PREFACE.

IT has been for ſome time faſhionable to make moſt parts of learning aſſume the form of a Dictionary. The learned Hofman's LEXICON UNIVERSALE, as it was the firſt, ſo probably it was the beſt of its kind. This excellent work was compriſed in four volumes folio, and gave a ſatisfactory account of all perſons and places remarkable in ancient or modern Hiſtory. To him ſucceeded Moreri, on a more enlarged plan; and ſince that time the French have publiſhed Dictionaries in every Art and Science whatſoever; Hiſtorical Dictionaries, Geographical, Natural, Mathematical, and Medical Dictionaries. They have moulded the Belle Lettres into this form, and have even given an alphabetical method to their very Jeſt-books.

It is eaſy however to ſee that moſt of theſe attempts are rather whimſical than uſeful; that ſome ſubjects are unfit to be thrown into that order; and that in many, the materials are ſo injudiciouſly combined, that the reader ſcarce knows what to look for. Mankind therefore are now beginning to reject this method of inſtruction which they have ſeen ſo frequently abuſed; and it is time that Dictionaries ſhould recur to their firſt manner, and dwell upon thoſe ſubjects to which they are beſt adapted.

In all thoſe Sciences where the parts are connected, or naturally grow out of each other, teaching by the deſultory alphabetical method is highly improper and erroneous. How little of a mathematical propoſition can be known by him who ſees it detached from all others upon which it depends in a Dictionary! what a confuſed ſyſtem of Ethics or Theology muſt that reader have who directs his reaſoning by the letters of the alphabet! The ſubjects therefore proper for a Dictionary are ſuch as conſiſt of many parts, and thoſe parts entirely independent on each other; conſequently, next to Languages, in which all the world is agreed on the neceſſity of Dictionaries, Geography and Biography claim the foremoſt place. Theſe were the ſubjects which originally formed the bulk of our greateſt and beſt Dictionaries, till caprice and faſhion began to pervert their utility.

Convinced therefore of the uſefulneſs of Dictionaries on ſome ſubjects, as well as of their futility in others; after mature deliberation we have ventured to offer the public a work of this kind, in the manner of Hofman, who may be conſidered as the father of the art. He ſaw the natural affinity between Geography and Biography, and united both in his laborious compilation. Theſe two parts of learning promote each other, and mutually excite the reader's curioſity. Every country is famous for remarkable men; he who knows the place deſires to know the inhabitant, and he who is acquainted with the inhabitant deſires information of the place of his birth. Alterius ſic altera poſcit opem & conjurat amice.

It muſt not be concealed, however, that Collier and others have endeavoured to walk in this track before us; but we may ſay with great truth, that all have been either diſguſtingly redundant or triflingly defective. From a work of this kind, publiſhed in our language in ten volumes folio, how few readers are there whoſe fortunes are equal to the purchaſe, how few whoſe leiſure is ſufficient for ſo tedious a compilation? From another again, in two volumes duodecimo, how little inſtruction can be expected? The readers curioſity in the former inſtance is ſuffocated by too great a load; in the latter it is excited, but not ſatisfied.

We have compriſed this work which we now offer the public in two volumes folio, which we conceive to be a mean between the oppoſite extremes, neither expenſively prolix, nor triflingly minute. In it we have endeavoured to comprehend all that is uſeful in former Dictionaries of this kind; and as we are come later, we have added all ſuch names of men and places as have grown into notice ſince the former were written: ſo that, if we do not flatter ourſelves, this work will contain a more copious catalogue, as well as a more ſatisfactory account of perſons and places than has hitherto appeared in any former compilation. Curioſity is faſhionably tranſient; the topics which were ardently purſued a century ago, are now totally neglected: by retrenching therefore ſuch long forgotten ſuperfluities, we have made room to inſert what is more adapted to modern learning, and what comes more immediately home to our preſent ſituation.

We are therefore confident in offering this work, though not as the moſt extended, yet as the moſt comprehenſive Dictionary of this kind ever yet publiſhed. It contains a Deſcription of places, and an Hiſtory of men who contributed to render thoſe places famous. In the former we have introduced whatever is curious or uſeful in Geography; in the latter, almoſt all that is worth knowing in Biography. To pretend to inſert all that is known on theſe ſubjects would be as imprudent as it would be impoſſible; hundreds of volumes would not be ſufficient even for the names of ſuch as have been at one time or other known in Hiſtory: the reader therefore muſt rely on our judgment for the ſelection, and we hope to be found ſkilful in the choice.

As to what concerns Geography, we have carefully been on our guard not to take our information from former Dictionaries or compilations of Geography, but from the Travellers themſelves who have viſited and ſeen the places they deſcribe. We have compared their accounts, and followed the moſt approved or the moſt plauſible. In this part, therefore, the reader will find a full and accurate deſcription of the Earth, the Continents, Iſlands, Oceans, Seas, Rivers, Lakes, and Harbours. He will find an account of the ſituation, extent, and boundaries of all the Countries of the World. He will be preſented with a conciſe yet ſatisfactory account of their government, revenues, forces, produce, manufactures, trade, cities, pictures, ruins, antiquities, mountains, vegetables, mines, and minerals; together with the language, learning, religion, manners, and cuſtoms of the inhabitants. In ſhort, it has been our deſign to melt down into one uniform maſs all that is to be found uſeful or entertaining in the various travels which have appeared ſince the revival of learning; and tho' incapable of affording a complete library of travels, yet at leaſt to furniſh an uſeful ſubſtitute.

In our biographical enquiries we have been ſtill more aſſiduous, as we have been more diffuſe. Had we been content with taking former compilers for our guides, the taſk would not have been difficult; but we ſhould thus only produce a work that would ſerve to multiply faults and perpetuate error. It is extraordinary with what ſeeming aſſiduity the very blunders of former Dictionaries have been adopted by their ſucceſſors, and how ignorance in ſome meaſure has become preſcriptive. For theſe reaſons we have applied to Hiſtory herſelf for great part of our informations; and if we be wrong at any time, it is from our earneſtneſs to follow the moſt authentic authorities. We have alſo endeavoured to avoid a fault too common with Moreri, Bayle, and other writers of Biographical Hiſtory. Their longeſt articles are frequently on the moſt trifling and unimportant perſonages; and this, becauſe they were more willing to ſhew their own learning than to increaſe that of their reader. In the preſent work the length of the account is generally proportioned to the importance of the character, except where it unavoidably happens that a great man's name, or works, are all that we have left of his hiſtory.

In this part of the work the reader will find a ſatisfactory account of all ſuch as have deſerved well of their country, or have notoriouſly merited its reſentment. He will here find an account as well of the fabulous perſonages of the ancients as of their real worthies. Philoſophers, Generals, Hiſtorians, Poets, and the inventors of uſeful arts, or the implacable diſturbers of mankind, here all paſs in review before him. By being informed of the inventors of arts and ſcience, the reader will be thus led to the ſciences themſelves, and what at firſt only ſeems to offer amuſement, will often become the happieſt introduction.

In the general ſurvey of mankind no country nor no tribe, how barbarous ſoever, has been wilfully omitted. Wherever we have found men conſpicuous from their virtues, their abilities, their ſtation, or their guilt, we have taken care to enroll them either as objects to allure us by their ſucceſs, or to deter us by their example. Thus we have not only made mention of Chineſe Monarchs, and Philoſophers, but alſo thoſe of Egypt and Arabia: as we have attempted to make our work the repoſitory of fame, the merit of every country has a right to an apartment.

But it is chiefly in the hiſtory of our own country that we have endeavoured to be more than uſually copious. The perſons and things neareſt us are always to us at leaſt the moſt important. Our own commerce, our own cities, and our own heroes, deſerve our firſt and longeſt attention. That attention we have given them, and upon that we ground no ſmall part of thoſe advantages we boaſt of poſſeſſing above other works of this nature. As Demoſthenes has ſaid upon a ſimilar occaſion, "It is fit to praiſe the Athenians among the Athenians."

In a Work obviouſly uſeful, let us avoid the ſuperfluity of profeſſion; it will be ſufficient to obſerve, that our Dictionary will ſerve as an uſeful index to the ſcholar, and perhaps as a competent geographical and biographical library to ſuch as have not the ambition to adorn themſelves with the trophies of more profound literature. However ſome may affect to deſpiſe our humble labours, and to conſider the makers of Dictionaries rather as drudges than candidates for fame, yet we cannot wholly relinquiſh the claim. We have a right to expect ſome applauſe for our diligence and perſeverance; we expect more for our judgment in ſelection and lopping off what was barren or exuberant in others; we hope that in point of ſtyle or ſimplicity of narration we have not been totally deficient. As for the reſt, we rely on the reader's candour, and we truſt that where he cannot praiſe, at leaſt he will be inclined to pardon.

DICTIONARY

WORLD.

A.

AA, a ſmall river in Weſtphalia, which riſes near Munſter, and watering that town falls into the river Embs, over againſt Greven.

AA, a ſmall river of Dutch Brabant, which riſes on the confines of the territories of Liege and Guelderland, waters the town of Helmont, and receiving ſeveral ſmall ſtreams falls into the Dommel a little below Bois-le-duc.

AA, a river of the county of Flanders, which has its ſource near Rumily, paſſes to Renty, St. Omers, and Gravelines, and ſoon after falls into the German ocean.

AA, or ALPHA, a river of Swiſſerland, which riſes in Mount Brunig, in the canton of Underwald, running through it from ſouth to north, and watering the town of Sarnen, falls into the lake Lucern.

AA, two ſmall rivers of the United Provinces, which proceeding from the Marſh called Bertang, in the territory of Drente, unite in Weſterwold, where they take the name of Weſterwolder Aa, and fall into the gulph of Dollart, near the confines of the county of Embden.

AA, or ALPHA, a ſmall river of Swiſſerland, whoſe ſource is in the canton of Lucern, and as it runs along forms two ſmall lakes, paſſes by Leintzburg, and ſoon after falls into the Aar between Arburg and Bruck.

AA, or ALPHA, a river of Weſtphalia, which riſes in the county of Lemgou, waters Detmold, and afterwards Hervorden, falling into the Weſer about eight miles above Minden.

AACH, a little town in Germany, in the circle of Suabia, near the ſource of the river Aach, and is nearly the ſame diſtance from the Danube and the lake Conſtance. It belongs to the houſe of Auſtria, and is 12 miles north-eaſt of Schaffhauſen, and twenty-five north-weſt of Conſtance. Long. 9. 0. E. Lat. 47. 55.

AAHUS, a little town in Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and the biſhoprick of Munſter. It is the capital of Aahus, a ſmall diſtrict; has a good caſtle, and lies north-eaſt of Coesfeldt. Long. 7. 1. E. Lat. 52. 10.

AAR, a great river of Swiſſerland, having its ſource in the Alps. It runs croſs the lake of Brientz and that of Thun, paſſing by Thun, Bern, Aarberg, Bure, Solure, Wangen, Arwangen, and Araw; and, after having received ſeveral rivers, falls into the Rhine over-againſt the town of Waldſhut.

AARON, the firſt high-prieſt of the Jews, was by the father's ſide great-grand-ſon, and by the mother's grand-ſon of Levi. He was born in Egypt three years before his brother Moſes, and about 1574 before Chriſt. Aaron always accompanied his brother, and ſpoke in his ſtead, both to the people and the king. The firſt miracles were performed by his rod, and he had a great ſhare in all that Moſes did to deliver the Iſraelites. But while Moſes was on Mount Sinai, Aaron had the weakneſs to ſuffer himſelf to be prevailed on by the intreaties of the people, to ſet up the golden calf, which the Iſraelites worſhipped by his conſent: but afterwards repenting, he was by order of God himſelf appointed high-prieſt of the Jews, an office that was confirmed to him and his family, by another miracle; for his rod, which was placed in the tabernacle, budded, and brought forth leaves and almonds. He died in the fortieth year after his departure from Egypt, upon Mount Hor, when he was an hundred and twenty-three years old: his ſon Eleazer being firſt choſen high-prieſt in his ſtead.

AARON and JULIUS (Saints) ſuffered martyrdom together in Britain, A. D. 303, during the perſecution of the emperor Diocleſian. They are joined together in the Roman martyrology, and their feſtival placed on the firſt of July.

AARON BEN ASER, a celebrated rabbi, who, in the fifth century, had a ſhare in the invention of the Hebrew points and accents.

AARON OF ALEXANDRIA, a Chriſtian prieſt and phyſician, who flouriſhed in Egypt about the year 621. He is the moſt antient author who has treated of the ſmall-pox.

AARON AL RASCHID, or AMIRAS I. king of Perſia, and the fifth caliph of the race of the Abbaſſides, whoſe reign was a continued train of proſperity and conqueſts. He was mild, humane, and a friend to men of letters. In his time the Arabs began to trade with China. He died A. D. 809, after a reign of forty-three years.

AARON, (ISAAC) a Greek, who was made priſoner at Corinth, when that city was taken by Roger, king of Sicily, about the year 1148, and carried into Italy, where he ſerved as interpreter to the emperor Emanuel Comnenus: but betraying that prince's intereſt, while, in his preſence, he was interpreting his will to the ambaſſadors of the Weſtern nations, his eyes were ordered to be put out. But his miſerable condition could not ſuppreſs his ſtrong propenſity to miſchief; for he inſinuated to Andronicus Comnenus, who had uſurped the government, that his enemies ought to be deprived not only of their eyes, but of their tongues: however, the conſequence of this inhuman counſel ſoon proved fatal to himſelf; for Iſaac, furnamed the Angel, having driven Andronicus from the throne, ordered Aaron's tongue to be cut out.

AARON HAACHERON, i. e. Aaron the latter, to diſtinguiſh him from the former, was born at Nicomedia in 1346. The Caraite Jews ſet ſuch a value on his opinions, that they cite them as decrees. His principal works are, The Garden of Eden, which contains the doctrines and cuſtoms of the Caraites; a Commentary on Iſaiah, and a Treatiſe on the Foundation of the Laws.

AARON HARISCHON, i. e. Aaron the firſt, a celebrated rabbi and Caraite, who practiſed phyſic at Conſtantinople in 1294. He wrote a learned Commentary on the Pentateuch, which is in MS. in the French king's library; a good Hebrew grammar printed at Conſtantinople in 1581; and many other works.

AARON BEN CHAIM, a famous rabbi, the chief of the ſynagogues of Fez and Morocco, at the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He wrote a Commentary on Joſhua, intitled, The Heart of Aaron, printed at Venice in 1609, in folio; which is very ſcarce; and alſo ſome other works.

AARON SCHASCHON, a celebrated rabbi, the chief of the ſynagogue of Theſſalonica. His principal works are, The Law of Truth, in which he anſwers two hundred and thirty-two queſtions on buying, ſelling, &c. and The Book of Truth, in which he explains the Toſephoth and Gemara.

AARSENS, or AERSENS, (FRANCIS) lord of Someldyck and Spyck, &c. and one of the ableſt miniſters the United Provinces could ever boaſt. He wrote very judicious memoirs on his embaſſies to France and England, during the reign of Henry IV. of France.

AARSENS, or AERSENS, (PETER) called in Italy Pietro Longo, on account of the tallneſs of his ſtature, was an excellent painter, born at Amſterdam in 1519. He was eminent for all kinds of ſubjects; particularly for altar-pieces, and for repreſenting a kitchen with its furniture.

AARTGEN, or rather AERTGEN, of Leyden, was very much eſteemed by the painters of his time, and among others by the celebated Francis Floris, who having a great curioſity to ſee him, went to Leyden for that purpoſe. He enquired for Aertgen's habitation, which was a little wretched hovel half ruined, ſituated near the city walls. Aertgen not being at home, Floris deſired his ſcholars to ſhew him the room where their maſter painted, ſaying that he was come a great way to ſee his works. Accordingly they conducted him into a very mean upper apartment. Floris viewed the paintings, and taking up a bit of charcoal, ſketched on the wall, as large as it would admit, a St. Luke, with an ox's head, and the painters arms, and went away. Aertgen being returned, and hearing that an unknown ſtranger had been there, flew to the draught, and at firſt ſight cried, "This ſketch is ſo beautiful, that it muſt be Floris's." Our painter entertaining a very mean opinion of himſelf, was confounded to think that ſo celebrated an artiſt ſhould come to viſit him. Floris ſent for him, and being together, the latter ſtrongly ſolicited his brother-painter to go with him to Antwerp, promiſing that he ſhould be richly rewarded for his labour: but Aertgen giving him many thanks, declared that he found more ſweets in his poverty, than others did in the greateſt riches. Aertgen was fond of drinking and of nocturnal rambles, and was at laſt unhappily drowned in the year 1564, when ſixty-ſix years of age.

ABACH, a market-town of Germany, in Lower Bavaria, ſeated on the Danube, ſix miles ſouth-weſt of Ratiſbon, and twenty-nine north of Landſhut. It is remarkable for Roman antiquities and ſprings of mineral waters, which are ſaid to be good for various diſtempers. Long. 11. 56. E. Lat. 48. 53.

ABAGA, king of the Tartars, ſent ambaſſadors to the ſecond general council of Lyons in 1274. This prince conquered Perſia, and rendered himſelf formidable to the Chriſtians who had ſettled in the Holy Land.

ABAKA KHAN, the eighteenth emperor of the Moguls of the race of Genghis Khan, ſucceeded his father Holagou Khan A. D. 1264. He reigned ſeventeen years, and is by ſome authors ſaid to have been a Chriſtian, on account of his keeping the feaſt of Eaſter ſome ſhort time before his death: but it was common in thoſe times of brotherly love, for Chriſtians and Mahometans to join together in keeping the ſame feaſts.

ABALAK, a town in Siberia, two miles from Tobolſkoi, where there is a famous picture of the Virgin Mary, that is conſtantly viſited by a great number of pilgrims: the clergy carry this image every year in proceſſion to Tobolſkoi, where it is kept for a fortnight. Lon. 64. 10. E. Lat. 57. 1.

ABANO, a town of the Paduano, in the republick of Venice, famous among the antients for its hot baths. It is five miles ſouth-weſt of Padua, and fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Vicentia. Long. 10. 7. E. Lat. 45. 20.

ABANTES, a people who came originally from Thrace and ſettled in Phoceca, a country of Greece, where they built a town which they called Aba, after the name of Abas their leader; and if we may credit ſome antient authors, the Abantes went afterwards into the iſland Eubœa, now called Negropont: others ſay the Abantes of Eubœa came from Athens. The Abantes were a very warlike people, cloſing with their enemies, and fighting hand to hand.

ABARA, a town in the Greater Armenia, under the dominion of the Turks: it is often the reſidence of the archbiſhop of Nakſivan, from which place it is twenty miles north. Long. 46. 25. Lat. 39. 45.

ABARANER, a town of Aſia, in Grand Armenia, belonging to the Turks. It is ſeated on the river Alingena, twenty miles north of Nakſivan. Long. 46. 30. Lat. 39. 50.

ABARIS, an ambaſſador ſent by the Hyperboreans to Athens, about 564 years before the Chriſtian æra. He was one of thoſe barbarians whoſe virtue and wiſdom were the admiration of Greece. It is ſaid that he was capable of foretelling tempeſts and earthquakes.

ABAS, in the heathen mythology, was the ſon of Hypothoon and Meganira, who entertained Ceres, and offered a ſacrifice to that goddeſs; but Abas ridiculing the ceremony, and giving her opprobrious language, ſhe ſprinkled him with a certain mixture ſhe held in her cup, on which he became a newt, or water-lizard.

ABAS, (SCHAH) ſurnamed the Great, was third ſon of Codabendi, ſeventh king of the race of the Sophis. Mirza Salmas, his father's prime miniſter, being deſirous of ſacrificing this young prince to the intereſt of Emir Hemſe, his ſon-in-law, and having moreover a ſtrong antipathy to his perſon, conſpired againſt his life, by inſinuating to his father that he was about to raiſe a rebellion amongſt his ſubjects. Abas, having intelligence of this treachery, ſent two noblemen, his friends, with proteſtations of his loyalty; when, upon a ſtrict enquiry, he was cleared of the barbarous aſperſion, and the wicked miniſter was put to death. On the death of his father, Abas ſucceeded to the throne in 1585, being no more than eighteen years of age. Upon his acceſſion to the crown, finding the treaſury in a manner exhauſted, occaſioned by the conqueſts of the Turks and Tartars, he reſolved immediately to attempt the recovery of thoſe provinces which they had invaded. In purſuance of this reſolution he entered with an army into Chorazin, defeated the forces of Abdallah, prince of the Uſbeck Tartars, and cut off his head. Having made himſelf maſter of this province, he returned to Iſpahan, where he fixed his reſidence; and adorning the city with many noble edifices, conſtituted it the capital of his dominions. He afterwards turned his arms againſt the Turks, over whom he obtained ſeveral victories: he likewiſe retook the iſland of Ormus from the Portugueſe. He died in 1629, after a reign of forty-four years, which had been truly glorious, were it not ſtained with ſome cruel actions, and thoſe too againſt his own children. He was not only a mighty general, but a very ſubtle politician, which particularly appears from the very laſt action of his life, when he gave poſitive orders that his death ſhould be concealed till the ſucceſſion ſhould be ſecured to Schah Sefi his grandſon. Theſe orders were punctually obeyed in the following manner. His body was expoſed every day in the hall where he uſed to adminiſter juſtice, ſeated upon the tribunal with the eyes open; behind the tapeſtry was ſecretly placed the Aga Juſuf, who by the means of a ſilken cord lifted up his arm, while Timerbeg made a ſhew of repreſenting to him the ſeveral grievances of the people; by which ſtratagem his death was not publickly known for the ſpace of ſix weeks.

ABAS (SCHAH) the ſecond ſon of Sefi, and grandſon of the prince above-mentioned, was the ninth king of Perſia, of the blood of the Sophis. He came to the crown in 1642, at thirteen years of age, after having narrowly eſcaped being rendered incapable of the ſucceſſion, by the cruelty of his father Sefi, who had already put his eldeſt ſon to death, and gave orders to one of the eunuchs to paſs the iron over the eyes of his ſecond ſon; but the eunuch having compaſſion for the youth, and availing himſelf of the ambiguity of Sefi's expreſſion, only paſſed a cold iron over his eyes, and aſſured the king his orders were complied with. In the mean time Abas, being inſtructed by the eunuch, acted the part of a blind man ſo well, that no body ſuſpected the impoſture. When Schah Sefi was upon his death-bed, he greatly repented of his cruelty and folly, in depriving himſelf of an heir to his throne, by incapacitating his only ſurviving ſon. The eunuch perceiving his affliction, and hearing him declare he ſhould die contentedly, provided his ſon could ſucceed him, aſſured the king that he had a ſecret, by the means of which he could reſtore his ſon to his ſight. The king was overjoyed at this information; and ſeeing, by the ſuppoſed recovery of Abas, that the eunuch's ſecret had its deſired effect, his tranſport was ſo great, that it prolonged his life many days. Abas, on account of his tender age, committed the adminiſtration of affairs to his mother, in conjunction with Athemal-Doulet, an ancient perſon in whom ſhe placed a ſingular confidence; but at the age of ſixteen, he took the reins of government into his own hands. Abas was but eighteen years old when he beſieged the city of Candahar, which in the former reign had been taken by the Great Mogul; yet he retook it, and all the country round about it, notwithſtanding the efforts of that Indian emperor, who beſieged it more than once with an army of 300,000 men. This prince was equally adored by his ſubjects and dreaded by his neighbours; he was ſtrictly juſt, of an exalted turn of mind, a lover of foreigners, and openly protected the Chriſtians, whom he tolerated in the exerciſe of their religion; declaring, that "God alone was the lord of the conſciences of men." He formed the deſign of extending the limits of his empire to the North, and for this purpoſe amaſſed great ſums of money, not by taxing his ſubjects, but by retrenching ſuperfluous expences, and leaving vacant many uſeleſs poſts, to which great revenues were annexed; but death put an end to his projects; for this truly great king died on the 25th of September 1666, of the venereal diſeaſe, aged thirty-ſeven.

ABASCIA, or ABCAS, a country in Aſia, tributary to the Turks, ſituated on the coaſt of the Black Sea. The people are poor, thieviſh, and treacherous, inſomuch that there is no trading with them, without the utmoſt caution. Their commodities are furs, buck and tyger ſkins, linen yarn, box-wood and bees-wax; but their greateſt traffic is in ſelling their own children, and even one another, to the Turks; inſomuch that they live in perpetual diſtruſt: they are deſtitute of many neceſſaries of life, and have nothing among them that can be called a town, though we find Anacopia, Dandar, and Czekorni, mentioned in the maps. They have the name of Chriſtians, but have nothing left but the name, any more than the Mingrelians, their northern neighbours. The men are robuſt and active, and the women are fair and beautiful; on which account the Turks have a great value for the female ſlaves which they purchaſe from among them. Their cuſtoms are much the ſame as thoſe of the Mingrelians, which ſee. Long. from 39 to 43. E. Lat. from 43 to 45.

ABASSON, a famous impoſtor, who went into France, where he paſſed for a Perſian prince, by which means he got conſiderable ſums of money. From thence he went to Iſpahan, the capital of Perſia, where he concealed himſelf till he had obtained a thorough knowledge of the language and manners of the Perſians. He then ingratiated himſelf into the eſteem of a Perſian lady, and declared that he was brother to the king of Perſia, the ſon of Solyman, and grandſon of Abas the Great; that his mother, who was an Arabian, had hid him immediately after his birth, for fear the king ſhould ſacrifice him, as he had already done his brothers; and that he had at laſt reſolved to free his countrymen from the tyranny of a prince, who unjuſtly poſſeſſed a crown to which he only had a right by his birth. To make this ſtory ſtill more plauſible, he cauſed the name of Solyman to be graven on an emerald, with that of a ſon of his, born of an Armenian woman, but who died a child: in ſhort, he in a little time ſo far infatuated ſeveral Armenian merchants, that they collected large ſums of money for him, and adviſed him to go into Turky, and beg the Sultan's aſſiſtance, in order to reſtore him to the Perſian throne. The Grand Signior having notice of his arrival, offered him 500 rixdollars (that is, about 35 l. ſterling) a day, and a guard of Janiſzaries; but theſe offers he refuſed, as beneath the dignity of ſo great a prince. This magnanimity, as his friends called it, ſo endeared him to the Armenians, that they furniſhed him liberally with money, ſo as to live in a manner ſuitable to his ſuppoſed birth: but the Grand Signior ſoon ſuſpecting him to be an impoſtor, had him ſeized, and ſent under a ſtrong guard to the iſle of Lemnos; and then ſending to Iſpahan, to enquire into the truth of the affair, and finding that his ſuſpicions were well founded, ordered him to be beheaded, with three of his abettors, and their heads were expoſed to the view of the whole army before the vizier's tent; an unfortunate end, but common to ſuch adventurers.

ABBADIE (James) a celebrated Proteſtant divine, born at Noy in the province of Bearn, in 1654. After having ſtudied at Sedan, and travelled into Holland and Germany, he was made miniſter of the French church at Berlin, from whence he came to London in 1690, where he was for ſome time miniſter of the French church in the Savoy, and was afterwards promoted to the deanery of Killalow in Ireland. He died at St. Mary-le-Bonne, near London, in 1727, aged 73. He publiſhed ſeveral works in French that were much eſteemed, the principal of which were, A Treatiſe on the Truth of the Chriſtian Religion; The Art of knowing one's ſelf; A Defence of the Britiſh Nation; and The Hiſtory of the laſt Conſpiracy in England, written by order of King William III.

ABBANO, or APONO, (Peter d') a celebrated phyſician, born at Abano in 1250, was profeſſor of medicine at Bologna. It is ſaid that he would never leave that city to viſit a ſick perſon, unleſs he was allowed 50 crowns a day; and that he would not go to Rome to cure Honorius IV. till he had bargained for 400 crowns a day. It is alſo ſaid that he had ſuch an averſion to milk, that he could not ſee thoſe who eat it without diſguſt. Abbano was accuſed of magic, and died in 1316, while the inquiſitors were carrying on his proſecution: they however condemned him after his death, and cauſed him to be publicly burnt in effigy. His principal works are, 1. Conciliator differentiarum Philoſophorum & præcipue Medicorum. 2. De Venenis, eorumque remediis. 3. Supplementum in meſuem. 4. Expoſitio problematum Ariſtotelis, &c.

ABBAS, ſon of Abdalmothleb, and Mahomet's uncle, oppoſed his nephew with all his power, eſteeming him an impoſtor and infidel; but in the ſecond year of the Hegira, being overcome and made a priſoner at the battle of Bendir in 623, a great ranſom being demanded for him, he repreſented to Mahomet, that his paying it would reduce him to poverty, which would redound to the diſhonour of the family. But Mahomet having been informed of Abbas's having ſecreted large ſums of money, aſked him after the purſes of gold he had left in his mother's cuſtody at Mecca. Abbas, upon this, conceiving him to be really a prophet, embraced his new religion, became one of his principal captains, and ſaved his life when in imminent danger at the battle of Henain, againſt the Thakefites, ſoon after the reduction of Mecca. But beſides being a great commander, Abbas was a famous doctor of the muſſulman law, inſomuch that he read lectures upon every chapter of the Koran, as his nephew pretended to receive them one by one from heaven. He died in 652, and his memory is held in the utmoſt veneration among the muſſulmen to this day.

ABBASA, the ſiſter of Harun Al Raſchid, the fifth khalif of the race of the Abaſſides. The khalif, her brother, married her to Giafer his favourite, on the hard condition that they ſhould not bed together; but their reciprocal paſſion making them diſregard the condition, ſhe had a ſon, who was privately ſent to Mecca to be nurſed. Raſchid hearing of this, was extremely exaſperated, and, according to ſome Perſian authors, cauſed Giafer to be beheaded, and Abbaſa to be confined for the reſt of her life in a dungeon.

ABBASSIDES, the deſcendants of Abbas the uncle of Mahomet, who poſſeſſed the khalifate for the ſpace of five hundred and twenty-four years. The dynaſty, or government of the Abbaſſides, began with Abul Abbas Saffah, the grandſon of Mahomet's uncle, A. D. 718, who dethroned the Ommiades; after which there were thirty-ſeven khalifs of that family, who ſucceeded each other without interruption.

ABBEVILLE, a conſiderable city of France in Picardy, and the capital of Ponthieu: the river Somme runs through the middle of it, and divides it into two parts. It has a collegiate church and twelve pariſh-churches, the moſt conſiderable of which are St. George's and St. Giles's, beſides a great number of monaſteries and nunneries, a bailiwic, and a preſidial court. It is a fortified town, and the walls are flanked with baſtions, and ſurrounded by large ditches, and was never yet taken. The country about it is low, marſhy, and dirty. It is pretty well peopled, and is famous for its woollen manufactory. It is about fifteen miles eaſt of the Britiſh channel, and ſhips may come from thence by the river Somme to the middle of the town. It is ninety miles almoſt directly north of Paris. Long. 2. 6. E. Lat. 50. 7.

ABBEY, the name of religious houſes governed by a ſuperior, under the title of Abbot or Abbeſs. Theſe were formerly religious houſes, where men retired from the world to ſpend their time in ſolitude and devotion; but they ſoon degenerated from their original inſtitution, and procured large privileges, exemptions and riches. There were many of them in England before the Reformation, ſo rich that they were very injurious to the public. Their lands were ſaid to be held in mortmain, and could never revert to the lords. Theſe places were wholly aboliſhed in England at the time of the Reformation; Henry VIII. having firſt appointed viſitors to inſpect into the lives of the monks and nuns, which were found very diſorderly: upon which, the abbots were perſuaded to reſign their houſes to the king, who by that means became inveſted with the abbey lands: theſe were afterwards granted to different perſons, whoſe deſcendants enjoy them at this day: they were then valued at 2,853,000 l. per annum, an immenſe ſum in thoſe days.

ABBEY-BOYLE, a town of Ireland, in the county of Roſcommon, and province of Connaught, twenty-three miles north of Roſcommon. Long. 8. 32. W. Lat. 53. 54. It is remarkable for an old abbey.

ABBEY-HOLM, a town in Cumberland, ſo called from an abbey built there by David king of Scots. It ſtands on an arm of the ſea, and had a market on Saturdays; it has now a fair on October 29, for horſes and horned cattle: it is ſixteen miles ſouth-weſt of Carliſle. Long. 2. 38. W. Lat. 54. 45.

ABBON, or ALBON, abbot of Fleury, was one of the moſt learned, pious, and illuſtrious monks of his time. He zealouſly defended the privileges of the monks, and was murdered on the 13th of November, 1004, as he was going to viſit the abbey of Reole, in order to put it under ſome regulations. He wrote in Latin, 1. An Apology for the Monks. 2. His Letters. 3. The Life of St. Edmund king of England: and 4. A Collection of Canons.

ABBOT (George) archbiſhop of Canterbury, was a ſheerman's ſon, and was born at Guildford in Surry, October 29, 1562. While his mother was pregnant with him, ſhe is ſaid to have had a dream, which being thought to be an omen, really proved a means of his advancement: ſhe fancied ſhe was told in her ſleep, that if ſhe could eat a pike, the child ſhe went with would prove a ſon, and ariſe to great preferment. Not long after this, in taking a pail of water out of the river Wey, which ran by their houſe, ſhe accidentally caught a pike. This being talked of, and coming to the ears of ſome perſons of diſtinction, they offered to become ſponſors for the child, which was gladly accepted; and afterwards they beſtowed many favours on him when he was at ſchool, and at the univerſity of Oxford. He was ſucceſſively maſter of Univerſity College, dean of Wincheſter, chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford, biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, then of London; and on the 9th of April, 1611, was tranſlated to the archbiſhopric of Canterbury: but ſome years after, being invited by the Lord Zouch to hunt in his park at Bramzill, he let fly a bearded arrow from a croſs-bow at one of the deer, which unhappily pierced the arm of the keeper, who was entirely out of the biſhop's ſight, and opening a large blood-veſſel, he bled to death in an hour's time. This accident ſo deeply affected the biſhop, that he not only ſettled an annuity of 20 l. upon the widow, but fell into a deep melancholy, and ever after kept a monthly faſt on Tueſday, the day on which this fatal miſchance happened. Some time after this the duke of Buckingham, his declared enemy, cauſed him to be ſuſpended from his archiepiſcopal functions and the primacy: he was at length however reſtored, but died ſoon after, on the 4th of Auguſt 1633, aged 71 years. He was one of the eight learned divines of Oxford, to whom the care of tranſlating the whole New Teſtament, except the Epiſtles, was committed: he alſo wrote An Expoſition of the Prophecy of Jonah, and ſeveral other works. He ſhewed himſelf in moſt circumſtances of his life, a man of great moderation to all parties, and was deſirous that the clergy ſhould attract the eſteem of the laity rather by the ſanctity of their manners than their function.

Abbot (Robert) biſhop of Saliſbury, was brother to the former, and was born at Guildford in 1660. He took his doctor's degree at Oxford, was afterwards made principal of Baliol College, and king's profeſſor of divinity. The ſubject of his lectures, which was the authority of kings, pleaſed king James I. ſo much, that 'tis believed theſe alone raiſed him to the ſee of Saliſbury. Beſides his book on the Power of Kings, he publiſhed An Anſwer to Eudæmon Johannis's Apology for Henry Garnet; A Latin Commentary on St. Paul's Epiſtles, and other works, particularly ſeveral pieces againſt the Roman catholics. He applied to the the duties of his function with great diligence and aſſiduity, viſiting his whole dioceſe in perſon, and preaching every Sunday; but his ſedentary life, and cloſe application to his ſtudies, brought upon him the gravel and ſtone, of which he died on the ſecond of March 1617, in the eightieth year of his age.

ABBOT, (MAURICE, or rather MORRIS) was a younger brother of the former, and acquired great reputation in trade. He was one of the commiſſioners employed in the negotiation and concluſion of a treaty with the Dutch Eaſt India company, by which one-third of the commerce to the Molucca iſlands was declared to belong to the Engliſh; and was one of the council for ſettling the colony of Virginia. He was knighted by king Charles I. and in 1638, was lord mayor of London. He died January 10, 1640.

ABBOTS BROMLEY, a town in Staffordſhire, with a market on Tueſday. After the diſſolution of the monaſteries it was given to the lord Paget, and has ſince been called Paget's Bromley, and is ſo denominated in the county map. But it retains its old name in the king's books, and is a diſcharged vicaridge of 30l. clear yearly value. It likewiſe retains the old name with regard to the fairs, which are three, and all for horſes and horned cattle They are on the Thurſday before Mid-lent Sunday, the twenty-ſecond of May, and the twenty-fourth of Auguſt. It is ſix miles eaſt of Stafford, ſeven north of Litchfield, and a hundred and twenty-eight north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 2. W. Lat. 52. 45.

ABBOTSBURY, a ſmall town in Dorſetſhire, with a market on Thurſday, ſeven miles weſt of Weymouth, ſeven ſouth-weſt of Dorcheſter, and a hundred and thirty-three weſt-by-ſouth of London. The fair is on July the tenth, for ſheep and toys. Long. 1. 17. W. Lat. 50. 40. The abbey near this town was founded by a Norman lady, about the year 1026. Edward the Confeſſor and William the Conqueror were conſiderable benefactors thereto.

ABDALCADER, a famous grammarian, author of the Aouamal, which was commented on by Ebn Heſchain, and is in the French king's library. It was printed at Rome with a Latin tranſlation, under the title of Centum Regentes. He alſo compoſed an abridgment of the Arabic Dictionary of Gianhari.

ABDALLA, the father of Mahomet, and the ſon of Abdalmothleb.

ABDALLA, the ſon of Ali, the huſband of Fatima, Mahomet's daughter. He was uncle to Abul Abbas and Almanſor, the two firſt khalifs of the Abbaſſides, and uſed the moſt effectual means to eſtabliſh his family on the ruins of the Ommiades; by which means he ſecured the empire to his nephew Abul Abbas Saffah. But after his death, diſliking his nephew Almanſor, he took arms and cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed Khalif: but he did not long enjoy this dignity, for being defeated in battle by Abu Moſlem, Almanſor's general, he fled to Baſſora; but at length being diſcovered and taken, he was impriſoned in a houſe, the foundation of which, it is ſaid, was laid with ſtones of ſalt; and Almanſor having turned a water-courſe againſt the foot of the building, the houſe ſoon fell, and involved Abdalla in its ruins.

ABDALLA, the ſon of Ibrahim, and great-grandſon of Tamerlain. Upon his father's death in 1481, he became poſſeſſed of the ſovereignty of Fars, or Perſia, properly ſo called; but four years after was diſpoſſeſſed by his couſin-german, and obliged to fly to his uncle Uleg Beg, who then reigned in Tranſoxane, and gave him his daughter in marriage. Uleg Beg having been killed in a battle fought againſt his ſon Abdallathif, and the latter not enjoying the ſucceſs of his parricide above ſix months, Abdalla, as ſon-in-law to Uleg Beg, took poſſeſſion of his dominions. But Abuſaid, his couſin-german, who reigned in Khorazan, declared war againſt him, and defeated him in a pitched battle, in which he periſhed.

ABDALLA, the ſon of Yezid, a famous lawyer among the Muſſulmans, was the diſciple of Abu Hureira and Ebn Abbas, both of whom were the companions of Mahomet. He is noted for ſaying, "That a wiſe and able doctor ought to leave to his "ſucceſſors and diſciples ſome points of the law for them to ex- "plain, and therefore ought never to bluſh at ſaying La "Adri, i. e. I do not know."

ABDALLA, the ſon of Omar, was a wiſe and generous Arabian. He is ſaid to have beſtowed thirty thouſand drachmas (about 500l.) at one time, and to have generouſly given freedom to a thouſand of his ſlaves. He was one of the Muſſulmans who was dignified by the title of Sabaha, i. e. the companions of the prophet.

ABDALLA, ſurnamed Motaſeb Billah, drove the Aglabites out of Africa, and placed Obeidallah, one of the family of Ali, on the throne; but after this prince was well eſtabliſhed, he ungratefully put this Abdalla, to whom he owed his advancement, to death. See the article OBEIDALLAH.

ABDALLA, the ſon of Zobair. After the battle of Kerbela, in which Huſſain the ſon of Ali was ſlain, the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina made an inſurrection againſt Yezid, the ſecond khalif of the race of the Ommiades, and proclaimed this Abdalla, a deſcendant of Ali, khalif of the Muſſulmans. Yezid receiving news of this revolt, ſent one of his heralds to Mecca, with a collar or yoke of ſilver, ordering him to tell Abdalla, in his name, that if he would ſubmit himſelf to him, and wear that yoke, he would let him live peaceably at Mecca; but if he refuſed to acknowledge him for khalif, he would come and put that collar about his neck, and drag him to Damaſcus. Abdalla refuſing to accept of theſe terms, Yezid took and pillaged Medina, and then beſieged Mecca, where Abdalla had fortified himſelf: but Yezid dying during the ſiege, the army drew off, and Abdalla remained peaceable poſſeſſor of the khalifate, and his ſovereignty was acknowledged by all the provinces of the empire, except thoſe of Syria and Paleſtine, which ſubmitted to Moavie, the ſon of Yezid. He enjoyed this dignity nine years; but at length khalif Abdalmalek, the ſon of Marvan, the ſucceſſor of Moavie, who then reigned in Syria, ſent Hegiage his general with an army, to form the ſiege of Mecca. Abdalla defended himſelf for ſeven months, and gave evident proofs of great courage, both in oppoſing the aſſaults of the enemy, and in enduring the utmoſt extremity of hunger, thirſt, and heat: but at length, during an aſſault, he was killed with a ſtone; upon which his head was cut off, and ſent to the khalif Abdalmalek. This Abdalla, though very valiant, was to the laſt degree covetous; ſo that it became a proverb among the Arabians, that "Courage and liberality "were ever united, except in the perſon of Abdalla the ſon of "Zobair."

ABDALLA, the ſon of Moavie, and grandſon of Giafer, the brother of Ali. When the people began to be diſguſted with the government of the Ommiades, and to caſt their views to the Abbaſſides, in order to raiſe them to the ſovereignty, he was ſupported by a great party in the city of Couſah, where the memory of Ali was held in great veneration, and there proclaimed khalif; but was ſoon driven from thence, and forced to fly into the province of Khoraſan, where Abou Moſlem, who ſupported the party of the Abbaſſides, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated.

ABDALLA, the ſon of Jaſſin, the firſt doctor of the ſect of the Almoravides, or African Marabouts, condemned to death Giauhar Gedali, the chief and prince of the Marabouts, for tranſgreſſing againſt a law which he himſelf had impoſed.

ABDALLA the Mohavedin, a native of Tenmellet in Barbary, and author of the Mohavedins or Almohades, aſſembled, by his ſermons, a great number of perſons, and put Abdulmumen at their head, who dethroned and beheaded Abraham king of Morocco. Abdalla died ſoon after, about the year 1148.

ABDALLA BEN MASSUD. See MASSUD.

ABDALMALEK, or APDALMELEK, the ſon of Mirvan, and the fifth khalif of the race of the Ommiades, began his reign in 684, and was ſurnamed, from his extreme avarice, Raſch al Hegiarat, i. e. the Skinner of a Stone. It is ſaid that his breath had ſuch a noxious ſmell, that it killed the flies that ſettled on his lips: yet he ſurpaſſed all his predeceſſors in power; for he conquered India, made himſelf maſter of Mecca and Medina, and penetrated even into Spain.

ABDALMALEK, the ſon of Nouh (or Noah) Ben Naſſer, and of the race of the Samanides, ſucceeded his father Noah, and was thereby obliged to enter into a war with Roeneddoulat, a prince of the family of the Bouides: but after many battles fought, this laſt was obliged to pay to Abdalmalek the yearly tribute of two hundred thouſand gold drachmas, which had been formerly ſtipulated with his father Noah. This prince reigned ſeven years, and died of a fall from his horſe in the year 961.

ABDALMALEK (BEN NOAH BEN MANSOR) the ninth and laſt prince of the race of the Samanides, ſucceeded his brother Manſor, after he had deprived him of his ſight and crown; but this inhuman monſter had reigned but ſixteen months and ſeventeen days, when Mahmoud, ſultan of the Gaznevides, took poſſeſſion of his empire, and, in the year 999, made it paſs from the monarchs of the race of the Samanides to that of the Gaznevides. This prince loſt his kingdom, liberty, and life, for careſſing his brother's murderers; for truſting the government of his dominions to his ſlaves and flatterers; for depending for his ſupport on the aſſiſtance of foreigners; and for oppreſſing his own ſubjects.

ABDALMALEK (BEN SALEH BEN ABDALLAH BEN ABBAS, was related in blood to the prophet Mahomet; and being inveſted by the khalif Harun Al Raſchid with the government of Egypt, that khalif, when he ſent him thither, gave him the following inſtructions: "So behave thyſelf in thine office, as one who "negotiates with God on the behalf of his ſervants. A wiſe "merchant, when he finds that no profit ariſes from his com- "merce, will withdraw his capital in time. When thou art at the "head of thy troops, never let them pillage the place where "thou intendeſt to quarter; and in ſtratagems of war, ſeek ra- "ther to conceal thine own, than to diſcover thoſe of the ene- "my." He continued in his government till about the year 792; when Harun ſuſpecting that he was engaged in ſome cabals, in order to obtain the empire, threw him into priſon, where he continued till Harun's death; when his ſon Ainm delivered him, and inveſted him with the government of Syria.

ABDALMALEK BEN ZOHAR, an eminent phyſician, commonly called by the Europeans Avenzoar. See AVENZOAR.

ABDALMOTHLEB, or ABDAL MATALEB, the ſon of Haſkem, the father of Abdalla, and grandfather of Mahomet the prophet of the Muſſulmans, was, it is ſaid, of ſuch wonderful beauty, that all women who ſaw him fell in love with him; which may have given occaſion to that prophetic light, which, according to the Arabians, ſhone on the foreheads of him, his anceſtors and deſcendants, it being certain that they were very handſome and graceful men. He died when Mahomet was only eight or nine years old, aged, according to ſome, an hundred and ten, and according to other writers an hundred and twenty.

ABDALONYMUS, or ABDOLONYMUS, of the royal family of Sidon, and deſcended from king Cinyras, was contented to live in obſcurity, and get his living by cultivating a garden, while Strato was in poſſeſſion of the crown of Sidon. Alexander the Great having depoſed Strato, enquired whether any of the race of Cinyras was living, that he might ſet him on the throne. It was generally thought that the whole race was extinct; but at laſt Abdalonymus was thought of, and mentioned to Alexander, who immediately ordered ſome of his ſoldiers to fetch him. They found the good man at work, happy in his poverty, and entirely a ſtranger to the noiſe of arms, with which all Aſia was at that time diſturbed; and they could ſcarcely perſuade him that they were in earneſt. Alexander was convinced of his high deſcent by the dignity that appeared in his perſon; but was deſirous of learning from him in what manner he bore his poverty. "I wiſh, ſaid Abdalonymus, I may bear my new "condition as well: Theſe hands have ſupplied my neceſſities: "I have had nothing, and I have wanted nothing." This anſwer pleaſed Alexander ſo much, that beſides giving him all that was Strato's, he augmented his dominions, and gave him a large preſent out of the Perſian ſpoils.

ABDALRASCHID, or ABDERRASCHID, the ſon of Sultan Mahmoud, and the eighth prince of the Dynaſty of the Gaznevides, was kept in priſon the greateſt part of his life, but being proclaimed Sultan after the death of Ali his nephew, he gave the government of Segeſtan to Togrul the Turk; who had afterwards the ingratitude to dethrone and murder his maſter, with all his family, except one daughter whom he married. Abdalraſchid was murdered in the 445th year of the Hegira, A. D. 1053.

ABDAS, a Perſian biſhop, in the reign of Theodoſius the younger, by his raſh zeal occaſioned the moſt dreadful calamities. He demoliſhed a temple conſecrated by the Magi to fire; on which the king of Perſia, who had hitherto ſuffered the Chriſtians to enjoy the free exerciſe of their religion, after a gentle cenſure, ordered Abdas to rebuild the temple. Abdas refuſed, though the monarch declared that in caſe of his diſobedience he would deſtroy all the Chriſtian churches. He put his threats in execution, and abandoned the faithful to the mercy of the Magi, who fell upon them with the utmoſt fury; and Abdas was the firſt who ſuffered death upon this occaſion. During this perſecution, the Chriſtians applied for ſuccour to Theodoſius, and by this means kindled a war between the emperors of Perſia and Greece, which laſted thirty years.

ABDELATIF, great khan of Tartary, and the laſt of the race of Gengis-Khan, died in the year 1435.

ABDEMELEK, or MULEY-MOLUK, king of Fez and Morocco, was deprived of his dominions by Mahomet his nephew: but having obtained ſuccours from Selim, emperor of the Turks, Mahomet, in his turn, called to his aſſiſtance Sebaſtian, king of Portugal, who landed at Tangier with a powerful army. The battle was fought on Monday the 4th of Auguſt, 1578, and proved fatal to theſe three princes; for the king of Portugal diſappeared, without its being ever known what became of him; Mahomet periſhed in a bog; and Abdemelek, being wounded, died in his litter.

ABDERAMA, or ABDALRAHMAN, governor of Spain under Heſcham, khalif of the Saracens. After having ſubdued all Spain, he entered France with a powerful army, took Bourdeaux, where he burnt all the churches, defeated Eudes, duke of Aquitain in a bloody battle, croſſed Poitou, and advanced even to Tours. But Charles Martel, in conjunction with the duke of Aquitain, ſtopped his progreſs, and a battle was fought, in which Abderama loſt his life, and a prodigious ſlaughter was made of the Saracens. This victory was gained in 732.

ABDERAMA I. ſurnamed Abdel, or the Juſt, grandſon of the khalif Heſcham of the race of the Ommiades. After the ruin of his family in Aſia; he was called from Africa into Spain in 754, by the Saracens, who had revolted from king Joſeph. Abderama defeated that prince, and took the title of king of Cordoua, and that of khalif in 762. He conquered the kingdoms of Caſtile, Arragon, Navarre, and Portugal; took Toledo, and laid waſte almoſt all Spain. Aurelius, one of the kings of Spain, purchaſed a peace of him, for an annual tribute of an hundred girls. It was this Abderama who built the great moſque of Cordoua. He died in 790, leaving eleven ſons and nine daughters, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Oſman. There were three other kings of Cordoua named Abderama.

ABDERUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the favourite of Hercules. The latter having carried off Diomedes's mares, which lived on human fleſh, ordered Abderus to take care of them, and marched himſelf againſt the Biſtones, who had taken up arms. Hercules, on his return, found that the mares had torn Abderus to pieces; on which he built a city near his tomb, and called it by his name.

ABDIAS of Babylon, the author of a fabulous hiſtory, intitled Hiſtoria Certaminis Apoſtolici. This impoſtor boaſts that he had ſeen our Saviour; that he was one of the ſeventy-two diſciples; that he had followed St. Simon and St. Jude into Perſia; and that they made him the firſt biſhop of Babylon. He cites Hegeſippus, who lived an hundred and thirty years after the Aſcenſion of our Lord, and Julius Africanus, who lived A. D. 221, which are groſs proofs of fraud. Wolfgang Lazius found the MSS. of this work in a cave of Carinthia, and had it printed at Baſil in 1551. It has had ſeveral other editions.

ABDISSI, or HEBEDJESU, patriarch of Muzal in Aſſyria, came to Rome, and after paying obeiſance to pope Pius IV. received from him the pallium or pall, on the 7th of March, 1562. This patriarch was perfectly acquainted with the Chaldee, Arabic, and Syriac languages; and as he was a man of great abilities, he had the art to perſuade a great number of Neſtorians to enter into the pale of the church of Rome.

ABDON, in the opinion of ſeveral authors, was the prophet who was ſent to Bethel to reprove Jeroboam for offering incenſe to the calves he had ſet up there. His prophecy on this occaſion exaſperated the king, who, holding out his hand, ordered the prophet to be ſeized: but he was ſoon puniſhed for his wickedneſs, for his arm inſtantly dried up, ſo that he could not draw it in again, and at the ſame time the altar was rent, and the aſhes thrown about. Jeroboam, aſtoniſhed at theſe miracles, deſired the prophet to pray for him, that his hand might be reſtored. This was granted, and his hand healed: on which, the king invited the prophet to his palace to refreſh himſelf, and receive a reward: but the man of God refuſed to accept the invitation, or to receive any preſent. But afterwards diſobeying the command of the Lord, who had commanded him not to eat or drink by the way, he was killed by a lion. The ſcripture mentions three other perſons of the ſame name.

ABDULMUMEN, or MIRAMOLIN, king of Morocco, was a potter's ſon, or according to others, the ſon of Abdalla the Mohavedin. He cauſed himſelf to be declared king of Morocco in 1148, after having taken the capital by aſſault, and reduced great part of that city to aſhes. He cauſed the king to be beheaded, and with his own hands ſtrangled Iſaac, his ſucceſſor. Abdulmumen at length conquered the kingdoms of Fez, Tunis, and Tremeſen, and was preparing to enter Spain, when he died in 1156: however, that deſign was put in execution by his ſon Joſeph II.

ABEILLE (GASPARD) a French poet, born at Riez in Provence. He went to Paris, embraced the ſtate of an eccleſiaſtic, and applied himſelf to poetry. His patrons were the duke of Vendome, the prince of Conti, and the marechal of Luxemburg, who gave him ſingular marks of their eſteem. He was made ſecretary general of the province of Normandy, prior of Notre Dame and Merci, and, in 1704, was received into the French academy. He died at Paris, in an advanced age, on the 22d of May 1718. He wrote ſome odes and epiſtles, ſeveral tragedies, a comedy, and two operas.

ABEILLE (SCIPIO) brother to the former, was an able phyſician, and died at Paris on the 9th of December 1697. He compoſed a conciſe Hiſtory of the Bones, which is much eſteemed.

ABEL, in Hebrew Affliction, was the ſon of Adam and Eve. He was a ſhepherd, and having offered up to God the firſtlings of his flock, his offering was accepted. Cain, his elder brother, offended at the Lord's not looking with ſo favourable an eye on the fruits of which his offering was compoſed, roſe up againſt his brother and killed him. This is ſuppoſed to have happened about the year of the world 130.

ABEL, king of Denmark, aſcended the throne A. D. 1250, after having prevailed on ſome ſeditious perſons to kill king Erick, his elder brother: but he did not long enjoy his uſurpation, for two years after he was himſelf killed in the war of Frieſland, by ſome peaſants.

ABELARD (PETER) one of the moſt famous doctors of the twelfth century, was born at Palais near Nantz, in Britany: he was well learned in divinity, philoſophy, and the languages, but was particularly diſtinguiſhed by his ſkill in logic, and his fondneſs for diſputations, which led him to travel into ſeveral provinces, in order to give public proof of his acuteneſs in that ſcience. After having baffled many antagoniſts, he read lectures in divinity with great applauſe at Paris; where he boarded with a canon whoſe name was Fulbert, and who had a very beautiful niece named Heloiſe. The canon ardently wiſhed to ſee this young lady make a figure among the learned, and Abelard was made her preceptor: but inſtead of inſtructing her in the ſciences, he taught her to love; in conſequence of which ſhe became pregnant; and at Abelard's requeſt leaving her uncle, and retiring to his ſiſter in Britany, was there delivered of a ſon. However, to ſoften the canon's reſentment, he privately married her, and afterwards placed her in a nunnery, where ſhe did not put on the veil. Mean while her relations, enraged at Abelard, hired ruffians, who broke into his chamber in the dead of night, and there emaſculated him. This treatment made Abelard fly to the gloom of a cloiſter; and, in order to conceal his confuſion and ſhame, he aſſumed the monaſtic habit in the abbey of St. Denis; but the diſorders of that houſe ſoon drove him from thence. He was afterwards charged with hereſy; but after ſeveral perſecutions for his religious ſentiments, he ſettled in a ſolitude in the dioceſe of Troies, where he built an oratory, to which he gave the name of the Paraclet. He was afterwards choſen ſuperior of the abbey of Ruis in the dioceſe of Vannes: when the nuns being expelled from the nunnery in which Heloiſe had been placed, he gave her his oratory, where ſhe ſettled with ſome of her ſiſter nuns, and became their prioreſs. Abelard mixed the philoſophy of Ariſtotle with his divinity, and in 1140 was condemned by the council of Rheims and Sens. Pope Innocent II. ordered him to be impriſoned, his books to be burnt, and forbid him ever teaching again. However, he was ſoon after pardoned, at the ſollicitation of Peter the Venerable, who received him into his abbey of Clugni, where he led an exemplary life. He died in the priory of Marcellus at Chalons, April 21, 1142, aged ſixty-three. He left ſeveral works, the moſt celebrated of which are thoſe tender letters that paſſed between him and Heloiſe, which have been tranſlated into Engliſh; and one of them immortalized by the harmony of Mr. Pope's numbers.

After Abelard's death, his body was ſent to Heloiſe, who interred it in the chapel of the Paraclet.

ABELIANS, or ABELONIANS, in church hiſtory, a ſect which aroſe in the dioceſe of Hippo in Africa, and is ſuppoſed to have begun in the reign of Arcadius, and to end in that of Theodoſius. Indeed it was not calculated for being of any long continuance. Thoſe of this ſect regulated marriage on the foot of the terreſtrial paradiſe, in which Adam and Eve were united only in heart: or rather after the example of Abel; for they pretended that Abel was married, but died without having ever known his wife. They therefore allowed each man to marry one woman, but enjoined them to live in continence with their wives; and to keep up the ſect, when a man and woman entered into this ſociety, they adopted a boy and a girl, who were to inherit their goods, and to marry upon the ſame terms of not begetting children, but of adopting two of different ſexes.

ABELLY (LEWIS) biſhop of Rhodes, was born at Vexin, in France, in 1604; and having at length quitted his biſhopric, retired to St. Lazarus, where he died on the 4th of October 1691, aged eighty-eight. His principal works are, 1. Medulla Theologica, Theological Marrow; whence Boileau called him the Marrowy Abelly. 2. A Treatiſe on the Hierarchy and Authority of the Pope. 3. The Tradition of the Church, in regard to the Worſhip of the Bleſſed Virgin; a Work which the Proteſtants have often quoted againſt Monſ. Boſſuet. 4. The Life of St. Vincent de Paul. 5. A Latin Treatiſe on the Duty of Biſhops, &c.

ABEN EZRA (ABRAHAM) a celebrated rabbi, born at Toledo in Spain, called by the Jews, the wiſe, great, and admirable Doctor, was a very able interpreter of the Holy Scriptures, and was well ſkilled in grammar, poetry, philoſophy, aſtronomy, and in medicine. He was alſo a perfect maſter of the Arabic. His principal work is Commentaries on the Old Teſtament, which are much eſteemed: theſe are printed in Bomberg's and Buxtorf's Hebrew Bibles. His ſtyle is clear, elegant, conciſe, and much like that of the Holy Scriptures; he almoſt always adheres to the literal ſenſe, and every where gives proofs of his genius and good ſenſe: he however advances ſome erroneous ſentiments. The ſcarceſt of all his books is entitled Jeſud Mora, which is a theological work, intended as an exhortation to the ſtudy of the Talmud. He died in 1174, aged about ſeventy-five.

ABEN MELLER, a learned rabbin, who wrote a commentary on the Old Teſtament in Hebrew, intitled The Perfection of Beauty. This rabbin generally follows the grammatical ſenſe, and the opinions of Kimchi. The beſt edition is that of Holland.

ABENAS, a town of France in Languedoc, and in the lower Vivarais, ſeated on the river Ardeſch, at the foot of the Cevennes, fifteen miles north-weſt of Viviers. Long. 4. 43. E. Lat. 44. 40.

ABENSPERG, a ſmall town of Germany, in the circle and duchy of Bavaria, and in the government of Munich. It is ſeated on the river Abentz, near the Danube, thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Ratiſbon, and twenty eaſt of Ingolſtadt. Long. 11. 38. E. Lat. 48. 45.

ABERAVON, a borough town of Glamorganſhire in Wales, governed by a Portreeve. It had a market, which is now diſcontinued: the vicarage is diſcharged, and is worth 45 l. clear yearly value. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Avon, nineteen miles ſouth-weſt of Cowbridge, ſeventy-five eaſt of St. David's, and 194 weſt of London. Long. 3. 21. W. Lat. 51. 40.

ABERBROTHICK, is a market-town and royal burgh, in the ſhire of Angus, in Scotland, ſeated on the eaſtern coaſt, not far from the promontory called Red-Head, which may be ſeen at a great diſtance. Here was formerly a rich monaſtery, which has ſince been erected into a lordſhip, and was given to a marquis of Hamilton. The town and harbour were lately in a very ruinous condition; but in the eleventh year of his late majeſty, they were allowed a duty of two pennies Scots upon each pint of ale ſold within the town and liberties, for the repairing of both. It is the ſeat of a preſbytery, which contains eleven pariſhes; and there is a mineral ſpring, ſuppoſed to be efficacious in curing many chronic diſeaſes. It is nine miles almoſt ſouth of Montroſe, and forty-nine from Edinburgh. Long. 3. 29. W. Lat. 56. 34.

ABERBROTHICK, or ARDBROTHOCK, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Angus, ſeated on the river Tay. It had a monaſtery, which was demoliſhed at the time of the reformation; but there are yet magnificent ruins to be ſeen. There are two churches, one of which is half ruined. It has a pretty good harbour, advantageous for trade, and ſtands on a fertile plain. It is fifteen miles north-eaſt of St. Andrews, and forty north-north-eaſt of Edinburgh. Long. 2. 29. W. Lat. 56. 30.

ABERCONWAY, or CONWAY, in Caernarvonſhire, North-Wales; ſo called from its ſituation at the mouth of the river Conway. It is a large well-built town; but its caſtle is now in ruins. It is governed by a mayor and two bailiffs, and has a market on Fridays. It is 229 meaſured miles from London. Long. 3. 47. W. Lat. 53. 20.

ABERDEEN, a maritime town in the north of Scotland, divided into two towns, the New and the Old, which make one Univerſity. Old Aberdeen was the ſeat of a biſhop, and has a handſome cathedral called St. Machar's, which is built of hewn ſtone. The college is as good as any in Scotland: it ſtands at the mouth of the river Done, whence it receives its name; for Aber ſignifies mouth. About a mile ſouth from hence is New Aberdeen, ſeated at the mouth of the river Dee. It is the capital of the ſheriffdom of that name. The ſtreets are paved with ſtone, and at the weſt end is a little round hill, from whence iſſues a ſpring called the Spa. Over the Dee, about a mile from the city, is a bridge of ſeven ſtone arches. In the middle of the High-ſtreet is a church, well built of free ſtone; and near the port or wharf ſtands the cuſtom-houſe. It has a ſpacious market-place, and moſt of the houſes are of ſtone, commonly four ſtories high, or more, with handſome ſaſh-windows, and gardens and orchards behind them. It is by much the politeſt place in the north of Scotland, for its extent, the beauty of its private and public buildings; the chief of which is the college, originally a Franciſcan monaſtery. It has a principal, four profeſſors of philoſophy, one of divinity, and one of mathematics. There is likewiſe a ſchool, with a head maſter and three uſhers; a muſic-ſchool, three hoſpitals, an alms-houſe, and a library, built at the charge of the town, and furniſhed with good books from divers benefactions. Both theſe towns together make one city, which is reckoned the third in Scotland. There is very good anchoring in the bay, from ſeven to nine fathom water; but as the channel is narrow, and the bar often ſhifts its place, there is no venturing in without a pilot.

The merchants trade to divers parts, and in particular ſend their herrings to many places in the north of Europe. There is an incredible quantity of ſalmon in theſe rivers, which breed in the ſhallows in autumn; at which time they caſt their ſpawn and are very poor and lean. The ſpawn in the ſpring becomes a fry of ſmall fiſh, which make their way to the ſea. Long. 1. 49. W. Lat. 57. 8.

ABERDEENSHIRE, which includes Mar and other leſſer diviſions; is bounded on the ſouth by Angus, Mearns, and Gaurie; on the north-weſt by Bamffſhire; and on the eaſt by the German Ocean. The ſoil, with proper cultivation, would be ſufficiently fruitful; it produces rye, oats, and pulſe, with roots and herbs both for food and phyſic. The hilly parts, particularly the craigs of Pennan, where eagles build their neſts, are covered with woods of fir and oak, and yield plenty of game and paſture, ſo that they have a great number of deer, ſheep, black cattle and horſes. They have likewiſe quarries of ſlate, limeſtone, and ſpotted marble, as alſo a ſtone peculiar to this country, called elf-arrow heads, which ſeem to be a kind of flint of different ſhapes, but all of them pointed, thin at the edges, and from half an inch to two inches long, but rough and unpoliſhed. In the rivers are muſcles, which breed a kind of pearls. The air is cool, but healthful, and their winter warmer than could be expected in ſuch a northern climate, which is owing to the vicinity of the ſea. Their firing is peat, turf, and wood.

ABERFORD, a market-town in the weſt riding of Yorkſhire, ſtands in a bottom, and is about a mile long, and indifferently well built. It is near a Roman highway, which is raiſed very high, and not far from the river Cock; between which and the town there is the foundation of an old caſtle ſtill viſible. The market-day is Wedneſday, and it is 181 miles north-by-weſt from London. Long. 2. 45. W. Lat. 55. 52.

ABERGAVENNY, a large, populous, and flouriſhing town in Monmouthſhire, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Uſk and Gavenny. It has a fine bridge over the Uſk, conſiſting of fifteen arches; and being a great thoroughfare from the weſt part of Wales to Bath, Briſtol, Gloceſter, and other places, is well furniſhed with accommodations for travellers. It is ſurrounded with a wall, and had once a caſtle. It is governed by a bailiff, a recorder, and twenty-ſeven burgeſſes; and has two markets, one on Wedneſdays, and the other on Fridays; and carries on a conſiderable trade in flannels, which are brought hither for ſale from the other parts of the county. Its fairs are on May 14, for lean horned cattle and ſheep; on the firſt Tueſday after Trinity-Sunday for linen and woollen cloth; and on the 25th of September for flannels, hogs, and horſes. It is 142 miles diſtant from London. Long. 2. 45. W. Lat. 51. 50.

ABERNETHY (JOHN) an eminent diſſenting miniſter, was the ſon of Mr. John Abernethy, a diſſenting miniſter in Colraine, and was born on the 19th of October, 1680. When about nine years of age, he was ſeparated from his parents, his father being obliged to attend ſome public affairs in London; and his mother, to ſhelter herſelf from the mad fury of the Iriſh rebels, retiring to Derry, a relation who had him under his care, having no opportunity of conveying him to her, took him with him to Scotland; by which means he eſcaped the hardſhips he muſt have ſuffered at the ſiege of Derry, where Mrs. Abernethy loſt all her other children. He afterwards ſtudied at the univerſity of Glaſgow, till he took the degree of maſter of arts; and in 1708, was choſen miniſter of a diſſenting congregation at Antrim, where he continued about twenty years, till he was choſen miniſter of the congregation in Woodſtreet, Dublin, where his preaching was much admired: he was diſtinguiſhed by his candid, free, and generous ſentiments, and died of the gout in Dec. 1740, in the ſixtieth year of his age. He publiſhed a volume of Sermons on the Divine Attributes; and after his death the ſecond volume was publiſhed by his friends; which were ſucceeded by two other volumes on different ſubjects; all of which have been greatly admired.

ABERNETHY, a town in Strathern, a diſtrict of Perthſhire, in Scotland. It is ſeated on the river Tay, a little above the mouth of the Erne. It is ſaid to have been the ſeat of the Pictiſh kings, and was afterwards the ſee of an archbiſhop, ſince transferred to St. Andrew's. It is now greatly decayed.

ABERYSWITH, a market-town of Cardiganſhire, in Wales, ſeated on the Ridal, near its confluence with the Iſtwith, where it it falls into the ſea. It was formerly a walled town, and was fortified with a caſtle, which is now in ruins, and the town itſelf is gone to decay, for there is ſcarce a hundred houſes remaining. However it is governed by a mayor, recorder, and ſends one member to parliament. It is noted for its fiſhing trade, and has a good market on Monday for corn and wool. Its diſtance from London is 199 miles weſt-ſouth-weſt. Long. 4. 15. W. Lat. 52. 30.

ABEX, a country in High Ethiopia, in Africa, bordering on the Red Sea, by which it is bounded on the eaſt. It has Nubia or Sennar on the north; Sennar and Abyſſinia on the weſt; and Abyſſinia on the ſouth. Its principal towns are Suaquem and Arkeko. It is ſubject to the Turks, and has the name of the Beglerbeg of Habeleth. It is about five hundred miles in length and one hundred in breadth, and is a wretched country; for the heat is almoſt inſupportable, and the air is ſo unhealthy, that an European cannot ſtay long there, without the utmoſt hazard of his life. It is very mountainous, inſomuch that there are many more wild beaſts than men. There are foreſts, in which grow a great number of ebony trees.

ABGAR, or ABGARUS, a name given to ſeveral of the kings of Edeſſa in Syria; the moſt celebrated of which is one who, it is ſaid, was cotemporary with Jeſus Chriſt; and who having a diſtemper in his feet, and hearing of Jeſus's miraculous cures, requeſted him, by letter, to come and cure him. Euſebius, who believed that this letter was genuine, and alſo an anſwer our Saviour is ſaid to have returned to it, has tranſlated them both from the Syriac, and ſays, that they were both copied from the Syriac annals. The firſt is as follows: "Abgarus, prince of "Edeſſa, to Jeſus the holy Saviour, who hath appeared in the "fleſh in the confines of Jeruſalem, greeting. I have heard of "thee, and of the cures thou haſt wrought, without medicines "or herbs. For 'tis reported thou makeſt the blind to ſee, "the lame to walk, lepers to be clean, devils and unclean ſpi-"rits to be expelled; ſuch as have been long diſeaſed to be healed, "and the dead to be raiſed; all which when I heard concerning "thee, I concluded with myſelf, That either thou waſt a God come "down from heaven, or the Son of God ſent to do theſe things. "I have therefore written to thee, beſeeching thee to vouchſafe "to come unto me, and cure my diſeaſe. For I have alſo heard "that the Jews uſe thee ill, and lay ſnares to deſtroy thee. I have "here a little city, pleaſantly ſituated, and ſufficient for us "both. Abgarus." To this letter, Jeſus, 'tis ſaid, returned an anſwer by Ananias, Agbarus's courier, which was as follows: "Bleſſed art thou, O Abgarus! who haſt believed in me whom "thou haſt not ſeen; for the ſcriptures ſay of me, They who "have ſeen me have not believed in me, that they who "have not ſeen, may, by believing, have life. But whereas "thou writeſt to have me come to thee, 'tis of neceſſity that I "fulfil all things here for which I am ſent; and having finiſhed "them, to return to him that ſent me: but when I am returned "to him, I will then ſend one of my diſciples to thee, who ſhall "cure thy malady, and give life to thee and thine. Jeſus." After Jeſus's Aſcenſion, Judas, who is alſo named Thomas, ſent Thaddeus one of the ſeventy to Abgarus, who preached the goſpel to him and his people, cured him of his diſorder, and wrought many other miracles; which was done, ſays Euſebius, A. D. 43.

Though the above letters are acknowledged to be ſpurious by the candid writers of the church of Rome, yet ſeveral proteſtant authors, as Dr. Parker, Dr. Cave, and Dr. Grabe, have maintained that they are genuine, and ought not to be rejected.

ABGILLUS (JOHN) ſurnamed Preſter John, was ſon to a king of the Friſcii, and from the auſterity of his life, obtained the name of Preſter or Prieſt. He attended Charlemagne in his expedition to the Holy Land; but inſtead of returning with that monarch to Europe, it is pretended that he gained mighty conqueſts, and founded the empire of the Abyſſines, called from his name, the empire of Preſter John. He is ſaid to have written the hiſtory of Charlemagne's journey into the Holy Land, and of his own into the Indies; but they are more probably trifling romances, written in the ages of of ignorance.

ABIA, king of the Parthians, levied war againſt Izates, king of the Abdiabinians, on account of his having embraced the Jewiſh, or as others ſay, the Chriſtian religion; but was defeated in this unjuſt invaſion, and ſo cloſely purſued by Izates's army, that he put an end to his life, for fear of falling into his hands.

ABIATHAR, high-prieſt of the Jews, and ſon and ſucceſſor of Abimelech, gave king David frequent teſtimonies of his fidelity, particularly during Abſalom's conſpiracy: but after that prince's death he conſpired with Adonijah, to raiſe him to the throne; at which Solomon was ſo exaſperated, that he diveſted him of the prieſthood, and ſent him into exile, in the 1014th year before the Chriſtian Æra.

ABIGAIL, the wife of Nabal, a churliſh and avaricious man, who dwelt in the deſart of Maon, and had his poſſeſſions in Carmel. David, who, whenever he was purſued by Saul, had always been careful not to injure this man, being reduced to great diſtreſs, ſent to deſire ſome refreſhments for himſelf and his attendants; on which, Nabal returning a very abuſive anſwer, David was ſo exaſperated, that he reſolved to exterminate him and all his family. However, Abigail going to meet him with proviſions, calmed his reſentment: when David was ſo charmed with her generoſity, prudence, and beauty, that he married her after the death of Nabal, A. M. 2975, and 1060 before Chriſt.

ABIHU, brother to Nadab, and the ſon of Aaron. Theſe two brothers were ſo happy as to aſcend Mount Sinai with their father, and there to behold the glory of God, but ſome time after, putting common fire into their cenſors inſtead of that lighted by the Almighty, a fire iſſued from the Holieſt of Holies, and killed them in the tabernacle, A. M. 2545, and before Chriſt 1490.

ABIMELECH, king of Gerar, a country of the Philiſtines, where the patriarch Abraham being with his wife Sarah, who paſſed for his ſiſter, the king was ſo enamoured with her, though ſhe was ninety years old, that he reſolved to marry her; but being informed of the deception in a dream, reproved Abraham, and reſtored his wife. However, Abraham excuſed himſelf by ſaying, that ſhe was his half-ſiſter, and that fear cauſed him to diſown her. Abimelech afterwards gave conſiderable preſents to Abraham, permitted him to continue in his country, and entered into a covenant with him. After the death of Abraham, there being a famine in the neighbouring countries, Iſaac his ſon alſo returned to Gerar, which was then governed by a king called Abimelech, and made uſe of the ſame artifice with his father, in relation to his wife Rebekah; this that king alſo diſcovered, and immediately ordered that none of his ſubjects ſhould do the leaſt injury to either of them.

ABIMELECH, the natural ſon of Gideon by Druma his concubine, after having cauſed ſeventy of his father's legetimate ſons to be ſlain, uſurped the ſovereign authority: he was at laſt, however, dangerouſly wounded by a woman throwing a piece of a millſtone upon his head; when being unwilling that it ſhould be ſaid that he died by the hand of a woman, he ordered his armour-bearer to put an end to his life, who accordingly ran him through the body. A. M. 2081. and before Chriſt 1234.

ABINGDON, a market-town in Berkſhire, ſeated on a branch of the Thames, received its name from an abbey anciently built there. The ſtreets, which are well paved, center in a ſpacious area, in which the market is held; and in the center of this area is the market-houſe, which is ſupported on lofty pillars, with a large hall of freeſtone above, in which the ſummer aſſizes for the county are held, and other public buſineſs done, the Lent aſſizes being held at Reading. It has two churches, one dedicated to St. Nicholas, and the other to St. Helena; the latter is adorned with a ſpire, and both are ſaid to have been erected by the abbots of Abingdon. Here are alſo two hoſpitals, one for ſix, and the other for thirteen poor men, and as many poor women, a free ſchool, and a charity-ſchool. The town was incorporated by queen Mary, and is governed by a mayor, two bailiffs, and nine aldermen: it ſends two members to parliament, who are choſen by the inhabitants at large, not receiving alms. Its great manufacture is malt, large quantities of which are ſent by water to London. The market-days are on Monday and Friday, and it hath four fairs for horſes and other cattle, on the firſt Monday in Lent, on June 20, on September 19, and on December 11. It it ſix miles and a half ſouth of Oxford, forty-ſeven eaſt of Glouceſter, and fifty-five weſt of London. Lat. 51. 34.

ABIASI (JOHN) born at Naples, was a celebrated phyſician, who flouriſhed about the year 1494. He left ſeveral works that are greatly eſteemed.

ABIRAM, a ſeditious Levite, who, in concert with Korah and Dathan, rebelled againſt Moſes and Aaron, in order to ſhare with them in the government of the people; when Moſes ordering them to come with their cenſors before the altar of the Lord, the earth ſuddenly opened under their feet and ſwallowed up them and their tents; and at the ſame inſtant fire came from heaven, and conſumed two hundred and fifty of their followers. This happened in the wilderneſs, A. M 2546, and 1489 before the Chriſtian Æra. Numb. xvi.

ABISARES, king of that part of India beyond the Hydaſpes. On Alexander the Great's invading India, Abiſares determined to oppoſe him, by joining his forces with thoſe of Porus; but the latter engaging Alexander ſingly, and being defeated, Abiſares ſent ambaſſadors to the Grecian monarch, with money, and forty elephants, who, in his name, offered his perſon and dominions to Alexander. The conqueror gave orders that Abiſares ſhould come immediately before him: but Abiſares ſending word that he was ill in bed, Alexander was ſatisfied with the excuſe, and not only left him in the peaceable poſſeſſion of his dominions, but enlarged them. This happened about 327 years before Chriſt.

ABISHAG, a young and beautiful Shunamite, choſen to attend upon and warm David in his old age. After the death of that prince, Adonijah, one of his ſons, deſired Bathſheba, the mother of Solomon, to intercede with her ſon, that he might be permitted to marry Abiſhag; but Solomon ſuſpecting that his deſign was to obtain an opportunity of uſurping the crown, put him to death, A. M. 3021, and 1014 before Chriſt. 1 Kings i.

ABISHAI, ſon of Zeruiah, and brother to Joab, was one of the celebrated warriors who flouriſhed in the reign of David: he killed with his own hand three hundred men, with no other weapon but his lance; and ſlew a Philiſtian giant, the iron of whoſe ſpear weighed three hundred ſhekels. 1 Sam. xxvi. 2 Sam. xxiii.

ABLANCOURT (NICHOLAS PERROT, SIEUR D') See PERROT.

ABLAVIUS, or ABLABIUS, was Præfectus Prætorio, and the favourite of Conſtantine the Great, from the year 326 to 337. Conſtantine on his death-bed nominated him one of his ſon Conſtance's council; but that emperor ſtript him of his employment, under the pretence of yielding to the deſires of his ſoldiers. Ablavius then retired to a country ſeat which he poſſeſſed in Bythinia; but Conſtance ſoon diſpatched ſome officers of the army to him there, who gave him a letter, by which he ſeemed to aſſociate him with himſelf in the government of the empire; but on his aſking for the inſignia of the empire, which he imagined they had brought him, the officers told him that letters only had been given them; but that ſome other officers, who were at the door, were intruſted with the other part of the commiſſion. Ablavius ſuſpected nothing, gave orders for their admiſſion; but theſe coming in, inſtead of cloathing him with purple, fell upon him and ſlew him.

ABLE, or ABEL, (THOMAS) chaplain to queen Catharine, conſort of king Henry VIII. whom he is ſaid to have taught muſic and the Engliſh language. He was very zealous againſt the queen's divorce, and wrote a treatiſe in Latin, to ſhew that the marriage of Henry and Catharine ought not to be diſſolved. In the year 1534 he was attainted of miſpriſion, for being concerned in the affair of Mary Barton, the holy maid of Kent; and afterwards denying the king's ſupremacy over the church, he was hanged, drawn, and quartered in Smithfield, on the 30th of July, 1540.

ABNER, the ſon of Ner, father-in-law of Saul, and general of his armies, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his fidelity and courage. Upon Saul's death, he ſet Iſhboſheth, that prince's only ſurving ſon, on the throne; but ſome time after a war breaking out between Iſrael and the tribe of Judah, who had made choice of David for their king, Abner was routed, which gave occaſion to Iſhboſheth to uſe him ill, in ſpite of his known valour and prudence. Abner being provoked at this treatment, went over to David, who received him with all the teſtimonies of affection he could deſire; but as he was returning, in order to engage the Iſraelites to declare in favour of David, Joab, who feared that the command of the army would be taken from himſelf and given to Abner, followed him, and treacherouſly murdered him, A. M. 2987. and before the Chriſtian æra 1048. David, extremely afflicted at this vile aſſaſſination, ordered a public mourning, and built a magnificent tomb for him in Hebron, on which which was placed an epitaph, which that prince himſelf made in his praiſe. 2 Sam. iii. Joſeph. Antiq. lib. vii. ch. 1.

ABO, a maritime town in Sweden: it is the capital of the province of Finland, and is ſeated in the gulph of that name, at the mouth of the river Aurajoki. It has a good port, and is the ſee of a biſhop, ſuffragan of Upſal. It has alſo an univerſity, founded by queen Chriſtina in 1640. It lies one hundred and twenty miles north-eaſt from Stockholm. Long. 21. 28. E. Lat. 60. 50.

ABOU, or ABAU, HANIFAH, the moſt celebrated doctor of the Muſſulmans, and chief of the ſect of the Haniſites, was born at Cauſa, a city of Chaldea; and though his ſect is the principal of the four which they now indifferently follow, he was ill uſed during his life-time, and died in the priſon at Bagdat, ſeven hundred and fifty-ſeven years before the Chriſtian æra. It is remarkable, that a magnificent monument was built for him in the laſt-mentioned city three hundred and thirty-five years after his death. His principal works are the Maſſuad, i. e. the Foundation or Support, wherein he eſtabliſhed all the points of the Muſſulman faith, by the authority of the Koran: a treatiſe entitled Filkelam, or Scholaſtic Divinity; and a catechiſm called Mollem, i. e. the Inſtructor. Houſſen Vaez relates an amazing inſtance of Abau Hanifah's calm and forgiving temper. This doctor, ſays he, having undeſervedly received a malicious and violent blow on the face, ſpoke thus to him that ſtruck him: "I could return thee injury for the injury thou haſt done me, "but I will not: I could inform againſt thee to the khalif, but "I will not be an informer: I could, in my prayers and addreſſes to God, repreſent the umbrage done me, but I will "forbear to do it. In fine, I could at the day of judgment de"ſire God to revenge it, but far be it from me. Nay, ſhould "that terrible day arrive this very moment, and could my in"terceſſion then prevail, I would not deſire to enter Paradiſe "without thee."

ABOU-NAVAS, an Arabian Poet of the firſt claſs, was born at Balſora, and flouriſhed at the court of Aaron al Raſchid, at the end of the ſeventh century.

ABRABANEL, ABARBANEL, or AVRAVANEL (ISAAC) a celebrated rabbi, deſcended from king David, and born at Liſbon A. D. 1437. He became counſellor to Alphonſo V. king of Portugal, and afterwards to Ferdinand the Catholic, but in 1492 was obliged to leave Spain with the other Jews. In ſhort, after reſiding at Naples, Corfou, and ſeveral other cities, he died at Venice in 1508, aged ſeventy-one. Abrabanel paſſed for one of the moſt learned of the rabbis, and the Jews give him the names of the Sage, the Prince, and the Great Politician. We have a Commentary of his on all the Old Teſtament, which is pretty ſcarce: He there principally adheres to the literal ſenſe, and his ſtyle is clear, but a little diffuſe. His other works are, a Treatiſe on the Creation of the World, in which he refutes Ariſtotle, who imagined that the world was eternal: A Treatiſe on the Explication of the Propheſies relating to the Meſſiah, againſt the Chriſtians: A Book concerning Articles of Faith, and ſome others leſs ſought after. Though Abrabanel diſcovers his averſion to Chriſtianity, yet in all his writings he treats the Chriſtians with politeneſs and good manners.

ABRADATES, king of Suſa, in Perſia, celebrated for the tender affection of his wife Panthea. That illuſtrious princeſs was taken priſoner in a battle which Cyrus the Great fought againſt the Aſſyrians, and was deſigned, by thoſe who took her, for the embraces of that monarch: but, notwithſtanding her being an exquiſite beauty, Cyrus gave her the moſt honourable treatment, without once offering to violate her chaſtity. Panthea, charmed with Cyrus's virtue, prevailed on Abradates to come over with his troops to him; and he being admitted into the conqueror's preſence, offered him his ſervice, which he readily accepted. Panthea then equipped her huſband for the fight, exhorted him to behave courageouſly, and took a tender farewel. Abradates fought with the utmoſt intrepidity, but preſſing with too much eagerneſs upon the Egyptian ſquadrons, was thrown from his chariot, and being unaſſiſted by his friends, periſhed in the field. His corpſe was found by Panthea, who had it put into her own ſedan, and brought to the river Pactolus; where, while her eunuchs and ſlaves were digging his grave, ſhe herſelf ſat on the ground, and, with his head in her lap, dreſſed him with all the ornaments ſhe had about her. Cyrus hearing this melancholy news, came to the place where Panthea was thus employed, and the mournful ſpectacle drew tears from his eyes. He ſpoke to her in the moſt tender terms; he took hold of Abradates's hand, which had been cut through with an Egyptian ſpear, and it came off into his. This circumſtance aggravated the grief of Cyrus; but as for Panthea, ſhe was inconſolable; ſhe took the hand from Cyrus, kiſſed it, and fixing it to the place from whence it had been disjointed, cried, "The "reſt, O Cyrus! is as this." She continued her tender lamentations, while Cyrus wept in ſilence; but he at laſt endeavoured to comfort her, by telling her that due honour ſhould be paid him at his funeral, and that ſhe ſhould be conveyed whitherſoever ſhe pleaſed. The king then leaving her, ſhe commanded her eunuchs to withdraw, and reſolving to die, bid the only attendant ſhe would ſuffer to ſtay with her to cover her and Abradates, after ſhe was dead, with the ſame cloth; and then taking a Perſian ſcymeter, ſhe plunged it into her ſide, and reclining her head on her huſband's breaſt, expired: upon which her three eunuchs alſo ſtabbed themſelves. Cyrus, on being told the mournful news, ran in order to ſuccour her; but it was too late. He, however, made a magnificent funeral for them, and afterwards erected a ſtately mauſoleum on the ſpot which was the ſcene of this fatal cataſtrophe. This happened five hundred and forty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra.

ABRAHAH, alſo called ABU YACSUM, and ſurnamed AL ASHRAM, was prince of Yaman, i. e. Arabia Felix, under the emperor of the Abyſſins. The Koran obſerves of this prince, that to divert his ſubjects from going to pay their devotions at Mecca, he built at his capital, Sanaa, a temple that ſurpaſſed in magnificence even that at Mecca; when the tribe of Koraiſh, who had the ſuperintendency of that temple, obſerving that their profits decreaſed, ſent a perſon to Sanaa, who on the night preceding a ſacred feſtival took occaſion to defile it and all its ornaments with human excrements; and then flying, publiſhed, wherever he came, the news of this profanation. Abrahah being informed of what had paſſed, vowed revenge, and reſolved to demoliſh the temple of Mecca. For this purpoſe he marched with an army, the greateſt ſtrength of which conſiſted in his elephants. The Koraiſh were ſtruck with the greateſt terror at the news of the approach of his army, with theſe animals which they had never ſeen, they therefore fled to the neighbouring mountains; and Abrahah met with no oppoſition till he came within ſight of the walls of Mecca, when, according to the Mahometans, the elephants, at the view of thoſe walls, turned back and fled; and inſtantly a flight of birds ariſing from the ſea, came and hovered over Abrahah's army. Every one of theſe birds carried three ſtones, one in its beak and two in its claws, and on every ſtone was written the name of him it was to ſtrike; and theſe ſtones, though not quite ſo big as vetches, the orientals ſay, they threw down with ſuch violence as to kill all the Abyſſins on the ſpot, except Abrahah, who was followed by one of theſe birds till he came before the Abyſſin emperor, and had told him the ſtory of this lamentable adventure: when the emperor aſking what kind of birds they were, Abrahah pointed to that which then hovered over his head; at this the bird inſtantly flung down his ſtone, which ſtriking Abrahah, he fell dead at the foot of the imperial throne.

ABRAHAM, the patriarch and father of the faithful, from whence the whole Jewiſh nation was deſcended, was born at Ur, in Chaldea, about one thouſand nine hundred and ninety-ſix years before Chriſt. Having acknowledged the true God, he married Sarah in Chaldea, and ſettled at Haran till his father Terah's death, who died aged two hundred and five years. Abraham left Haran when he was ſeventy-five years of age, and went to Sichem with Lot his nephew. Afterwards a famine obliged him to go into Egypt, where making Sarah his wife paſs for his ſiſter, Pharaoh took her from him, but immediately by a Divine command reſtored her to him again; and, after loading him with great preſents, deſired him to leave Egypt. The Patriarch then went with Lot his nephew to Bethel, where they were ſoon obliged to ſeparate, on account of the largeneſs of their flocks; and ſome time after four kings plundered Sodom, where Lot then reſided, and took him priſoner. Abraham being informed of this, purſued the four kings, ſurpriſed and defeated them, and brought back his nephew, with all the other priſoners, and the plunder that had been taken. He was ſtill in the vale of Mamre, when God appeared to him and told him, that he ſhould have a ſon who would be the father of a great people; and that his deſcendants, after remaining four hundred years in a ſtrange land, ſhould return to the country where he then was, and poſſeſs it; and ordered him to circumciſe himſelf and his poſterity, as a ſeal of the covenant he had made with him. This divine propheſy was confirmed by three angels, who alſo told him of the approaching ruin of Sodom and Gomorrah.

morrah. About this time Abraham went to Gerar, where again pretending that Sarah was his ſiſter, Abimelech took her from him; but he was alſo obliged by a divine command to reſtore her to him again. The year following, the promiſe of God was fulfilled in the birth of Iſaac, though Abraham was then a hundred years old, and Sarah ninety. About twenty-five years after, the Lord, as a trial of Abraham's faith, ordered him to ſacrifice Iſaac: the patriarch prepared to execute this command, and was ready to give the blow, when his hand was ſtopped by an angel; and he was permitted to ſacrifice a ram in the room of his ſon. He had another ſon, named Iſhmael, by his ſervant Hagar; and Sarah dying, he had ſeveral other children by a woman called Keturah. This patriarch died, aged one hundred and ſeventy-five, and was buried with Sarah in the cave of Ephron, about 1821 years before the Chriſtian æra.

ABRAHAM, king of Ethiopia, aſcended the throne, A. D. 448, and reigned twenty-ſeven years, viz. thirteen with his brother Azba, and fourteen alone. He was very zealous for the Chriſtian religion. It is ſaid, that he confined all the ſons of the royal family in a palace and gardens, encompaſſed with rocks, leſt ambition ſhould prompt them to the commiſſion of ſome crimes; and enacted, that he only who was to ſucceed to the crown, ſhould ever enjoy his liberty. This cuſtom is ſaid ſtill to prevail in Ethiopia. There have been ſeveral other Ethiopian princes of the ſame name.

ABRAHAM (ST.) a native of Syria, was taken priſoner by the Saracens, as he was going into Egypt, to viſit the anchorets there; however he eſcaped out of their hands, and went to Auvergne, where he founded a monaſtery, of which he was the firſt abbot. He died there about the year 472.

ABRAHAM BEN CHAIIA, a famous Spaniſh rabbi, who ſtudied aſtrology, and predicted that the birth of the Meſſiah, expected by the Jews, would be in 1358. We have a treatiſe of his on the figure of the earth.

ABRAHAM BEN MEIR, commonly called Aben Ezra. See ABEN EZRA.

ABRAHAM DE BOTAN, a rabbi who lived in the ſeventeenth century. He wrote A Commentary on the Jad Chaſaka of Maimonides; and another work, which contains two hundred and thirty anſwers to as many queſtions, on different caſes relating to the Jewiſh law.

ABRAHAM ECHELLENSIS. See ECHELLENSIS.

ABRAHAM GALANTI, an Italian rabbi who lived at the beginning of the ſixteenth century. His principal work is A Commentary on the Lamentations of Jeremiah.

ABRAHAM SCHALOM, a learned Spaniſh rabbi, who died in 1593. He was the author of a famous work, entitled in Hebrew Neve Schalom, i. e. The Habitation of Peace.

ABRAHAM USQUE, a Portugueſe Jew, who tranſlated the Bible out of Hebrew into Spaniſh. It was printed at Ferrara in 1553, and re-printed in Holland in 1630. This Bible, eſpecially the firſt edition, which is moſt valuable, is marked with ſtars at certain words, which are deſigned to ſhew that theſe words are difficult to be underſtood in the Hebrew, and that they may be uſed in a different ſenſe.

ABRAM (NICHOLAS) a learned Jeſuit born in the dioceſe of Toul, in Lorrain, in 1589. He obtained the rank of divinity profeſſor in the univerſity of Pont-a-Mouſon, which he enjoyed ſeventeen years, and died September 7, 1655. He wrote Notes on Virgil and on Nonnius; A Commentary on ſome of Cicero's Orations, in 2 vols. folio, an excellent collection of theological pieces in folio, entitled Pharus Veteris Teſtamenti, and ſome other Works.

ABRANTES, a town of Portugal, in Eſtremadura, ſeated on the river Tago, belongs to a marquis of the ſame name. It ſtands high, is ſurrounded with gardens and olive-trees, and contains thirty-five thouſand inhabitants. It has four convents, an almshouſe, and an hoſpital. Long. 7. 18. W. Lat. 39. 13.

ABRUZZO, a province in Naples; the river Peſcara divides it into two parts, one of which is called Ulterior, whereof Aquila is the capital; and the other Citerior, whoſe capital is Solmona. Beſides the Appenines, there are two conſiderable mountains, the one called Monte Cavallo, and the other Monte Maiello. The top of this laſt is always covered with ſnow. Abruzzo is a cold but fruitful country, and abounds with corn, rice, ſeveral good fruits, and ſaffron.

ABSALOM, the ſon of David and Maacah, daughter of Talman, king of Geſhur, was one of the handſomeſt youths of his time, and in his converſation was extremely affable and courteous: but all his good qualities were effaced by his ambition and other vices. He procured his brother Ammon, who had raviſhed his ſiſter Thamar, to be aſſaſſinated at a feaſt: and after having obtained his father's pardon, conſpired againſt him; obliged him to fly from Jeruſalem, accompanied only by a few ſoldiers; lay with his concubines; and preſumed to give battle to his army, in the foreſt of Ephraim. However, Abſalom's forces, though vaſtly ſuperior in number, were defeated; and as he was flying, his hair caught hold of the branches of an oak, and he was ſuſpended in the air: Joab ſaw him in that ſituation, and, contrary to the expreſs command of David, who had ordered his life to be ſpared, thruſt him through with three darts. This happened, A. M. 3012, and before Chriſt 1023. 1 Chron. iii. 2 Sam. i.

ABSIMARUS, or APSIMARUS (TIBERIUS) made emperor of the eaſt in 698, by the ſoldiers of Leontius, whom he confined in a monaſtery, after having cut off his noſe and ears. He conquered the Saracens, and was a profeſſed enemy of pope John VI but Juſtinian the younger having made himſelf maſter of Conſtantinople, by means of an aqueduct, treated Abſimarus with ignominy, and afterwards cut off his head in 705.

ABSTEMIUS (LAURENTIUS) a native of Macerata, profeſſor of belles lettres in Urbino, and librarian of duke Guido Ubaldo, under the pontificate of Alexander VI. He wrote, 1. Notes on the moſt difficult Paſſages of ancient Authors: 2. Hecatomythium, i. e. A Collection of an hundred Fables, &c.

ABSYRTES, in the heathen mythology, the ſon of Æta and Hypſea, and the brother of Medea. The latter running away with Jaſon, after her having aſſiſted him in carrying off the golden fleece was purſued by her father; when, to ſtop his progreſs, ſhe tore Abſyrtes in pieces, and ſcattered his limbs in his way.

ABU BECR, or ABUBEKER, the father-in-law of Mahomet, was the firſt khalif and ſucceſſor of that falſe prophet. He was a temperate and liberal prince, and the patron of men of learning. He was choſen khalif in 632, preferably to Ali, Oſman, and Omar. The Perſians have his memory in deteſtation, maintaining that Ali ought to have been the ſucceſſor of Mahomet. Abu Becr kept his court firſt at Couſa, and afterwards at Bagdat. He died in 634, and was interred at Medina. This khalif firſt collected together the verſes of the Koran, and formed them into chapters; and there is ſtill extant a collection made by him of the doctrines of Mahomet.

ABUCARAS (THEODORUS) metropolitan of Caria in the ninth century, was remarkable for his zeal in defending what he believed to be the truth, and was the author of above forty controverſial treatiſes againſt the Saracens, Jews, and reputed heretics. This metropolitan at firſt embraced the doctrines of Photius; for which, begging pardon of the council of Conſtantinople in 869, he was reſtored to the communion of the church, and obtained a ſeat in the council. His works are inſerted in the Supplement of the Bibliotheque des Peres, the Paris edition.

ABUDHAER, the chief of the Karmathians, or Cannathians, under whom they profaned and laid waſte Mecca, plundered the pilgrims, and killed one thouſand ſeven hundred of them within the very walls of the Caaba, or holy houſe; they carried off the black ſtone out of the temple, which is there venerated as a preſent ſent from heaven; pulled down the gate of the temple, and filled the well Zamzam, one of the holieſt parts of that place, with dead bodies. To add to the affliction of the Muſſulmans, Abudhaer ridiculed the Mahometan religion in the moſt outrageous manner, and brought his horſe to the entrance of the Caaba, that he might lay his dung there: but theſe inſults and profanations did not diminiſh the veneration of the Muſſulmans for the temple of Mecca, who continued their annual pilgrimages to it. Abudhaer died the peaceable poſſeſſor of large dominions in the year 953.

ABU'L AINA, a famous Muſſulman doctor, remarkable for his repartees; of which we ſhall give the following inſtance: Moſes the ſon of Abdalmalek, the khalif, having ſecretly put to death this doctor's friend, and cauſed a report to be ſpread that he had eſcaped; Abu'l Aina was one day aſked what was become of him? when he replied in the words of the Khoran, "Moſes "ſtruck him, and he died." This being told to the prince, he ſent for Abu'l Aina, and threatened to puniſh him if he did not bridle his tongue; when the doctor, without being in the leaſt diſconcerted, anſwered him in the words immediately following; "Intendeſt thou to kill me, as thou killedſt the man yeſterday?" This paſſage the prince found ſo well timed, that he reſolved to reſtrain his anger, and to ſilence the doctor by gifts rather than by menaces.

ABULFARAGIUS (GREGORY) a famous phyſician, divine, and hiſtorian, born at Malatia, near the Euphrates, A. D. 1226. He wrote an Univerſal Hiſtory from the creation of the world to his time, which is greatly eſteemed in the eaſt. The moſt excellent part of that work is what relates to the Saracens, the Moguls, and the conqueſts of Gengis-Khan. Dr. Pococke, profeſſor of the Hebrew and Arabic tongues at Oxford, publiſhed this work in 1663, in the original Arabic, with his own Latin verſion of it; to which he added a ſupplement, containing a compendious ſequel of that hiſtory, with reſpect to the eaſtern princes. Abulfaragius wrote above thirty other tracts, ſeveral of which relate to philoſophy and divinity.

ABULFARAGIUS was alſo the name of three celebrated Arabian poets, and one vaez, or preacher, of the ſame nation, whoſe ſermons are very much eſteemed.

ABULFEDA (ISMAEL) a learned and celebrated prince, who reigned at Hama, in Syria, and ſucceeded his brother Ahmed in 1310. He compoſed A Deſcription of the Countries beyond the river Oxus, which was publiſhed in London, with a Latin verſion by Mr. Greaves, in 1650. The abbé Aſcari, the French king's interpreter, has alſo tranſlated this work into Latin. The principal of Abulfeda's other works is his Abridgment of Univerſal Hiſtory down to his time. He is very exact, and his ſtyle ſublime and elegant; on which account his works are very much eſteemed. Abulfeda died at ſixty years of age, A. D. 1332.

ABU'L OLA AHMED, one of the moſt celebrated of all the Arabian poets, was born at Maara, a town of Syria, in 973. Tho' he loſt his ſight by the ſmall-pox at three years of age, his deſcriptions are extremely lively and agreeable. He died in 1057.

ABU MASHAR, known to us by the name of Albumaſar. See the article ALBUMASAR.

ABU MOSLEMA, or ABU MOSLEM, a governor of the province of Khoraſan, and a great Muſſulman captain, who, in the year 746, made the dignity of khalif paſs from the race of the Om-miades to that of the Abaſſiades. It is ſaid, that by this revolution he occaſioned the death of above ſix hundred thouſand men; but after he had done the khalif Almanſor the moſt ſignal ſervices, that prince, in the year 754, cauſed him to be thrown into the Tigris.

ABU NOWAS, a celebrated Arabian poet, born in the city of Baſra, in the year 762. The khalif Harun al Raſchid had ſuch a regard for him, that he gave him an apartment in his palace, with Maſab and Rekáſhi, two other admirable poets. His principal works have been collected into one body by ſeveral perſons; on which account there is a great difference between the copies of this author. He died A. D. 810.

ABU SAID EBN ALJAPTU, ſurnamed alſo BEHADER KHAN, ſultan of the race of Genghis-Khan, ſucceeded his father in 1317. He was the laſt monarch of that race: he died in 1335, and after his death the empire was made a ſcene of blood and deſolation.

ABU TEMAM, or HABIB EBN AWS AL-HARETH EBN KAIS, ſurnamed AL TAYI, from his being of an Arabian tribe, named Tay, is conſidered as the prince of the Arabian poets, and none but Al Motanabbi can diſpute precedence with him. He was born either in 842, or 846, at Jaſem, a ſmall town between Damaſcus and Tiberias. He ſung the elogiums of ſeveral khalifs, who were all extremely liberal to him; and collected all his poetical compoſitions into a volume.

ABU YUSOF, the ſame with Yocub Ebn Ibrahim Ebn Habib al Cufi, was made chief juſtice of Bagdat by the khalifs Al Hadi and Harun al Raſchid, and was the firſt who was honoured with the title Kadi al Kodat, i. e. Judge of the Judges. This doctor having one day confeſſed his ignorance on a queſtion that was propoſed to him, he was told, that though he received very conſiderable penſions from the royal treaſury, he did not do his duty, ſince he did not determine the law-points that were brought before him. To which Abu Yuſof made this ſagacious anſwer: "I receive, ſays he, from the treaſury in proportion to what I "know; but were I to receive proportionably to the things I "know not, all the riches of the khalif would not ſuffice to pay "me."

ABUZAID, king of Perſia, in the beginning of the 14th century, falling in love with his prime-miniſter's daughter, put both him and his own ſon-in-law to death, for oppoſing him in his amour; and then marrying the lady, ſurrendered the government of his dominions into her hands, which ſhe managed with extraordinary prudence. He died in 1337.

ABYDOS, a town and caſtle of Leſſer Aſia, which is now the ſouthern caſtle of the Dardanelles, at the ſtreight which joins the Archipelago to the Propontis. This ſtreight is otherwiſe called Gallipoli, and is two miles in breadth. Long. 27. 26. E. Lat. 40.

ABYO, or ABUYO, one of the Philippine Iſlands, in the Eaſt-Indies, between Mindinao and Suzon, where the Spaniards have a fort. Long. 120. 5. E. Lat. 10. N.

ABYSSINIA, by ſome called Higher Ethiopia, and by the Arabians Al Habaſh, is bounded on the north by Nubia, on the eaſt by the Arabic Gulph or Red Sea, and the kingdom of Adel; on the ſouth by the kingdoms of Ajan, Alaba, and Gingiro; and on the weſt by the kingdom of Goram and part of Gingiro; and is divided into a great number of provinces. The principal river is the Nile, and the moſt conſiderable lake that of Dambea, which diſcharges itſelf into the Nile, is about ſeven hundred miles in length, and ninety in breadth.

The air is pretty temperate in the mountains, and therefore their towns and ſtrong holds are generally placed thereon; but in the vallies it is hot and ſuffocating. The earth is of different kinds. In ſome places there are nothing but rocks and profound caverns; in others, eſpecially where there are rivers, the land is exceeding fruitful, and the banks of theſe ſtreams are bordered with flowers of various kinds, many of which are unknown in Europe. They have two crops in a year at leaſt, and have ſome wheat, barley, and maiz, but much more millet and pulſe; likewiſe abundance of ginger, cardamums, cotton, flax, ſugar, honey, wax, and vines. Their common drink is mead and metheglin. There are mines of gold, ſilver, copper, iron, and lead, but they are generally neglected. However, it is ſaid that they work a gold mine that is well guarded with ſoldiers; and the torrents in the rainy ſeaſon waſhes a great deal of that metal from the mountains. This ſeaſon begins in May, when the ſun is vertical, or directly over their heads, and ends in September: this is the cauſe of the overflowing of the Nile, which ſo much puzzled the ancients. It was commonly attributed to the melting of the ſnow upon the hills in theſe parts: but experience has ſince undeceived the world; for there is no ſnow, even on the higheſt hills in this country.

The moſt uſeful mines are thoſe of rock-ſalt: when they have procured any large pieces, they cut it into bars of different ſizes, which they uſe inſtead of money; and with this and unſtamped gold they carry on their traffic. This country produces a great variety of animals, both tame and wild, ſuch as lions, tigers, rhinoceroſes, leopards, elephants, monkeys, ſtags, deer, and ſeveral ſorts of game. Some authors affirm there are unicorns, with a horn in the middle of their foreheads; but this is a mere fable, there being no ſuch creature in the univerſe. It is probable the Rhinoceros was anciently ſo called, becauſe it has a horn on its noſe. Here are likewiſe oſtriches, and a vaſt variety of birds, beſides horſes, camels, dromedaries, goats, cows, and ſheep.

In the lakes there is the hippotamus, or ſea-horſe, which is an animal that lives in the water as well as on the land: it reſembles an ox in ſome things, but is much larger, and weighs near one thouſand ſix hundred pounds; he runs as faſt as a man, but when briſkly purſued he will turn again: here are likewiſe crocodiles in the rivers, and a great variety of venomous reptiles. There is a peculiar kind of bees, which are ſmall, black, and without a ſting; they hive in the earth, and make honey and wax that are extremely white. They are greatly infeſted with locuſts, which devour every thing that is green wherever they come.

Beſides the large towns, there are a great number of villages, which in ſome places are ſo thick ſown, that they look like one continued town: the houſes are very mean, being but one ſtory high, and built of ſtraw, earth, and lime. In moſt of the towns the houſes are ſeparated by hedges, which are always green, and mixed with flowers and fruit-trees at a certain diſtance from each other, which gives an agreeable proſpect.

The government is monarchical, and the ſovereign, falſely ſtiled Preſter John, by many has the title of Negus, and is an abſolute prince. When he is in camp, the tents are ſo regularly diſpoſed that you might miſtake it for a city; and there is a captain over every diviſion, to prevent diſorders and execute juſtice.

The Abyſſins in general are of an olive complexion, tall, graceful, and well featured; thoſe that are neither mechanics, tradeſmen, nor tillers of the ground, are inured to bear arms, which are a head-piece, a buckler, a coat of mail, bows and arrows, darts, pikes capped with iron at both ends, a ſling, and a ſword: they have very few fire-arms, and theſe were introduced by the Portugueſe. The habit of perſons of quality is a ſilken veſt, or fine cotton, with a kind of ſcarf. The citizens have the ſame habit, only coarſer. The common people have nothing but a pair of cotton drawers, and a ſcarf which covers the reſt of their body. The women are of a healthy conſtitution, active, and moderately handſome, having neither flat noſes nor thick lips, like the negroes; and nature is ſo friendly, that they ſtand in little need of midwives, which is indeed the caſe of moſt countries in the torrid zone. They appear in public as in Europe, without being forbid the converſation of men as among the Mahometans. Their religion allows the men but one wife; but they often break through that rule, and are willing to think it is not binding. Princeſſes of the royal blood are not permitted to marry foreigners; and when they take the air, they go in great ſtate, with four or five hundred women attendants.

The language of the Abyſſins is the Ethiopic, which bears a great affinity with the Arabic; but particular provinces have a different dialect.

The religion of the country is the Chriſtian, though there are Jews, Mahometans and Pagans in divers parts, but not every where tolerated: they are of the ſect of the Copts, or Egyptians, and have a patriarch, who depends on the patriarch of Alexandria, but have not any other biſhop. They ſay they received the Jewiſh religion from the queen of Sheba; and the Chriſtian, from the eunuch of the queen of Candace, who was baptized by Philip: but the firſt is a fabulous ſtory, and the other very uncertain. They call their patriarch Abona, and he directs all the affairs of the church.

The particular tenets of the Abyſſins are partly conformable to the Eutychians, and partly peculiar to themſelves. They believe that Jeſus Chriſt has but one nature, which is the divine, and his humanity is entirely ſwallowed up in the divinity; or rather, that he had nothing of the humanity but the appearance. They deny tranſubſtantiation, purgatory, extreme unction, images in churches, the celibacy of the clergy, and auricular confeſſion; inſtead of which laſt, they proſtrate themſelves before the prieſt, and declare they have merited hell; after which, the prieſt holding the book of the Goſpels in his left hand, and a croſs in his right, touches them with it in ſeveral parts of their face and hands, while he recites a prayer: after that, he reads part of a Goſpel, makes ſeveral ſigns of the croſs, orders them a ſlight penance, and ſo diſmiſſes them.

In ſome things they conform to the Jewiſh religion, uſing circumciſion as well as baptiſm: they pay equal regard to Saturday and Sunday, and have ſwine's fleſh in abhorrence. On the other hand, they behave very decently in their churches, pulling off their ſhoes before they go in. Beſides prayers, they only read a part of the Scriptures, having no preaching; but they carefully attend the hours of divine ſervice, and ſeem to have a great deal of devotion. All authors affirm they circumciſe the girls as well as the boys, but none of them tell us in what it conſiſts. Some authors call all their clergy monks, but very improperly, for they have no monaſteries, and are allowed to marry once. They live in little huts near the churches, and perform divine ſervice in their turns.

ACACIA, or AKAKIA, (MARTIN) See AKAKIA.

ACACIUS, ſurnamed LUSCUS, from his having but one eye, was the diſciple of Euſebius, biſhop of Cæſarea, whom he ſucceeded in the year 338, or 340. Though ſcarce inferior to the former in erudition, eloquence, and reputation, he was depoſed by the council of Sardica, together with ſeveral other biſhops, who had declared themſelves of his opinion; and who afterwards aſſembled at Philippolis, in Thrace, where, in their turn, they fulminated againſt Athanaſius, pope Julius, and the reſt of their antagoniſts. Acacius had alſo a great ſhare in the baniſhment of pope Liberius, and bringing Felix into the ſee of Rome. He gave his name to a ſect who were called Acaciani, and died about the year 365. He wrote the life of Euſebius, and ſeveral other works.

ACACIUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople, ſucceeded Gennadius in that ſee in 471. He maintained that his ſee ought to have the pre-pre-eminence over thoſe of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jeruſalem; and, to compaſs this deſign, prevailed on the emperor Leo to reſtore and confirm all the privileges which the churches once enjoyed, and eſpecially that of Conſtantinople. He was afterwards excommunicated by pope Felix III. and in return he eraſed the pope's name out of the ſacred dipticks, or the liſt of thoſe biſhops whoſe names were mentioned in the publick prayers: but being ſupported by the emperor of the Eaſt, he enjoyed his biſhoprick quietly till his death, which happened in 489.

ACACIUS, biſhop of Berœa, in Syria, in the fourth and beginning of the fifth century, was at the council of Conſtantinople, held in the year 381, in which were preſent an hundred and fifty biſhops. He was the friend of Epiphanius Flavianus, and the enemy of John Chryſoſtom, biſhop of Conſtantinople, whom he cauſed to be depoſed. He alſo, when an hundred and ten years of age, wrote to the emperor Theodoſius the younger, to adviſe him to confirm the ſentence pronounced againſt Cyril, biſhop of of Alexandria, who had been depoſed in a conventicle of ſchiſmatics. Notwithſtanding theſe rigorous proceedings, Theodoret aſſures us, that he was eminent both for his wiſdom and the ſanctity of his life. He died about the year 432.

ACACIUS (St.) biſhop of Amida, in Meſopotamia, in 420, was diſtinguiſhed by his piety and charity. He ſold the plate belonging to his church to purchaſe ſeven thouſand Perſian ſlaves, who were ready to die with want and miſery; and giving each of them ſome money, ſent them home. Veranius, their king, was ſo affected by this noble inſtance of benevolence, that he deſired to ſee the biſhop; and this interview procured a peace between that prince and Theodoſius I.

There have been ſeveral other eminent perſons of the ſame name, particularly a martyr under the emperor Decius: a patriarch of Antioch, who ſucceeded Baſil in 458, and died in 459: a biſhop of Miletum in the fifth century; and a famous rhetorician in the reign of the emperor Julian.

ACADEMIA, or ACADEMY, in Grecian antiquity, a grove in the ſuburbs of Athens, where there were ſhady and ſolitary walks fit for ſtudy and meditation. It took its name from Academus, or Echedemus, a citizen of Athens.

ACADEMICS, in Grecian antiquity, a ſect of philoſophers founded by Socrates and Plato, ſo called from their holding their aſſemblies in the Academia. They have been charged with maintaining that all things are uncertain, and that conſequently men ought to doubt of every thing. But Cicero, who was himſelf an Academic, ſays, that they differed from thoſe who imagined they knew every thing, in modeſtly maintaining that many things were only probable, that yet might ſerve to regulate their conduct; and that in this they had greatly the advantage of the dogmatiſts, as being entirely diſengaged, and unbiaſſed, and conſequently at full liberty to determine as their judgments ſhould direct.

ACADIA. See NOVA SCOTIA.

ACAMAS, the ſon of Theſeus, was deputed, with Diomedes, to the Trojans, to demand Helena. During which embaſſy he had a child by Leodice, the daughter of Priam. He was alſo one of the heroes who concealed themſelves in the wooden horſe. It is ſaid that one of the Athenian tribes was called Acamantides from his name, and that he founded Acamantium, a city in Phrygia.

ACAPULCO, a conſiderable town and port in Mexico, on the South Sea. It has a fine harbour, from whence a ſhip annually ſails to Manilla in the Philippine iſlands, near the coaſt of China in Aſia: and another returns annually from thence with all the treaſures of the Eaſt Indies, ſuch as diamonds, rubies, ſapphires, and other precious ſtones, the rich carpets of Perſia, the camphire of Borneo, the benjamin and ivory of Pegu and Cambodia; the ſilks, muſlins, and calicoes of the Mogul's country; the gold-duſt, tea, china-ware, ſilk, and cabinets of China and Japan; beſides cinnamon, cloves, mace, nutmegs, and pepper; inſomuch that this ſingle ſhip contains more riches than many whole fleets. The goods brought to Acapulco are carried to the city of Mexico, by mules and pack-horſes, and from thence to Vera Cruz on the North Sea, in order to be ſhipped for Europe. Acapulco itſelf is a ſmall place, with a little caſtle, conſiſting of about two or three hundred thatched houſes. Long. 102. 29. W. Lat 17. 30. N.

ACASTUS, the ſon of Pelias king of Theſſaly, and one of the moſt famous hunters of his time, married Hippolyta, who falling deſperately in love with Peleus, her ſon-in-law; and he refuſing to gratify her wiſhes, ſhe accuſed him to her huſband of a rape; on which he flew them both.

ACCA (St.) biſhop of Haguſtaldt, or Hexham, in Northumberland, ſucceeded Wilfrid in that ſee in 709. He wrote Paſſiones Sanctorum, i. e. The Sufferings of the Saints: Officia ſuæ Eccleſiæ, i. e. The Offices of his own Church, &c. He was eſteemed a very able divine, and was remarkably ſkilled in church muſic.

ACCARISI (FRANCIS) an Italian civilian, born at Ancona. He was raiſed to the chair of law-profeſſor at Sienna, and his fame ſpread ſo far that all the univerſities in Italy wiſhed to obtain him, and for that purpoſe made him very advantageous offers. He was afterwards made counſellor to the duke of Parma, and principal law-profeſſor in the univerſity of Piſa, which he enjoyed till his death in 1622.

ACCARISI (JAMES) doctor of divinity, and profeſſor of rhetoric at Mantua, was born at Bologna. He publiſhed a volume of his orations, another of letters, the Hiſtory of the Propagation of the Faith; and a Latin verſion of the diſturbances in the Low Countries, compoſed by cardinal Bentivoglio.

ACCIAIOLI (RENIER) duke of Athens, was deſcended from an antient and noble family of Florence, fruitful in great men. He rendered himſelf maſter of Athens, Corinth, and a part of Bœotia at the beginning of the fifteenth century.

ACCIAIOLI (ANGELO) cardinal, legate, and archbiſhop of Florence, his native country, died in 1407. He compoſed a work in favour of Urban VI.

ACCIAIOLI (DONATO) born at Florence in 1428, rendered himſelf famous by his learning, and the employments he poſſeſſed in his native country. He was conſidered as the ableſt orator, philoſopher, and mathematician of his age. He wrote, 1. A Latin Tranſlation of Plutarch's Lives of Alcibiades and Demetrius. 2. A Commentary, in Latin, on the Morals and Politics of Ariſtotle, collected from the leſſons of his maſter Argyrophilus. 3. The Lives of Hanibal and Scipio. 4. And tranſlated Aretino's Hiſtory of Florence into his native language, &c. He died in Auguſt 1473, at thirty-nine years of age.

ACCIAIOLI (JOHN) of the ſame family with the former, and a native of Florence, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. Quitting the bar, where he preſided in quality of ſenator, he entered into holy orders; and having learned the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic languages, travelled to Bologna and Padua to improve himſelf in uſeful knowledge. He was at length looked upon as an oracle in all ſciences, and the moſt eminent men of the age uſed to frequent his houſe, in order to conſult him on doubts, and aſſiſt at the conferences that were held there. He left only the following work, Multa doctiſſimorum Problematum Monumenta, magno Studio & ingenio Elucubrata.

ACCIAIOLI (ZENOBIO) a Dominican friar, born in Florence, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his works, among which the following only are extant: 1. A Tranſlation of Euſebius's book againſt Hierocles. 2. That of Olympiodorus on Eccleſiaſtes. 3. And that of Theodoret on the Cure of the falſe Opinions of the Gentiles. He died, according to ſome, in 1520, but others ſay not till 1587.

ACCIUS (LUCIUS) a tragic poet, greatly eſteemed by the antients for the force of his expreſſions, the nobleneſs of his ſentiments, and the variety of his characters. He alſo compoſed annals, and wrote verſes in praiſe of Decimus Brutus. Perſius and Martial ridiculed thoſe who imitated the ſtyle of this poet. Accius was born about a hundred and ſeventy-one years before the Chriſtian æra.

ACCIUS, a poet of the ſixteenth century, to whom is attributed a Paraphraſe on Æſop's Fables in elegiac verſe, of which Julius Scaliger has given a great elogium.

ACCO, a woman who ran diſtracted in her old age, on her finding by her glaſs that ſhe had loſt all her beauty. Plutarch obſerves, that mothers uſed to frighten their children by mentioning her name.

ACCOLTI (BERNARDO) ſecretary to the republic of Florence, was ſurnamed L'Unico, or the Non Such, probably from the great extent of his underſtanding, the variety of ſciencies he had acquired, and the excellency of his poetic vein; which not only gained him a ſeat among the Academicians of the court of Urbino, but made that great Mæcenas, pope Leo X. in 1520, create him prince of the ſtate of Nepi. He wrote many pieces, and among others a collection of excellent poems, printed at Venice in 1519 and 1553.

ACCURSIUS, a celebrated civilian born at Florence, was law-profeſſor at Bologna in the thirteenth century. Having quitted the chair, he compoſed a continued gloſs on the whole body of the law, which was of ſuch uſe to young ſtudents, that it quite eclipſed all the former expoſitions; and his authority was for ſome time of ſuch weight, that he was called the Idol of the civilians. He died at Bologna in 1229, aged ſeventy-eight.

ACCURSIUS, or ACCORSO, called AZZONE from his being the diſciple of the famous Azzone, became ſuch a maſter of the civil and canon laws, that he was conſidered as the prince of lawyers.

ACCURSIUS (FRANCIS or FRANCISCO ACCORSO) ſon to the former, was ſo highly eſteemed by the citizens of Bologna, that upon hearing that he was to follow the king of England into France, in order to teach the law there, they commanded him not to leave their city upon pain of having his whole eſtate confiſcated; and though Accurſius ſold it to a friend, they put their threats in execution; this obliged him to return back, on which it was reſtored to him again.

ACCURSIUS (MARIANGELUS) an able critic in the ſixteenth century, was born in Aquila. His Diatrebes, printed at Rome in folio, in 1524, on Ovid and Solinus, are a proof of his abilities in that kind of erudition. In his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus there are five books more than in any of the preceding ones. His predominant paſſion was the ſearching for and collecting of old manuſcripts: yet he made Latin and Italian verſes, was complete maſter of the French, German, and Spaniſh tongues, and underſtood optics and muſic.

ACEPHALI, a ſect ſo called, on account of their having no head or leader, from the word ἀκέφαλος. They were properly a party that appeared about the year 482, and followed the opinions of Peter Mongus, biſhop of Alexandria; but abandoned him on his ſubſcribing the decrees of the council of Chalcedon. Their doctrines were in general the ſame as that of the Eutychians.

ACERBO (FRANCIS) a learned Jeſuit, born at Nocera, was a perſon of great learning and penetration. His Latin poems, intitled, Ægro Corpori à Muſe Solatium, has been greatly eſteemed: it was printed at Naples in 1666, in quarto.

ACESIUS, a Novatian biſhop, who was preſent at the council of Nice. He denied that a perſon who had fallen into any crime after baptiſm, ſhould be received into the communion of the church. As he maintained this abſurd opinion in the preſence of Conſtantine, that emperor pleaſantly replied, "Set "up a ladder for yourſelf, Aceſius, and aſcend to heaven "alone."

ACHÆMENES, the chief of an illuſtrious family, who reigned in Perſia till the time of Darius Codomannus, on which account that family is often diſtinguiſhed by the term Achæmenides, and the epithet Achæmenians is frequently given to the Perſians by the antient poets.

ACHÆMENES, the ſon of Darius I. king of Perſia, and brother of Xerxes. This prince commanded the Egyptian fleet in the famous expedition that proved ſo fatal to Greece: but he was at laſt defeated and ſlain by Inarus, the chief of the Egyptian rebels, ſuccoured by the Athenians, about four hundred and ſixty years before the Chriſtian æra.

ACHÆUS, couſin to Antiochus the Great, endeavoured to obtain the kingdom of Syria. Being intruſted by Antiochus with the government of all his provinces beyond Mount Taurus, that high poſt excited his ambition, and made him reſolve to graſp at the ſovereignty; for this purpoſe he made himſelf popular by his liberalities, and diſputed the crown with his ſovereign: but though Antiochus immediately raiſed an army, Achæus kept the field for ſeven or eight years. At laſt Antiochus having received a reinforcement from Attalus, king of Pergamus, he drove him into Sardis, where, after a ſiege of two years, he was delivered up to Antiochus, who cauſed the extremities of his limbs to be cut off, and afterwards his head, which was ſewed up in an aſs's ſkin, and then the remaining part of the body was fixed on a croſs. This happened two hundred and eleven years before the Chriſtian æra.

ACHAIÆ PRESBYTERI, or the Preſbyters of Achaia, were thoſe who were preſent at the martyrdom of St. Andrew the apoſtle, A. D. 59, and are ſaid to have written an epiſtle in relation to it. Bellarmin, and ſeveral other eminent writers of the church of Rome, allow it to be genuine; while Du Pin, and ſome others, expreſsly reject it.

ACHAIUS, king of Scotland, was the ſon of king Ethſine, or Ethwin, and was raiſed to the crown in 788, after the death of Soluatius. The emperor Charlemagne ſent him an embaſſy, to deſire an alliance with him againſt the Saxons of Germany and England, who infeſted the ſeas with their piracies. This alliance was concluded in France, upon conditions ſo advantageous to the Scots, that Achaius, to perpetuate the memory of it, added to the arms of Scotland a double field ſowed with lilies.

ACHAN, the ſon of Carmi, of the tribe of Judah, who at the taking of Jericho concealed two hundred ſhekels of ſilver, a Babyloniſh garment, and a wedge of gold, contrary to the expreſs command of God. This ſin proved fatal to the Iſraelites, who were repulſed at the ſiege of Ai. In this dreadful exigence Joſhua proſtrated himſelf before the Lord, and begged that he would have mercy upon his people. Achan was diſcovered by caſting lots, and he and his children ſtoned to death. This expiation being made, Ai was immediately taken by ſtratagem. Joſh. vii. viii. ix.

ACHATES, the companion of Eneas, and his moſt faithful friend, celebrated in Virgil.

ACHELOUS, in fabulous hiſtory, wreſtled with Hercules, for no leſs a prize than Deianira, daughter to king Oenus: but as Achelous had the power of aſſuming all ſhapes, the conteſt was long dubious; at laſt, as he took that of a bull, Hercules tore off one of his horns, ſo that he was forced to ſubmit, and to redeem it by giving the conqueror the horn of Amalthæa, the fame with the Cornucopia, or horn of plenty, which Hercules having filled with a variety of fruits, conſecrated to Jupiter. Some explain this fable by ſaying, that Achelous is a winding river of Greece, whoſe ſtream was ſo rapid, that it roared like a bull, and overflowed its banks; but Hercules, by bringing it into two channels, broke off one of the horns, and ſo reſtored plenty to the country.

ACHEM, is the capital of the kingdom of the ſame name in the north part of the iſland of Sumatra, in the Eaſt Indies. It is ſituated in a plain on a pleaſant river, about a mile and a half from the ſea. The royal palace, which is very large, is ſeated in the very center of the city, and is of an oval figure ſurrounded with a ditch, and defended by very large pieces of ordnance. The ditch is guarded by palliſadoes, in which are ſeven gates. On the left ſide of the river is a fort to defend its entrance, and ſeveral other redoubts are erected in the marſhes round the city for its defence. The houſes are built upon poſts, ſo that you muſt go up ſeveral ſteps before you can enter them, becauſe in the rainy ſeaſon the waters riſe ſo high that they are forced to go from houſe to houſe in boats. The floors, partitions, and ſides are of ſplit bamboos, and they are covered with reeds, cocoa and palmeto leaves. They are all palliſadoed round, except in two chief ſtreets, in one of which they have their exchange, and in the other the Chineſe live. The number of houſes may be about ſeven or eight thouſand.

The ſtrangers, which conſiſt of Engliſh, Dutch, Danes and Portugueſe, Chineſe and Guzarats, live as near each other as they can, in a long ſtreet near the river, being only parted with bamboo pales. They have a particular ſort of houſes to put their beſt goods in, in order to preſerve them from fire; and theſe are the only brick or ſtone houſes in the city.

The north part of this iſland is more healthful than the ſouth, and yet it is very bad for ſtrangers, eſpecially in the rainy ſeaſons, when there is ſcarce a day paſſes without ſudden ſhowers, ſtorms, thundering, and lightning; beſides the heat of the ſun raiſes up the deleterious particles of the ſtanding waters, which infect the air and produce agues, fluxes, and malignant fevers. In other reſpects this part of Sumatra is pleaſant enough; for the ſoil produces rice in abundance, and all other ſorts of Indian fruits; ſuch as bananas, potatoes, yams, coco nuts, oranges, lemons, tamarinds, pumple noſes, mangoes, pomgranates, citrons, water melons, muſk melons, pine apples, mangaſtans, which is a moſt delicate fruit, and reſembles a pomegranate, but is leſs; ſugar, honey, and ginger.

Beſides here is cotton, camphire, white benzoin, calamback, or aloes wood, eagle wood, and ſandal wood. The foreſts are full of various kinds of wild beaſts, as elephants, buffaloes, rhinoceroſes, tygers, ſtags, wild boars, porcupines, apes, monkeys, guanas, lizards, and ſerpents. It is worthy of obſervation, that the kingdom of Achem, and other parts of the iſland of Sumatra, is the only place in the Eaſt Indies that has bears. The woods abound with wild-fowl of all ſorts, and the country with thoſe that are tame. They have likewiſe bats of an incredible ſize. The rivers, lakes, and ſea afford great plenty of fiſh; and in ſome of them are crocodiles.

The mountains contain gold, ſilver, copper, tin, iron, and brimſtone; but the gold mines are too much neglected: however, in the year 1665, the queen of Achem got a thouſand pound weight out of one mine, and the Dutch Eaſt India company three hundred. The mountains likewiſe yield emeralds, hyacinths, and other precious ſtones. On the top of the burning mountain Balabam is a ſpring of a ſulphureous liquor, like oil; and in other parts a kind of petrolæum is met with, which the natives call minjah tunnah, or earth oil. The exportation of this is prohibited by the king of Achem, under pain of death. It is ſaid to cure a particular kind of paralytic lameneſs peculiar to theſe parts, called beriberi, only by bathing the limbs.

The moſt general language is the Malayan, though they ſpeak ſeveral others. The inhabitants are large, and of a blackiſh brown, or deep tawny complexion, with black fine hair, a long viſage, black eyes, thin lips, and the noſe of a middle ſize. Some have black teeth with chewing betel. The women are well ſhaped, and of a ſomewhat better complexion, with exceeding white teeth, except they chew betel. They are not very ſcrupulous in point of chaſtity, for they think it no manner of diſgrace to proſtitute themſelves for money. The manners both of the men and women are but very indifferent, for they are proud, ill-natured, and treacherous. The men, like other Mahometans, have as many wives as they can keep; and women of quality are ſeldom ſeen in the ſtreets.

The richer ſort have a piece of linen wrapped about their heads as a turban, and ſmall drawers, with a kind of coat in the Mahometan faſhion, of ſilk or callico, and a ſort of ſandals for their feet. In general both men and woman go quite naked from the waiſt upwards, and without ſtockings or ſhoes, having a piece of ſome ſort of cloth wrapped about their middles. Their principal nouriſhment is rice; but the rich have wild fowl, fiſh, cabrettoes, mutton, hogs, and deer, which are of the ſize of rabbits, wherewith their markets are very well ſtocked. Sometimes they have buffaloes fleſh. They dreſs every thing very well in their manner, ſeaſoning with pepper and garlic, and dying them yellow with turmeric, to render them more agreeable to the ſight.

The moſt common occupations at Achem are bankers, carpenters, ſmiths, goldſmiths, and fiſhing. The country people live on feeding cattle principally for their own uſe, or by bringing wild-fowl to the market every week, if they live near the city. If they were not extremely lazy, they might live very well, by planting roots and other uſeful vegetables, which ſome of them of late have undertaken. The fiſhermen are the richeſt of all the lower ſort; for in fine weather they will take from fifty to a hundred fiſh, as thick as the calf of one's leg, which they carry immediately to the market. The carpenters are very handy in building houſes after their manner, but more eſpecially in making a kind of boats called flying proas, which are exceeding neat and well contrived. They can build barks from ten to twenty ton each, with which they trade from place to place.

As the Achineſe pick up a conſiderable quantity of gold duſt, they have goods brought from ſeveral parts to purchaſe it, ſuch as opium, ſaltpetre, rice, buffalo's butter, all ſorts of cotton and ſilk manufactures from Bengal; tobacco, onions, callico, muſlin, brown and blue long cloth, ſallampores, chints, and ſometimes gunpowder, from Madraſs, &c. The gold duſt is found in gullies or rivulets, as it is waſhed from the mountains, particularly one high mountain in the ſhape of a pyramid, which ſome ſay furniſhes them yearly with a thouſand pounds weight.
Elephants are very numerous at Achem, and conſequently their teeth are very plentiful. They are ſaid to live upwards of three hundred years, and grow in this place to be eleven feet high.

Moſt of the inhabitants living near the ſea-coaſts are Mahometans, and ſeem to be very zealous in their religion. Now as the ceremonial part of it partly conſiſts in frequent ablutions, perhaps this may be the reaſon why both men and women will never paſs by a river without bathing themſelves; and as for the river near the city it is always full of men, women, and children children of all ages. In the inland parts of the country they are pagans, but their ceremonies are unknown.

The laws are very ſevere in this country, and puniſhments are inflicted without delay. For the perſon accuſed of any crime is taken immediately before a magiſtrate, and either condemned or acquitted according to the evidence. When he is found guilty of theft, if the thing ſtolen does not amount to a tale, or twenty ſhillings, they cut off a hand or foot, at the option of the criminal. When he is caught a ſecond time, the ſame puniſhment is inflicted. But the third time, or if he has ſtolen the value of five tale, he is impaled alive. When a hand or foot is to be cut off, it is laid upon a hatchet fixed in a block, with the edge uppermoſt, and by ſtriking with a wooden mallet they make the amputation. This done they are ſent to an iſland called Pulo Way, where they muſt cultivate the ground, breed poultry, and the like, for the uſe of the city.

This country is governed by a king or queen, under whom there are twelve oronkers, or great lords, who have their ſeveral departments, and act with great power and authority. Theſe great men have many ſlaves, theſe have others under them, and theſe laſt have their ſlaves. This ſubordination renders the ſlaves ſo numerous, that it may be almoſt called a country of ſlaves. ACHERI (Luke d') a learned Benedictine of the congregation of St. Maur, was born at St. Quintin, in Picardy, in 1609, and made himſelf famous by printing ſeveral works, which till then were only in manuſcript, particularly, 1. The epiſtle attributed to St. Barnabas. 2. The works of Lanfrank, archbiſhop of Canterbury. 3. Thoſe of Guibert, abbot of Nogent. 4. A collection of ſcarce and curious pieces under the title of Spicilegium, i. e. Gleanings, in thirteen volumes, quarto. 5. Grimlaic's Rule for Anchorites, and ſome Aſiatic pieces. Luke d'Acheri paſſed his whole life in his retreat: he ſpoke with modeſty and reſerve; but his vaſt erudition has juſtly given him a place among the moſt learned men of the ſeventeenth century. He died at the abbey of St. Germain in the Fields, on the 29th of April 1685, aged ſeventy-ſix.

ACHERON, according to the heathen mythology, a river of Epirus, which, according to ſome, roſe out of the lake Acheruſia, in Epirus, and emptied itſelf into the bay of Ambracia. Others make it a ſulphureous and ſtinking lake near cape Miſenum, in the bay of Naples. The poets feigned it to be the ſon of Titan or Terra, or, as others ſay, of Ceres; and that he was born in a cave without a father, and ſent to hell for furniſhing the Titans with water during their war with the gods, where he was turned into a river, over which departed ſouls were ferried.

ACHILLES, in fabulous hiſtory, the firſt of this name, according to the poets, was the ſon of Terra, or the earth, and did Jupiter a very ſignal piece of ſervice; for having ſheltered Juno in a cave, when ſhe fled from the amorous purſuits of that god, he addreſſed her with ſuch perſuaſive eloquence, as to make her conſent to conſummate their marriage.

Achilles, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the greateſt heroes of antient Greece, was the ſon ef Peleus and Thetis. He was a native of Phthia, in Theſſaly: and, according to the poets, his mother fed him by day with ambroſia, and by night covered him with celeſtial fire. She dipped him alſo in the waters of the river Styx, by which his whole body became invulnerable, except that part of his heel by which ſhe held him; and afterwards intruſted him to the care of the centaur Chiron, who, to give him the ſtrength neceſſary for martial toil, fed him with honey, and the marrow of lions and wild boars, &c. To prevent his going to the ſiege of Troy, ſhe diſguiſed him in female apparel, and hid him among the maidens at the court of king Lycomedes: but Ulyſſes diſcovering him, perſuaded him to follow the Greeks. Achilles diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a number of heroic actions; and having quarrelled with Agamemnon on account of Briſeis, reſolved no longer to concern himſelf in the war; till hearing that Hector had killed his friend Patroclus, he fought with him, killed him, faſtened his corpſe to his chariot, and dragged it round the walls of Troy. At laſt Paris treacherouſly wounded him in the heel with an arrow, while he was in a temple treating about his marriage with Philoxena, daughter to king Priam. Of this wound he died, and was interred on the promontory of Sigæum, and after Troy was taken, the Greeks ſacrificed Philoxena on his tomb. It is ſaid, that Alexander ſeeing this tomb, honoured it by placing a crown upon it; at the ſame time crying out, that "Achilles was happy in having, "during his life, ſuch a friend as Patroclus; and after his "death, a poet like Homer." Achilles is ſuppoſed to have died 1183 years before the Chriſtian æra.

Achilles Tatius. See the article Tatius.

ACHILLINI (Alexander) a celebrated philoſopher and phyſician at Bologna, and an accurate interpreter of Averroes upon Ariſtotle's philoſophy, died at Bologna, his native city, in 1512. His philoſophical works are printed together in one volume in folio; as are alſo his medicinal works.

Achillini (Claudius) grandſon of the former, and one of the greateſt ornaments of Bologna, his native city, died in 1640, aged ſixty-ſix years. He wrote ſome Latin letters, and a volume of very ingenious Italian poems.

ACHIOR, a general of the Ammonites, who, during the ſiege of Bethulia, ſeven hundred and five years before Chriſt, ſpoke with great freedom to Holofernes of the protection granted by God to the Jews, and adviſed him not to attack them unleſs they had offended their God. His advice was received with the utmoſt indignation by all the principal officers of the army, who reſolved to kill him; and Holofernes himſelf, after having reproached him in the moſt blaſphemous terms, ordered his ſoldiers to ſeize him, to carry him to Bethulia, and deliver him up to the Jews: but thinking it impoſſible to get to that city, on account of the ſlingers who caſt ſtones at them, they bound him and left him at the foot of the hill; when the Iſraelites ſeeing Achior, came and looſed him, and brought him into the city. He then informed them of the reaſon why the Aſſyrians treated him in that manner; upon which Ozias, one of the governors of the city, received him into his houſe. Some time after Judith having cut off Holofernes's head, brought it to Achior; who was no ſooner recovered from his ſurpriſe, than he expreſſed his joy, and immediately became a protelite to the Jewiſh religion.

ACHISH, king of Gath, to whom David retired, and who gained a complete victory over Saul, which was fatal both to that prince and his ſon Jonathan. This battle was fought about one thouſand and fifty-five years before Chriſt.

ACHITOPHEL, counſellor to king David, and afterwards to Abſalom, hanged himſelf, becauſe Abſalom would not follow his counſel. This happened about one thouſand and twenty-three years before the Chriſtian æra.

ACHMET, the ſon of Selim, a Chriſtian author in the ninth century, wrote a treatiſe on the interpretation of dreams, which was printed in Greek and Latin, and annexed to Artimidorus, in 1623. The Arabic original is loſt.

Achmet Geduc, a famous general under Mahomet II. and Bajazet II. was a native of Albania, and lived in the fifteenth century. He took Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples, ſword in hand, and carried the women into Greece, where he ſold them to the higheſt bidders. When Mahomet II. died, his ſons, Bajazet and Zezim, both claimed the throne, and reſolved to decide their conteſt by the ſword. Achmet ſided with the former, and by his bravery and conduct fixed the crown on his head. But that general found, by ſad experience, that too bright a glory is an unpardonable crime in the eyes of a tyrant; for Bajazet took away his life, by whom he was raiſed to the throne.

Achmet I. emperor of the Turks, ſucceeded his father Mahomet III. in 1604. He was very unfortunate in a war againſt the Perſians, was ignorant, paſſionate, and cruel; always wavering, without courage to proſecute his deſigns; and neglecting the moſt important affairs to amuſe himſelf with trifles. After a ſhort and inglorious reign he died in the year 1616, being then about twenty-ſix years old. This prince built the ſuperb moſque in the Hippodrome of Conſtantinople.

ACIDALIUS (Valens) a very learned man, would probably have been one of the beſt critics in his time, had he not died very young. He was born at Witſtock, in the duchy of Brandenbourg; and having viſited ſeveral academies in Germany and Italy, embraced the Romiſh religion. He wrote Latin notes on Quintius Curtius, which are very much eſteemed; and alſo ſeveral other works; but died in 1595, in the twenty-ninth year of his age.

ACILIUS Glabrio (Marcus) conſul in the year of Rome 562, and two hundred and eleven years before the Chriſtian æra, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and conduct in gaining a complete victory over Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, at the Streights of Thermopylæ, in Theſſaly; and on ſeveral other occaſions. He built the Temple of Piety at Rome, in conſequence of a vow he made before the above-mentioned battle; and the reaſon of his giving it that name, is very remarkable. The ſtory mentioned by Pliny, Valerius Maximus, and other authors, is as follows: The Roman prætor had condemned a woman for a capital crime, and committed her to the triumvir to be put to death in priſon; but the keeper being moved with compaſſion, deferred the painful taſk of ſtrangling her, and even ſuffered her daughter to viſit her, after ſhe had been carefully ſearched, to prevent her carrying her any food, imagining that ſhe would ſoon be ſtarved to death. But after ſeveral days had paſſed, and he found no alteration in her, he was ſurpriſed at her being ſupported ſo long; and at laſt, having watched the daughter, he obſerved that the order of nature was happily inverted, and the mother was ſuſtained by ſucking the daughter's breaſt. The keeper immediately told this ſurpriſing circumſtance to the triumvir, and it being diſcovered to the council of the judges, the woman's puniſhment was remitted; and ſhe was not only diſcharged, but a perpetual allowance was appointed to maintain both her and her daughter.

Acilius (Caius) one of Julius Cæſar's ſoldiers, rendered himſelf famous by an inſtance of aſtoniſhing bravery; for being in a ſea-fight at Marſeilles, and having caught hold of one of his enemy's ſhips, had his right hand cut off; notwithſtanding which he leaped into the ſhip, and knocked down every one who met him with his ſhield.

Acilius Aviola, legate of Tiberius in Gaul, ſuppreſſed the commotions raiſed in that country by Julius Florus and Julius Sacrovir. The manner of his death was very extraordinary; for being thought to be dead, he was carried to the funeral pile prepared for him; but as ſoon as the fire came to touch his body, he recovered, and cried out, that he was alive, deſiring his tutor, who was the only perſon that ſtaid there, to aſſiſt him; but the flames had by that time ſurrounded him, ſo that he was preſently burnt to death.

ACIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Faunus and Simetheis, a beautiful ſhepherd of Sicily, who being beloved by Galatea, Polyphemus the giant was ſo enraged, that he daſhed out his brains againſt a rock; after which Galatea turned him into a river, which was called by his name.

ACME, a Jewiſh lady, in the ſervice of Livia, the wife of Auguſtus Cæſar; who being bribed by Antipater, the ſon of Herod the Great, forged a letter in the name of Salome, that king's ſiſter, in order to expoſe her to Herod's reſentment; but this baſe impoſture being detected, ſhe was executed by order of Auguſtus.

ACOLTI, an antient family in Tuſcany, that has produced ſeveral great men, viz. 1. Benedict Acolti the elder, who was born at Arezzo, in Tuſcany, and flouriſhed about the year 1376. He wrote a treatiſe to exhort the emperor Charles IV. to undertake an expédition into Italy, to quiet the diſorders there. 2. Benedict Acolti the younger, ſuppoſed to have been the grandſon of the former, was born at Arezzo in 1415, and wrote a Latin work on the wars carried on by the Chriſtians againſt the Infidels, in order to recover Judea and the Holy Sepulchre: another piece on the excellent perſonages in his time; and a work in French, conſiſting of military diſcourſes on the wars carried on by the Chriſtians againſt the Barbarians. 3. Peter Acolti, cardinal of St. Euſebius, was ſon of the former. He wrote ſeveral tracts, and died at Rome in 1532. 4. Benedict Acolti, cardinal, was born at Florence October 29, 1497. He made an extraordinary progreſs in the ſtudy of the law, and became ſo great a maſter of the Latin tongue, that he was called the Cicero of his time. He wrote a treatiſe on the rights of the pope to the kingdom of Naples, and ſome poems that were much eſteemed. He died at Florence in 1549. He ought not to be confounded with Benedict Acolti, chief of a conſpiracy againſt pope Pious IV. who was executed in 1564.

ACOMA, a town of North America, in New Mexico, ſeated on a hill, with a good caſtle. To go into the town you muſt walk up fifty ſteps, cut out of the rock. It is the capital of that province, and was taken by the Spaniards in 1599. Long. 104. 15. W. Lat. 35. 0.

ACOMACK, the name of a county in Virginia. It is on the eaſtern ſide of Cheſepeak bay, on a ſlip of land by the Virginians called the Eaſtern Shore. It is a large county, and yet contains but one pariſh, the inhabitants being but thin at preſent, and ſcattered up and down in diſtinct ſettlements.

ACOMINATUS NICETAS. See NICETAS.

ACONTIUS (JAMES) a philoſopher, civilian, and divine, born at Trent in the ſixteenth century. He embraced the Reformed religion, and coming to England, was well received by queen Elizabeth, to whom he dedicated his book on the ſtratagems of Satan. He alſo wrote, 1. A Treatiſe of the Method and right Way of inveſtigating and treating of Arts and Sciences. 2. A Treatiſe of Logic; and, 3. Another on the Manner of making Books. He was a man of great penetration and judgment, and of ſingular modeſty and moderation, in matters of religion.

ACOSTA (URIEL) a gentleman born at Oporto, about the end of the ſixteenth century. He was educated in the Romiſh religion, and inſtructed in a variety of ſciences, the laſt of which was the law. Religion having early made a deep impreſſion on his mind, he was ſeized with the dread of eternal miſery, which threw him into the moſt horrible agonies; and as the Popiſh doctrines would not ſuffer him to be at reſt, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Moſes and the prophets; which giving him more ſatisfaction, he embraced Judaiſm, left Portugal, and was circumciſed at Amſterdam; on which occaſion he changed his name of Gabriel to that of Uriel: but having obſerved that the tenets and cuſtoms of the Jews were not conformable to the laws of Moſes, it was impoſſible for him to be ſilent, he was therefore excommunicated by the ſynagogue, on which he wrote a book to prove that the rites and traditions of the Phariſees are contrary to the writings of Moſes. He even embraced the errors of the Sadducees, becauſe Moſes made no mention either of a ſtate of future rewards or puniſhments: and a Jewiſh phyſician wrote againſt him a defence of the immortality of the ſoul. After farther conſideration, Acoſta imagined that the Moſaic law was only an human invention, and that all religions are indifferent; in conſequence of which he diſguiſed his errors, and, retracting what he had written, returned again to the Jewiſh church, fifteen years after his excommunication: but ſome days after he was accuſed by a young lad, his nephew, of not obſerving the Jewiſh law, either with reſpect to eating or the ſabbath. On this accuſation he received the moſt cruel and ignominious treatment from the Jews, as he himſelf relates in a ſmall book, intitled, Exemplar vitæ humanæ. In ſhort, attempting to kill his principal enemy, and the piſtol miſſing fire, he took another and killed himſelf. This happened about the year 1640.

ACOSTA. See COSTA.

ACQUI, a town of Italy, in the duchy of Montferrat, with a biſhop's ſee, and commodious baths. It was taken by the Spaniards in 1745, and retaken by the Piedmonteſe in 1746; but after this it was taken again and diſmantled by the French, who afterwards forſook it. It is ſeated on the river Bormia, twenty-five miles north-weſt of Genoa, and thirty ſouth of Caſal. Long. 8. 40. E. Lat. 44. 40.

ACRA, a country on the gold coaſt of Guinea, in Africa, where the Engliſh have a large, ſtrong, and handſome fort, built on the top of a ſteep rocky cliff, hanging over the ſea: it has a battery juſt under the caſtle wall, next the water: beſides which, there are large ſtrong flankers, on which are mounted twenty-ſeven pieces of ordnance. A little below this, the Dutch have a fort, called Crevecoeur, which is larger than the Engliſh, but the walls are thinner. Two leagues further is a Daniſh fort, called Chriſtianburgh, which is the only one they have on this coaſt: it is a ſquare building, ſtrengthened by four batteries, and is planted with twenty guns. The country hereabout is the pleaſanteſt part of the gold coaſt, being not ſo woody as the other parts: and here are ſalt ponds belonging to the Engliſh fort, which yield a great deal of ſalt. There is a negro town belonging to each fort.

ACRA, or ACRE, a town and port in Paleſtine, ſeated on the ſea-ſhore. It was formerly called Acco, and then Ptolemais. The knights of Malta had it a long while in their poſſeſſion. It was a large ſtrong place, as appears by its ruins. Some hiſtories ſay there were as many churches as there are days in the year; but this does not appear at preſent; for if we may judge from what remains, there could be no more than thirty. There is at Acre a ſquare tower, which ſerves for a caſtle, and a houſe near it, which is uſed for the ſeraglio of the baſſa, when he reſides at this place. There is not above fifty houſes left, and theſe are more properly huts. This was a very famous place during the wars in the Holy Land, when the Chriſtians attempted to drive the Saracens from Jeruſalem. It was for ſome time the ſeat of the kings of Jeruſalem, and was often taken and retaken; but the Saracens were conquerors at laſt, not only of this place, but of the reſt of Syria. Its port is pretty much frequented to this day: at the entrance there is a moſque, and near it a great number of marble pillars, of all colours, lying on the ground, but generally broken or buried in the ſand. It is about thirty-eight miles from Jeruſalem. Long. 36. 20. E. Lat. 33. 40. N.

ACREMAH, ſon of Abu Jahl, an idolater, and one of thoſe whom Mahomet had reſolved to put to death at the taking of Mecca: but afterwards embracing the new religion, he was received to favour, and died fighting valiantly in its defence, in the khalifat of Abu Beçr, about the year 634.

ACRISIUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Argos, who being told by the oracle, that he ſhould be killed by his grandchild, ſhut up his daughter Danae in a brazen tower; but Jupiter entering to her in a golden ſhower, ſhe proved pregnant, and brought forth Perſeus. Acriſius, on hearing of her diſgrace, cauſed both her and the infant to be ſhut up in a cheſt, and caſt into the ſea; when being thrown on the iſle of Seriphus, they were taken up by Dictys, the king of the iſland's brother, who happened to be then fiſhing; and finding them alive, took them out of the cheſt and uſed them kindly. Perſeus, after a number of adventures, had, it ſeems, the misfortune to kill his grandfather; for, according to ſome, being reconciled to Acriſius, and playing with him at diſcus, or quoits, his quoit bruiſed the old king in the foot, which turning to a mortification, carried him off. Others ſay, that after he had killed Meduſa, he carried her head to Argos, which Acriſius ſeeing, was turned into ſtone.

ACRO, an antient ſcholiaſt of Horace, who lived about the ſeventh century.

ACRON, a celebrated phyſician of Agrigentum, who firſt thought of lighting large fires, and purifying the air with perfumes, to put a ſtop to the peſtilence that ravaged Athens, and which was attended with ſucceſs. He lived about four hundred and ſeventy-three years before the Chriſtian æra.

ACRON, a territory on the gold coaſt of Guinea, in Africa, bordering on the Fantynean country. The Dutch have a fort here called Fort Patience; and under it is a village, inhabited only by fiſhermen. The other inhabitants are addicted to huſbandry, and ſell their corn to other countries. There is plenty of game, which is very commodious for the Dutch factory. The people are very ignorant, and go naked like the reſt of the negroes. This is called Little Acron, for Great Acron is farther inland, and is a kind of a republic.

ACRONIUS (JOHN) a native of Friezland, taught phyſic and the mathematics at Baſil, with great reputation, and wrote the following books; 1. De Terræ Motu: 2. De Sphæra: De Aſtrolabii & Annuli Aſtronomici Confectione. He died at Baſil in 1563.

ACROPOLITA (GEORGE) a Greek hiſtorian, was born at Conſtantinople, and educated in the court of the emperor John Ducas, at Nice. He was employed in the moſt important affairs of the empire, and in particular was ſent ambaſſador to John prince of Bulgaria, in 1282, but died immediately after his return. He wrote, 1. A Continuation of the Greek Hiſtory, from the taking of Conſtantinople by the Latins, till it was recovered by Michael Palæologus in 1261: 2 A Treatiſe concerning Faith, Virtue, and the Soul: 3. An Expoſition upon the Sermons of St. Gregory Nazianzen; and other pieces.

ACROPOLITA (CONSTANTINE) ſon of the preceding, was called the younger Metaphraſtes, and flouriſhed at Conſtantinople under the emperor Michael Palæologus, and his ſon Andronicus, about the year 1270. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes on the proceſſion of the Holy Ghoſt; and orations on the martyrs Theodoſia and Neophytus; on St. Theodore, and St. John Damaſcenus.

ACTÆON, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Ariſtæus and Autonoë, the daughter of Cadmus king of Thebes, was paſſionately fond of hunting; but as he was in the midſt of the chace, he diſcovered the goddeſs Diana bathing, with her nymphs, who being incenſed at his intruſion, transformed him into a ſtag; when his own dogs miſtaking him for their game, purſued and tore him to pieces. The following ingenious explication has been given of this fable: Actæon was a man who lived in Arcadia, and was a great lover of hunting; but by keeping many dogs, and ſpending his time in hunting on the mountains, he entirely neglected his domeſtic affairs; and being brought to ruin, was generally called the wretched Actæon, who was devoured by his own dogs.

ACTOR, a name given to ſeveral perſons in fabulous hiſtory, particularly, 1. To one of the companions of Hercules in the war with the Amazons, who being wounded, reſolved to return home, but died by the way: 2. Actor, father of Menœtius, and grandfather of Patroclus, who married Ægina, after ſhe had had a ſon called Æacus, by Jupiter: 3. Another Actor, who was the ſon of Hyppoſus, and went in the Argonautic expedition: 4. Another, who was the ſon of Neptune and Agamede, daughter of Augeus: 5. Another, who was ſon to Phorbas, and built a city in Elis, his native country: 6. Another, who was the ſon of Aceus, and father of Aſtyochia, by whom the god Mars had two ſons, who went to the ſiege of Troy: and 7. Another among the Arunci, whom Virgil deſcribes as an hero of the firſt rank.

ACTUARIUS, a celebrated Greek phyſician, of the thirteenth century, and the firſt Greek author who has treated of mild purgatives, ſuch as caſſia, manna, ſena, &c. His works were printed in one volume in folio, by Henry Stephens, in 1567.

ACUNA (Christopher de) a Spaniſh Jeſuit, a native of Burgos, who went into Chili and Peru, with a commiſſion from the king of Spain, to make diſcoveries on the river of the Amazons; and after his return to his native country in 1640, publiſhed at Madrid, a deſcription of that river.

ACYNDYNUS (Septimus) conſul of Rome with Valerius Proculus, the year in which Conſtantine, ſon of Conſtantine the Great, was killed, A. D. 340. He had been governor of Antioch: and during his government, there happened an event worthy of notice: A certain man neglecting to carry to the treaſury the pound of gold he was taxed, Acyndynus threw him into priſon, and ſwore he would hang him, in caſe he did not pay the money on a certain day appointed: and the time was near expired when he found it impoſſible to ſatisfy the governor's demand. At this time a very rich man, inflamed with the love of his wife, who was very beautiful, offered her the pound of gold on which her huſband's life depended; and deſired no other recompence but the pleaſure of paſſing a night with her. The woman, taught by the Scriptures that her body was not in her own power, but in that of her huſband, acquainted him with the offers which the rich gallant made her, declaring that ſhe was willing to accept of them, provided he was willing to ſave his life, at the expence of her chaſtity; which, as he had an abſolute power over her body, was at his diſpoſal. The impriſoned huſband thanked his wife, and ordered her to go and lie with her gallant. She went: the ſum agreed upon was given her in a purſe, which was afterwards dextrouſly exchanged for another, filled only with earth. The woman, at her return home, no ſooner perceived the fraud, than ſhe complained publickly of it, ſued for juſtice at the governor's hands, and ingenuouſly told him the whole ſtory. Acyndynus began by owning himſelf in fault, and expreſſing his concern that his ſeverity and menaces had forced the unhappy pair to have recourſe to ſuch remedies, and then ſentenced himſelf to pay the pound of gold into the treaſury; and afterwards decreed that the woman ſhould poſſeſs the piece of ground whence the earth had been taken, which was found in her purſe.

ADA, daughter of Hecatumnus, married Idrieus, her own brother, and reigned with him in Caria after the death of her ſiſter Artemiſia, the widow of Mauſolus. Idrieus died after a reign of ſeven years, and leaving no iſſue, was ſucceeded by Ada, who ſwayed the ſcepter about four years, when ſhe was dethroned by Pexodares, her younger brother, who, to ſtrengthen his power, married his daughter, who was alſo named Ada, to a Perſian lord, called Orontabates, who ſucceeded his father-in-law ſix years after, and defended Halicarnaſſus againſt Alexander. At this favourable conjuncture, Ada implored the protection of the conqueror, againſt the uſurper; delivered up to him the city Alinda, which ſhe ſtill poſſeſſed, and offered to endeavour to reduce ſeveral others under his power. Alexander gave her a very kind reception; and after he had taken the city of Halicarnaſſus, reſtored her to the authority ſhe had before enjoyed over all Caria. Ada, then to ſhew her gratitude, ſent him a preſent of ſweetmeats and the moſt delicate viands, with the beſt cooks ſhe could hear of: but Alexander anſwered, that he had no occaſion for ſuch things, and that Leonidas his tutor had formerly furniſhed him with much more excellent cooks, by teaching him, "That "he who would have an appetite to his dinner, muſt riſe early, "and take a walk; and if he is deſirous of making a delicious "ſupper, he muſt eat moderately at dinner."

ADALBERT (St.) biſhop of Augſburgh, died in 921. There has been another St. Adalbert, who was biſhop of Prague, and ſuffered martyrdom in 997.

ADAM, the firſt man, and the father of the human race, was created by the Almighty on the ſixth day of the creation, and placed in a delightful garden; from whence he was driven, for having, at the ſolicitation of Eve, eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, contrary to the expreſs orders of God himſelf. Adam had three ſons, whoſe names are mentioned in the ſacred Scriptures, Cain, Abel, and Seth. He died aged 930.

Adam (John) a French Jeſuit, and a celebrated preacher, and controverſial writer, was a native of Limouſin. He warmly oppoſed the Janſeniſts, and was made ſuperior of the Jeſuits houſe at Bourdeaux; in which character he died, on the 12th of May, 1684. He compoſed a great number of works, the moſt famous of which are, 1. A Tranſlation of the Office of the Church: 2. A Reply to a Letter of Mr. Daillé: 3. The Triumph of the Euchariſt, againſt the Rev. Mr. Claude: 4. The Life of St. Francis of Borgia, &c.

Adam (Melchior) a Calviniſt, and principal of the college of Heidelberg, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing the lives of the philoſophers, divines, lawyers, and phyſicians, of the ſixteenth and beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries, in 4 vols. Theſe illuſtrious men are all either Germans or Flemings. He wrote ſome other works, and died in 1622.

Adam, a joiner of Nevers, a French poet. See Billaut.

ADAMITES, a ridiculous ſect, who, according to St. Epiphanius, were thus denominated from one Adam, who lived at the time when they were ſo called; but more probably, according to St. Auſtin, from Adam, the parent of all mankind. Theſe enthuſiaſts imagining that Adam did not know Eve till after his fall, and even till after he was driven out of Paradiſe, concluded that marriage would never have been inſtituted had man continued in his primitive ſtate; and therefore made a vow of continence and a monaſtic life: and as our firſt parents went naked, while in a ſtate of innocence, both the men and women, at entering their aſſemblies, after their example, ſtripped themſelves entirely naked; after which, they ſeated themſelves on benches fixed one above the other, and began their devotions, heard the leſſons read, prayed, and received the ſacraments; aud theſe being ended, they returned to their reſpective habitations. They never appeared naked but in their aſſemblies, which were held in a ſtove-room, under which a fire was made to expel the cold. Such perſons as committed a fault, were excluded the aſſembly; on which occaſion they uſed to ſay, that having, like Adam, eaten of the forbidden fruit, they deſerved, like him, to be driven out of Paradiſe, for ſo they called their church.

For the modern Adamites ſee the article Picards.

ADAMS (Sir Thomas) Lord-mayor of London, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his prudence and piety, his acts of munificence, his loyalty, and his ſufferings. He was born at Wem in Shropſhire in 1586, educated in the univerſity of Cambridge, and bred a draper in London; and by his wiſdom and integrity was gradually raiſed to the higheſt offices in the city, and was frequently returned a burgeſs in parliament; but being a loyaliſt, was not permitted to ſit there. While he was lord-mayor in 1645, his houſe was ſearched with the expectation of finding king Charles I. and the next year he was committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower, where he continued ſeveral years. He lent ten thouſand pounds to king Charles II. during his exile; and in the ſeventy-third year of his age was deputed by the city their commiſſioner to Breda, whither he went with general Monck, to congratulate and attend king Charles to England. In conſideration of his ſignal ſervices, that king conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and a few days after his reſtoration, advanced him to the dignity of a baronet of England. Sir Thomas gave his houſe at Wem for a free-ſchool, which he liberally endowed: he founded an Arabic profeſſorſhip at Cambridge, with a ſalary of 40 l. per annum, and was at the expence of printing the Goſpels in the Perſian language, and tranſmitting them to that kingdom. His beneficence appeared on a variety of occaſions, he being always ready to relieve the diſtreſſed. This worthy magiſtrate died Feb. 24, 1667, in the eighty-ſecond year of his age. After his death a ſtone was extracted from his bladder, which weighed above twenty-five ounces; and this ſtone is ſtill preſerved in the laboratory of Cambridge.

ADAMSON (Patrick) archbiſhop of St. Andrews, was born March 15, 1563, in the town of Perth, of mean but very honeſt parents; and on the death of biſhop Douglas was raiſed to the archbiſhopric of St. Andrew's. Though he was one of the moſt learned and polite prelates of the age in which he lived, the above dignity brought him nothing but trouble and uneaſineſs; and king James at laſt granting the revenue of his ſee to the duke of Lenox, this unfortunate prelate and his family came, in a literal ſenſe, to want bread. He died in 1591. He wrote a Tranſlation of the Lamentations of Jeremiah into Latin verſe, and ſeveral other works.

ADANA, a town of Aſia in Natolia, and in the province of Carmania. It is ſeated on the river Choquen; on the banks of which ſtands a little ſtrong caſtle built on a rock. It has great numbers of beautiful fountains brought from the river by means of water-works. Over the river there is a ſtately bridge of fifteen arches, which leads to the water-works. The climate is very pleaſant and healthy, and the winter is very mild and ſerene; but the ſummer is ſo hot, it obliges the principal inhabitants to retire into the neighbouring mountains, where they ſpend ſix months among ſhady trees and grottos, in a moſt delicious manner. The adjacent country is rich and fertile, and produces melons, watermelons, cucumbers, pomegranates, pulſe, and herbs of all ſorts, all the year round, beſides corn, wine, and fruits in their proper ſeaſon. It is thirty miles eaſt of Tarſus, on the road to Aleppo. Long. 35. 42. E. Lat. 38. 10. N.

ADDISON (Lancelot) the ſon of Lancelot Addiſon, a clergyman, was born at Mouldiſmeaburne, in the pariſh of of Croſby Ravenſworth in Weſtmoreland, in the year 1633. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, and at the reſtoration of king Charles II. accepted of the chaplainſhip of the garriſon of Dunkirk; but that fortreſs being delivered up to the French in 1662, he returned to England, and was ſoon after made chaplain to the garriſon of Tangier; where he continued ſeven years, and was greatly eſteemed: in 1670 he returned to England, and was made chaplain in ordinary to the king; but his chaplainſhip of Tangier being taken from him on account of his abſence, he found himſelf ſtraitened in his circumſtances, when he ſeaſonably obtained the rectory of Milſton, in Wiltſhire, worth about 120l. per annum. He afterwards became a prebendary of Sarum, took his degree of doctor of divinity at Oxford; and in 1683 was made dean of Litchfield, and the next year archdeacon of Coventry. His life was exemplary; his converſation pleaſing and greatly inſtructive; and his behaviour as a gentleman, a clergyman, and a neighbour, did honour to the place of his reſidence. He wrote, 1. A Short Narrative of the Revolutions of the Kingdoms of Fez and Morocco: 2. The preſent Hiſtory of the Jews: 3. A Diſcourſe on catechiſing: 4. A modeſt Plea for the Clergy: 5. An Introduction to the Sacrament: 6. The firſt State of Mahometiſm; and ſeveral other pieces. This worthy divine died on the 20th of April, 1703, and left three ſons, 1ſt. Joſeph, whoſe life we ſhall give in the next article: 2d. Gulſton, who died while governor of Fort St. George: 3d. Lancelot, maſter of arts, and fellow of Magdalen College in Oxford; and one daughter, firſt married to Dr. Sartre, prebendary of Weſtminſter, and afterwards to Daniel Combes, Eſq.

ADDISON, (JOSEPH) one of the brighteſt geniuſes that this or any other country has produced, was the ſon of dean Addiſon, the ſubject of the laſt article. He was born at Milſton, near Ambreſbury, in Wiltſhire, on the 11th of May, 1672; and not being thought likely to live, was baptized the ſame day. Having received the firſt principles of his education, he was removed to the Charter-houſe, in London, where he contracted a friendſhip for Mr. Richard Steele, afterwards Sir Richard, which laſted as long as his life. At fifteen he was entered in Queen's College, Oxford, where he ſoon became a maſter of the claſſics, obtained an elegant Latin ſtyle, and before he was known in town, his Latin poetry gained him the admiration of both univerſities. He was twenty years of age before he publiſhed any thing in Engliſh, and then his Tranſlation of Virgil's fourth Georgic, his Verſes to Mr. Dryden, ſeveral other poems, and his Diſcourſe on the Georgics, procured him the applauſe of that excellent poet. He had been cloſely preſſed, while at the univerſity, to enter into holy orders; but this his great modeſty made him decline; and having dedicated a poem on one of king William's campaigns to the lord-keeper Somers, that judicious ſtateſman not only ſeconded his deſire to travel, but procured for him from the crown an annual penſion of 300l. by which means he was enabled to make the tour of Italy; and at his return he publiſhed an account of his travels, and dedicated them to his patron. As the death of king William had produced a change in the miniſtry, his penſion was now ſtopped, and he remained a conſiderable time unemployed. But an unexpected incident at once raiſed him, and gave him an opportunity of exerting his fine talents to advantage: for in the year 1704, the lord-treaſurer Godolphin happened to complain to lord Halifax, that the duke of Marlborough's victory at Blenheim had not been celebrated in verſe in the manner it deſerved; and intimated, that he would take it kindly, if his lordſhip, who was the known patron of the poets, would name a gentleman capable of doing juſtice to ſo elevated a ſubject, lord Halifax replied with ſome quickneſs, that he was well acquainted with ſuch a perſon, but that he would not name him; adding, that he had long ſeen with indignation, men of no merit maintained in pomp and luxury at the public expence, while perſons of too much modeſty, with great abilities, languiſhed in obſcurity. The treaſurer ſaid very coolly, that he was ſorry his lordſhip had occaſion to make ſuch an obſervation; and that for the future he would take occaſion to render it leſs juſt than it might be at preſent; but that in the mean time he would pawn his honour, whoever his lordſhip ſhould name, might venture upon this theme without fear of loſing his time. Upon this, lord Halifax named Mr. Addiſon, but inſiſted that the treaſurer himſelf ſhould ſend to him, which he promiſed. Accordingly he prevailed upon Mr. Boyle, chancellor of the exchequer, to go to Mr. Addiſon in his name, and communicate to him the buſineſs; which he accordingly did, in ſo obliging a manner, that he readily entered upon the taſk. The lord-treaſurer Godolphin ſaw the poem before it was finiſhed, when the author had written no farther than the famous ſimile of the angel; and was ſo pleaſed with it, that he immediately made him a commiſſioner of appeals. Two years after, he was appointed under-ſecretary of ſtate: after this, he was made ſecretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and keeper of the records in that kingdom. He aſſiſted Sir Richard Steele in writing the Tatler, till its concluſion in 1711. And ſir Richard having ſoon after formed the plan of the Spectator, conſulted Mr. Addiſon about it, who, in the courſe of that admired work, which began to be publiſhed on the firſt of March, 1711, furniſhed the greateſt part of thoſe papers which are in higheſt eſteem, which he marked with ſome letter in the word CLIO: and ſuch was the ſucceſs of that periodical paper, that twenty thouſand of them have been ſold in one day. In 1713 his Cato appeared on the ſtage, and with the applauſe of every party, ran thirty-five nights. He afterwards had a ſhare in the Guardian, &c. Upon the death of the queen the lords juſtices appointed him their ſecretary. At this time he was intended for the poſt of ſecretary of ſtate, which he took pains to decline, and accepted again of that of ſecretary to the lord-lieutenant of Ireland. After this, Mr. Addiſon was made one of the lords of trade. In 1716 he married the counteſs of Warwick, and was the next year appointed by king George I. one of his principal ſecretaries of ſtate: but his health, which had been before impaired by an aſthmatic diſorder, ſuffered greatly by his advancement. However, he bore it with patience, till ſuſpecting that the public buſineſs might ſuffer by his diſorder, he reſigned his office, and applied himſelf to the writing A Treatiſe on the Chriſtian Religion; but a long and ſevere relapſe put a period to his life on the 17th of June 1719, in the fifty-fourth year of his age. Mr. Addiſon, beſides the above works, wrote The Freeholder, Dialogues upon Medals, and ſeveral other admirable performances: all of which have been collected together, and printed in 4 vols. 4to.

ADEL, a kingdom on the eaſtern coaſt of Africa, which reaches as far as the ſtraits of Bab-el-Mandel, which unites the Red Sea to that of Arabia. This country produces corn, and feeds a great number of cattle. The inhabitants drive a trade in gold, ſilver, ivory, oil, frankincenſe, a ſort of pepper, and other merchandizes of Arabia and the Indies. The king was formerly a vaſſal to the grand negus of Abyſſinia: but being Mahometans, and the Abyſſinians a ſort of Chriſtians, they could not agree; and in 1535 came to an open rupture, when the Adelines threw off the yoke, ſeeking protection from the grand ſignior. The principal places are Adela, ſeated in the centre of the country, and is the town where the king reſides: Zeila, near the Arabian Sea; it is a rich town, and has a good trade: Barbora, near the ſea-coaſt, is an ancient trading-town. It rains very ſeldom in this country.

ADELARD (ST.) grandſon of Charles Martel, and the firſt miniſter of Pepin, king of Italy, died at the abbey of Corbie, of which he was abbot, in 826.

ADELME, or ALDHELM, ſon to Kenred, and nephew to Ina, king of the Weſt-Saxons. After being educated abroad, he was made abbot of Malmſbury, and enjoyed that dignity thirty years. He was the firſt Engliſhman who wrote in Latin, the firſt who brought Latin poetry into England, and the firſt biſhop of Sherburn. He wrote A Treatiſe on the Obſervance of Eaſter. He died in 709, and his corpſe was inſhrined at Malmſbury, and held in great veneration, he being afterwards canonized. The monks have related ſeveral fabulous particulars of him.

ADEN, a city in Arabia the Happy, ſeated on a ſmall peninſula on the ſouth coaſt. It was the antienteſt, faireſt, and moſt pleaſant town in all this country, ſurpaſſing all the neighbouring ports. The houſes were built both neat and ſtrong, and the caſtles from the top of the mountains afforded a curious diverting proſpect. It has good walls next the ſea, and on the land ſide it is ſurrounded with mountains, whoſe paſſages are guarded with ſtrong forts. It once contained about ſix thouſand houſes, but we are informed by a maſter of a ſhip, who has lately been there, that it is now in ruins. It has been often plundered by the Bedowins, or wild Arabians, who live in the deſert: and the Portugueſe were once maſters of it; then the Turks; and now the king of Yemen. The country adjacent produces barley, wheat, beans, peas, plenty of fruit and roots, camels, aſſes, mules and horſes. They have great numbers of ſheep with large tails that reach almoſt to the ground: the goats are the fineſt, both for beauty and taſte, that ever were ſeen; and the ſea affords plenty of good fiſh. The religion is the ſame as all over Arabia, that is the Mahometan. It is eighty-five miles from Sannaa, the capital of Arabia. Long. 46. 30. E. Lat. 12. 50. N.

ADERBIJAN, a province of Perſia in Aſia, bounded on the north by Proper Armenia; on the ſouth by Irac Ajemi, on the eaſt by Guilan or Khilen; and on the weſt by Curdiſtan. It is three hundred miles long, and one hundred and eighty broad; and the moſt remarkable places are Tauris and Ardevil.

ADHERBAL, king of Numidia, was the ſon of Micipſa. He was beſieged in the city of Cirta, taken priſoner, and put to death by Jugurtha, about one hundred and thirteen years before Chriſt.

ADIGE, a river of Italy, which has its ſource in Tyrol; and after having watered the biſhopric and town of Trent, in the territory of Venice, and having paſſed by Verona and Rovigo, diſcharges itſelf into the gulph of Venice.

ADIMARI (ALEXANDER) was born at Florence in 1579, and was greatly eſteemed by the learned. He was a member of the academy of the Incogniti at Venice, and acquired great reputation by his poems. He died in 1649, in the ſeventieth year of his age.

ADMETUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Phares, in Theſſaly, whoſe ſheep Apollo was reduced to keep, for having killed the cyclops who forged the thunderbolt with which Eſculapius was ſlain. The god, in return for the kindneſs he had received from Admetus, made the Parcæ conſent not to cut the thread of his life, if any one could be found who would die in his ſtead: but none being found, Alceſtis, his wife, freely offered herſelf to ſave her huſband; when Proſerpine, moved by the tears of Admetus, reſtored her back to life.

ADOLPHUS OF NASSAU, was elected emperor in 1291, to the prejudice of Albert of Auſtria, the eldeſt ſon of Rodolphus the former emperor. Albert, however, endeavoured to dethrone him; and ſeeing Adolphus in the battle of Haſenferet, near Spire, at the head of his ſquadron, he attacked him perſonally, killed him, and by that means won the imperial ſceptre. Adolphus loſt his life on the 2d of July, 1298.

ADONIA, feſtivals in honour of Adonis, who was worſhipped in ſeveral places, particularly at Athens and at Alexandria, where his image was carried about the city with great ſolemnity. But the moſt remarkable feſtival of this kind was in Syria, where, on a certain day, they made great lamentations for the death of Adonis, the women tearing their hair and beating their breaſts; and as great rejoicings the next day, on his being alive and taken up into heaven. At this feſtival the women had their heads ſhaven, after the manner of the Egyptians at the death of Apis; when they who refuſed to be ſhaved were obliged to proſtitute themſelves a whole day to ſtrangers, and the money gained by this ſhameful commerce was conſecrated to Venus, in whoſe temple the ceremonies were performed.

ADONIBEZECK, king of the Canaanites, rendered himſelf formidable by his victories over ſeventy kings, whoſe thumbs and great toes he cauſed to be cut off; but being conquered and taken priſoner by Joſhua, about one thouſand four hundred and twenty-four years before Chriſt, he was himſelf ſerved in the ſame manner.

ADONIJAH, the ſon of David by Haggith, finding that Ammon and Abſolom, his elder brothers, were dead, and that David was too old to manage the affairs of government, imagined that the kingdom was due to him by birth-right, and that it would be proper for him to procure himſelf to be acknowledged king before his father's death; but being defeated in this deſign by Nathan the prophet, who anointed his younger brother Solomon, he ſubmitted to him, and was pardoned; but ſome time after deſiring Bathſheba to intercede with her ſon Solomon, that he might have Abiſhag to wife, Solomon, imagining that he wanted a pretence to countenance his aſpiring to the crown, ordered him to be put to death, about one thouſand and fourteen years before the Chriſtian æra.

ADONIS, in fabulous hiſtory, a youth of incomparable beauty, was the ſon of Cynaras by his own daughter Myrrha. The goddeſs Venus fell in love with him, and often came down to meet him on Mount Libanus. But Mars envying this rival, transformed himſelf into a wild boar, and as Adonis was hunting ſtruck him with one of his tuſks in the groin and killed him. Venus, who heard his cries, haſted to his aſſiſtance, and in her way trod on a thorn, when the blood which trickled from her foot produced the damaſk roſe; but coming too late to ſave him, ſhe changed him into the flower anemone, which ſtill retains a crimſon colour. After this ſhe went to hell, and prevailed on Proſerpine to let Adonis be ſix months with her in heaven, and continue the other ſix months in the infernal regions.

By Adonis ſome mythologiſts underſtand the corn, which is hid ſix months in the earth, before the time of harveſt. Adonis is ſaid to be killed by a boar, that is by the winter, when the heat of the ſummer is extinguiſhed by the cold, which is the enemy of beauty and fertility.

ADORNE (Francis) a Jeſuit of an antient Genoeſe family, fruitful in great men, wrote, at the ſolicitation of St. Charles, king of France, a treatiſe on eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. He died January 13, 1586, aged fifty-ſix.

ADRASTUS, king of Argos, was the ſon of Talaus and Lyſianaſſa. Being driven out of this kingdom by Amphiarus, he retired to Polybius, king of Sycion, who gave him his daughter Amphithea in marriage, and at length left him his kingdom. Adraſtus raiſed a powerful army to reſtore Polynices, his ſon-in-law, to the throne of Thebes, in Bœotia, which had been uſurped by Eteocles. This war was called the Expedition of the Seven Worthies, on account of its being commanded by ſeven princes, including Adraſtus, who was at their head. Theſe were all killed at this ſiege, except Adraſtus, about one thouſand two hundred and fifty one years before the Chriſtian æra: when the laſt mentioned prince returning to his kingdom, incited the children of the former to revenge the death of their fathers, and aſſembled a new army, called the Epignes, on account of its being commanded by thoſe who ſurvived their fathers. Theſe princes were of the ſame number as the former: they defeated the Thebans, and all of them returned victorious except Ægialeüs, ſon of Adraſtus, who was ſlain; when Adraſtus was ſo afflicted at his ſon's loſs, that he died with grief. The Sicyonians erected a mauſoleum to his memory; and inſtituted feſtivals and ſacrifices to his honour, which they celebrated annually with great pomp.

ADRAZZO, or Ajaccio, a town in the iſland of Corſica, with a caſtle and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the weſtern ſide of the iſland, and has a good port. The adjacent parts are pleaſant and fruitful, producing wine in abundance. It is twenty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Corte. Long. 9. 20 E. Lat. 41. 54.

ADRETS (Francis de Beaumont Baron des.) See Beaumont.

ADRIA, a town of Italy, which gave its name to the Adriatic Gulph. It was formerly a great city, but now contains only a few houſes inhabited by fiſhermen. It is ſixteen miles eaſt of Rovigo. Long. 13. 15. E. Lat. 45. 5.

ADRIAN, or Hadrian (Publius Ælius) emperor of Rome, was the ſon of Ælius Adrianus Afer, and was born A. D. 76. He loſt his father at ten years of age, and had for his guardians Trajan, and Cælius Tatianus, a Roman knight. He was ſucceſſively made tribune of the people, prætor, and conſul. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery on ſeveral occaſions; and Trajan being taken ſick after the ſiege of Afer, adopted him for his heir, and died ſoon after: on which Adrian, who was then at Antioch, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor, on the 11th of Auguſt, 117. One of his firſt actions was his yielding up almoſt all the conqueſts made by Trajan; and though the ſenate decreed him a triumph, and honoured him with the title of father of his country, he refuſed both, and deſired that Trajan's image might triumph. His liberality was amazing; he forgave what was owing him by the people, and burnt in Trajan's ſquare all the bonds and notes relating to the debts due to himſelf. There was ſcarcely a province in his whole empire which he did not honour with his preſence; he viſited Gaul, Germany, and Britain; in which laſt place he built a wall eighty miles long, from Newcaſtle to the city of Carliſle: and though he travelled on foot, paſſed into Aſia and Africa, leaving, wherever he came, the greateſt proofs of his liberality. He puniſhed the Jews who had revolted: but though he publiſhed no edicts againſt the Chriſtians, he ſuffered them to be perſecuted. After a reign of twenty-one years he was ſeized with a dropſy, and having many phyſicians, aſcribed his death to their difference in opinion. Upon his death-bed he repeated thoſe verſes to his ſoul, which have been ſo finely imitated by Mr. Pope, and died at Baiæ, in the ſixty-third year of his age. He had a ſurpriſing memory, was prudent, learned, and, though a lover of peace, was poſſeſſed of great military ſkill. He wrote poems both in the Greek and Latin languages, and underſtood the ſciences; but was jealous of thoſe who excelled. He adminiſtered juſtice with wonderful application; but, on the other hand, was cruel, envious, and laſcivious.

Adrian I. was elected pope on the 9th of February, 772, after the death of Stephen III. In the beginning of his pontificate Didier, king of the Lombards, invaded St. Peter's Patrimony, and ravaged the country almoſt to the very walls of Rome; but Charlemagne coming with an army to the pope's aſſiſtance, Dedier was defeated and taken priſoner. Charlemagne then ſubdued Lombardy, and afterwards going to Rome, Adrian, in an aſſembly of the clergy, gave him the power of creating popes. He ſat above twenty-three years in the chair, and died on the 26th of December, 795.

Adrian II. ſucceeded pope Nicholas I on the 4th of December, 867, at the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age. He had twice refuſed the pontificate, and did not then accept it till after much perſuaſion. He took off the excommunication inflicted by his predeceſſor on Lothario, king of Lorrain, who had repudiated his queen Thietberga, in order to marry Valdreda; that prince having aſſured the pope, that he had quitted the latter. Adrian II. held a council at Rome againſt Photius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, and ſent two legates to the council of Conſtantinople held in 869, at which Photius was depoſed, and Ignatius reſtored. But though he approved of what was done in this council, he afterwards quarrelled both with the emperor of Greece and the patriarch Ignatius, about the poſſeſſion of Bulgaria, to which he laid claim. This pope died in 872, and was ſucceeded by John VIII.

Adrian III. was elected pope after the death of Martin, in 884. Baſil the Macedonian, emperor of the Eaſt, warmly ſolicited this pope to annul all that had been done againſt Photius, and to receive that famous patriarch to the communion of the church; but this he abſolutely refuſed. This pope alſo publiſhed a decree, which authoriſed the ordination of popes in the abſence of the emperor's ambaſſadors. He died in 885, and was ſucceeded by Stephen V.

Adrian IV. was the only Engliſhman that ever ſat in St. Peter's chair. His name was Nicholas Brekeſpere, or Breakſpere. He was the ſon of one Robert de Camera, a man of learning, but poor, and was born at Langley, near St. Albans: his father being a lay-brother in the abbey of St. Albans, he daily received alms at their gate, for which he did a part of their drudgery; but being unable to obtain admiſſion into the houſe, he went to Arles, in France, where he was firſt admitted ſervitor to the regular canons of St. Rufus, then one of that body, and at length general of the order. Pope Eugenius III. made him cardinal and biſhop of Albania, and ſent him as his legate to Denmark and Norway, where he laboured with great zeal and ſucceſs in the converſion of the people; and at his return was unanimouſly choſen pope on the 11th of December, 1154, after the death of Anaſtatius IV. The very next year he excommunicated William king of Sicily, who ravaged his territories, and abſolved that prince's ſubjects from their allegiance. About the ſame time Frederic, king of the Romans, having entered Italy with a powerful army, Adrian met him, and concluded a peace with him. At this interview Frederic condeſcended to hold the pope's ſtirrup, whilſt he mounted on horſeback. Adrian died on the firſt of September, 1159, and was ſucceeded by Alexander III.

Adrian V. (pope) was a Genoeſe, and the brother of Innocent IV. He was elected pope on the 12th of July, 1276, but died thirty-ſix days after.

Adrian VI. (pope) was born at Utrecht in the year 1459, and, his father being poor, he was educated at Louvain, in a college where a certain number of the ſcholars were maintained gratis. However, he ſoon obtained great reputation for his probity and learning; and after being advanced to the higheſt poſts in that univerſity, was made tutor to the archduke Charles, afterwards the emperor Charles V. by whom he was ſoon after employed in ſeveral important negotiations, and by whoſe intereſt he was raiſed to the papal throne on the 9th of January, 1522. He would not change his name, but in every thing ſhewed a great diſlike to all pomp, oſtentation, and ſenſual pleaſure. He acknowledged the great abuſes he obſerved in the church, lamented the wicked life of the clergy, and the corrupt morals of ſome popes. His pontificate laſted only till the 14th of September, 1523; and it is remarkable that, before his death, he ordered the following inſcription to be engraven on his tomb: Adrianus VI. hic ſitus eſt, qui nihil ſibi infelicius in vita duxit quam quod imperaret. i. e. "Here lieth Adrian VI. who eſteemed the "ſovereign power, the greateſt misfortune of his life." This pope wrote ſeveral works: 1. his Queſtiones & Expoſitiones on the fourth Book of the Sentences were printed at Paris, in folio, in 1512 and 1516. He alſo wrote, 2. Queſtiones quod libetica duodecim. 3. Regulæ Cancellariæ Apoſtolicæ; and 4. Computum Hominis Agonizantis & Sermonem de Sæculo pertuſo.

ADRIAN, biſhop of Bath and Wells, in the reigns of Henry VII. and VIII. and cardinal prieſt, was born of a mean and obſcure family at Cornetto, in Italy; was ſent nuncio into Scotland and France by pope Innocent VIII. and made cardinal by Alexander VI. He drew upon himſelf the hatred of pope Julius II. and to avoid the effects of his reſentment, hid himſelf in the mountains of Trent: but being recalled by Leo X. he ungratefully engaged in a conſpiracy againſt him. The pope, however, pardoned him; but Adrian not daring to truſt to this, made his eſcape in the night, and was never more heard of. This prelate let out the revenues of his ſee in England while he himſelf continued at Rome: however, he was one of the firſt that effectually reformed the Latin ſtyle; he wrote a treatiſe on the Latin tongue, and another on true philoſophy, which are ſtill extant.

ADRIANI (JOANNI BATTISTA) a celebrated author, born at Florence in 1511, of a Patrician family. He wrote in Italian an Hiſtory of his own times, which is a continuation of Guicardini's Hiſtory of Italy, and begins with the year 1536; it is a very accurate performance: he alſo wrote ſix funeral orations. He died in Florence in 1579.

ADRIANOPLE, a city of Turky in Europe, in the province of Romania, and the ſee of an archbiſhop, under the patriarch of Conſtantinople. It is about ſeven or eight miles in circumference, including the old city and ſome gardens. The houſes are low, moſtly built of mud and clay, and ſome of brick; and the ſtreets are exceeding dirty. The walls and towers are in a great meaſure fallen to decay. However, there is a beautiful bazar, or market, half a mile long, called Ali Baſſa. It is a vaſt arched building, with ſix gates, and three hundred and ſixty-five well furniſhed ſhops, kept by Turks, Armenians, and Jews, who pay five crowns a month for each ſhop. The number of inhabitants of all nations and religions may be about a hundred thouſand: but it is dear living here, becauſe the proviſions are brought from diſtant places. The air is wholeſome, and the country very pleaſant in the ſummer time, on account of the river and ſtreams that run near and about the city; the chief of which is the Mariza. Theſe promote and preſerve the verdure of the gardens, meadows, and fields, for a conſiderable part of the year. In the winter there is plenty of game. Near the principal bazar there is another, about a mile in length, covered with boards, with hobs on each ſide to let in the light. It is full of good ſhops, which contain all kinds of commodities. Sultan Selim's moſque ſtands on the ſide of a hill, in the midſt of the city; for this reaſon, this magnificent ſtructure may be ſeen on all ſides. There are ſeveral other moſques well worth ſeeing. Every thing made of gold and ſilver, jewels, piſtols, ſcimetars, &c. are ſold in another part of the city, called by travellers the bizeſtein, though it differs little from a bazar. This contains about two hundred ſhops, and is covered like the former: but the covering is ſupported by two rows of large pillars. The grand viſier's palace is nothing more than a convenient houſe, after the Turkiſh manner of building. The emperor's ſeraglio is a regular ſtructure, in a plain near the river Tungia. It is two miles in compaſs, and has ſeven gates, beſides thoſe of the gardens, which are ſeveral miles in circumference. The city is governed by a mullah cadi, who has an abſolute authority both in civil and criminal matters. In the time of the plague, or war, the grand ſeignior ſometimes reſides here. The Turks took this city from the Greeks in 1362, and made it the capital of the empire, till Mahomet II. took Conſtantinople in 1453. Long. 26. 27. E. Lat. 41. 45.

ADRICHOMIA (CORNELIA) a nun of the order of St. Auſtin, in the ſixth century, was the daughter of a Dutch gentleman, and acquired great reputation by her poetical genius, which ſhe applied to ſacred ſubjects. She put the Pſalms of David into verſe, and wrote other ſacred poems.

ADRICHOMIUS (CHRISTIAN) was born at Delft, in Holland, in the year 1533. He was a conſiderable time director of the nuns of St. Barbara, in the place of his birth. He wrote, 1. A Deſcription of the Holy Land. 2. The Life of Chriſt: and, 3. An Oration, de Chriſtiana Beatitudine; and died at Cologne in June 1585.

ADYTUM, in Pagan antiquity, the moſt retired and ſacred place in their temples, anſwering to the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Jews: for into this place none but the prieſt was allowed to enter; and here they alſo delivered their oracles.

ÆA, in the fabulous hiſtory, was a virgin, fond of hunting; but being very deſirous to avoid the courtſhip of Phaſis, ſhe prayed the gods to aſſiſt her; upon which they changed her into an iſland of the ſame name. This fable aroſe from the iſland of Æa being encompaſſed by the river Phaſis.

ÆACEA, in Grecian antiquity, ſolemn feſtivals and games celebrated at Ægina in honour of Æacus. See ÆACUS.

ÆACIDES, in Grecian antiquity, a name given to all the princes deſcended from Æacus. See the next article.

ÆACUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Jupiter by Ægina, who, when the iſle of Ægina was depopulated by a plague, his father, in compaſſion to his grief, changed all the ants upon it into men and women, who were called Myrmidons from μύρμηξ, an ant. The meaning of which fable is, that when the country had been depopulated by pirates, who forced the few that remained to take ſhelter in caves, Æacus encouraged them to come out, and by commerce and induſtry recover what they had loſt. His character for juſtice was ſuch, that, in a time of univerſal drought, he was nominated by the Delphic oracle to intercede for Greece, and his prayer was anſwered. The Pagans alſo imagined that Æacus, on account of his impartial juſtice, was choſen by Pluto one of the three judges of the dead: and that it was his province to judge the Europeans.

ÆACUS, brother to Polyclea, both of whom were deſcended from Hercules. An oracle having declared, that which ſoever of them firſt ſet their feet on land, after paſſing the river Achelous, ſhould enjoy the city and kingdom: Polyclea feigned herſelf lame, and deſired her brother to carry her over; but on coming near the ſhore ſhe leaped from his back, while he was yet in the water, crying, "Brother, the kingdom is mine, by the "deciſion of the oracle." Her brother commended her wit, married her, and they reigned together.

ÆCHMALOTARCHA, αἰχμαλωτάρχης, in Jewiſh antiquity, a title given to the principal leader or governor of the Hebrew captives reſiding in Chaldea, Aſſyria, and the neighbouring countries. This magiſtrate was called by the Jews roſch-galath, i. e. the chief of the captivity.

ÆDES, in Roman antiquity, beſides its more ordinary ſignification of a houſe, or the part where the family uſed to eat, is uſed for an inferior kind of temple conſecrated to ſome deity; but not by the augurs. In antient Rome there were a great number of theſe: as the Ædes Hercules, Ædes Fortunæ, Ædes Pacis, &c.

ÆDICULA, the inner part of a temple, where the altar and ſtatue of the Deity ſtood.

ÆDILE, Ædilis, in Roman antiquity, a magiſtrate who ſuperintended buildings of all kinds; but more particularly public ones, as temples, aquæducts, &c. to them likewiſe belonged the care of the highways, public places, weights, and meaſures. They fixed the prices of proviſions, took cognizance of debauches, puniſhed lewd women, and ſuch as frequented gaming-houſes. They had alſo the inſpection of comedies and other pieces of wit, and were obliged, at their own expence, to exhibit magnificent games to the people.

The ædiles were at firſt only two in number, choſen from among the common people; but theſe not being able to ſupport the expence of the public ſhews, two more were created out of the patrician order, who took upon themſelves all the expences of the games, and were called the ædiles curules, or majores, as the two plebeians were denominated minores. At length, in order to eaſe theſe four, Julius Cæſar created two others, who were called ædiles cereales, on account of their having the inſpection of all kinds of grain committed to their care.

The municipal cities had alſo ædiles, who had much the ſame authority as thoſe in Rome.

ÆDITUA, in Roman antiquity, a female officer belonging to the temples of the goddeſſes, who had the ſame poſt as the ædituus in the temples of the gods.

ÆDITUUS, in antiquity, an officer in the temples of the gods, who had the care of the offerings, treaſure, and ſacred utenſils.

ADOUR, a river of France, which riſes in the mountains of Bigorre, and running north by Tarbes, through Gaſcony, afterwards turns eaſt, and paſſing by Dax, falls into the bay of Biſcay below Bayonne.

ADRIANO A SIERRA, or mountain of Adriana, in Guipuzcoa, a ſub-diviſion of the province of Biſcay, in Spain. There is a road over it to Alaba and Old Caſtile, which is very difficult: at its beginning there is a dark path of forty or fifty paces cut through a rock; after which is the mountain that muſt be paſſed over, which is one of the higheſt of the Pyrennees. Theſe mountains are little frequented; and there are no inhabitants, except a few ſhepherds, who live in cottages.

AEDON, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of king Zethus, the brother of Amphion. She envying her ſiſter-in-law, becauſe ſhe had ſix boys, went in the night to kill one of them; but by miſtake murdered her own ſon Itylus, inſtead of one of Amphion's: but lamenting her error, the gods, in compaſſion, turned Itylus into a goldfinch.

ÆGEATES (JOHN) a prieſt of the ſect of Neſtorians, who flouriſhed, according to Voſſius, under the emperor Zeno, about the year 483. He wrote an eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, which began with the reign of Theodoſius the younger, and ended with the reign of Zeno: he alſo wrote a treatiſe againſt the council of Chalcedon.

ÆGEUS, in fabulous hiſtory, was king of Athens, and the father of Theſeus. The Athenians having baſely killed the ſon of Minos, king of Crete, for carrying away the prize from them, Minos made war upon the Athenians; and being victorious, impoſed this ſevere condition on Ægeus, that he ſhould annually ſend into Crete ſeven of the nobleſt of the Athenian youths, choſen by lot, to be devoured by the Minotaur. On the fourth year of this tribute the choice fell on Theſeus, or as others ſay, he himſelf intreated to be ſent. The good king, at his ſon's departure, gave orders, that as the ſhip ſailed with black ſails, it ſhould return with the ſame, in caſe he periſhed; but if he came back victorious, he ſhould change them into white. Theſeus, after having killed the Minotaur, forgot his father's inſtructions. Mean while the old king, impatiently waiting for his return, went every day to the top of a high rock, that overlooked the the ocean, to ſee what ſhips appeared in view; and at laſt diſcovering his ſon's veſſel, with the ſable omens he dreaded, he threw himſelf into the ſea, which, from his name, was called the Ægean Sea.

The Athenians decreed Ægeus divine honours, and ſacrificed to him as a marine deity, the adopted ſon of Neptune.

ÆGIALEA, in fabulous hiſtory, daughter of Adraſtus, king of Argos, and wife to Diomedes. 'Tis related that Venus, out of revenge to Diomedes, who had wounded her in the arm at the ſiege of Troy, fired his wife with ſo laſcivious a paſſion, that ſhe was for ever running after all the young men ſhe met with. Ægialea not only diſgraced her huſband, but, on his return from Argos, conſpired againſt his life.

ÆGINA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Æſopus, king of Bæotia, was beloved by Jupiter, who debauched her in the ſimilitude of a lambent flame, and then carried her from Epidaurus to a deſert iſland called Œnope, to which ſhe gave her own name.

ÆGIPAN, in heathen mythology, a name given to the god Pan, from his being repreſented with the horns, legs, feet, &c. of a goat.

ÆGIS, in heathen mythology, the ſhield which Jupiter preſented to Minerva, after his having covered it with the ſkin of Amalthea, the goat who ſuckled him. Afterwards Minerva fixed Meduſa's head in the middle of the ægis, which by this means obtained the power of turning all who ſaw it into ſtone.

ÆGISTHUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Thyeſtes, by his own daughter Pelopeia, who, to conceal her ſhame, expoſed him in the woods. According to ſome, he was found and educated by a ſhepherd; others ſay that he was ſuckled by a goat, whence he was called Ægiſthus. He corrupted Clytemneſtra, the wife of Agamemnon, and having, by her aſſiſtance, killed her huſband, reigned ſeven years in Mycenæ; but both he and Clytemneſtra were ſlain by Oreſtes, the ſon of Agamemnon.

ÆGIUCHUS, in pagan mythology, a name given to Jupiter, on account of his having been ſuckled by a goat.

ÆGOCEROS, in heathen mythology, a name given to Pan on account of his transforming himſelf into a goat.

ÆGYPIUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Antheus, having debauched Timandra, her ſon Neophron, in return, ſeduced Bulis, Ægypius's mother; and having intelligence where he was to meet Timandra, conveyed Bulis thither in her room. Ægypius lay with her, and being fallen aſleep, his mother viewing him, knew him to be her ſon: when ſeized with ſhame and remorſe, ſhe took his ſword, and was going to make uſe of it in putting out his eyes; but was prevented by his waking. When Ægypius ſeeing his error, wiſhed the memory of this inceſt might be buried in his death: on which Jupiter turned Ægypius and Neophron into vultures, Bulis into a didapper, and Timandra into a titmouſe.

ÆGYPTUS, in fabulous hiſtory, was the ſon of Beleus, and brother of Danaus. See BELIDES.

ÆLFRED. See ALFRED.

ÆLIAN (CLAUDIUS) was born at Prænеſte, a city of Italy. He was a hearer of Pauſanius, and taught rhetoric at Rome under Alexander Severus; was greatly applauded by Philoſtratus for his excellent knowledge of the Greek tongue, and for his pleaſing eloquence was called Honeymouth. He wrote a Various Hiſtory, a Treatiſe on Animals, and another on Military Diſcipline. His principles, he himſelf tells us, were never corrupted by the poiſon of courts. There is not an indecent or an improper expreſſion in all his works; but, on the contrary, he every where recommends virtue, inveighs againſt vice, and mentions the puniſhments reſerved by the gods for the vicious. There have been ſeveral editions of his Various Hiſtory.

ÆLIUS CATUS, a Roman conſul, famous for his knowledge of the civil-law, and the plainneſs and ſimplicity of his manners. During his conſulſhip the embaſſadors of the Ætoleans paid him a viſit, and finding him eating out of earthen diſhes, would have made him a preſent of ſilver ones; which he abſolutely refuſed to accept, and never uſed any veſſels of that metal, except two cups which were preſented him by Lucius Paulus, after the conqueſt of king Perſeus, on account of his ſingular merit.

ÆLIUS PERTINAX, a native of Liguria, and the ſon of Ælius Succeſſus, a dealer in wood; became a ſchoolmaſter, and was afterwards raiſed by Marcus Antoninus to the dignity of a ſenator. Commodus ſent him to quell the inſurrections in Britain; and after his return he was made pro-conſul of Africa. At length Commodus dying, he was choſen emperor by the ſoldiers, in the ſixtieth year of his age: but was killed by Lætus, captain of the Prætorian bands.

ÆLIUS PÆTUS, a Roman prætor, who gained the eſteem of his countrymen by a ſingular proof of his diſintereſted love for his country. While he was upon the bench hearing cauſes, a woodpecker ſat upon his head. The augurs being conſulted upon this occaſion, gave anſwer, that if he kept the bird alive, his family ſhould enjoy the greateſt proſperity imaginable, while the commonwealth ſhould labour under the moſt dreadful misfortunes: but if he killed it, the reverſe ſhould happen both in his family and in the commonwealth. Upon this he immediately ſeized the bird, and tore it to pieces with his teeth before the ſenate. Agreeable to this preſage he loſt ſeventeen of his family, all men of diſtinguiſhed valour, in one day at the battle of Cannæ, while the Roman republic was gradually raiſed to the higheſt pitch of grandeur.

ÆMILIUS PAULUS, the ſon of Lucius Paulus, who was killed at the battle of Cannæ, was twice conſul. In his firſt conſulate he triumphed over the Ligurians; and in the ſecond ſubdued Perſeus, king of Macedonia, and reduced his country to a Roman province, on which he obtained the ſurname of Macedonicus. He returned to Rome loaded with glory, and triumphed for three days. He died 168 years before Chriſt.

ÆMILIUS PAULUS, a celebrated hiſtorian born at Verona, who obtained ſuch reputation in Italy, that he was invited into France by the cardinal of Bourbon, in the reign of Lewis XII. in order to write the hiſtory of the kings of France in Latin, and was given a canonry in the cathedral of Paris. He was near thirty years in writing that hiſtory, which has been greatly admired, and died at Paris on the 5th of May, 1529.

ÆNEAS, in fabulous hiſtory, a famous Trojan prince, the ſon of Anchiſes and Venus. At the deſtruction of Troy he bore his aged father on his back, and ſaved him from the Greeks; but being too ſolicitous about his ſon and houſhold gods, loſt his wife Creuſa: but getting on board a ſhip, he ſet ſail, and landed in Macedonia, in Sicily, and in Africa, where he was kindly received by queen Dido; but forſaking her he landed in Italy, where he married Lavinia the daughter of king Latinus, and defeated Turnus, to whom ſhe had been contracted. After the death of his father-in-law he was made king of the Latins, over whom he reigned three years: but joining with the Aborigines, he was ſlain in a battle againſt the Tuſcans. Virgil has rendered the name of this prince immortal, by making him the hero of his poem. It is, however, generally believed, that Æneas was never either in Africa or Italy. See the article DIDO.

ÆNEAS TACTICUS, one of the moſt antient Greek authors who has written on the art of war, lived about three hundred and thirty-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra. Caſaubon publiſhed his work in Greek and Latin.

ÆNEAS GAZEUS, a celebrated Platonic philoſopher, at the end of the fifth century. He wrote a dialogue on the immortality of the ſoul, and the reſurrection of the body, intitled, Theophraſtus. It is wrote in Greek, and has been tranſlated into Latin, with the notes of Barthius, and other learned men.

ÆNEAS SYLVIUS (pope) See the article PIUS II.

ÆNGINA, one of the iſlands in the Archipelago. It lies in the bay of Engia, and the town of that name contains about eight hundred houſes and a caſtle; and near it are the ruins of a magnificent ſtructure, which was probably a temple.

ÆOLUS, in heathen mythology, the god of the winds, is ſaid to be the ſon of Jupiter by Acaſta, or Sigeſia, the daughter of Hippotus; or, according to others, the ſon of Hippotus by Meneclea, daughter of Hyllus, king of Lipara. He dwelt in the iſland Strongyle, now called Strombolo, one of the ſeven iſlands called Æolian, from their being under the dominion of Æolus. Others ſay, that his reſidence was at Regium, in Italy; and others again place him in the iſland Lipara. He is repreſented as having authority over the winds, which he held inchained in a vaſt cavern, to prevent their committing the devaſtations they had been guilty of before they were put under his direction. Mythologiſts explain the original of theſe fables, by ſaying that he was a wiſe and good prince; and being ſkilled in aſtronomy, was able, by the flux and reflux of the tides, and the nature of the volcano in the iſland Strongyle, to foretel ſtorms and tempeſts.

AERIUS, a preſbyter in the reign of Conſtantine the Great, diſtinguiſhed himſelf not only by going over to the Arian party, but by maintaining that the Scripture makes no diſtinction between a biſhop and a preſbyter. He alſo condemned prayers for the dead, the faſts eſtabliſhed by the church, and the celebration of Eaſter.

ÆRODIUS, a civilian of the ſixteenth century. See AYRAULT.

AERSCHOT, a town of the Low Countries in the duchy of Brabant. It was taken by the French in 1746, and reſtored at the peace. It is ſeated on the river Demur, ten miles eaſt of Malines, and eight north of Louvain. Long. 5. 4. E. Lat. 51. 15. N.

ÆSCHINES, a Socratic philoſopher, was the ſon of Charinus, a ſauſage maker. He lived in the ſeventy-ſixth Olympiad, 390 years before Chriſt, and wrote ſeveral dialogues, &c. three of which are ſtill extant; they have been tranſlated into Latin by Mr. Le Clerc, who added notes to them, and ſubjoined ſeveral diſſertations. They were publiſhed in 1711, in 8vo.

ÆSCHINUS, a celebrated orator, born at Athens, was the rival of Demoſthenes. He publicly accuſed Cteſiphon, the friend of that great orator; but Demoſtenes defended his cauſe, and procured Æſchinus to be baniſhed from Athens; on which he went to Rhodes, where he taught rhetoric; and from thence to Samos, where he died. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner by his eloquence, that the Greeks gave the name of the Three Graces to his three orations, that are ſtill extant; and that of the Nine Muſes to his nine epiſtles. He ought not to be confounded with ſeveral other perſons of the ſame name, mentioned by Diogenes Laertius.

ÆSCHYLUS, a celebrated tragic poet, born at Athens, of an illuſtrious family, about 525 years before the Chriſtian æra. He ſignalized himſelf by his courage at the famous battles of Marathon, Salamis, and Platæa; and furniſhed the theatre with a great number of tragedies, that were received by the Greeks with univerſal applauſe. At the decline of life he retired to Hiero, king of Syracuſe, who had a particular eſteem for him. It is ſaid, that he was killed by an eagle miſtaking his bald head for the the point of a rock, and letting a tortoiſe fall upon it, in order to break its ſhell; but this has too much the air of a fable. However, Æſchylus died 477 years before the Chriſtian æra. We have ſtill ſeven of his tragedies in Greek; the beſt edition of which is Stanley's, printed at London in 1663, in folio.

Æſchylus is conſidered by the antients as the principal improver of tragedy. It was he who introduced on the ſtage ſcenes, interlocutors, the uſe of the maſk, and the buſkin. His ſtyle is grand, ſublime, and vehement; and his expreſſions ſo terrible, that, according to the Greek ſcholiaſts, the firſt time his Eumenides was repreſented, many children died in the theatre with terror, and ſeveral women with child miſcarried, through fear, upon the ſpot.

ÆSCULAPIUS, in the heathen mythology, the god of phyſic, was the ſon of Apollo and the nymph Coronis. He was educated by the centaur Chiron, who taught him phyſic; by which means Æſculapius cured the moſt deſperate diſeaſes. But Jupiter, enraged at his reſtoring to life Hypolitus, who had been torn in pieces by his own horſes, killed him by a thunderbolt.

The following fabulous account is given of the manner in which the Romans became acquainted with this imaginary deity. A plague happening in Italy, and the oracle being conſulted, they were ordered to fetch the God Æſculapius from Epidaurus. On which an embaſſy was appointed of ten ſenators, at the head of whom was Quintius Ogulnius. Theſe ambaſſadors on their arrival viſited the temple of that god; when a huge ſerpent came from under the altar, and croſſing the city, went directly to their ſhip, and lay down in Ogulnius's cabbin; upon which they immediately ſet ſail, and arriving in the Tiber, the ſerpent quitted the ſhip, and retired to a little iſland oppoſite the city, where a temple was ſoon after erected, and the peſtilence ceaſed.

According to Cicero, there were three deities of this name, the firſt, the ſon of Apollo, worſhipped in Acadia, who invented the probe, and bandages for wounds; the ſecond, the brother of Mercury, killed by lightning; and the third, the ſon of Ariſippus and Arſinoe, who firſt taught the art of tooth-drawing and purging.

At Epidaurus, Æſculapius's ſtatue was of gold and ivory, with a long beard, his head ſurrounded with rays, holding in one hand a knotty ſtick, and the other entwined with a ſerpent; he was ſeated on a throne of the ſame materials as his ſtatue, and had a dog lying at his feet. The Romans crowned him with laurel, to repreſent his deſcent from Apollo, and the Phaliaſins repreſented him as beardleſs.

The cock, the raven, and the goat were ſacred to this deity. His chief temples were at Pergamus, Smyrna, Trica, a city in Ionia, and the iſle of Coos; in all which, votive tables were hung up, ſhewing the diſeaſes cured by his aſſiſtance. But his moſt famous ſhrine was at Epidaurus, where every five years games were inſtituted to him, nine days after the Iſthmian games at Corinth.

The abbé la Pluche gives the following explication of the origin of this god: That the public ſign or cymbal expoſed in the aſſemblies of the Egyptians, to warn the people to obſerve the depth of the inundation of the Nile, was the figure of a man with a dog's head, carrying a pole with a ſerpent twiſted round it, to which they gave the names of Anubis, or the barker; Tayant, the dog, and Æſculapius, the man-dog, from Aiſh, man, and Caleph, dog; but at laſt made uſe of this repreſentation for a real king, who, by the ſtudy of phyſic, ſought the preſervation of his ſubjects: thus the ſerpent and dog became the attendants of Æſculapius among the Greeks and Romans, who were entirely ſtrangers to the original meaning of theſe hieroglyphics.

ÆSON, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Theſſaly, and the father of Jaſon; Medea, at Jaſon's requeſt, by the help of her magical charms, reſtored the old king Æſon to youth.

ÆSOP, a Greek author, celebrated for his fables, was, according to the general opinion, a Phrygian. He was born a ſlave, and carried to Athens, where he learnt moral philoſophy, which was then in great reputation. At length he was ſold to Xanthus of the iſle of Samos, and afterwards to Idmon, or Iadmon, of the ſame iſland, who had, at the ſame time, Rhodope, the famous courteſan, for his ſlave. Æſop ſeeing that the meanneſs of his birth would not allow him to have that weight and authority with the people which were neceſſary, in order to inſtruct them by grave and moral ſentences, as was then the practice of the ſages of Greece, thought himſelf obliged to follow another method. He therefore compoſed ingenious, uſeful, and agreeable Fables, by which he obtained great reputation throughout all Greece; when Iadmon, as a reward for his ſervice, his abilities, and his virtue, ſet him free, being aſhamed of keeping in ſlavery a man worthy of commanding others. The report of Æſop's wiſdom having reached the ear of Crœſus, that prince ſent for him to his court, and, by the favours he conferred on him, engaged him to conſent to ſtay with him as long as he lived. Æſop there converſed with Solon and the other wiſe men of Greece, and behaved with more politeneſs and complaiſance to the great, than thoſe famous philoſophers. He travelled to Athens, when it was under the government of Piſyſtratus, and appeared among the ſeven wiſe men of Greece at the court of Periander, the tyrant of Corinth. At his return to Sardis, Crœſus ſent him to Delphos, in order to make a magnificent ſacrifice to Apollo, and to diſtribute to each of the citizens four minas of ſilver. But Æſop ſeeing that lands near Delphos, capable of being cultivated, were lying waſte, he reproached the Delphians for their lazineſs; and, after the ſacrifices were performed, ſent the money that was left to Sardis. This conduct ſo enraged the Delphians, that they caſt him down from the top of a rock, under the pretence of his having ſtolen a golden cup conſecrated to Apollo. This cup they had concealed in one of his bundles, as he was ſetting out in order to return to Crœſus. All Greece was concerned for the death of this great man, and the Athenians erected for him a magnificent ſtatue. It is commonly believed, on the authority of Planudes, that Æſop was the moſt deformed and ill-favoured man in the world; and that he had ſuch an impediment in his voice, that he could ſcarcely be underſtood: but no antient author deſcribes him in this manner, or mentions his having any deformity. On the contrary, we find that Æſop had an agreeable perſon, was well ſkilled in muſic, and was the politeſt philoſopher of his time. Beſides, the life of Æſop, by Planudes, is filled with ridiculous and puerile tales, unworthy of the leaſt degree of credit. Socrates, while in priſon, turned Æſop's Fables into verſe; but theſe verſes are loſt. The collection we have of them, which was publiſhed by Planudes, does not appear to have been all written by Æſop; for there are ſome that were wrote before his time; and the antients cite fables, under Æſop's name, that are not to be found in this collection.

ÆSOP (CLODIUS) the moſt celebrated tragedian that ever appeared among the antient Romans, lived about eighty-five years before the Chriſtian æra. He perfected Cicero in the art of declamation, and died immenſely rich, though he had lived in a very profuſe manner.

ÆTHELSTAN, ATHELSTAN, or ETHELSTAN. See ATHELSTAN.

AETIUS, one of the moſt zealous defenders of Arianiſm, was born in Syria, and flouriſhed about the year 336. After being ſervant to a grammarian, of whom he learned grammar and logic, he was ordained deacon, and at length biſhop, by Eudoxus, patriarch of Conſtantinople. Beſides the opinions which he had in common with the Arians, he maintained that faith alone, without good works, was ſufficient to ſalvation. St. Epiphanius has preſerved forty-ſeven of his propoſitions againſt the Trinity. His followers were called Aëtians.

AETIUS, a famous phyſician, born at Amida, in Meſopotamia, and the author of a work intitled Tetrabiblos, which is a collection from the writings of thoſe phyſicians who went before him. He lived, according to Dr. Freind, at the end of the fifth or the beginning of the ſixth century.

AETIUS (FLAVIUS) governor of the Gauls, and one of the greateſt generals of his time, defeated Theodoric, conquered the Franks, and gained a great victory over Gondicarus; and being joined by the Franks and Goths, defeated Attila in the year 452. But the emperor Valentinian III. jealous of the merit of this great man, killed him in 454 with his own hand, under the pretence that he had permitted the invaſion of the Huns, after Attila's defeat. This murder ſurpriſed all Europe, and threw the empire into a decline, from which it could not be recovered.

ÆTNA, a high mountain in Sicily, famous for its throwing out fire and aſhes. There is a dreadful gulph on the top of it, which has been taken notice of by the antients. The land about it is rich and fertile, and is covered with vineyards, paſture, beech and fir-trees: but on the upper parts there are nothing but moving aſhes and pumice-ſtones. It is ſixty-ſix miles in circumference. Sometimes when it vomits flames and aſhes it ruins the country about it for ſeveral leagues; as in 1536, 1544, 1566, 1579, 1669, and 1693. At the time of this laſt eruption it ſunk conſiderably. It is called Mount Gibel by the inhabitants.

AFER (DOMITIUS) a celebrated orator under Tiberius, and the three ſucceeding emperors, was born at Nîmes, and was maſter to Quintilian; but he diſgraced his talents, by turning informer againſt ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonages in Rome. He died A. D. 59.

AFRANIA, the wife of Licinius Buccio, a Roman ſenator, famous for his litigious and clamorous temper, and her publickly pleading her own cauſes in the courts of juſtice.

AFRANIUS, a celebrated comic poet, praiſed by Cicero for his lively genius and elegant ſtyle; but blamed by Quintilian for having inſerted paſſages in his comedies capable of corrupting youth. He lived about a hundred years before the Chriſtian æra.

He ought not to be confounded with Quinctianus Afranius, a Roman ſenator, put to death by Nero, for entering into the famous conſpiracy which coſt Seneca his life.

AFRICA, one of the four parts of the world, is a peninſula, it being joined to Aſia only by the iſthmus of Suez, which ſeparates the Red Sea from the Mediterranean: the ſea ſurrounds it in all other places. It is ſeated between 10. 40. weſt, and 50. 0. eaſt longitude, and between 37. 30. of north latitude and 34. 50. ſouth. It is bounded on the north by the Mediterranean ſea, and the ſtreights of Gibraltar; on the ſouth by the Southern ocean; on the eaſt by the Indian ocean, the Arabic gulph, and the iſthmus of Suez, which ſeparates it from Aſia; and on the weſt by the Weſtern ocean. From north to ſouth it is about four thouſand three hundred and twenty miles long, and from eaſt to weſt four thouſand one hundred and fifty broad. But the breadth is not every-where alike: it diminiſhes all of a ſudden in about five degrees of latitude, and becomes ſenſibly narrower and narrower to the cape of Good Hope.

It is but lately, that the ſouthern parts of this country have been known; before which the ſea-coaſt only was ſuppoſed to be inhabited, and that only in the northern parts; for the ancients believed the torrid zone deſtitute of people. At that time, they had penetrated no farther than the deſerts of Barca, which are full of burning ſands, which made them conclude, that the country ſtill nearer the line muſt be more unfit to maintain any inhabitants, on account of its ſterility and nearneſs to the ſun: but we are now undeceived by thoſe who have viſited this part of the world; for it is well known, that thoſe parts of Africa which lie immediately under the line are well watered with ſprings and rivers, and produce a great quantity of fruit and grain, which ſerve to maintain a vaſt number of inhabitants. This is not at all ſurpriſing, when we conſider that the year is divided into two ſeaſons, the rainy and the dry; for as ſpring, autumn, ſummer, and winter, which ſome authors mention, they are not to be met with under the line: the rainy ſeaſon may, indeed, be compared to winter, and the dry ſeaſon to ſummer, but then the other two are wanting: the former continues ſeveral months, which, with the plentiful dews in the night, are ſufficient to render the land fruitful, and, in reality, there is a continual verdure all the year, as well as a continual ſucceſſion of bloſſoms and fruit.

Africa is divided into the following ſtates and kingdoms:

I. The north diviſion, or coaſt of Barbary, containing Barca, Tripoly, Tunis, and Algiers.

II. The weſtern diviſion, containing Morocco, Biledulgerid, and Zaara.

III. The ſouth-weſt diviſion, which contains Guinea, Benin, Loango, Congo, Angola, Benguela, Mataman, Monomugi, and Monomotopa.

IV. The ſouth diviſion, which includes Caffraria, or the country of the Hottentots, and Terra de Natal.

V. The ſouth-eaſt diviſion, containing Sofala, and Zanguebar.

VI. The north-eaſt diviſion, which includes Abex and Anian, Abyſſinia, or the Upper Ethiopia, Nubia, and Egypt.

The interior part of this great continent is ſtill almoſt entirely unknown.

The principal rivers of Africa are the Niger and the Nile: the latter is now well known, and deſerves an article by itſelf; but the Niger, or Niger Nile, ſaid to proceed from the ſame ſource as the Nile, we are not ſo well ſatisfied about. Some affirm, that the rivers Gambia and Senegal are two branches of the Niger; and others, that they are diſtinct rivers. De Liſle makes the lake Maber of Maberia to be the ſource of the river Senegal; and yet Labat is poſitive, that theſe two rivers are the ſame, and that the Gambia is a branch of it; notwithſtanding which, there are no boats come from Tombut, a town generally allowed to ſtand on the Niger; and likewiſe the merchants who come from thence, make their journey partly by land and partly by water: hence we may conclude, that there is no communication between the Senegal and the Niger, or, at leaſt, that the courſe is interrupted by banks of ſand or cataracts.

Beſides the animals that we have in Europe, Africa produces others which are not ſo generally known, as lions, leopards, tigers, panthers, rhinoceroſes, elephants, cameleons, oſtriches, camels, dromedaries, monkeys, buffaloes, and wild aſſes: in the rivers, there are crocodiles and river-horſes. The moſt uſeful of theſe are the elephant, the camel, and the dromedary.

Africa has many iſlands, whoſe names I ſhall juſt mention, for the ſake of finding them elſewhere. Thoſe on the eaſt are, Madagaſcar, St. Maurice, Bourbon, and Zocotora. Thoſe on the weſt are, the iſles of Madeira, the iſles of Cape Verd, the Canary iſlands. The iſles of Madeira are, Madeira, Porto Santo, and La Deſerta. The Cape de Verd iſlands are, St. Anthony, St. Vincent, St. Lucia, St. Nicholas, St. Jago, Sal, Mayo, Del Fuego, Brava, and Bonaviſta. The Canary iſlands are, Lancerota, Forteventura, Canaria, Tenerif, Gomera, Ferro, and Palma. There are other iſlands, which lie between this continent and South-America, which are reckoned among the African iſlands, St. Thomas, St. Matthew, St. Helena, Annobon, and Prince's Iſle.

AFRICANUS (Julius) an excellent hiſtorian of the third century, the author of a chronicle which was greatly eſteemed, and in which he reckons 5500 years from the creation of the world to Julius Cæſar. This work, of which we have now no more than what is to be found in Euſebius, ended at the 221ſt year of the vulgar æra. Africanus alſo wrote a letter to Origen, on the hiſtory of Suſannah, which he ſuppoſed to be ſuppoſititious; and we have ſtill a letter of his to Ariſtides, in which he reconciles the ſeeming contradictions in the two genealogies of Chriſt recorded by St. Matthew and St. Luke.

AGADES, a kingdom and city of Negroland, in Africa. It lies nearly under the tropic of Cancer, between Gubur and Cano. The town ſtands on a river that falls into the Niger; it is walled, and the king's palace is in the midſt of it. The king has a retinue, who ſerve as a guard. The inhabitants are not ſo black as other Negroes, and conſiſt of merchants and artificers. Thoſe that inhabit the fields are ſhepherds or herdſmen, whoſe cottages are made of boughs, and are carried about from place to place on the back of oxen. They are fixed on the ſpot of ground where they intend to feed their cattle. The houſes in the city are ſtately, and built after the Barbary faſhion. This kingdom was, and may ſtill be tributary to the king of Tombut. It is well watered; and there is great plenty of graſs, cattle, ſenna, and manna. The prevailing religion is the Mahommedan, but very looſely profeſſed. The Lat. of Agades is 26. 10. N. Long. 9. 10. E.

AGAG, king of the Amalekites, who, being conquered by Saul, was taken priſoner, and hewn in pieces by Samuel on account of his cruelty, 1070 years before Chriſt. 1 Sam. xv.

AGAMEMNON, in fabulous hiſtory, was, according to Homer, the ſon of Atrius by Æropa. He was king of Argos and Mycene, and general of the Grecian army at the ſiege of Troy; but was obliged to ſacrifice his daughter, Iphigenia, to Diana, and to reſtore Briſeis to Achilles, from whom he had taken her away. He was aſſaſſinated by Ægiſthus, about 1183 years before Chriſt, as he was entering his dominions; but his death was revenged by his ſon Oreſtes.

AGAPÆ, in church hiſtory, love-feaſts, kept by the ancient Chriſtians, from a principle of brotherly charity and mutual benevolence. At theſe feaſts, the rich brought proviſions, and the poor were invited to partake of them. This charitable entertainment was attended with prayers, ſinging pſalms, and religious diſcourſe.

AGAPETUS I. elected pope on the 28th of April, 535, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his firmneſs in refuſing to join with the Eutychians. The emperor Juſtinian I. reſolving to oblige him to communicate with Anthimus, patriarch of Conſtantinople, who was one of the above ſect, threatened him with baniſhment, when he replied, "I thought I had "found a Catholic emperor; but, I find, I have met with "a Domitian: however, I fear not your menaces." Agapetus died ſome days after, in 556.

Agapetus II. ſucceeded pope Martin II in 946. He called the emperor Otho to Rome againſt Berenger II. and decided the diſpute between the church of Lorche and Saltzburg, in relation to the right of ſupremacy. He died in 956, and was ſucceeded by John XII.

AGARD (Arthur) a learned and induſtrious antiquary, was the ſon of Clement Agard, of Toſton in Derbyſhire, and was born in 1540. He was educated for the law, and, in 1570, was made deputy chamberlain of the exchequer, which poſt he enjoyed forty-five years. He wrote in Latin, 1. A Treatiſe on the Uſe and true Meaning of the obſcure Words in the Doomſday-Book, which is preſerved in the Cotton library. 2. A Catalogue of the Records in his Majeſty's four Treaſuries. And, 3. An Account of all Leagues, Treaties of Peace, Intercourſes, and Marriages, with foreign Nations. Theſe laſt, with eleven other MS. treatiſes, he left to the exchequer. All the reſt of his valuable treaſure of collections, containing at leaſt twenty volumes, he bequeathed to his friend ſir Robert Cotton. He died on the 22d of Auguſt 1615.

AGASICLES, king of Sparta, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his wiſdom and learning. He lived about 650 years before Chriſt, and enjoyed a peaceable reign. Being aſked how a prince might live in ſafety, he replied, "By treating his "ſubjects as a father treats his children."

AGATHA (St.) a virgin, born at Palermo, of a noble family. She was remarkable for her beauty; but being unwilling to favour the paſſion of Quintianus, governor of Sicily, was, by his orders, cruelly tortured, and died in priſon about the year 251.

Agatha (St.) a ſmall city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated between Benevento and Capua, 10 miles from each, and 20 north-eaſt of Naples. Long. 17. 10. E. Lat. 40. 55.

AGDE, a city of France, in Lower Languedoc, in the territory of Agadez, with a biſhop's ſee. The dioceſe is ſmall, but it is one of the richeſt countries in the kingdom. It produces fine wool, wine, oil, corn, and ſilk. It is ſeated on the river Eraut, a mile and a quarter from its mouth, where it falls into the gulph of Lyons, and where there is a fort built to guard its entrance. It is well peopled; the houſes are built of black ſtone, and there is an entrance into the city by four gates. The greateſt part of the inhabitants are merchants or ſeamen. The public buildings are but mean: the cathedral is ſmall, and not very handſome: the biſhop's palace is an old building, but convenient enough. The city is extended along the river, where it forms a little port, wherein ſmall craft may enter. There is a great concourſe of pilgrims and other devout people to the chapel of Notre Dame de Grace. It is a little without the city, between which and the chapel there are about thirteen or fourteen oratories, which they viſit with naked feet. The convent of the capuchins is well built, and on the outſide are lodgings and apartments for the pilgrims who come to perform their neuvaine, or nine days devotion. The chapel, which contains the image of the Virgin Mary, is diſtinct from the convent. It is 18 miles north eaſt of Narbonne, 10 eaſt of Beſiers, 20 ſouth by weſt of Montpellier, and 400 ſouth by eaſt of Paris. Long. 3. 20. E. Lat. 43. 19.

AGATHARCHIDES, a celebrated Greek hiſtorian, born at Gnidos. He wrote an hiſtory of the ſucceſſors of Alexander, and was the firſt author who gave a deſcription of the rhinoceros. He lived about 180 years before the Chriſtian æra.

AGATHARCHUS, a famous painter of Samos, who, at the requeſt of Æſchylus the tragedian, was the firſt who furniſhed the ſtage with ſcenes drawn according to the rules of perſpective. He lived about 480 years before Chriſt.

AGATHIAS, or AGATHIUS, diſtinguiſhed by the title of Scholaſticus, was a Greek hiſtorian, who lived in the ſixth century, under the emperor Juſtinian. He wrote an hiſtory of the reign of the emperor Juſtinian; a collection of poems, under the title of Daphniaca; and a collection of epigrams.

AGATHO, a tragic and comic poet, was the diſciple of Prodicus and Socrates. His firſt tragedy obtained the prize; and he was crowned, in the preſence of thirty thouſand men, in the fourth year of the ninetieth Olympiad.

AGATHO (St.) a Benedictine monk, born at Palermo, was elected pope on the 11th of April, 679. He put a ſtop to the tribute paid by the holy ſee to the emperor at the election of every pope.

AGATHOCLES, tyrant of Sicily, was a potter's ſon at Reggio. He gained ſeveral victories over the Carthaginians, and was poiſoned by his grand-child Archagathus, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age, after a reign of twenty-eight years, and about 290 years before Chriſt.

AGELLIUS (ANTHONY) biſhop of Acerno, in the 17th century, wrote a learned commentary on the Pſalms and other books of the ſacred ſcriptures.

AGEN, a city in France, on the river Garonne, the capital of Agenois, in Guienne, and the ſee of a biſhop. The gates and old walls, which are yet remaining, ſhow that this city is very ancient, and that its former circuit was not ſo great as the preſent; but there is no trace remaining of the caſtle ſo famous in hiſtory. The palace, wherein the preſidial holds his ſeſſions at this day, was heretofore called the caſtle of Montravel, and is ſeated without the walls of the old city, and on the ſide of the foſſe. There are likewiſe the ruins of another caſtle called La Sagne, which was without the walls, cloſe by a brook. Though the ſituation of Agen is very convenient for trade and commerce, the inhabitants are ſo very indolent, that there is very little, of which the neighbouring cities take the advantage. It is ſeated on the bank of the river Garonne, in a pleaſant country, 25 miles north by eaſt of Condom, 38 north of Auch, 75 ſouth-eaſt of Bourdeaux, and 340 ſouth by weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 30. E. Lat. 44. 12. N.

AGENOIS, a territory of Guienne in France, which takes its name from Agen, the capital. It lies between Querci, Perigord, Bazidois, and the river Garonne, which ſeparates it from Armagnac.

AGESANDER, a celebrated ſculptor of Rhodes, under Veſpaſian, who, with other ſculptors, formed the famous groop of Laocoon.

AGESILAUS II. king of Sparta, was the ſon of Archidamus, and was raiſed to the throne, notwithſtanding the ſuperior claim of Leotychides. He gained a celebrated victory over Tiſaphernes, general of the Perſians; defeated the Thebans and their allies at Coronea; vanquiſhed the Acamenians, and rendered himſelf maſter of Corinth. He died about 356 years before the Chriſtian æra, aged eighty four, after a reign of forty-one years.

Ageſilaus was little, ill-favoured, and lame; but, at the ſame time, he was brave, vigilant, ſober, and regular in his manners. He forbid the erecting of ſtatues to his honour, and would have no other monuments of his glory than his own actions. To ſhew the little regard he thought due to thoſe who made their higheſt glory conſiſt in breeding and managing horſes for diſputing the prize at the Olympic games, he perſuaded his ſiſter Cinyſca to contend for the victory; and having herſelf trained her horſes for that exerciſe, ſhe entered the liſts, and was the firſt woman who ever obtained the prize.

AGESIPOLIS I. king of Sparta, was the colleague of Ageſilaus II. and ſucceeded his father Pauſanias, who had taken refuge in a temple, on his perceiving that his conduct in concluding a peace with the Thebans was diſapproved. He ravaged the country of the Argives, carried on a war with the inhabitants of Mantinea, and, after having laid waſte the country, took the city, by ſtopping the river which ran through it, which, by this means, cauſed an innundation that ſo weakened the foundation of the houſes and walls, that the inhabitants, fearing they would fall, capitulated. After this, he ravaged the country of the Olynthians, and made himſelf maſter of Torone. He died in this laſt expedition, about 380 years before the Chriſtian æra, and the fourteenth of his reign. He was ſucceeded by Ageſipolis II. who reigned only one year, and who is more remarkable for his apophthegms than his actions.

AGGAS (ROBERT) commonly called AUGUS, a good Engliſh landſcape-painter, in the reign of king Charles II. He was alſo ſkilled in architecture. He painted both in oil and diſtemper; but there are not many of his pictures extant. The beſt is a landſcape, which he preſented to the company of paper-ſtainers, and is ſtill preſerved in their hall. He died in London, in 1679, at about the ſixtieth year of his age.

AGGERHUYS, a province in Norway, the capital of which bears the ſame name, as does alſo a caſtle, the ſeat of the governor. As to the ſoil, if you except the country which runs along the coaſt of Categat and the golf of Aſſoy, all the reſt is nothing but dreadful mountains. There are but few inhabitants in the valleys, and their chief trade is ſtock-fiſh, rich furs, train oil, pitch, and naval ſtores. There is nothing remarkable in theſe parts. Long. of the caſtle is 10. 30. E. Lat. 60. 0. N.

AGILNOTH, AGELNOTH, or ÆTHELNOTH, an Engliſhman, and the ſon of a nobleman called Agelmar, was greatly in favour with Canute I. and, from being dean of Canterbury, was raiſed to the archiepiſcopal ſee of that city, in 1020. His zeal for the church, his fondneſs for ſacred relics, and the care he took to increaſe the riches of the clergy and friars, gained him the ſurname of Good. He wrote ſeveral books, among which is a volume of letters in praiſe of the Bleſſed Virgin. He died Oct. 30th, 1038, after his having enjoyed the ſee of Canterbury eighteen years.

AGHRIM, a town of Ireland, in the county of Wicklow, and province of Leinſter, 13 miles ſouth-weſt of Wicklow. Long. 8. 17. Lat. 52. 45. It is famous for a battle fought in 1691.

AGILULPHUS, duke of Turin, and king of the Lombards, died in 616, after having ſubdued all Italy except Ravenna.

AGINCOURT, a village of the French Netherlands, in the county of Artois, 7 miles north of Heſdin, where Henry V. king of England obtained a victory over the French in 1415. Long. 2 10. Lat. 40. 35.

AGIS II. king of Sparta, ravaged the country of the Argives, and ſignalized himſelf in the war of Peloponneſus. He was accuſtomed to ſay, that "the envious were extremely "unhappy, ſince the felicity of others tormented them like "their own misfortunes." He died about 390 years before the Chriſtian æra.

AGIS IV. king of Sparta, was deſcended in a right line from Ageſilaus II. and attempted, in the flower of his age, to baniſh the luxury that then prevailed among the Spartans, by introducing the ancient frugality, and, for this purpoſe, began with his own perſon; but, by thus attempting to reſtore the laws of Lycurgus, he brought about his own ruin: the rich, the women, and Leonidas his colleague, oppoſed him. Cleombrotus was placed on the throne, and Agis was obliged to retire for ſafety to a temple, which he never left, except to bathe; but, as he was one day returning from the baths, he was ſeized by Amphares, one of the Ephori, who hurried him to priſon, where he was immediately tried and condemned by the Ephori. In the mean time, Ageſiſtrata, being informed of the danger her ſon was in, haſtened to the gate of the priſon with Archidamia her mother, demanding, that her ſon might be allowed to plead his cauſe before the people; but they were apprehenſive that his words would make too great an impreſſion, and therefore ordered him to be immediately ſtrangled; and, at the ſame time, Amphares came out to aſſure Ageſiſtrata, that no harm ſhould be done to her ſon; and that both ſhe and her mother, if they pleaſed, might go in and ſee him. They both went into the priſon; but Amphares cauſed Archidamia to be immediately hanged, and Ageſiſtrata to be conducted to the place where her mother had been executed. The firſt object that preſented itſelf to the eyes of the lady was the body of her ſon lying on the ground, and that of her mother hanging by it: ſhe helped the executioners to take it down, laid it on the ground by the body of her ſon, and, kiſſing Agis, cried out, that he had undone himſelf, and drawn them into that misfortune, by his modeſty, lenity, and humanity. At theſe words, Amphares told her, that ſince ſhe approved of her ſon's conduct, ſhe ſhould be treated after the ſame manner; when Ageſiſtrata, without ſhewing the leaſt ſurprize, offered her neck to the executioner, only ſaying, that ſhe heartily wiſhed the whole might redound to the good and welfare of her country. To ſum up this tragical ſtory, Agiatis, the wife of the unhappy Agis, a princeſs of great fortune and prudence, and and one of the fineſt ladies in Greece, was forced away from her apartment by king Leonidas, and obliged to marry Cleomenes his ſon. This happened 280 years before the Chriſtian æra.

AGLIONBY (John) an Engliſh divine, was born of a genteel family in Cumberland, and was chaplain in ordinary to queen Elizabeth and king James I. and rector of Iſlip, near Oxford. He was maſter of all the ſeveral kinds of literature, was profoundly ſkilled in the fathers and in ſchool-divinity, and is ſaid to have had a conſiderable ſhare in the tranſlation of the New Teſtament. He died in February, 1609, aged forty-three AGMONDESHAM, or Amersham, a town in Buckinghamſhire, with a market on Tueſdays. It conſiſts of a long ſtreet lying in the road, which is divided about the middle with a leſſer croſs one. About eighty years ago, ſir William Drake built here a very neat town-hall, or market-houſe, of brick, which ſtands upon arched pillars, is embelliſhed with free ſtone at the corners, and has a lanthorn and a clock at the top. The town contains about two hundred houſes; and yet the electors for members of parliament are not above one hundred and thirty; for, though the houſes ſtand in the middle of the town, if they are in other leets, they are excluded that privilege, there being none but the lords tenants of the borough, paying ſcot and lot, who are admitted to vote. They began to chuſe members in the reign of Edward II. and, after five times, this power was diſcontinued till the time of James I. ſince which they have ſent burgeſſes to every parliament regularly. The rectory is the beſt in the county, and is charged 48l. 16s. 1d. in the king's books. It hath two fairs for ſheep, viz. Whit-Monday, and September 19. It is thirty-one miles ſouth-eaſt of Buckingham, and twenty-nine north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 15. W. Lat. 51. 47. N.

AGNANI, a ſmall city of Italy, in the Campagna di Roma, with a biſhop's ſee. Long. 12. 6 E. Lat. 41. 45.

AGNANO, a lake in the kingdom of Naples, near the baths of the ſame name. This lake is almoſt ſurrounded with mountains, and is extremely deep. It is very near the Grotto del Cani; and when a dog has been ſtifled with the ſulphureous fumes of that cavern, he is thrown into this lake, and comes to himſelf. Indeed, there is no great wonder in this; for, probably, any other cold water would do as much.

AGNES (St.) a celebrated virgin, who, at twelve or thirteen years of age, ſuffered martyrdom at Rome, about the year 303.

Agnes Soreau, or Sorel, diſtinguiſhed by the name of the Beautiful Agnes, was born at Fromenteau, a village of Touraine, and was lady of that place. King Charles VII. of France was extremely fond of her; but ſhe often reproached him with his indolence, and, in order to oblige him to exert himſelf againſt the Engliſh, aſſured him, that an aſtrologer had foretold, that the greateſt king in the world ſhould honour her with his friendſhip, and added, that this could not be him, ſince he neglected to recover his dominions; ſhe muſt therefore, in order to accompliſh the prophecy, be obliged to go to the Engliſh court. The ſeverity of this remonſtrance touched Charles in the moſt ſenſible manner, and obliged him to take up arms in order to expel the Engliſh out of his kingdom. She died February 9, 1450.

AGOBARD, archbiſhop of Lyons, one of the moſt learned prelates of the 9th century, was depoſed at the council of Thionville, in 834, by the order of Lewis the Debonair; but being afterwards reſtored to favour, he was re-eſtabliſhed in his ſee, and died in 840. Agobard wrote againſt Felix Orgelitanus, to ſhew that Chriſt is the real ſon of God, and not merely by adoption and grace. He alſo wrote againſt duels, trials by fire and water, and a work to prove that there are no ſorcerers capable of raiſing tempeſts. His works were publiſhed by Papirius Maſſo, who found the manuſcript among ſome waſte paper, at a bookſeller's ſhop at Lyons, where it was going to be torn to pieces; but a more correct edition was publiſhed by M. Baluze at Paris, in two volumes, octavo, in 1666, with notes.

AGON, in antiquity, a term uſed indifferently for any conteſt in the public games; and alſo for a place near the Tiber, where the Curule games were celebrated.

Agon alſo ſignified a miniſter employed in the heathen ſacrifices, whoſe buſineſs it was to ſtrike the victim.

AGONALES, in Roman antiquity, the ſame with the Salii. See the article Salii.

AGONALIA, in Roman antiquity, feſtivals appointed by Numa, in honour of Janus, whom the Romans invoked before they undertook any affair of importance. Theſe ſeem to have been obſerved three times in the year, viz. on the 5th of the ides of January, on the 12th of the calends of June, and on the third of the ides of December.

AGONISTARCHA, in antiquity, an officer who directed the preparatory exerciſe of the athletæ; though ſome make him the ſame with the agonotheta. See Agonotheta.

AGONOTHETA, or Agonothetes, in Grecian antiquity, the ſuperintendant of the ſacred games, who defrayed the expences attending them, inſpected the manners of the athletæ, and adjudged the prizes to the victors. There was at firſt only one agonotheta in the Olympic games, but ſeveral colleagues were afterwards joined with him.

AGORACITUS, a celebrated ſculptor of Pharos, who formed the beautiful Venus of Rhamnus, about 448 years before Chriſt.

AGORÆUS, in heathen antiquity, a name given to ſuch deities as had ſtatues in the market-places, particularly to Mercury. The Spartans paid an extraordinary veneration to Minerva Agoræa.

AGORANOMOS, in Grecian antiquity, a magiſtrate of Athens, whoſe office anſwered in part to that of the Roman ædile; for he had the regulation of weights and meaſures, the prices of proviſions, &c. Some make the agoranomi ten in number, five to the city, and the ſame number to the Pyreus, while others ſuppoſe them to be fifteen.

AGOSTA, a town of Italy, with an excellent port. The greateſt part of it was ſwallowed up by an earthquake in 1693, and the remainder is very inconſiderable. Long. 16. 15. E. Lat. 37. 17. N.

AGRA, the capital city of the province of Agra, in Indoſtan, or Hindowſtan. It is ſeated on the river Jemina, and in the midſt of a barren ſandy country, which cauſes exceſſive heats. It is one of the greateſt cities of the Indies, and is nine miles in length. The houſes of the great men are very beautiful and well built; but thoſe of private perſons are mean. They ſtand at a diſtance from each other, and are hid by the walls which ſurround them, for fear their women ſhould be ſeen; therefore, we may well imagine, that theſe cities are nothing near ſo pleaſant and agreeable as thoſe in Europe. No part of the town is fortified, except the palace, but the whole is moated round, and there always is a great army when the mogul is there. The moſt remarkable things are the palace, and the fine ſepulchres near the city. The palace is incloſed all round with a double wall, which is terraſſed in ſome places. There are likewiſe little rooms thereon, for ſome of the officers of the court to lodge in. The Jemina runs before the palace; but between the wall and the river there is a place for the elephants to fight in. It is choſen purpoſely near the river, becauſe the victorious elephant being in great rage, they have no way to tame him, but by forcing him into the river by crackers and ſuch ſort of fire-works, for, as ſoon as he is in a little way, he immediately grows calm. The palace, which is built of ſtone, is four miles in compaſs, and is full of ornaments of gold and other precious materials, finely wrought; ſo that it may be reckoned one of the wonders of the world. The city has ſixty caravanſeras, or public inns, for travellers, eight hundred baths, and ſeven hundred moſques. As for the ſepulchres about the city, they are very fine; and there is not an eunuch of the king's haram, but is very ambitious of rearing a magnificent one; for they commonly amaſs great riches, and hardly knowing what to do with their money, uſe it in building ſepulchres to preſerve their memory. The inhabitants are very numerous, and chiefly Mahometans, though there are a vaſt number of Pagans, and ſome reckon twenty-five thouſand Chriſtian families. It is a place of great traffick and reſort for the Chineſe, Perſians, and diſtant inhabitants of India. The Engliſh had a factory here as well as the Dutch; but the diſtance of Surat, and the danger of travelling was ſo great, that the former thought proper to abandon it. Long. 79. 12. E. Lat. 26. 29. N.

AGRARIAN Stations, in the Roman art of war, were a kind of advanced guards placed in the fields.

Agrarian Laws, among the ancient Romans, were thoſe relating to the diviſion of the lands, of which there were a great number; but that ſo called, by way of eminence, was publiſhed by Spurius Caſſius, about the 268th year of Rome, for dividing the lands equally among all the citizens, and limiting the number of acres each citizen was allowed to enjoy.

AGREDA (Maria d') a viſionary nun, famous for being the author of a book intitled, The myſtical City of God, which was cenſured by the Sorbonne, though that cenſure gave offence to a great number of people. Francis Coronel her father, and Catharine d'Arena her mother, who lived at Agreda, a town of Spain, founded a convent in their own houſe, on the 9th of January, 1619, of which Maria was choſen ſuperior in 1627. It is ſaid, that during the ten firſt years of her charge, ſhe received from heaven repeated commands to write the life of the Bleſſed Virgin, with which ſhe at laſt complied, and wrote a book full of abſurdities, though adapted to pleaſe the extravagant devotees of the Virgin Mary. We are there told, "That as ſoon as the Virgin came into the world, the Al-"mighty ordered the angels to convey the lovely infant to "the empyrian heaven, which they did ſeveral times; that " God aſſigned nine hundred angels to wait upon her, and " afterwards appointed twelve others to ſerve her in a viſi- " ble and corporeal form, and then eighteen more of the " higheſt order, who aſcended and deſcended by Jacob's " ladder, to carry meſſages from the queen to the king, " &c. that for the better government of this invincible " troop, St. Michael, the prince of the heavenly hoſt, " was appointed their captain; that if the Virgin did not " ſpeak as ſoon as ſhe was born, it was not becauſe ſhe " could not, but becauſe ſhe was not willing; and that " before ſhe was three years old, ſhe ſwept the houſe, in " which work ſhe was aſſiſted by angels, &c." Maria d'Agreda died at the convent of the Immaculate Conception, at Agreda, in 1665, aged ſixty-three years, and her canonization was warmly ſollicited at Rome.

"God

AGRESTIS (JULIUS) a captain in Vitellius's army, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the following very bold and ſurprizing action: Antonius, who had revolted from Vitellius to Veſpaſian, having taken, plundered, and laid waſte the city of Cremona, Agreſtis was unable to bear the indolence the emperor ſhewed on this occaſion; and, having in vain endeavoured to awaken his magnanimity, begged that he might be ſent to ſurvey the enemies forces, and to learn the tranſactions at Cremona. This requeſt being granted, inſtead of aſſuming the behaviour of a ſpy, he went, and boldly told Antonius his deſign, deſiring to be permitted to ſee the whole. Antonius readily ſent ſome perſons with him, who ſhewed him the ſcene of the fight, the deſolation and remains of Cremona, and the legions taken priſoners. Agreſtis, upon his return to Vitellius, related what he had ſeen; but finding his report diſbelieved, and himſelf accuſed of corruption and infidelity, he boldly cried out, " Since then ſome remarkable confirmation is neceſſary, " and ſince neither my life nor my death can henceforth " avail thee, I will furniſh thee with an evidence that " thou may'ſt credit;" and ſaying this, he left his preſence and, by a voluntary death, confirmed the truth of what he had aſſerted.

AGRIA, called by the Germans Eger, is a ſmall but ſtrong town in Upper Hungary, and is a biſhop's ſee. It is ſituated on a river of the ſame name, and has a citadel called Erlaw. It was beſieged by the Turk, in 1552, with ſeventy thouſand men; but they loſt eight thouſand in one day, and were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, though the garriſon conſiſted only of two thouſand Hungarians. The women performed wonders on this occaſion. However, it was afterwards taken by Mahomet III. in 1596, but was retaken by the emperor in 1687, ſince which time, it has belonged to the houſe of Auſtria. It is remarkable, that, notwithſtanding the firſt oppoſition, all the inhabitants turned Mahommedans, while this town was in the hands of the Turks; and, when it was retaken, four thouſand inhabitants forſook the place rather than be under the government of the Chriſtians. It is forty-ſeven miles north-eaſt of Buda, and fifty-five ſouth-weſt of Caſſovia. Long. 20. 10. E. Lat. 48. 10. N.

AGRICOLA (CNEIUS JULIUS) the ſon of Julius Græcinus, a man of ſenatorial rank, famous for his eloquence, was born at Frejus in Provence. He was choſen tribune of the people, and then prætor, under the emperor Nero; and in the reign of Veſpaſian, was made conſul, and then governor of Britain, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and conduct in ſeveral campaigns; but having conquered part of Scotland, and obtained a ſignal victory over Galgacus, the Britiſh general, in a pitched battle, the emperor Domitian, jealous of his merit, recalled him, under the pretence of making him governor of Syria, and, it was generally thought, got rid of him by poiſon. He died about the year 93. Tacitus, who married his daughter, gives him a fine eulogium, and laments his death in a very pathetic manner.

AGRICOLA (GEORGE) a German phyſician, born at Glauca, in Miſnia, on the 24th of March, 1494, ſurpaſſed all the ancients in the knowledge of metals and ſubterraneous animals. He wrote ſeveral works upon this and other ſubjects, and died on the 21ſt of November, 1555.

AGRICOLA (JOHN) a Saxon divine, born at Iſlebe, April 20, 1492. He had a good talent at preaching, but taught ſeveral dangerous doctrines, with reſpect to the uſe of the law under the goſpel; and, in ſhort, became the founder of the ſect of the Antinomians, but was attacked by Luther with great ſeverity. He died, at Berlin, in 1566.

AGRICOLA (MICHAEL) a Lutheran miniſter, at Abo, in Finland, was the firſt who tranſlated the New Teſtament into the language of that country, which greatly contributed to the propagation of Lutheraniſm.

AGRICOLA (RHODOLPHUS) a celebrated profeſſor of philoſophy, at Heidelburgh, and one of the moſt learned men in his time, was born at Baſſlon, near Groningen, in 1442. He was one of thoſe who revived the taſte for the belles lettres in Germany and the Netherlands. He travelled a great deal, and every where obtained admirers and friends. He read public lectures at Worms; and, at the requeſt of the elector palatine, wrote an abridgement of antient hiſtory; he alſo wrote a work entitled, De Inventione dialectica. He died, at Heidelburg, Oct. 28, 1485.

AGRIONIA, Αγριώνια, in Grecian antiquity, feſtivals annually celebrated, by the Bœotians, in honour of Bacchus. At theſe feſtivals, the women pretended to ſearch after Bacchus as a fugitive, and, after ſome time, gave over their enquiry, ſaying, that he was fled to the Muſes, and was concealed among them. This ceremony ſeems to ſignify, that the Muſes can reſtore thoſe to reaſon whom Bacchus has rendered mad by intemperance.

AGRIPPA (MENENIUS) a Roman conſul, about 502 years before Chriſt, conquered the Sabines, and, by the fable of the members of the human body and the ſtomach, appeaſed an inſurrection of the people, who were loaded with debts, and oppreſſed with miſery. This conſul, notwithſtanding his great employments, died ſo poor, that the Roman people were obliged to be at the expence of his funeral.

AGRIPPA (MARCUS VIPSANIUS) a Roman conſul, and the ſon-in-law and favorite of Auguſtus, raiſed himſelf, by his valour, to the firſt dignities in the empire. He was one of the moſt prudent captains of his age; and Auguſtus was indebted to him for the empire of the world, on account of the victory he obtained over Mark Antony and young Pompey. That emperor having conſulted Agrippa, he adviſed him to re-eſtabliſh the republic, but Mecænas, Auguſtus's other friend, perſuaded him to the contrary. The emperor followed the advice of the latter, and deſigned to have made Agrippa his ſucceſſor; but that conſul died firſt, about twelve years before the Chriſtian æra.

This Agrippa built the Pantheon at Rome, now called the Rotunda.

AGRIPPA (HEROD) I. the ſon of Ariſtobulus and Berenice, and the grandſon of Herod the Great, lived at Rome in ſo expenſive a manner, that he contracted very large debts, which obliged him to leave Rome, and retire to Idumea, where his wife Cypros ſupplied him with money. Some time after, he returned to Rome, where Tiberius threw him into priſon: however, he was ſet at liberty ſix months after, by order of Caligula, who gave him a chain of gold of the ſame weight as the iron one with which he had been before loaded, and gave him the kingdom of Judea, A. D. 37. Joſephus ſays, that he was a zealous Jew, and was naturally ſo generous and benevolent, and had ſo great a love for his ſubjects, that he neglected nothing to make his reign glorious by great and commendable actions. However, he unjuſtly put St. James to death, and impriſoned St. Peter, and was puffed up by the extravagant flattery of the Jews. He died in violent agonies, and gnawed by worms, A. D. 43, in the ſeventh year of his reign, and the 54th of his age.

AGRIPPA II. the ſon of the former, and the laſt king of the Jews, was at Rome when his father died, and being then only ſeventeen years of age, the emperor Claudius gave the government of Judea to Culpius Fadius; and Herod, king of Chalcide, brother to Agrippa I. dying four years after, he gave his kingdom to Agrippa, which he had enjoyed only three or four years, when Claudius deprived him of it, and gave him, in its ſtead, thoſe provinces which had been poſſeſſed by Herod the Great, with the province of Abila; and Nero, his ſucceſſor, enlarged his kingdom, by adding to it four cities with their territories. The Jews having revolted, he endeavoured to perſuade them to return to their obedience; and, though he himſelf was a Jew, he joined his forces to thoſe of the Romans, and was wounded at the ſiege of Gamala. He was alſo with Titus at the ſiege of Jeruſalem, and died under Trajan, A. D. 100. It was in the preſence of this prince and his ſiſter Berenice, with whom he was ſuſpected to have an inceſtuous commerce, that St. Paul pleaded his cauſe in Ceſarea.

AGRIPPA, ſurnamed CASTOR, flouriſhed under the emperor Adrian, about the year 132. He was a man of great learning, aud wrote a very accurate work againſt Baſilides.

AGRIPPA (HENRY CORNELIUS) was born, at Cologne, Sept. 14, 1486, and was equally formed for the ſword and the pen; for he was a brave ſoldier, and a learned divine, phyſician, and lawyer. He ſignalized himſelf in arms in the ſervice of the emperor Maximilian; and, as a reward for his bravery, received the honour of knighthood, to which he added the degrees of doctor of law and phyſic. In ſhort, he was well ſkilled in many languages, and was by the ignorant accounted a magician, and yet was frequently in danger of wanting bread. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe on the Excellence of Women above that of Men. 2. The Hiſtory of the Government of Charles V. 3. A Treatiſe on the Vanity of the Sciences. 4. Another on occult Philoſophy; and other pieces, all of which are printed in two volumes octavo. He died in 1535.

AGRIP-

AGRIPPINA, the daughter of Germanicus, the ſiſter of Caligula, and the mother of Nero, was not only extremely beautiful, but had a moſt delicate wit, qualities which ſhe rendered ſubſervient to her debaucheries and ambition. She was thrice married; the laſt time to the emperor Claudius, her uncle, whom ſhe poiſoned, in order to raiſe Nero to the throne. Being told, that that prince would one time or other put her to death, "No matter, ſhe replied, let him "kill me, provided he does but reign." At length, what had been told her came to paſs; Nero ſent his guards to ſtab her; and, as the centurion followed her with his ſword in his hand, Agrippina cried, "Strike firſt this belly, for "producing ſuch a monſter as Nero."

AGUCCHIO (JOHN BAPTISTA) archbiſhop of Amaſia, in Natolia, was born, at Bologna, on the 10th of November, 1570. Urban VIII. ſent him nuncio to Venice, where, notwithſtanding his maintaining the rights of the ſee of Rome with the utmoſt rigour, he gained a general eſteem. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe upon Comets and Meteors. 2. The Life of Cardinal Lega. 3. The Antiquities of the City of Bologna; and other works. He died in 1634.

AGUI, king of Bantam, to whom his father, ſultan Agoim, reſigned his kingdom, in 1688; but afterwards taking up arms to recover it, Agui defeated him, and threw him into priſon.

AGUILA, a town of the province of Habat, in the kingdom of Fez, in Africa, ſeated on the river Aguela, and is ſubject to the king of Morocco.

AGUILAR, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Navarre, twenty-four miles weſt of Oſtella. Long. 20. 0. Lat. 42. 50. There is another town, called Aguilar del Campo, in Old Caſtile.

AGUILLONIUS (FRANCIS) a Jeſuit, born at Bruſſels, and eminent for his knowledge in the mathematics. He wrote a book of Optics, which was printed in folio, and died at Antwerp, March 20, 1617, in the fiftieth year of his age.

AGUIRRA (MICHAEL DE) a native of Aſpeitia, in the province of Guipuſcoa, was a civilian, and wrote in favour of the pretenſions of Philip II. king of Spain, to the crown of Portugal. He died in 1588.

AGUIRRA (JOSEPH SAENZ DE) a Benedictine, and one of the moſt learned men of the ſeventeenth century, was born March 24, 1630. He was cenſor and ſecretary of the ſupreme council of the inquiſition in Spain, and interpreter of the ſcriptures in the univerſity of Salamanca. He printed three volumes in folio upon Philoſophy, a Commentary upon Ariſtotle's ten Books of Ethics, and other pieces. He died at Rome, Auguſt 19, 1699.

AGYLÆUS (HENRY) diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary knowledge of the Greek language, tranſlated the Nomocanon of Photius, and died in 1595, aged ſixty-two.

AGYRIS, tyrant of the Agerini, with whom Dionyſius the Great made a league, when Mago invaded Sicily.

AHAB, the ſon of Omri; king of Iſrael, ſucceeded his father, A. M. 3086, and ſurpaſſed all his predeceſſors in impiety and wickedneſs. He married Jezebel, daughter to the king of the Zidonians, by whom he was induced to worſhip Baal; on which God ſent Elijah, to let him know that the land ſhould not be watered with rain or dew for three years; and the king being enraged, the prophet proved his divine miſſion, and that he ſerved the true God, by cauſing fire to deſcend from heaven and conſume the ſacrifice he offered. Ahab afterwards unjuſtly ſeized Naboth's vineyard; and died by an arrow ſhot at random, A. M. 3107, and before Chriſt 893.

AHUN, a town in France, in the Upper Marche and generality of Moulins, and is a royal juriſdiction. It is ſeated on the river Creuſe, near a Benedictine abbey of the ſame name, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Gueret, thirty north-eaſt of Lomages, and fifty-five ſouth-eaſt of Moulins. Long. 2. 8. E. Lat. 49. 5. N.

AHUYS, a town of Sweden. It is ſmall, but very ſtrong by its ſituation, and has a good port. It is in the principality of Gothland, in the territory of Bleckingy, near the Baltic Sea, about eighteen miles from Chriſtianſtadt. Long. 14. 10. E. Lat. 56. 20. N.

AJAN (the coaſt of). The beſt geographers only place the kingdom of Adel, already ſpoken of, along this coaſt, and aſſirm, that Magadoxo, Brava, &c. belong to Zanguebar, which ſee.

AJAX, the ſon of Oileus, in fabulous hiſtory, was one of the principal generals at the ſiege of Troy; and, as his father had very extenſive dominions in the country of the Locrians, he himſelf fitted out forty ſhips for that expedition. Homer repreſents him as fearleſs, intrepid, ſwift, and expert at drawing the bow, but without judgment or conduct. After the taking of Troy, he raviſhed Caſſandra, the daughter of Priam, in the temple of Minerva, whither ſhe had fled for ſanctuary; on which that goddeſs puniſhed him, by raiſing a ſtorm in which he periſhed.

AJAX, in fabulous hiſtory, king of Salamis, and the ſon of Telamon, was, next to Achilles, the moſt valiant and paſſionate general among the Greeks. He fought with Hector, and gave the moſt ſignal proofs of his courage; but, tranſported with fury at the arms of Achilles being adjudged to Ulyſſes, he ruſhed furiouſly among a flock of ſheep, and imagining that he was ſacrificing the Greek to his revenge, made a great ſlaughter; but at length perceiving his error, he pierced himſelf with the fatal ſword he had received from Hector.

AJAX, the ſon of Teucer, rendered himſelf famous by building a temple to Jupiter, in Olbus, a city of Cilicia.

AJAZZO, a ſea-port town of the iſland of Corſica, in the Mediterranean, with a biſhop's ſee. Long. 26. 35. Lat. 41. 40.

AJAZZO, a ſea-port town of Natolia, in the province of Caramania, anciently Sileſia, ſeated on the coaſt of the Mediterranean, thirty miles north of Antioch, and fifty weſt of Aleppo, where the city of Iſſus anciently ſtood, and near which Alexander fought his ſecond battle with Darius. Long. 33. 10. Lat. 37. 0.

AICH, a ſmall town of Germany, in Upper Bavaria, ſeated on the river Par. It was taken by the Swedes, in 1634, who exerciſed great cruelties. Some time afterwards, it was reduced to aſhes. Long. 11. 20. Lat. 48. 30.

AICHSTAT, a ſmall ſtate of the circle of Franconia, in Germany, extends fifty miles, from eaſt to weſt, along the river Altmul, but its breadth is not conſiderable. The ſoil is pretty fruitful, but is in ſome places covered with woods. This diſtrict is divided into thirty-one bailiwics.

AICHSTAT, the capital of the diſtrict of the ſame name, and the ſee of a biſhop, who is chancellor of the church of Mentz, is ſeated in a fertile and agreeable valley on the river Altmul, about ten miles north of Newburg, and twelve north-weſt of Ingolſtadt. Long. 28. 45. Lat. 40. 0.

AIDAN, a Scottiſh biſhop of the ſeventh century, famous for his piety, humility, and zeal for the converſion of the Engliſh. He died in 651.

AIDAN, or AIDANUS, king of Scotland, was the ſon of Goran or Goranus. He was but young, when his father was murdered, in 535; on which account, Eugenius his father's nephew, ſucceeded to the throne; and taking Donald of Athol, his uncle's murderer, into favour, the queen dowager was ſo alarmed, that ſhe took the firſt opportunity of retiring, with her two ſons, Reginan and Aidan, into Ireland, where he continued forty-eight years, in which time both the queen, his elder brother, and Eugenius died: but at length, Congallus, who ſucceeded his brother Eugenius, conſidering the wrong done to the lawful heir, ſent for Aidan, who, on his arrival in Scotland, found that Congallus too was dead, and that the Scots had ſet his brother Kennatillus on the throne: he, however, went to court, when the new-made king, to the ſurprize of every one, received him with the utmoſt kindneſs, telling him, that he ſhould for the preſent aſſiſt him in governing the kingdom, which, as he was old and infirm, would ſhortly become his. He was accordingly crowned in 578; and this was no ſooner done than he went into Galloway, where he reduced certain robbers who had committed great diſorders; and then inſtituted annual aſſizes in Galloway, Lochaber, and Caithneſs. He defeated the Picts; and, in conjunction with the Britons, totally routed the united forces of the Saxons and Picts, in which Ceuline, king of the Weſt Saxons was killed; but ſeveral years after, the Britons neglecting to join him, he was defeated by the Picts and Saxons. This wiſe and brave prince died, in 606, aged ſeventy-eight.

AIGLE, a bailiwick, in the territory of Romand, in Swiſſerland, conſiſts of mountains and valleys the principal of which are the Aigle and Bex. Through theſe is the great road from Vallais into Italy. When you paſs by Villeneuve, which is at the head of the lake of Geneva, you enter into a deep valley three miles wide, bordered on one ſide with the Alps of Swiſſerland, and on the other with thoſe of Savoy, and croſſed by the river Rhone. Six miles from thence you meet with Aigle, a large town, ſeated in a wide part of the valley, where there are vineyards, fields, and meadows. The governor's caſtle is on an eminence that overlooks the town, and has a fine lofty marble tower. This government has nine large pariſhes, and is divided into four parts, Aigle, Bex, Olon, and Ormont. This laſt is among the mountains, and joins to Rougemont. It is a double valley, abounding in paſture lands. Ivorna, in the diſtrict of Aigle, was in part buried by the fall of a mountain, occaſioned by an earthquake, in 1584.

AIGLE, a ſmall town, in France, in Upper Normandy, twenty-three miles from D'Evereux, and thirty-eight from Rouen. It is ſurrounded with walls and ditches, has ſix gates, three ſuburbs, and three pariſhes. It trades in corn, toys, and more particularly in needles. Long. 1. 5. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

AIGUE-PERSE, a ſmall town of France, in Lower Avergne, and the duchy of Montpenſier, is eight miles from Riom, twenty north of Clermont, thirty-five ſouth of Moulins, and two hundred and eight ſouth of Paris. Long. 4. 30. E. Lat. 45. 50. N.

AIGUES-MORTES, a ſmall town of France, in Lower Languedoc, and in the dioceſe of Niſmes. Long. 4. 30. E. Lat. 43. 34. N.

AIGUILLON, a ſmall town of France, in Guienne, and in the Agenois. It is ſeated in a very fertile valley, ten miles from Agen. Long. 0. 14. E. Lat. 44. 25. N.

AIGURANDE, a ſmall town of France, in La Marche, on the confines of Berry. Long. 2. 0. E. Lat. 46. 25. N.

AILAH was formerly a ſmall town, in Arabia Petræa, ſeated on the north-eaſt end of the Red Sea, near the road of the Egyptian pilgrims going to Mecca. Nothing remains of it now but a tower, the reſidence of a governor, who is under the governor of Cairo. Some ſuppoſe it to be the ancient Elath mentioned in the Scriptures. Long. 35. 40. E. Lat. 29. 10. N.

AILESBURY, AYLESBURY, or ALESBURY, a borough town, in Buckinghamſhire, conſiſting of about four hundred houſes. It conſiſts of ſeveral ſtreets, though the houſes are not very contiguous; theſe lie round about the market-place, in the middle whereof is a very convenient hall, where the ſeſſions are held, and ſometimes the aſſizes for the county. It ſends two members to parliament, has a market on Saturdays, and three fairs for cattle, viz. on the Saturday before Palm-ſunday, June 14, and September 25. It is ſixty miles ſouth-eaſt of Buckingham, and forty-four north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 40. W. Lat. 51. 40. N.

AILLY (PETER D') born at Compiegne, in Picardy, in 1350, of poor parents, who, however, gave him a good education. He was firſt penſioner of the college of Navarre, at Paris, then doctor of the Sorbonne, at length chancellor of the univerſity, confeſſor and almoner to Charles VI. biſhop of Puy, and at laſt biſhop of Cambray and cardinal. He preached at Genoa, in 1405, in ſo moving a manner, on the myſtery of the Trinity, that pope Benedict XIII. was ſo affected by his ſermon, that he inſtituted the feaſt of the Trinity. He was one of the moſt learned biſhops at the councils of Piſa and Conſtance. His greateſt blemiſhes were, that he condemned John Hus to death, and his weakneſs with regard to judicial aſtrology. He died at Avignon, where he was legate for Martin V. on the 8th of Auguſt, 1419. The moſt valuable of his works is a Treatiſe on the Reformation of the Church.

AILMER, or ÆTHELMERE, earl of Cornwall and Devonſhire, founded the abbey of Cerne in Dorſetſhire, that of Eyneſham in Oxfordſhire, and the priory of Bruton in Somerſetſhire; but when Suene, king of Denmark, in 1013, over-ran the greateſt part of England, he meanly left king Ethelred, ſubmitted himſelf to the conqueror, and gave him hoſtages; and when Canute, the ſon of Suene, invaded England, and was bravely oppoſed by Edmund Ironſide, the ſon of Ethelred, this earl, with ſeveral others, joined the Danes againſt their natural prince, and by this means principally occaſioned the ruin of the Saxons. He however died ſoon after; and his ſon Æthelward, earl of Cornwall, following his father's example, Canute, who had reaped the benefit of their treaſons, finding him no longer uſeful, cauſed him to be put to death.

AILRED, ÆLRED, or ETHELRED. See ETHELRED.

AILSHAM, ALESHAM, or ALYSHAM, a town, in Norfolk, of three furlongs in length, with a market on Saturdays. It is chiefly inhabited by knitters of ſtockings. It is twelve miles north-eaſt of Norwich, ten miles ſouth of Cromer, and fifty-ſix north of London. Long. 0. 30. E. Lat. 52. 53.

AINSWORTH (Dr. HENRY) an eminent nonconformiſt divine, who, about the year 1590, diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the Browniſts, which drew upon him ſuch troubles, that he was obliged to retire to Holland, and became miniſter of a church at Amſterdam. His ſkill in the Hebrew language, and his excellent Annotations on the Holy Scriptures, which are ſtill highly eſteemed, gained him great reputation. He alſo wrote ſeveral pieces in defence of the Browniſts, and ſeveral other works.

AIRAY (Dr. HENRY) provoſt of Queen's College, in Oxford, and vice-chancellor of that univerſity, flouriſhed at the end of the ſixteenth and the beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries. He was a zealous Calviniſt, and a great ſupporter of thoſe of his party. He wrote Lectures upon St. Paul's Epiſtle to the Philippians, a Treatiſe againſt bowing at the Name of Jeſus, and died in 1616, aged fifty-ſeven.

AIRAY (CHRISTOPHER) vicar of Milford, in Hampſhire, was born at Clifton, in Weſtmoreland, and educated in Queen's College, Oxford. He wrote, in Latin, a Collection of the Rules of Logic, and ſome other pieces. He died on the 18th of October, 1670.

AIRAULT (PETER) in Latin, Ærodius, lieutenant-criminal in the preſidial of Angers, was born there in the year 1536, and executed that office in ſuch a manner as to obtain the title of the "Rock of the accuſed." He publiſhed, 1. The Declamations of Quintilian, which he illuſtrated with notes. 2. A Treatiſe concerning the Power of Redemption, written by Francis Grimaudet, to which he wrote a Preface on the Nature, Variety, and Change of Laws. 3. An Account of Decrees and Caſes that have been adjudged amongſt divers Nations from all Antiquity. 4. A Treatiſe upon the Power of Fathers; and ſome others. He died, at Angiers, July 21. 1601, aged ſixty-five years, leaving ten children. See the next article.

AIRAULT (RENE) eldeſt ſon of the former, was the occaſion of great trouble to his father. He was born at Paris, Nov. 11, 1567. Peter Airault, in order for his education, put him under the care of the Jeſuits, and perceiving that he had a lively genius, a ſtrong memory, and other excellent qualifications, very earneſtly deſired both the provincial of that order and the rector of the college not to ſolicit him to enter into their ſociety, which they readily promiſed, but ſoon broke their word; and, though he made the greateſt intereſt, and even got the king of France and the pope on his ſide, he could never get him out of their hands. This was the reaſon which induced him to write on the power of fathers. Rene Airault died, at La Fleche, December 18, 1644.

AIRE, the chief town of the ſhire of Aire, in Scotland ſtands near the mouth of a river of its own name. It drives ſeveral mills in the middle of the new town, which is joined to the old town by a bridge of four arches. It is the chief market town in the weſt of Scotland, next to Glaſgow. It ſtands in the midſt of a ſandy plain, ſurrounded with fields ſufficiently fruitful. It has a handſome church, and is the ſeat of a preſbytery to which twenty-eight pariſhes belong. Long. 4. 42. E. Lat. 55. 30. N. It is ſixty-four miles weſt of Edinburgh.

AIRE, a city of France, in Proper Gaſcony, of which it is the capital, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Adour, on the declivity of a mountain, thirty-ſeven miles weſt of Condom. Long. 0. 3. E. Lat. 43. 47. N.

AIRE, a fortified town, in the Low Countries, upon the river Lis, which divides it into two unequal parts. It is not very large, but may contain near five thouſand ſouls. It has three land gates and two water gates. It has three ſquares, of which that of Notre Dame is the largeſt, but it is not very regular. The others are St. Pierre and that of Cazernes. The ſtreets are but indifferent. The caſtle is almoſt all contained within the walls of the city, and is of a ſquare form with ſeven towers. On the ſide of the city is a foſſe, or ditch, full of water. The town is of a very irregular figure, and is flanked with eight baſtions. It is covered by fort St. Francis, which has five baſtions more. The great church was very magnificent till it was damaged by the bombs in 1710, when it was taken by the duke of Marlborough. There are here ſeveral convents for men and women, among which is an Engliſh nunnery. The Jeſuits church is worth obſervation. This town was given up to France by the treaty of Utrecht. It is twenty-five miles weſt of Liſle, twenty-five north-weſt of Arras, and thirty ſouth-eaſt of Calais. It communicates with St. Omer's by a canal, and the diſtance is two hours ſail. Long. 2. 31. E. Lat. 50. 38. N.

AISNE, a river of France, which riſes and unites with the Oiſe a little above Compiegne.

AISTULPHUS, the twenty-ſecond king of the Lombards, ſucceeded his brother Rachid, who retired into a monaſtery, A. D. 750. The emperors of Conſtantinople had then loſt all they formerly poſſeſſed in Italy, except the exarchate of Ravenna, and this, with its duchy, Aiſtulphus took; but pope Stephen III. being diſpleaſed at ſeeing Ravenna in the hands of the Lombards, went to Aiſtulphus, and deſired him to reſtore it to the emperor, but meeting with a refuſal, he went into France, and perſuaded king Pepin to take the exarchate and Pentapolis from the Lombards, and, inſtead of returning it to the emperor, to give it to St. Peter. Upon this, Aiſtulphus endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of Rome; but Pepin, after ſending ambaſſadors to deſire him to deſiſt, and to give the cities he had taken to the pope, marched into Italy with all his forces, defeated Aiſtulphus's army, laid waſte his dominions, and obliged that prince to promiſe never to give the pope the leaſt diſturbance, to give up whatever he claimed as belonging to the church, and never to recede from the allegiance he owed to France. Aiſtulphus, however, ſoon forgot his promiſes, and reſolving to be revenged, again laid ſiege to Rome, when Pepin once more raiſed the ſiege, beſieged the Lombards in Pavia, their capital city, and forced Aiſtulphus to ſurrender the exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis to the pope for a perpetual ſucceſſion; and the keys were ſent to Rome, and laid on St. Peter's tomb, as a token of a real and perpetual dominion. Aiſtulphus, however, intended to take theſe cities again, but was, the next year, prevented by death, he being killed by a fall from his horſe, A. D. 756.

AITZEMA (Leo d') a gentleman of Friſeland, born at Dockum, in the year 1600, was made counſellor to the Hans towns, and their reſident at the Hague. He compiled an Hiſtory of the United Provinces, was well verſed in ſeveral languages, and was a man of great probity, good nature, and affability. He died Febrvary 23, 1669.

AIX, a ſmall, but ancient town, in the duchy of Savoy, with the title of a marquiſate, It is ſeated on the lake Bourget, at the foot of a mountain, between Chamberry, Annecy, and Rumilly. There is here a triumphal arch of the ancient Romans, but it is almoſt entirely ruined. Its mineral waters bring a great number of ſtrangers to this place. Long. 7. 10 E. Lat. 45. 40. N.

Aix, an ancient city, the capital of Provence, in France. It is an archbiſhopric, and has a parliament, a court of aids, a chamber of accounts, a ſeneſchal's juriſdiction, a generality, and an univerſity It has not a very agreeable aſpect on the outſide, but is a very beautiful city within, it being well built, and moſt like Paris of any place in the kingdom, as well in the largeneſs of the buildings as in the politeneſs of the inhabitants. It is embelliſhed with abundance of fine fountains and ſeveral beautiful ſquares.

The place of reſort, called the Cours d'Orbitelle, is very agreeable, and is the place where the citizens take the air, like St. James's Park in London. It is planted with four rows of trees, which form three viſtas, or walks, about four hundred yards long; and on each ſide, are beautiful uniform houſes, all of hewn ſtone, adorned with ſculptures and balconies. In the middle walk, are four baſons, and as many agreeable fountains, which conſtantly throw up water; they are of different figures, and variouſly adorned. You may enter the city through eight or nine different gates, and the ſtreets in general are well built and paved, but very dirty. The Preachers Square is on the ſide of a hill; it is about one hundred and ſixty yards in length, and is ſurrounded with trees and houſes, built with ſtone, three ſtories high. The town-hall is at one end of the city, and is diſtributed into ſeveral fine apartments; the two loweſt of which are taken up by the board of accounts, and by the ſeneſchal; that above is deſigned for the ſeſſions of parliament. The hall of audience is adorned with the pictures of the kings of France on horſeback.

The hotel of the city is a pretty handſome building, but unfortunately hid by the houſes of the narrow ſtreet in which it is placed. The cathedral church is a Gothic ſtructure, the front of which is adorned with ſmall figures of the prophets, apoſtles, and ſaints, placed in no manner of order, and wretchedly done. The church of the fathers of the oratory is a handſome building; and not far from thence is the chapel of the blue penitents, which is full of paintings and gildings. The principal thing in that of the white penitents is a painting in an oval, whoſe longeſt diameter is thirty-two feet, and repreſents the reſurrection. The convent of the preachers is very fine: in their church is a ſilver ſtatue of the Virgin Mary almoſt as big as the life. From the library of this church, you have one of the fineſt and moſt extenſive views in this province; the hills appear covered with olive-trees and vineyards; the plains and valleys diverſified with fields and meadows always green, beautified with brooks and rivulets, and bordered with trees which yield an agreeable verdure more than one half of the year. There are other churches and buildings, which contain a great number of rarities, which we are obliged to paſs over in ſilence. The baths without the city, which were diſcovered not long ſince, have good buildings, raiſed at a vaſt expence, for the accommodation of thoſe that drink the waters. Long. 5. 32. E. Lat. 43. 32. N.

Aix, a ſmall iſland on the coaſt of France, between the iſle of Oleron and the continent. It is only memorable for an inglorious expedition of the Engliſh in 1758, when they were bound to Rochfort, with a deſign of taking or burning the ſhips and ſtores in the river on which that town is ſeated, but returned without doing any thing, except demoliſhing the fort of this iſland. It is twelve miles north-weſt of Rochfort, and twelve ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Rochelle. Long. 1. 5. W. Lat. 46. 5. N.

Aix la Chapelle, a fine city of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and duchy of Juliers. All authors are agreed about its antiquity, it being mentioned in Cæſar's Commentaries and the Annals of Tacitus; the Romans had colonies and fortreſſes there, when they were at war with the Germans; but the mineral waters and the hot bath ſo increaſed its fame, that, in proceſs of time, it was advanced to the privileges of a city, by the name of Aquægranii, that is, the waters of Granius; that which it has now, of Aix la Chapelle, was given it by the French, to diſtinguiſh it from other town of the ſame name. It is ſo called, on account of a chapel built by Charlemagne in honour of the Holy Virgin. He having repaired, beautified, and enlarged the city, that was deſtroyed by the Huns, in the reign of Attila, in 451, he made it the moſt common place of his reſidence. There being a great number of reliques in the church of Notre Dame, it is greatly frequented by pilgrims on that account.

The town is ſeated in a valley ſurrounded with mountains and woods, and yet the air is very wholeſome. It may be divided into the inward and outward city: the inward is encompaſſed with a wall about three-quarters of a league in circumference, having ten gates; and the outward wall is about a league and a half in circumference, in which there are eleven gates. There are rivulets, which run through the town and keep it very clean, turning ſeveral mills; beſides twenty public fountains, and many private ones. They have ſtone-quarries in the neighbourhood, which furniſh the inhabitants with proper materials for their magnificent buildings. of which the ſtadt-houſe and cathedral are the chief. There are likewiſe thirty parochial or collegiate churches.

The market-place is very ſpacious, and the houſes round it very ſtately. In the middle, before the ſtadt-houſe, is a fountain of blue ſtones, which throws out water, from ſix pipes, into a marble baſon placed beneath, thirty feet in circumference. On the top of this fountain, is placed the ſtatue of Charlemagne, of braſs gilt, holding a ſceptre in his right hand, and a globe in his left. The ſtadt houſe is adorned with the ſtatues of all the emperors ſince Charlemagne. This fabric has three ſtories, the upper of which is one entire room, of one hundred and ſixty-two feet in length, and ſixty in breadth. In this, the new-elected emperor formerly entertained all the electors of the empire. On each ſide, there is a tower raiſed pretty high, and ornamented with ſculptures and figures.

Aix la Chapelle is a free imperial city, and changes its magiſtracy every year on the eve of St. John Baptiſt. The mayor is in the nomination of the elector palatine, in the quality of the duke of Juliers, as protector of the city. This place is famous for ſeveral councils and treaties of peace concluded here, particularly thoſe between France and Spain in 1668, and between Great Britain and France in 1748. The baths have been frequented for ſeveral centuries, of which ſome are hot and ſome are warm; the principal are called the Emperor's Bath, the Bath of St. Cornille, the Bath of Roſes, the Bath of St. Quirin, the Little Bath, and the Bath of the Poor, beſides ſeveral others. The Emperor's Bath has the name of Charlemagne, who repaired it, and bathed very often in its waters: it is the fineſt and moſt commodious. The Little Bath receives its waters from the Emperor's Bath, and contains three bathing-places. That of St. Quirin has particular ſprings, but its virtues are the ſame as the former. The Bath of St. Cornille is ſo called from the ſign of the houſe where it is ſeated: it is only warm, and is divided into five different baths. The Bath of Roſes is ſo called from a citizen named John Roſen, who built it. The Poor's Bath is free for every one, and is frequented by crouds of poor people. The men bathe in diſtinct baths from the women, and even private baths are to be had for money.

There are two ſprings in the lower part of the city, over one of which there is the ſtatue of the Virgin Mary, and over the other that of Charlemagne. Theſe are for drinking; and there are two pumps to raiſe up the water. There are ſeveral galleries or piazzas, under which they walk during the time of drinking, to make them paſs more freely. It is but about a hundred years ſince theſe waters were firſt taken inwardly; and this was owing to a French phyſician, who wrote a treatiſe on the virtues of theſe waters.

About a quarter of a league from Aix, ſtands the abbey of Borzet, or Burſcheit, which is a very magnificent pile of building. It was formerly a monaſtery, but ſerves for a nunnery, whoſe abbeſs is a princeſs of the empire, and lady of Borzet. The baths here are much hotter than at Aix la Chapelle; and ſome of them are ſo hot, that they will boil eggs, which is frequently done by poor people; and if you throw in a dog, he will be killed in an inſtant. Therefore, here, as at Aix, the water muſt ſtand till it is of a proper coolneſs. You may bathe here at fourteen different houſes; and there is likewiſe one open bath, where the poor may bathe gratis. Near this place are ſeveral mines of lead, coal, vitriol, and lapis calaminaris.

The time of drinking the waters, in the firſt ſeaſon, is from the beginning of May to the middle of June; and, in the latter ſeaſon, from the middle of Auguſt to the latter end of September. They are ſaid to be efficacious in almoſt all tedious chronic diſeaſes, whether internal or of the ſkin, particularly in all diſorders of the nerves, or in all cold diſeaſes, and inward decays. We need not to mention, that there are all kinds of amuſements common to other places of public reſort; but the ſharpers appear more ſplendid here than elſewhere, aſſuming titles with an equipage ſuitable

AKAKIA (MARTIN) profeſſor of phyſic in the univerſity of Paris, was born at Chalons, in Champagne. He was named Sans Malice, i. e. Without Malice; but, according to the cuſtom of that age, he changed it to Akakia, a Greek word of the ſame meaning. He publiſhed a Latin tranſlation of two books of Galen, De Ratione Curandi, i. e. Of the Method of Curing, and illuſtrated it with a commentary: he alſo tranſlated Galen's Ars Medica. He died in 1551.

AKAKIA (MARTIN) a Pariſian, ſon to the former, and ſecond phyſician to Henry III. He wrote a Treatiſe de Moribus Mulieribus, and Conſilia Medica, which were not publiſhed till after his death, which happened in 1588.

AKIBA, a famous rabbin, flouriſhed a little after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Titus. He kept the flocks of a rich citizen of Jeruſalem till the fortieth year of his age, and then applied himſelf to ſtudy in the academies for twenty-four years, and was afterwards one of the greateſt maſters in Iſrael, he having twenty-four thouſand ſcholars. He declared for the impoſtor Barcochebas, whom he owned for the Meſſiah, and not only anointed him king, but took upon himſelf the office of his maſter of the horſe; but the troops ſent by the emperor Adrian having exterminated this faction, Akiba was taken, and after having his fleſh torn and mangled with iron combs, was burnt to death with a ſlow fire.

AKISSAT, the ancient Thyatira, a city, in Natolia, in Aſia, ſituated in a plain eighteen miles broad, that produces plenty of cotton and grain. The inhabitants, who are reckoned to be about five thouſand, are ſaid to be all Mahommedans, and not one Chriſtian among them, except a few ſlaves. The houſes are built of nothing but earth or turf dried in the ſun, and are very low and ill contrived. There are ſix or ſeven moſques, which are all of marble. They are in no want of water, for there are brooks which run through ſeveral of the ſtreets; and the city is well furniſhed with common proviſions. There are remarkable inſcriptions on marble in ſeveral parts of the town, which are part of the ruins of ancient Thyatira. It is ſeated on the river Hermes, fifty miles from Pergamos. Long. 28. 30. E. Lat. 38. 50. N.

ALABASTER (WILLIAM) an Engliſh divine, born at Hadley, in the county of Suffolk. He was one of the doctors in Trinity-college, in Cambridge, but turned to the Roman communion; however, being ſoon diſſatisfied with his new religion, he again became a Proteſtant, and obtained a prebend in the cathedral of St. Paul, and after that, the rectory of Therfield, in Hertfordſhire. He was well ſkilled in the Hebrew tongue, and was ſtrangely infatuated with the Caballa. He gave a proof of his fondneſs for myſtical interpretations in the ſermon he preached at his taking the degree of doctor of divinity, when he took for his text the words "Adam, Seth, Enos," and endeavoured to prove that each of theſe words contained a hidden myſtery. He wrote a Latin tragedy, intitled Roxana, which, when it was acted, in a college at Cambridge, was attended with a remarkable circumſtance; for a lady was ſo terrified at the laſt words, Sequar, ſequar, which were pronounced in a very ſhocking tone, that, it is ſaid, ſhe loſt her ſenſes, and never again recovered them. He wrote a Hebrew Lexicon in folio, and ſeveral other works. He was living in 1630.

ALADULIA, a conſiderable province of Turky in Aſia, in that part called Natolia, between the mountains of Antitaurus, which ſeparates it from Amaſia on the north, and from Carimania on the weſt. It has the Mediterranean Sea on the ſouth; and the Euphrates, or Frat, on the eaſt, divides it from Diarbeker. It comprehends the Leſſer Armenia of the ancients and the eaſt part of Cilicia. Formerly it had kings of its own; but the head of the laſt king was cut off by Selim I. emperor of the Turks, who had conquered the country. It is now divided into two parts: the north, comprehended between Taurus, Antitaurus, and the Euphrates; is a beglerbeglic, which bears the name of Maraſh, the capital town: and the ſouth, ſeated between mount Taurus and the Mediterranean, is united to the beglerbeglic of Aleppo. The country is rough, ragged, and mountainous; and yet there are good paſtures, and plenty of horſes and camels. The people are hardy and thieviſh. The capital is Malatigah.

ALAGNON, one of the principal rivers in the government of Auvergne, in France, which riſes at Cantal, and is very rapid; it runs into the Allier.

ALAIS, a town, in Languedoc, ſeated on the river Gardon, is a pretty large, populous, trading city, and has ſeven gates. Its cathedral is but mean, though it has a portico in the Gothic taſte, on which the ſteeple is raiſed, underneath which is the principal gate of the church. The Jeſuits had a college in this place; and a fort was built here in 1689. Underneath is a large terraſs, which is ſupported by a wall, or parapet, and ſerves for a walk for the better ſort of people. The meadows, which take up about a league of land, are the moſt pleaſant part about this city. Long. 4. 20. E. Lat. 44. 8. N. It is thirty-four miles north of Montpellier, and three hundred and forty from Paris.

ALAIN DE L'ISLE, in Latin, Alanus de Inſulis, a learned divine of the univerſity of Paris, ſurnamed the Univerſal Doctor, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his works, which were printed, in 1653, in folio. He died in 1294.

ALAIN CHARTIER, or CHARRITIER, ſecretary to Charles VII. king of France, was born in the year 1386. He was famous for ſeveral works, both in proſe and verſe; but his moſt conſiderable performance was his Chronicle of King Charles VII. It is ſaid, that Margaret, daughter to the king of Scotland, and wife to the dauphin, who was afterwards Lewis XI. paſſing once through a hall, where Alain Chartier lay aſleep upon a bench, ſhe went and kiſſed his lips before all the company that attended her; when ſome of them telling her, that it was ſtrange ſhe ſhould be induced to kiſs a man who had ſo few perſonal charms, ſhe replied, "I did not kiſs the man, but that mouth "from whence have proceeded ſo many excellent ſay-"ings, ſo many wiſe diſcourſes, and ſo many elegant ex-"preſſions."

ALAKAMARE, the firſt king of Granada, in Spain, aſcended the throne in 1237. His ſucceſſors reigned two hundred and fifty-five years, till the Moors were expelled by Ferdinand and Iſabella, in 1492.

ALAMANDUS, in French, Aleman, (LEWIS) commonly called the Cardinal of Arles, was one of the greateſt men in the fifteenth century. He was archbiſhop of Arles, and cardinal of St. Cecilia. He preſided at the council of Baſil, which depoſed Eugenius IV. and elected the antipope Felix V. He was formed to preſide in public aſſemblies, being firm, active, and learned, and, by his admirable memory, was able to recapitulate all that the orators and diſputants had ſaid; but, what is ſtill more to his honour, though the plague raged in that city, neither the death of part of his domeſtics, nor the entreaties of others, could prevail on him to leave it. It is not, however, to be wondered at, that pope Eugenius thundered againſt the preſident of a council that depoſed him; but, though he deprived him of all his dignities, and treated him as a ſon of iniquity, he was, after his death in 1450, beatified by pope Clement VII. in the year 1527.

ALAMANNI (NICHOLAS) a learned man of the ſeventeenth century, became eminent for the ſtrength of his genius and the integrity of his manners. He was ſecretary to cardinal Borgheſe, and afterwards keeper of the Vatican library. He publiſhed the Hiſtory of Procopius, and a Deſcription of St. John de Lateran.

ALAMMANNI (LEWIS) was born, at Florence, of a noble family, on the 28th of October, 1495. He was obliged to fly his country for a conſpiracy againſt Julius de Medici, who was ſoon after choſen pope under the name of Clement VII. During this voluntary baniſhment, he went into France, where Francis I. became his patron; but Clement dying, he returned into Italy, became a member of the academy of the Infiammati, then newly eſtabliſhed at Padua, and was afterwards ſent ambaſſador to Charles V. In this embaſſy there was a remarkable circumſtance, which we cannot forbear relating. Among ſeveral poems he had compoſed in praiſe of Francis I. there was a ſmart piece againſt the emperor, in which, among other ſatyrical ſtrokes, there was one in which the cock ſaid to the eagle,

——— Aquila grifagna
Che per piu divorar due becchi porta.

That is,

Two crooked bills the ravenous eagle bears,
The better to devour.

The emperor had read that piece, and when Alamanni appeared before him, and pronounced a fine diſcourſe in his praiſe, the emperor, who had heard him very attentively, gave him no other anſwer but the above verſes. Alamanni, without being in the leaſt out of countenance, immediately anſwered, "Sire, ſince your majeſty has ſeen thoſe verſes, I "will not diſown them; but when I made them, I ſpoke "as a poet, who is permitted to make uſe of fiction; but "now I ſpeak as an ambaſſador, who is obliged to tell the "truth: I ſpoke them as a young ſpark; but now I ſpeak "as an old man: I was then ſwayed by paſſion, and the "rage with which the deſolate condition of my country "inſpired me; but now I am free from paſſion." The emperor was ſo pleaſed with this anſwer, that he told Alamanni, he ought not to grieve at his baniſhment, ſince he had found a protector like the king of France; but that Florence ſhould rather be afflicted at the loſs of ſo valuable a ſubject as he was. Alamanni died, at Amboiſe, in France, April 18, 1556.

ALAMOS (BALTHAZAR) was born at Medina del Campo, in Caſtile. He entered into the ſervice of Anthony Perez, ſecretary of ſtate under Philip II. king of Spain; and having a great ſhare in the confidence of that miniſter, was, upon his diſgrace, thrown in priſon, where he continued eleven years, during which time he wrote a Spaniſh tranſlation of Tacitus, which he publiſhed at Madrid in 1614; but, on Philip III's coming to the throne, he was ſet at liberty, and, in the reign of Philip IV. was made council of the king's patrimony. He left ſeveral other works, which have never been printed.

ALAN (OF LYNN) in Latin, Alanus de Lynna, a famous divine, who flouriſhed about the year 1420, was born at Lynn, in Norfolk, and was particularly famous for the great pains he took in writing indexes to moſt of the books he read. He wrote ſeveral other works, particularly, Moralia Bibliorum, i. e. The Morality of the Scriptures.

ALAN, ALLEN, ALLYN, (WILLIAM) cardinal prieſt of the Romiſh church, was born at Roſſal, in Lancaſhire, in the year 1352. In 1558, he was a canon of York; but, on queen Elizabeth's coming to the crown, he withdrew to Louvain, in the Spaniſh Netherlands, where he wrote many books in defence of the Romiſh religion; but the moſt famous of all his pieces was a work in two parts, the firſt explaining the pope's bull for the excommunication and deprivation of queen Elizabeth, the ſecond exhorting the nobility and people of England to deſert her and take up arms in favour of the Spaniards. He died, at Rome, October 6, 1594.

ALANDT, an iſland in the Baltic Sea, between Sweden and Finland. The fortreſs of Caſtleholm is the only conſiderable place upon it. It belongs to Sweden.

ALANTEJO, a province in Portugal, is ſo called from a word which ſignifies beyond the Tajo, or Tagus, becauſe it is beyond that river with regard to Liſbon. It is bounded on the eaſt by Andaluſia and Spaniſh Eſtramadura, on the north and north-eaſt by Portugueſe Eſtramadura, on the weſt by the ocean, and on the ſouth by the kingdom of Algarve. It is about thirty-ſix leagues in length, and almoſt as much in breadth, comprehending almoſt all that ſpace which lies between the Tajo and the Guadiana, and a ſmall part of the country lying beyond this laſt river, where it is ſeparated from Andaluſia by the river Chanca. This province is watered by a great number of ſmall rivers, or brooks, the principal of which is the Zadoan, which, riſing in the mountains of Algarve, runs from ſouth to north, and falls into the ſea a little above Settuval. The others are, Exarrhama, which runs to Ebora, then to Viana, and falls into the Zadoan; Campilhas, which enters into the ſame river; Canha, which paſſes from mount Moro Nova, and falls into the Tajo near Benevavento; Ojor and Avis fall into the Soro, and Taye into the Guadiana, between Elvas and Badajos. All theſe rivers are very inconſiderable, and moſt of them dry up in the ſummer ſeaſon. Alantejo is divided into ſix territories, Portalegre, Elvas, Eſtremos, Ebora, and Beja. It is a very fruitful country, and the inhabitants are very induſtrious.

ALARIC, or ALRIC, king of the Swedes, lived about the time of Julius Cæſar. Being choſen by the noblemen of Sweden, without waiting for the conſent of the Goths, the latter thought themſelves ſlighted, and choſe a king for themſelves, named Geſtill, or Geſtilblind, who entered into an alliance with Roller, king of Norway, Alaric's uncle. Alaric governed his ſubjects with juſtice and moderation, endeavouring to deſerve the title of the father of his country, ſtriving at the ſame time to ſoften the hearts of the Goths, who were exaſperated againſt him; but finding their hatred was not to be eradicated, and that his own uncle had entered into an alliance with Geſtill, he forgot his former mildneſs, and overloaded his ſubjects with new and intolerable taxes. Roller, though he did not chuſe to aſſiſt Geſtill in perſon, ſent him an army under the command of Eric his brother; on which Alaric advanced to meet the forces of the allies; when, inſtead of entering into a general engagement, he choſe to fight with Eric in ſingle combat, and had the misfortune to be killed. Eric himſelf was much wounded; but recovering, was, after the death of Geſtill, made king of Sweden and Gothland.

ALARIC, or ALVER, the ſon of Dager, was raiſed to the throne of Sweden after the death of his father. He ſent to the Ruſſians, whom he had already vanquiſhed before he came to the throne, to demand the tribute they had promiſed to pay the Swedes; but they treacherouſly killing his commiſſioners, he raiſed a powerful army to puniſh them. When they were ready to engage, Hildegern, one of his principal officers, deſired leave to challenge the ſtrongeſt and braveſt man among the Ruſſians at ſingle combat. His requeſt was granted; and, to his great grief and amazement, Haldan, his own brother, was ſent againſt him. Hildegern, who knew his brother, though he was not known to him, now did all he could to wave the combat without diſcovering himſelf, by pretending that he was yet too young, and would be too eaſy a match for him; but Haldan having given him ſeveral proofs of his courage and ſkill in fighting, Hildigern was at laſt obliged to engage him, and having received a mortal wound, he let him know that he was his brother. Haldan, aſtoniſhed and overwhelmed with grief, lamented over him, reproached him for not diſcovering himſelf ſooner, and ſuffering him to become a wretched fratricide, aſſuring him, that he would have ſpent the laſt drop of his blood to ſave his life, and that he ſhould lament him as long as he lived; while Hildigern only pleaded, that he did not diſcover himſelf, leſt he ſhould be thought to have made that a pretence for declining the combat, and then expired.

Alaric, notwithſtanding his champion had been killed, engaged in battle againſt the Ruſſians, and gaining a complete victory, they could no longer refuſe to pay tribute to the Swedes; on which Alaric returned triumphant into his kingdom, and paſſed the remainder of his life in peace.

ALARIC I. king of the Goths, one of the greateſt ſcourges of the Roman empire, laid waſte many provinces in the eaſt, and afterwards marching into Italy, took the city of Rome, depoſed the emperor Honorius, and made Attalus, who was governor of the city, emperor in his ſtead; but ſome time after, making a peace with Honorius, he reſtored him to his former dignity: but this peace did not laſt long; for one Sarus, an ambitious general, being exaſperated againſt Atulphus, Alaric's brother-in-law, attacked the Goths. To revenge this injury, Alaric returned to Rome, took the city, and permitted his ſoldiers to plunder it, giving, however, ſtrict orders, that thoſe who fled for ſanctuary into the churches ſhould there be ſecure. This happened A. D. 409. After this, Alaric beſieged and took the city of Coſenza, and died there in the year 411.

ALARIC II. king of the Viſigoths, reigned twenty-three years, and was killed in battle by Clovis, in 507.

ALAVA (DIEGO ESQUIEL DE) a famous Spaniſh biſhop, born at Vittoria, a city, in the country of Alava, in the province of Biſcay, in Spain. He aſſiſted in the council of Trent, and wrote a learned work, entitled De Conſiliis Univerſalibus, &c. i. e. Of General Councils, and the Regulations that ſeem neceſſary to reform the Religion and State of the Chriſtians. He died March 17, 1562.

ALBA, a town of Italy, in Montferrat, with a biſhop's ſee. It was ceded, by the treaty of Quieraſque, to the duke of Savoy, in 1631, and is ſeated on the banks of the river Tanaro, twelve miles ſouth-eaſt of Aſti, twenty ſouth-eaſt of Turin, and twenty miles north-eaſt of Acqui. Long. 8. 15. E. Lat. 44 36. N.

ALBA JULIA, a ſtrong and conſiderable town of Tranſylvania, in the county of Weiſſenburg, with a biſhop's ſee. It was formerly the place of reſidence of the princes of Tranſylvania. The governor reſides here; and the caſtle is fortified after the modern taſte. It is one hundred and twenty miles north-eaſt of Belgrade. Long. 22. 30. E. Lat. 46. 30. N.

ALBAN (ST.) was born at Verulam, now St. Alban's, of Pagan parents, but was converted to Chriſtianity by Amphibalus, a monk of Caer-Leon, and is famous for being the firſt Chriſtian who ſuffered martyrdom in this iſland. He was beheaded during the tenth and laſt general perſecution, A. D. 303. In his way to execution, it is ſaid, that he was ſtopped by a river, over which was a bridge ſo thronged with ſpectators, that it was impoſſible to croſs it, when the ſaint approaching the brink, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, the ſtream miraculouſly divided, and afforded a paſſage for himſelf and a thouſand perſons. This miracle converted the executioner upon the ſpot, who threw away his drawn ſword, and falling at St. Alban's feet, deſired he might have the honour to die with him, or rather for him. This ſudden converſion of the headſman occaſioning a delay in the execution, St. Alban went up to a neighbouring hill, where, praying for water to quench his thirſt, a fountain ſprung up under his feet. Here he received the crown of martyrdom; but the inſtant the ſtroke was given, the legend ſays, the executioner's eyes dropped out of his head.

ALBANI, in Roman antiquity, a college of the prieſts of Mars, ſo called from Albanus, the place where it was ſituated.

ALBANI (FRANCIS) a celebrated painter, born at Bologna, March 17, 1578. It is remarkable, that he owed much of his reputation to his ſecond wife, a woman of great beauty, by whom he drew his Venuſes, Nymphs, and Graces; and ſhe bringing him ſeveral lovely children, who were alſo finely proportioned, they were his models for his little Cupids. He delighted much in drawing the fair ſex, whom he repreſented with wonderful beauty. He excelled in all parts of painting; but his ſmall pieces were particularly admired, and his compoſitions on love-ſubjects were eagerly ſought after. He died October 4, 1660, aged eighty-two.

ALBANI (JOHN JEROME) a learned civilian, well verſed in the belles lettres, was born at Bergamo, and was made cardinal, after the death of his wife, in 1570. He wrote the following works, 1. De Immunitate Eccleſiarum. 2. De Poteſtate Papæ & Concilii. 3. De Cardinalibus, &c. and died in 1591.

ALBANIA, a province of Turky in Europe, on the gulph of Venice, bounded by Livadia on the ſouth, by Theſſaly and Macedonia on the eaſt, and on the north by Boſnia and Dalmatia. The people are ſtrong, large, courageous, and good horſemen: the grand ſeignor procures excellent ſoldiers from hence, particularly cavalry, known by the name of Arnauts. There are ſeveral large towns in this province; and the inhabitants are almoſt all Chriſtians of the Greek church. Formerly it was part of the kingdom of Macedonia. Their chief manufacture is carpets. The principal places are Durazzo, Velona, Antivari, Scutari, Croya, Aleſſo, Dibra, Dolcigno, and Albanopoli. Long. from 28. to 31. E. Lat. from 39. to 43. 30. N.

ALBANO, a town in Italy, upon a lake of the ſame name, in the Compagna di Roma. It is a biſhop's ſee, is pretty populous, and its territory produces the beſt wine in all thoſe parts. Moſt of the Roman lords have vineyards or gardens here, where they paſs the fine ſeaſon of the year. It is ſixteen miles ſouth-eaſt from Rome. Long. 13. 10. E. Lat. 41. 43. N.

ALBANOPOLI, a town of Turky in Europe, in the province of Albania, of which it was formerly the capital. It is ſeated on the river Drin, in the centre of the province, forty miles eaſt of Aleſſio, and 43 north of Guaſtandil. Long. 20. 42. E. Lat. 41. 48. N.

ALBANS (ST.) a market-town, in Hertfordſhire, governed by a mayor, a high ſteward, a recorder, ten aldermen or burgeſſes, a town-clerk, and twenty-four aſſiſtants. It is a very great thoroughfare, accommodated with good inns, on the north-weſt road from London, at the diſtance of twenty-one miles. It is divided into four wards, and contains four pariſh churches. Here are two charity-ſchools; one for twenty-four boys, all clothed; and another for twenty-one girls, of whom fourteen only are cloathed. Some alms-houſes were built here by John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, who alſo erected a ſeat here, upon the river Ver, which runs through the gardens. This town ſends two members to parliament, and has one of the beſt markets for wheat in England.

St. Alban's is ſeated near the ruins of an ancient Roman city, by Tacitus called Verulam, and by the Saxons Watlingceſter, becauſe it is ſeated on the road called Watling-ſtreet. Nothing now remains of Verulam, but the ruins of old walls, in the fields adjacent to which they continue to find Roman coins, as they formerly have teſſellated pavements. In memory of St. Alban, Offa, king of the Mercians, anno 795, erected an abbey, calling it St. Alban's; and near it the town of the ſame name was afterwards built. The church of the abbey is remaining to this day: time and the weather have made it look like ſtone on the outſide; but if you break a bit off, the redneſs of the brick immediately appears. When the monaſteries were diſſolved, the townſmen paid four hundred pounds to prevent its being levelled with the ground, and have ſince converted it into a pariſh-church, which, for its largeneſs, beauty, and antiquity claims a particular regard. It had a very noble font of ſolid braſs, in which the children of the kings of Scotland were uſed to be baptiſed, and was brought from Edinburgh, by ſir Philip Lea, when that city was in flames; but in the times of the late civil wars it was taken away. Not many years ſince, a tomb was diſcovered in this church, ſaid to be that of Humphrey duke of Glouceſter: when the leaden coffin was opened, the body was pretty entire, being preſerved in a ſort of pickle. There was a ſtately croſs in the middle of the town, as there were in many other places, where queen Eleanor's body reſted, when it was brought out of the north for interment at Weſtminſter, but it has been demoliſhed, as ſome ſay, by the inhabitants. The market-days are Wedneſdays and Saturdays. Long. 0. 12. W. Lat. 51. 44. N.

ALBANY, a town of North America, in the province of New-York, ſeated on Hudſon's river, one hundred and fifty miles north of New-York. At this place the ſachems, or kings of the Five Nations of Iroquois, met the governors of the Britiſh plantations, when they entered into any new treaties with them for their mutual defence againſt the French and their Indian allies. It is ſituated in Long. 44. 29. W. Lat. 42. 30. N.

ALBARAZIN, a ſtrong town, and one of the moſt ancient of the kingdom of Arragon in Spain. It is ſeated upon an eminence, near the river Guadelquivir, a little below its ſource, and on the frontiers of Valencia and New Caſtile. It is the ſeat of a biſhop, and produces the beſt wool in all Arragon. It is about one hundred miles eaſt of Madrid. Long. 2. 10. E. Lat. 40. 32. N.

ALBA REGALIS, or STULWEISSEMBURG, a city in Lower Hungary, ſeated on the Rauzia, thirty miles weſt of Buda, and as much ſouth of Strigonia. It is a ſtrong town by its ſituation on a large moraſs; becauſe it cannot be come at but by three cauſeways defended by good baſtions; and yet this has not hindered its being often taken and retaken by the Turks and Imperialiſts. Theſe laſt took it, in 1688, and ſtill continue maſters of it. Long. 18. 25. E. Lat. 47. 10. N.

ALBATEGNIUS, a learned Arabian aſtronomer, of the religion of the Sabians, made his obſervations in Meſopotamia, in 882. We have a treatiſe of his on the knowledge of the ſtars, printed at Nuremburg, in 4to, in 1537, and at Bologna in 1545.

ALBEMARLE, or AUMARLE, a town of France, in Upper Normandy, and in the territory of Caux, from whence the noble family of Keppel take the title of earl. The ſerges of this town are in high eſteem. It is ſeated on the declivity of a hill, by the ſide of a meadow, on the confines of Picardy, thirty-five miles north-eaſt of Rouen, twenty ſouth of Abbeville, and ſeventy north-weſt of Paris. Long. 2. 21. E. Lat. 49. 50. N.

ALBEMARLE, the moſt northern province of North-Carolina, in America, and ſubject to Great-Britain.

ALBENGUA, a town of Italy, in the territory of Genoa. It is the ſee of a biſhop, and is a very ancient handſome town, but not well peopled on account of the inſalubrity of the air. However, it is ſeated in a very beautiful plain, which is cultivated; and the outſide of the town is ſurrounded with olive-trees. It is a ſea-port, about thirty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Genoa. Long. 8. 13. E. Lat. 44. 4. N.

ALBERGOTTI (FRANCIS) a celebrated civilian, born at Arezzo. He wrote Conſultations and Commentaries on the Digeſt, and on ſome of the books of the Code.

ALBERONI (JULIUS) a celebrated cardinal and miniſter of ſtate, was the ſon of a poor gardener of Placentia, and was born on the 31ſt of May, 1664. From this low original, by his addreſs and abilities, he roſe to be privy-counſellor, and afterwards prime-miniſter, to the king of Spain, and was raiſed to the purple. He rouſed that kingdom out of the lethargy it had been in for a century paſt, awakened the attention and raiſed the aſtoniſhment of all Europe. In leſs than two years, he cauſed Spain to make a quite different figure than ſhe had done. It is ſaid, he engaged the Turks to fall upon the emperor, and meaſures were taken to depoſe the duke of Orleans from the regency of France, and king George I. from the throne of Great-Britain; but he was afterwards, through the influence of a powerful prince, deprived of his dignity, and baniſhed to Rome, yet ſtill preſerved his credit with the court of Spain. He died, at Placentia, on the 26th of June, 1752, in the 89th year of his age. The Teſtament Politique of cardinal Alberoni, collected from his Memoirs and Letters, was publiſhed at Lauſanne, in 1753, and was afterwards tranſlated into Engliſh.

ALBERT I. the ſon of the emperor Rodolphus, and the firſt archduke of Auſtria, ſlew in battle, with his own hand, Adolphus, who had been preferred before him to the empire, in 1298, and was afterwards crowned emperor. He fought twelve battles, and was at laſt killed at the paſſage of the Ruſſe, near Windiſh, in 1308, by John, duke of Swabia, whoſe eſtates he had ſeized.

ALBERT II. archduke of Auſtria, and marquis of Moravia, was elected emperor, on the 1ſt of January, 1438. He was an humane and liberal prince, and had deſigns that would have been of great advantage to the empire; but he died before he had time to execute them, on the 27th of October, 1439. His death was occaſioned by his eating melons to exceſs.

ALBERT THE COURAGEOUS, duke of Saxony, and governor of Frieſland, was one of the greateſt protectors of Luther, and rendered himſelf illuſtrious by his prudence and noble exploits under the emperor Maximilian I. He died on the 13th of September, 1500.

ALBERT, ſurnamed THE BEAR, was the ſon of Otho, prince of Anhalt, and was born in 1106. He was beloved by the German princes, and eſpecially by the emperor Conrade III. who, about the year 1150, made him marquis and elector of Brandenburgh. He diſoreſted the Marche of Brandenburgh, built towns, churches, and colleges, and died on the 18th of November, 1168.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the name of Albert.

ALBERTI (JOHN) a celebrated civilian of the ſixteenth century, was born at Widmanſtadt, and was well verſed in the oriental languages. He printed the New Teſtament in Syriac, in 1556, and alſo publiſhed a Syriac Grammar.

ALBERTI (LEANDER) provincial of the Dominicans, was born at Bologna, and publiſhed Eulogiums on the illuſtrious men of his order, and a Deſcription of Italy. He died, in 1552, aged ſeventy-four.

AL-

ALBERTI (LEONE BATTISTA) was deſcended from a noble family in Florence, and was perfectly acquainted with painting, ſculpture, and architecture. He wrote of all three in Latin; but his ſtudies did not permit him to leave any thing conſiderable behind him in painting. He was employed by pope Nicholas V. in his buildings, which he executed in a beautiful manner; and his work on architecture, which conſiſts of ten books, is greatly eſteemed. He alſo wrote ſome treatiſes of morality, and a piece on arithmetic. He died in 1485.

ALBERTI (ANDREW) the author of an excellent Treatiſe on Perſpective, printed in Latin, at Nuremburg, in 1670.

ALBERTUS, archbiſhop of Mentz, was deſcended from a noble family in Lorrain, and was made chancellor, or at leaſt ſecretary, to prince Henry, ſon of the emperor Henry IV. and became one of the chief promoters of that prince's revolt againſt his father. When Henry V. was ſeated on the throne, he was ſent ſeveral times ambaſſador to the pope, and at length made archbiſhop of Mentz, in 1112; when, forgetting the innumerable favours he had received from Henry V. he, that very year, entered into a conſpiracy againſt him, but being taken, was thrown into priſon, where he remained four years; but the emperor being at Mentz, the inhabitants, who had a great love for Albertus, roſe up in arms, and threatened to kill him, if he did not reſtore them their biſhop, which he was obliged to promiſe, and he was accordingly ſet at liberty. Albertus died June 23, 1137.

ALBERTUS (MAGNUS) a Dominican friar, and afterwards archbiſhop of Ratiſbon, was one of the moſt learned men and moſt famous doctors of the thirteenth century. He was by the ignorant charged with being a magician, and making a machine reſembling a man, which they fooliſhly imagined explained all the difficulties he propoſed to it. He died at Cologne, November 15, 1280. His works were printed at Lyons, in 1651, in twenty-one volumes in folio.

ALBI, a city of France, the capital of the Albigeois, in Languedoc, and the ſee of an archbiſhop. The cathedral is dedicated to St. Cecilia, and has one of the fineſt choirs in the kingdom. Here is a very valuable ſilver ſhrine, of very exquiſite workmanſhip, of the Moſaic kind: it contains the reliques of St. Clair, the firſt biſhop of this city. The chapel of this pretended ſaint is magnificent and adorned with paintings. The Lice is a fine large walk without the city, what diſtinguiſhes this from all others, it is a terras above a deep mall, which ſerves inſtead of a foſſe; it is bordered with two rows of very fine trees, which are kept in excellent order. There are four gates, through which you may view all the beauties of a delightful plain. At one end of this is the convent of the Dominicans. The archbiſhop's palace is worth ſeeing. The river waſhes its walls, and ſerves both for an ornament and defence. This city is ſeated on the river Tarn, thirty-five miles north-by-weſt of Toulouſe, and two hundred and fifty ſouth of Paris. Long. 0. 52. E. Lat. 43. 56. N.

The dioceſe of Albi is a country abounding in corn, woad, grapes, ſaffron, plums, and ſheep; and the inhabitants drive a great trade in dried prunes, crapes, a coarſe ſort of cloth, and wines of Gaillac. Theſe wines are the only ſorts hereabouts that are fit for exportation: they are carried down to Bourdeaux, and generally ſold to the Engliſh. They have likewiſe ſeveral coal-mines.

The inhabitants of this country have been famous in eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and were known by the names of Albigenſes: they were a branch of the Waldenſes, or Vaudois, who proceeded from Peter Waldo, or Valdo, a rich merchant of Lyons, and a pious charitable man. This Waldo being ſtruck with the ſudden death of a friend at a feaſt, began to think ſeriouſly of his latter end, which led him to ſtudy the Holy Scriptures, by which means he began to diſcover the errors of the church of Rome. He was a charitable man, and performed all the good offices that lay in his power; on which account he was had in high veneration: for this reaſon, he was the more readily attended to, when he endeavoured to ſhew the abſurdity of image-worſhip, the invocation of ſaints, the pope's ſupremacy, and the like. His followers ſoon became very numerous, and were called in deriſion, by the Papiſts, the Poor Men of Lyons. They were firſt mentioned in hiſtory about the middle of the twelfth century, at the time they began to be perſecuted by the Papiſts, who forced them to fly into Piedmont, where they met in vallies a ſociety of ancient Chriſtians who had never ſubmitted to the authority of the pope. Part of them fled into Languedoc, and ſettled among the Albegois, where they increaſed exceedingly. The firſt attempt to bring them back was by ſending miſſionaries among them, who were to convert them by preaching. For this purpoſe, the order of Dominican friars were inſtituted, about the beginning of the thirteenth century; but theſe were not able to perform the work they were ſent about, eſpecially as the reformed were patronized by the earl of Thouloufe, who had embraced their opinions; and therefore the pope raiſed a cruſade againſt them, and perſuaded the duke of Auſtria to go againſt the Vaudois, and Simon de Mountfort, earl of Leiceſter, was leader againſt the Albigenſes. Theſe, together with the king of France, and a great army deſigned for the Holy Land, proved too ſtrong for theſe poor people. Great numbers of them were barbarouſly tormented and murdered, which cauſed the reſt to fly into Provence: and in time they ſettled at Merindol, Cabrieres, and the adjacent villages, where, in the year 1545, they were moſt barbarouſly maſſacred by the French Papiſts. Thoſe that eſcaped ſent Zuinglius to procure them teachers, and incorporated with the reformed.

ALBINOVANUS, a Latin poet, whom Ovid ſurnamed the Divine. There is now nothing of his extant, except an Elogy on Druſus, and another on the death of Mecænas.

ALBINUS (PETER) a celebrated hiſtorian and good poet of the ſixteenth century, was born at Sneeberg in Miſnia. His family name was Weiſs, which in German ſignifies White, but he changed it to that of Albinus. He was profeſſor of poetry and mathematics in the academy of Wittemberg, and then ſecretary to the elector at Dreſden, where he publiſhed a ſecond edition, much enlarged, of the Chronicles of Miſnia, which he had printed at Wittemberg, in 1580. He wrote ſeveral other works, moſt of which are hiſtorical, and much eſteemed.

ALBIZI, or ALBIZIS, (BARTHOLOMEW) a famous cordelier of the fourteenth century, called Bartholomew de Piſa, from his having made a profeſſion of that order at Piſa. He was born at Rivano, in Tuſcany, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his preaching and ſeveral works, the moſt famous of which is his book in Latin Of the Conformity of St. Francis with Jeſus Chriſt: he compoſed it in 1389, and preſented it, in 1399, to a general chapter of his order, aſſembled at Aſſiſe; it was received with great applauſe, the author was loaded with praiſes, and rewarded with a preſent of a complete habit which St. Francis wore when living. This work is, however, a very bad and impious performance; for Albizi's zeal made him not only raiſe the actions of St. Francis above thoſe of the other ſaints, but he even equals them to thoſe of the Son of God. He died at Piſa, in the convent of cordeliers, in 1401, in a very advanced age.

ALBON (JAMES D') more known by the name of Marechal de St. André, was marquis of Fronſac, lord of St. André, marechal of France, and one of the greateſt generals of the ſixteenth century. He ſerved under Henry II. and had the command of the army in the campaigns of 1552 and 1554; he contributed greatly to the taking of Marienburgh; he demoliſhed the caſtle of Cambreſis, and acquired great glory by the retreat of Queſnoy; he was afterwards at the battle of Renty, and was made priſoner at that of St. Quintin, in 1557. At length, he embraced the party of the Guiſes, and was ſhot by Bobigni de Mezieres, with a piſtol, at the battle of Dreux, in 1562.

This celebrated general was a Calviniſt, and had ſome concern in all the great affairs tranſacted in France during his time.

ALBOR, a ſmall town, ſeated in the bottom of a gulph, in the ſouth part of Portugal. It has a port, the entrance into which is difficult, on account of the rocks on the ſide of it. It is ſeated in a vaſt plain, which produces excellent wine. Long. 8. 10. W. Lat. 37. 0. N.

ALBORNOS (GILES ALVAREZ CARILLO) archbiſhop of Toledo, cardinal, and one of the greateſt men Spain has produced, was born at Suença, a city of New Caſtile. He reſigned his archbiſhopric, as ſoon as he was made cardinal, and taking up arms, reduced all Italy to the obedience of the pope; recalled Urban V. from Avignon to Rome, and at length retired to Viterbo, where he died, in 1367, after having founded the magnificent Spaniſh college at Barcelona. It is ſaid, that Urban V. aſking him what he had done with the large ſums that had been ſent him for the conqueſt of Italy, he ordered a waggon, loaded with keys, locks, and bars, to be driven to the pope's palace, and then deſiring his holineſs to look out of the window, told him, that he had laid out the money in making him maſter of all thoſe cities, to which the locks and keys in the waggon belonged. At theſe words, the pope embraced him, and never after called him to an account.

ALBOVINUS, or ALBOIN, king of the Lombards, rendered himſelf maſter of almoſt all Italy; but was at length aſſaſſinated at Verona, about the year 574.

ALBOURG, a town of Denmark, in North-Jutland, capital of the dioceſe of the ſame name, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the gulph of Lymford. The caſtle, where the bailiff reſides, is old and almoſt ruined. The houſes are well built, and the inhabitants civilized, whence it is called the ſecond Copenhagen. Their herrings, of which they catch a large quantity, are much eſteemed. They export a great deal deal of bacon, tallow, ſalt-fiſh, and ſkins; likewiſe their piſtols, muſkets, ſaddles, and gloves are in great eſteem in Denmark. There is an illuſtrious ſchool here, and the town has a deep harbour, where veſſels may ride in ſafety. It is ſeated on a channel, four miles from the ſea, thirty north of Wiburg, and fifty north of Arhus. Long. 29. 16. E. Lat. 56. 35. N.

ALBRET, a ſmall town of France, in Gaſcony, in a healthy country, where there are a multitude of hares. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth of Bourdeaux, and forty ſouth-eaſt of Dax. Long. 0. 50. W. Lat. 44. 10.

ALBRICIUS, an Engliſhman, born at London, was a great philoſopher, a learned and able phyſician, and was well verſed in all the branches of polite literature. He lived in the eleventh century, and wrote ſeveral works in Latin, particularly, 1. Of the Origin of the Gods. 2. The Virtues of the Ancients. 3. The Nature of Poiſon, &c.

ALBUMAZAR, or JAFER EBN MOHAMMED EBN OMAR ABU MASHAR, the prince of the Arabian aſtrologers, was born in the city of Balkh, in Khoraſan, and after having applied himſelf to arithmetic and geometry, ſtudied judicial aſtrology, after he was forty-ſeven years old. It is pretended, that Al Mámûn, the khalif, in order to make a trial of his ſkill in aſtrology, cauſed one of his attendants to conceal himſelf in a room, and made him ſit on a golden mortar, laid in a braſs baſon full of blood, and afterwards aſked this aſtrologer where he was; on which, having made his obſervations, he replied, "I ſee him ſeated on a mountain of gold, in the midſt of a ſea of blood, ſurrounded "with walls of braſs." It is certain, that he was a man poſſeſſed of great abilities, and that he wrote ſeveral books on aſtronomy and judicial aſtrology; but the moſt famous of all his works is that of the Olûf, which treats of the beginning, duration, and end of the world. He there aſſerts, that when the world was created, the ſeven planets were together in the firſt point of the ſign of Aries, and that it will end, when the ſame planets ſhall meet again in the laſt point of Piſces, in their exaltation, or dragon's head. He died in the ninth century.

ALBUQUERQUE (ALPHONSO, duke of) a famous admiral, was born at Melinda, a city of Africa, and was at length nominated viceroy of the Eaſt Indies, by Emanuel, king of Portugal, in which office he ſucceeded Almeida. He extended and eſtabliſhed the power of the Portugueſe in the Eaſt; particularly, he added Ormuz, Goa, and Malacca to the dominions of Portugal, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf ſo greatly by his prudence and conduct, that he was named the Great. He died on board a veſſel, in the port of Goa, in 1515.

Blaiſe Albuquerque, his ſon, was raiſed to the moſt conſiderable poſts in the kingdom of Portugal, and publiſhed, in the Portugueſe tongue, memoirs of his father's actions, which were printed at Liſbon, in 1576.

ALBUQUERQUE, a ſmall city, in Spain, in the province of Eſtramadura, is ſeated on an eminence, nine miles from the frontiers of Portugal. It is commanded by an almoſt impregnable fortreſs, built on a high mountain, and ſerves to defend the town. It carries on a great trade in wool and woollen manufactures. It was taken by the allies of Charles, king of Spain, in 1705. Long. 7. 0. W. Lat. 38. 52. N.

ALBUTIUS (SILUS CAIUS) a famous orator, born at Novarre, in the reign of Auguſtus, was advanced to the office of ædile, but reſigned it on account of an inſult offered him by ſome perſons who had loſt their ſuit; for on his pronouncing their ſentence, they ſeized him by the feet, and dragged him from the tribunal. On this affront, he went to Rome; but being at laſt grown old, and afflicted with an abſceſs, he returned to Novarre, where, having called the people together, he repreſented to them the reaſons that hindered his deſiring to live, and then ſtarved himſelf to death.

ALBUTIUS (TITUS) a Roman philoſopher of the ſect of Epicurus, who going, when young, to Athens, conceived ſuch a fondneſs for the manners of the Greeks, that he choſe to paſs for a Greek rather than a Roman. Cicero ſays, he would have been a better orator, if he had not been ſo attached to the ſect of the Epicureans.

ALCÆUS, a native of Mitylene, in the iſland of Leſbos, was one of the greateſt lyric poets of antiquity. He was the enemy of Pittacus, Periander, and other tyrants. The fragments we have of his poetry make us regret the loſs of the reſt. He lived in the time of Sappho, about ſix hundred and four years before Chriſt.

ALCÆUS, a tragic poet, and, in the opinion of ſome, the firſt compoſer of tragedies. He left ten pieces, one of which was entitled Paſiphæ: this was the piece he produced when he diſputed with Ariſtophanes, in the fourth year of the ninty-ſeventh Olympiad.

He is a different perſon from Alcæus, the ſon of Miccus, a comic poet.

ALCALA DE GUADEIRA, a ſmall town of Spain, in Andaluſia, upon the river Guadeira. Here are abundance of ſprings, from whence they convey water to Seville by an aqueduct. Long. 6. 16. W. Lat. 37 15. N.

ALCALA DE HENARES, a beautiful and large city and univerſity of Spain, in New Caſtile, ſeated upon the river Henares, which waſhes its walls. It is built in a very agreeable plain, and is of an oval figure. The ſtreets are handſome and pretty ſtrait; one of them is very long, for it runs from one end of the city to the other. The houſes are well built; and there are ſeveral ſquares, the largeſt of which is an ornament to the city; it is ſurrounded on all ſides with piazzas, where tradeſmen have their ſhops, to expoſe ſeveral ſorts of commodities to ſale, of which there is as great plenty and variety as in moſt towns of Spain. The univerſity was founded by cardinal Ximenes, archbiſhop of Toledo, about the beginning of the ſixteenth century.

The land about Alcala is watered by the Henares, and is well cultivated, and very fruitful, while that at a diſtance is dry and ſterile: it yields grain in plenty, very good muſcat wine, and melons of a delicious kind. Without the walls is a ſpring, whoſe water is pure, ſo good, and ſo well taſted, that it is encloſed and ſhut up for the king of Spain's own uſe, from whence it is carried to Madrid. This city is ten miles ſouth-weſt of Guadalaxara, and thirteen miles eaſt of Madrid. Long. 4. 20. W. Lat. 40. 30. N.

ALCALA-REAL, a ſmall city of Spain, in Andaluſia, with a fine abbey. It is built on the top of a high mountain, in a mountainous country; and therefore it is no wonder, that the road to it ſhould be incommodious, rough, and unequal; but to make amends for this, here are ſeveral kinds of exquiſite fruit and wine. Long. 4. 15. W. Lat. 37. 18. N.

ALCAMENES, the ninth king of Sparta, ſucceeded his father Telecles, eight hundred years before the Chriſtian æra, and was eminent for his juſtice, temperance, and wiſdom. Being aſked what was the moſt certain means of preſerving the public, he anſwered, "That nothing ſhould ever be done "with a view to private intereſt." Being aſked why he lived in the manner he did, though he was very rich, he anſwered, "Becauſe it was more honourable for a rich "man to live according to reaſon, than to ſuffer himſelf "to be carried away by appetite."

ALCANIS, a town of Arragon, in Spain, ſeated on the river Guadaloup, twelve miles fram Caſpe. It was formerly the capital of the kingdom of the Moors; but being taken from them, it was made a commandery of the order of Calatrava. Here is a very remarkable fountain, which throws up water through forty-two pipes. It is ſurrounded with gardens and fruit-trees, and defended with a good fortreſs. Long. 0. 5. W. Lat. 41. 0. N.

ALCANTARA, a ſmall, but very ſtrong city of Eſtramadura, in Spain. It gives name to one of the three orders of knighthood, and is ſeated on the banks of the Tajo, or Tagus, twenty-one miles from Coria, in a very fruitful ſoil, and is celebrated for its bridge over that river: it was built in the time of the emperor Trajan, as appears by an inſcription over one of the arches, by the people of Luſitania, who were aſſeſſed to ſupply the expence; it is raiſed two hundred feet above the level of the water, and though it conſiſts but of ſix arches, is ſix hundred and ſeventy feet in length, and twenty-eight in breadth. At the entrance of the bridge, there is a ſmall antique chapel hewn in a rock by the ancient Pagans, who dedicated it to Trajan, as the Chriſtians did to St. Julian. This city was built by the Moors, on account of the convenience of this bridge, and is in a place where the Tajo is very deep, running between two high ſteep rocks; for which reaſon, they called it Al-Cantara, which, in their language, ſignifies the Bridge. It was taken from them in 1214, and given to the knights a Calatrava, who afterwards aſſumed the name of Alcantara. It was taken by the earl of Galloway, in April, 1706, and retaken by the French in November following. It is forty-five miles from Madrid, and one hundred and twenty-five from Seville. Long. 7. 12. W. Lat. 39. 30. N.

ALCANTARA is the name of a ſmall town, three quarters of a mile from Liſbon, where there is a royal palace ſeated on the banks of the Tajo, where there are fine and delightful gardens, with great variety of fine flowers and excellent fruits, caſcades, grottoes, and artificial fountains. Long. 9. 30. W. Lat. 38. 42. N.

ALCAREZ, a ſmall city of La Mancha, in Spain, defended by a pretty ſtrong caſtle, and remarkable for an ancient aqueduct. It ſtands near the river Guardamena, and the ſoil about it is very fruitful. They have a breed of little running-horſes, which are very fleet and ſtrong. It is twenty-five miles north of the confines of Andaluſia, one hundred and eight ſouth of Cuenza, and one hundred and thirty-eight ſouth-by-eaſt of Madrid. Long. 1. 50. W. Lat. 38. 28. N.

AL-

ALCASAR (Louis d') a Spaniſh Jeſuit, born at Seville, in 1554, who compoſed a large Commentary on the Apocalypſe, and other works. He died in 1613.

ALCASSAR do Sal, a town of Portugal, in Eſtramadura, which has a caſtle ſaid to be impregnable, it being very ſtrong both by art and nature, as being built on the top of a rock which is very ſteep on all ſides. Here is a ſalt-work that produces a large quantity of ſalt. The fields likewiſe produce large quantities of a ſort of ruſhes, of which they make mats, which are tranſported out of the kingdom. Long. 9. 10. W. Lat. 38. 18. N.

Alcassar, a city in Barbary, ſeated about two leagues from Larache, in Aſga, a province of the kingdom of Fez. It was of great note, and the ſeat of the governor of this part of the kingdom. It was built by Jacob Almanzor, king of Fez, about the year 1180, and deſigned for a magazine and place of rendezvous for the great preparations he was making to enter Granada in Spain, and to make good the footing Joſeph Almanzor had got ſome time before. It is ſaid his father firſt invaded Spain with three hundred thouſand men, moſt of whom he was obliged to bring back to Africa to quiet a rebellion that had broke out in Morocco. This done, he returned to Spain again with an army, if you will believe tradition, of two hundred thouſand horſe, and three hundred thouſand foot. This city is now fallen greatly to decay, ſo that of fifteen moſques there are only two that they make uſe of; the reaſon of which is probably its bad ſituation; for it ſtands ſo low, that it is exceſſively hot in ſummer, and almoſt overflowed with water in the winter. This they affirm to be owing to a curſe of one of their ſaints. Here are a great number of ſtorks, who live very familiarly with the people, walking about the town, poſſeſſing the tops of the houſes and moſques without moleſtation; for they eſteem it a ſacred bird, and account it a ſin to diſturb them: however, when the weather is exceſſive hot, ſome of them drop down dead every day. At preſent, the baſhaw of Tetuan appoints a governor to this town, which is the laſt of his dominions towards Mequinez.

Near this city there is a high ridge of mountains, running towards Tetuan, whoſe inhabitants were never brought intirely under ſubjection; and whenever it was attempted, they revenged themſelves by infeſting the roads, and robbing and deſtroying the travellers; when they were purſued, they retired into their woody mountains, where none could ſafely follow them. Not far from hence is the river Elmahaſſan, famous for the battle fought between Don Sebaſtian, king of Portugal, and the Moors. The Portugueſe, who loſt the battle, would not believe the king was ſlain, but ran up and down the country, crying, Onde eſta el rey? Where is the king? The Moors often hearing the word rey, which in Arabic ſignifies common ſenſe, told them, that if they had any rey, they would not have come there. Long. 12. 35. Lat. 35. 15.

ALCAZAR Leguer, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Fez, and in the province of Ilabat. It was taken by Alphonſo, king of Portugal, in 1468; but ſoon after that, it was abandoned to the Moors. It is ſeated on the coaſt of the ſtraits of Gibraltar. Long. 5. 30. W. Lat. 35. 0. N.

ALCAZER, a town of Spain, in New Caſtile, ſeated on the river Guardamana, which has a fortreſs on a high hill for its defence, and lies in a very fruitful country, one hundred miles north-weſt of Carthagena. Long. 2. 10. W. Lat. 38. 15. N.

ALCESTIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Pelius, and wife of Admetus, who died in order to preſerve the life of the king her huſband. See Admetus.

ALCHABITUS, an Arabian aſtrologer, who compoſed an Introduction to the Knowledge of the celeſtial Influences; he alſo wrote on the Conjunction of the Planets, and a Treatiſe on Optics.

ALCHINDUS, an Arabian phyſician and aſtrologer of great learning, who wrote ſeveral works, among which there is one De Temporum Mutationibus, and another De Gradibus Medicinarum compoſitarum inveſtigandis, and De Theorica Magicarum Artium. We have no certain account when he lived; but he cannot be placed below the twelfth century.

ALCIAT (Andrew) a famous Italian lawyer, born in 1492. He mixed much polite learning in the explication of the laws, and happily drove out the barbariſms in language, which till then had reigned in the lectures and writtings of the Italian lawyers.

Alciat (John Paul) a gentleman of Milan, was one of thoſe Italians, who, in the ſixteenth century, forſook their country to join with the Proteſtant church; and afterwards diſliking the commonly received doctrine of the Trinity, formed a new party of their own. Alciat, after being perſecuted in ſeveral places, died at Dantzick, in the ſentiments of Socinus.

ALCIBIADES, a celebrated Athenian general, the ſon of Clinias, and the diſciple of Socrates. He was accompliſhed both in mind and body; he ſignalized himſelf on all occaſions, and gained the prize at the Olympic games. However, being falſely accuſed of ſacrilege, he fled to Thebes, and joined the Lacedemonians, whom he engaged to enter into an alliance with the king of Perſia. Alcibiades at length retired to Tiſſaphernes, Darius's general; but was ſoon after recalled by the Athenians. Before his return, he obliged the Spartans to ſue for peace, and took ſeveral cities on the borders of Aſia. The Athenians, on his arrival amongſt them, returned him his eſtate, and loaded him with honours; but ſome years after, Antiochus, his lieutenant general, being defeated by the Spartans, Alcibiades fled to Pharnabazes, who, at the ſolicitation of Lyſander, cauſed him to be ſhot with arrows. Thus died Alcibiades, about four hundred and four years before the Chriſtian æra, and in the fiftieth year of his age.

ALCIDES, in fabulous hiſtory, one of the names of Hercules.

ALCINOE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Polybius the Corinthian, and the wife of Amphilochus, fell in love with Xanthus, who lodged at her houſe, and forſaking her huſband and little children, embarked with him for the iſle of Samos, his native country. But, during this voyage, reflecting on her conduct, ſhe called to mind, with cries and tears, her huſband and her young children; when all the tender things her lover could ſay, though he offered to marry her, affording her no conſolation, ſhe threw herſelf into the ſea. What is moſt extraordinary in this ſtory is, that Minerva is ſaid to have inſpired Alcinoe with this criminal paſſion, to puniſh her for not paying all ſhe had promiſed to a woman who had worked for her.

ALCINOUS, in fabulous hiſtory, king of the Phæacians, in the iſland now called Corfu, was famous for his palace and his gardens, which, without the viciſſitude of winter and ſummer, were conſtantly filled with the moſt delicious fruits. He received Ulyſſes with much civility, when a ſtorm had caſt him on the coaſt of Phæacia, and conducted him to Ithaca, loaded with preſents. The Phæacians were expert ſailors, and yet lived in luxury and pleaſure.

Alcinous, a Platonic philoſopher, who wrote an Abridgment of Plato's Philoſophy. On this work James Charpentier has written a learned and curious Commentary.

ALCIONEUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a giant, who killed twenty-four of the ſoldiers of Hercules, and was going to knock down that hero, when Hercules turned aſide his club, and killed him on the ſpot; upon which ſeven young virgins, who were in love with Alcioneus, and were afflicted at his loſs, threw themſelves into the ſea, and were turned into halcyons.

ALCIONIUS (Peter) was born in Italy, and became corrector to the printer Aldus Manucius; and afterwards profeſſor at Florence, in the ſixteenth century. Some writers have ſaid, that having in his hands Cicero's Treatiſe De Gloria, he burnt it, though it was the only original in the world, after having taken from it whatever he thought proper for his work De Exilio; but ſuch accuſations ought certainly to be never made without proof.

ALCITHOE, in fabulous hiſtory, a Theban lady, who contemning Bacchus, and his orgia, was ſpinning at home, while the other women were ſolemnizing his feſtival; on which Bacchus, being incenſed, transformed her into a bat, and her ſpindle and flax into a vine and ivy.

ALCMAER, a city of the United Provinces, ſeated in North-Holland, about four miles from the ſea, fifteen from Haerlem, and eighteen from Amſterdam. It is a handſome city, and one of the cleaneſt in Holland. The ſtreets and houſes are extremely neat and regular, and the public buildings very beautiful. It had formerly two pariſh-churches, dedicated to St. Matthew and St. Lawrence. The latter had ſo high a tower, that it ſerved for a ſea-mark to the veſſels that were in the open ſea; but, in 1464, it tumbled down, and damaged the other church ſo much, that they were both demoliſhed in 1470, and one church was built in their ſtead, dedicated to the ſame ſaints. The Spaniards, under the command of Frederic of Toledo, ſon of the duke d'Alva, came to beſiege it, after they had taken Haerlem, in 1573; but were forced to raiſe the ſiege, after three months lying before it, as well on account of the infection of the air as the ſtout reſiſtance of the inhabitants and ſoldiers; even the women ſignalized themſelves bravely in its defence. It is recorded in the regiſter of this city, that, in the year 1637, one hundred and twenty tulips, with the off ſets, ſold for ninety thouſand florins. The town has a very good trade in butter and cheeſe, of which it ſells a vaſt quantity every year. Long. 4. 26. E. Lat. 52. 28. N.

ALCMAN, a lyric poet, and one of the moſt antient Greek authors, was a citizen of Sparta, and is accounted the firſt who compoſed amorous verſes. He lived about ſix hundred and ſeventy-two years before the Chriſtian æra, and compoſed ſeveral poems, of which there are none now remaining, but a few fragments quoted by ancient writers.

ALCMENA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Electryo, king of Mycenæ, and the wife of Amphytrion, being beloved by Jupiter, he aſſumed the form of her huſband, and was without ſcruple admitted to the liberties of the marriage-bed, and on this occaſion made the night laſt as long as three ordinary ones. From this embrace ſprung Hercules.

ALCMEON, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Amphiarus and Eryphile, ſlew his mother, in obedience to the command of his father, who looked upon her as the cauſe of his death: after which, Alcmeon, being haunted by Furies, retired to Pſophis, in Arcadia, where he expiated his crime, and married Arſinoe, the daughter of Phegeus; but afterwards marrying Callirrhoe, the daughter of Achelous, and giving her a necklace, which he had taken from his mother and given to his other wife, Achelous ordered his two ſons to purſue and kill him. See the articles AMPHIARUS and CALLIRRHOE.

ALCMEON, a native of Crotona, and diſciple of Pythagoras, was thought to be the firſt who wrote upon natural philoſophy. He lived about the year of the world 3520.

ALCOCK (JOHN) doctor of laws, and biſhop of Ely, in the reign of king Henry VII. was born at Beverley, in Yorkſhire. He was a prelate of ſingular learning and piety, and ſo highly eſteemed by king Henry, that he made him lord preſident of Wales, and afterwards lord high chancellor of England. He converted the old nunnery of St. Radegund into Jeſus college. Bale ſpeaks in very high terms of his piety and mortifications. He wrote, 1. Mons Perfectionis, i. e. The Mount of Perfection. 2. In Pſalmos Penitentiales, i. e. Penitential Pſalms, &c. and died October 1, 1500.

ALCRED, ALCREDUS, or ALREDUS, king of Northumberland, was lineally deſcended from Ida, the firſt king of the Bernicii, and was born about the year 740. In 765, he aſcended the throne, but was ſo far from pleaſing his ſubjects, that, in the year 774, he was obliged to fly from court, and ſpend the remainder of his life in exile.

ALCUDIA, a town in the iſland of Majorca, conſiſting of about one thouſand houſes, and belongs to Spain. It is ſeated between two large harbours, called Major and Minor. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 40. 10. N.

ALCUINUS, or ALBINUS, (FLACCUS) abbot of Canterbury, was one of the moſt learned men of the eighth century. He was born in Yorkſhire, or, as others ſay, not far from London; and, in 793, went over into France, being invited thither by Charlemagne, who not only honoured him with his friendſhip and confidence, but became his pupil, and was inſtructed by him in rhetoric, logic, mathematics, and divinity. That prince gave him ſeveral abbies, and he died in that of St. Martin, at Tours, on the 19th of May, 804. His works were printed at Paris, in 1617, in folio.

ALCYONIUS (PETER) one of the learned Italians, who improved the belles lettres, in the ſixteenth century. He was for a long time corrector of the preſs, at Venice, to that learned printer, Aldus Manutius, and conſequently deſerves a ſhare in the praiſes due to his editions. He wrote ſome pieces on eloquence, and tranſlated ſeveral of Ariſtotle's works into Latin, but did not ſucceed well in them.

ALDBOROUGH, a ſea-port town in Suffolk, with a market on Saturdays. It is ſeated pleaſantly, in a dale, between a high hill to the weſtward, on which its large old-built church ſtands, the ſea to the eaſt, and its river, or channel, running ſouth-weſt. It is a large, long, ordinary town, made up of two or three ſtreets of low houſes, running parallel to each other. A quarter of a mile to the ſouth lies Slaughden, where they have a commodious key, with warehouſes for fiſh: more ſoutherly ſtill, they have conveniencies for drying their north-ſea-fiſh. Their employment in the fiſhery is their chief buſineſs, which is conſiderable in the ſeaſons for catching herrings and ſprats; and it is the only place in England for curing red ſprats. It is a town corporate, and is governed by two bailiffs, twelve capital burgeſſes, and twenty-four inferior burgeſſes, and ſends two members to parliament. Towards the ſea, it has ſome pieces of cannon planted for its defence. It is eighty-eight miles north-eaſt from London. Long. 1. 32. E. Lat. 52. 50. N.

ALDBOROUGH, a market town in the Weſt Riding of Yorkſhire, ſeated on the river Ouſe, fifteen miles north-weſt of York, and two hundred miles north of London. It ſends two members to Parliament. Long. 0. 20. W. Lat. 54. 15. N. It was anciently a Roman city, called, Iſurium Brigantium; and ſeveral coins and monuments of the Saxons and Romans have been diſcovered there.

ALDEGRAEF (ALBERT) an eminent painter and engraver, was born at the city of Zouſt, in Weſtphalia, where he painted many things for the churches, and, among others, a nativity worthy the admiration of the curious. He, however, principally employed himſelf in engraving; this appears from the vaſt number of his prints, which ſhew that he was a correct deſigner, and that his expreſſion is graceful.

ALDERNEY, an iſland in the Britiſh channel, ſubject to the crown of Great-Britain. It is ſeparated from Cape La Hogue, in Normandy, by a very narrow ſtreight, called the Race of Alderney, which is a very dangerous paſſage, on account of the hidden rocks in it. Through this ſtreight the French fleet made their eſcape, after their defeat at La Hogue, in 1692. It is a healthy iſland, has but one church, and is fruitful both in corn and paſture. The inhabitants live together in a town of the ſame name, for their greater ſafety, the iſland being but eight miles in circumference. The number of houſes are ſaid to be two hundred, and the inhabitants a thouſand. It has but one harbour, called Crabby, which is at a good diſtance from the town, and is only fit for ſmall veſſels. To the weſt lie the range of rocks, called the Caſkets, ſo dangerous to mariners. Long. 2. 17. W. Lat. 49. 50. N.

ALDERHOLM, a pleaſant iſland of Sweden, formed by the three arms of a river running through Gentle, a town of Nordland, in Sweden. Here is a wharf, a repoſitory for planks and deals, two packing-houſes, a large cuſtom-houſe for taking toll of the ſhips, an arſenal for cannon, and a granary.

ALDHELM, or ADELM, biſhop of Shireburn, in the time of the Saxon heptarchy, is generally allowed to have been the ſon of Kenred, or Kenter, the brother of Ina, king of the Weſt Saxons. He was born at Caer-Bladon, now called Malmſbury, in Wiltſhire. He wrote ſeveral works; particularly, a book Againſt the Miſtake of the Britons in celebrating Eſther, and another, partly in proſe, and partly in hexameter verſe, In Praiſe of Virginity, &c. The popiſh writers pretend, that he uſed frequently to put his virtue to a dangerous trial, by lying all night with a young woman, which, they ſay, he performed without the leaſt violation of chaſtity. He is ſaid to have been the firſt Engliſhman who wrote in Latin, and the firſt that introduced poetry into England. We are alſo told, that he preferred muſic to all other earthly delights; and that he played on all ſorts of inſtruments. He died May 25, 709.

ALDHUN, or ALDUN, the firſt biſhop of Durham, ſucceeded Elfſig, in 990, in the biſhopric of Holy Iſland; but that iſland being greatly expoſed to the incurſions of the Daniſh pirates, he left it ſix years after, and at laſt ſettled with his followers, at Dunelm, or Durham, where he gave riſe both to the city and cathedral. This prelate educated king Ethelred's two ſons, Alfred and Edward; and on their father's being driven from the throne, by Suene king of Denmark, conducted them, together with queen Emma, into Normandy, to duke Richard, the queen's brother. This happened, in 1017, a little before biſhop Aldhun's death.

ALDRED, archbiſhop of York, in the reigns of Edward the Confeſſor, Harold, and William the Conqueror, was a monk of Wincheſter, afterwards abbot of Taviſtock, and, in 1046, was promoted to the ſee of Worceſter. He travelled to Jeruſalem, and after his return was ſent on an embaſſy to the emperor Henry I. In 1061, he was raiſed to the ſee of York; after which, he built a common hall for the canons to dine in, finiſhed Beverley-hall, begun by his predeceſſor, and rebuilt the cathedral at Glouceſter, which had been deſtroyed by the Danes; but no ſooner was his patron, king Edward, dead, than he aſſiſted Harold to obtain the crown; and when William the Norman had ſucceeded in his invaſion, and Stigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had refuſed to crown him, he fell in with the ſtream, and performed the ceremony; and yet his behaviour to that monarch, on the following occaſion, ſhewed him capable not only of properly vindicating his own rights, but of the higheſt degree of prieſtly arrogance. As the archbiſhop's ſervants were one day bringing a large quantity of proviſions to his palace at York, they were ſtopped on the road by the high-ſheriff of the county, who aſked to whom they belonged; and being told that they were the archbiſhop's ſervants, and were conveying thoſe proviſions for his uſe, he, deſpiſing the prelate, ordered his officers to ſeize the carriages and proviſions, and convey them to the king's granary in York caſtle. The archbiſhop hearing of this, ſent ſeveral of his clergy and citizens to the high-ſheriff, to demand reſtitution, and threaten him with excommunication upon his refuſal; but he diſregarding his threats, the archbiſhop haſtened to London, and, attended by a train of biſhops and other eccleſiaſtics, went to Weſtminſter, where the king was then in council. The monarch no ſooner caſt his eyes upon the prelate, than he roſe up, as uſual, to ſalute him, which the latter put by with his croſier, and taking no notice of the king's ſtanding, or of his crowd of courtiers, cried, "Hear me, William; when "thou wert an alien, and God had permitted thee, for our "ſins, and through much blood, to reign over us, I anointed "thee king, and placed the crown upon thy head with a "bleſſing; but now, becauſe thou deſerveſt it not, I will "change that bleſſing into a curſe againſt thee, as a perſe-"cutor of God and his miniſters, and a breaker and "contem-

" contemner of thoſe oaths and promiſes, which thou " madeſt to me before the altar of St. Peter." The king, aſtoniſhed at theſe menaces, threw himſelf at the archbiſhop's feet, and humbly begged to know by what offence he had deſerved ſo ſevere a ſentence. The noblemen preſent were greatly irritated at his ſuffering the king to lie proſtrate without raiſing him; but the archbiſhop, turning to them, cried, " Let him alone, gentlemen, let him lie; he " does not lie at my feet, but at St Peter's." However, after ſome time, he thought fit to raiſe the king, and told him his errand. The Conqueror was too much frightened to deny his requeſt; he gave him rich preſents, and diſpatched an expreſs to the high-ſheriff for the reſtitution of his goods, which were punctually reſtored. This prelate died on the 10th of September, 1069.

ALDRIC (St.) biſhop of Mans, was of royal extraction, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his knowledge and piety. He wrote an excellent Collection of the Decrees of the Popes and the Canons of Councils, and died in 856.

ALDRICH, or ALDRIDGE, (ROBERT) called, in Latin, Aldriſius, was born at Burnham, in Buckinghamſhire, and was biſhop of Carliſle, in the reigns of king Henry VIII. king Edward VI. and queen Mary. He was a man of admirable parts and learning, and wrote ſeveral pieces; particularly, 1. A Letter to William Horman. 2. Various Epigrams. 3. Several Reſolutions concerning the Sacraments. 4. Anſwers to ſeveral Queries concerning the Abuſes of the Maſs, &c. He died March 25, 1555.

ALDRICH (HENRY) an eminent philoſopher, poet, and divine, was born at Weſtminſter, in the year 1647, and, in 1682, was made dean of Chriſt-church, Oxon. He wrote a Syſtem of Logic, and ſome other things. The reviſing of Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion was committed to his care, jointly with Dr. Sprat. He annually publiſhed ſome piece of an antient Greek author, and had a ſhare in the controverſy with the Papiſts, in the reign of king James II. This worthy divine died on the 14th of December, 1710.

ALDRINGER, a famous general under the emperor Ferdinand II. was born of an obſcure family, in the country of Luxembourg, and, from being a common ſoldier, raiſed himſelf entirely by his merit. He behaved with great bravery and reſolution on ſeveral occaſions, and particularly contributed, in 1633, to the raiſing the ſiege of the city of Conſtance. He had a very lively and penetrating genius, a refined underſtanding, and great courage; but theſe excellent qualifications were accompanied with exceſſive avarice and cruelty. He was ſlain in 1634, at Landſhut, in Bavaria; but it was never certainly known, whether his own ſoldiers or the Swedes gave the blow.

ALDROVANDUS (ULYSSES) profeſſor of philoſophy and phyſic at Bologna, was one of the moſt curious men that ever lived, with regard to natural philoſophy. He travelled into the moſt diſtant countries, from no other motive than that of enquiring into their natural productions: minerals, metals, plants, and animals were the objects of his reſearches; but he applied himſelf principally to birds; and, in order to have figures of them drawn to the life, he, for above thirty years, employed the moſt excellent artiſts in Europe: by theſe expences he was ruined, and, it is ſaid, died in the hoſpital at Bologna, full of years and blind, in the year 1605. His works have been printed in thirteen volumes folio.

ALDULPH, ARDULPH, or EARLDULF, ſucceeded Oſwald, king of Northumberland, in 796. He had been one of the principal lords of king Ethelred's court, and was baniſhed, with other Northumbrian noblemen, by that prince, on a ſuſpicion of their carrying on deſigns againſt his perſon and crown. But king Ethelred being aſſaſſinated, and Oſwald, his ſucceſſor, elected in his room, the laſt-mentioned prince was driven out, when he had reigned only twenty-ſeven days, and Aldulf advanced to the throne. Two years after, he gained a glorious victory over the party who had murdered Ethelred; but afterwards, to preſerve the crown, he raiſed Alcmund, the ſon of Alcred, who had ſwayed the ſceptre of that kingdom, to be privately murdered. This cauſed a new inſurrection; and though he defeated his enemies in a battle, in which Aldric, their leader, was ſlain, yet the oppoſite party grew ſo powerful, that Aldulf was obliged to ſave himſelf by flying to the court of Charlemagne; and two years after, that kingdom ſubmitted to Egbert, king of Weſſex, which put an end to the heptarchy.

ALDUS MANUTIUS. See MANUTIUS ALDUS.

ALEANDER (JEROME) cardinal and archbiſhop of Brindiſi, was born in 1480, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf, at the beginning of the Reformation, by the oppoſition he made to Luther; for, being ſent into Germany, as the pope's nuncio, in 1519, he acted, as occaſion ſerved, both in the character of ambaſſador and doctor, and declaimed, three hours together, againſt Luther's doctrine, before the diet of Worms; but he could not prevent that celebrated reformer from being heard in that diet. He publiſhed ſeveral works, and died at Rome, in 1542.

ALEANDER, (JEROME), ſecretary to Cardinal Octavius Bendini, and afterwards to Cardinal Francis Barbirini, was a famous lawyer, and one of the moſt learned men in the 7th century. He publiſhed, 1. A commentary upon the inſtitutions of Caius. 2. A volume of poems. 3. A vindication of the Adonis of the Chevalier Marino, and other pieces. He died in 1631.

ALECTO, in heathen mythology, one of the three Eumenides or Furies. See EUMENIDES.

ALECTROMANTIA, in Grecian antiquity, a kind of divination performed by means of a cock, in the following manner. Having drawn a circle on the ground, they divided it into twenty-four parts, in each of which they wrote one of the letters of the alphabet, and on each letter laid a grain of wheat; a cock was then placed in the circle, when thoſe letters, out of which he picked the corns, being joined together, were thought to expreſs the expected anſwer.

ALECTRYO, in pagan mythology, a youth ſo much in favour with Mars, that he intruſted him with his ſecrets, and particularly his adultery with Venus; but ſetting him to watch the door, to prevent their being ſurpriſed by the ſun, Alectryo fell aſleep, and the lovers were diſcovered; on which Mars was ſo exaſperated, that he changed him into a cock, which ſtill remembering the effects of its drowſineſs, watches the ſun ſo ſtrictly as to give notice of its firſt approach.

ALEGAMBE, (PHILIP) a celebrated Jeſuit, born at Bruſſels, on the 22d of January, 1592. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by publiſhing a Bibliotheque of the writers of his order, and died at Rome, September 6, 1652.

ALEGRETTE, a ſmall town of Portugal, in Alentejo, on the confines of Port Alegre, on the river Caja, which falls into the Guadiana, a little below Bajadoz, near the frontiers of Spaniſh Eſtramadura. It is a very pretty town, and has a charming ſituation, ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt of Port Alegre, and thirty north of Elvas. Long. 5. 20. W. Lat. 39. 6. N.

ALENZON, a large handſome town of France, in lower Normandy, with the title of a dutchy. It is ſurrounded with good walls, and flanked with towers. The caſtle was formerly a place of great conſequence, and has held out long ſieges. It has but one pariſh church, which has a bold noble front. Among the nunneries, that of St. Clair is moſt remarkable. It is ſeated on the river Sarte, in a vaſt open plain, which produces all ſorts of corn and fruit. Near it there are quarries of ſtone, fit for building, wherein are found a ſort of ſtones like Briſtol ſtones. The linen made at Alenzon is very good, and ſells well at Paris. It is 20 miles north of Mans, 63 ſouth by weſt of Rouen, and 88 ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 10. Lat. 48. 25. N.

ALENTAKIN, a ſmall province of Eſthonia, on the gulph of Finland, of which Narva is the capital.

ALENTEJO, a province of Portugal, between the rivers of Tajo and Guadiana: The ſoil is very fertile, and the inhabitants laborious and induſtrious. The principal town is Ebora.

ALEPPO, or HALEB, the metropolis of Syria, is built on eight ſmall hills or eminences, on the higheſt of which the caſtle is erected, and is now generally agreed to be the ancient Beræa. This mount is of a conic form, and ſeems in a great meaſure to be raiſed with the earth thrown up out of a deep broad ditch, which ſurrounds it. The ſuburbs to the north-north-eaſt are next in height to this, and thoſe to the weſt-ſouth-weſt are much lower than the parts adjacent, and than any other part of the city. It is encompaſſed by an old wall not a little decayed, and a broad ditch, now in moſt places turned into gardens. It is about three miles and a half in circumference, but the ſuburbs eight. The houſes conſiſt of a ground floor, generally arched, of an upper ſtory which is flat on the top, and either terraced with hard plaſter, or paved with ſtone: The apartments are placed on each ſide of a ſtone court; the ceilings are of wood neatly painted, and ſometimes gilt, as are alſo the window ſhutters, the pannels of ſome of their rooms, and the cup-board doors, of which they have a great number. Theſe, taken together, have a very agreeable effect. Over the doors and windows, on the inſide, are written paſſages out of the Koran, or verſes of their own compoſition. The court yard is neatly paved, and has generally a baſon, with a jet d'eau in the middle, on one or both ſides of which a ſmall ſpot of a yard or two ſquare is left unpaved for a garden. The verdure, the flowers in pots, and the playing of the fountain, produce a very agreeable effect, but they can only be ſeen by thoſe within, for the paſſage into the ſtreet is cloſed with double doors, ſo contrived, that there is no looking in when the doors are opened; beſides, there are no windows to the ſtreet, except a very few in the upper rooms, which render the ſtreets very diſagreeable to Europeans.

The better ſort of houſes have an arched alcove in the court, open to the north, and oppoſite to the fountain. The pavement of this alcove is raiſed about a foot and a half above the pavement of the court, which ſerves for a divan. Between this and the fountain the pavement is generally of Moſaic work, made with marble of various colours; as is alſo the floor of a large hall, with a cupola roof, which commonly has a fountain in the middle, and is a cool room in the ſummer-time. The divan is that part of a room in a Turkiſh houſe raiſed above the floor, and is covered with a carpet in winter, and in ſummer with fine matts. Along the ſides are thick mattraſſes, about three feet wide, and commonly covered with ſcarlet cloth. There are likewiſe large bolſters of brocade, ſtuffed with cotton, ſet againſt the walls to lean upon: On theſe they ſit croſs-legged, for they have no chairs.

People of faſhion have but one or two rooms below ſtairs, for themſelves, in the outer court, the reſt are for the ſervants, and ſtabling. Above ſtairs is a colonnade, if not round the whole court, at leaſt fronting the weſt; behind which are their rooms and kioſks. Theſe laſt are a ſort of wooden divans, that project a little way from the other part of the building, and hang over into the ſtreet. They are raiſed about a foot and a half higher than the floor of the room, to which they are quite open, and by having windows in front, and on each ſide, there is a great draught of air, which renders them cool in ſummer. Beyond this court is another, containing the womens apartments, built in the ſame manner as other houſes. Some few have a garden and a tall cypreſs tree. There is likewiſe one of theſe in the outward yard.

The moſques in Aleppo are numerous, and ſome few of them magnificent. Before each of them is an area, with a fountain in the middle, deſigned for ablutions before prayers, and behind ſome of the larger there are little gardens. There are many large khans, or caravanſerais, conſiſting of a capacious ſquare, on all ſides of which are a number of rooms, built on a ground floor, uſed occaſionally for chambers, ware-houſes, or ſtables. Above ſtairs there is a colonade or gallery on every ſide, in which are the doors of a number of ſmall rooms, wherein the merchants, as well ſtrangers as natives, tranſact moſt of their buſineſs. The ſtreets are narrow, but well paved, and kept very clean.

The bazars or market-places are long covered narrow ſtreets, on each ſide of which are a great number of ſmall ſhops, juſt ſufficient to hold the tradeſman and his goods, the buyer being obliged to ſtand without. Each ſeparate branch of buſineſs has a particular bazar, which is locked up as well as the ſtreets, an hour and a half after ſun ſet: but the locks are of wood, though the doors are caſed with iron. The ſlaughter houſes are in the ſuburbs, open to the fields. The tanners have a khan to work in near the river. To the ſouthward in the ſuburbs they burn lime, and a little beyond that there is a village where they make ropes and catgut. On the oppoſite ſide of the river, to the weſtward, there is a glaſs-houſe, where they make a coarſe white glaſs, in the winter only, for the greateſt part of this manufacture is brought from a village thirty-five miles weſtward.

The city is ſupplied with good water from ſprings, near the banks of the river Heylen, about five miles to the north-eaſt, which is conveyed from thence by an aquæduct, and diſtributed all over the town by earthen pipes. This is ſufficient for drinking, cookery, &c. but the fountains are ſupplied by wells of brackiſh water, of which there is one in every houſe. Their fuel is wood and charcoal in the houſe; but they heat their bagnios with the dung of animals, leaves of plants, parings of fruit, and the like.

The rivulet Wic paſſes along the weſtern part of the city, within a few yards of the walls, and ſerves to water a narrow ſlip of gardens on its banks, which reach from about five miles, to three miles ſouth of the town. There are likewiſe gardens near a village called Bab Allah, about two miles to the north-eaſt, which are ſupplied by the aquæduct. The riſing grounds above the gardens are in ſome places laid out in vineyards, interſperſed with olive, fig, and piſtachio trees, and in ſome ſpots where there are no gardens. The villages are deſtitute of trees and water, there being no other ſtream for twenty or thirty miles round; and therefore they ſave the rain water in ciſterns.

The ſeaſons are ſo regular, and the air ſo healthy, pure, and free from damps, that all the inhabitants ſup and ſleep in the court-yards, or on the houſe tops, from the end of May to the middle of September. The ſeverity of the winter continues only from the 12th of December to the 20th of January, when the air is exceſſively piercing; and yet the ice, even in ſhady places, is ſeldom ſtrong enough to bear a man, and the ſnow very ſeldom lies above a day. Narciſſuſes, hyacinths, and violets, blow during this weather. In February the fields are clothed with an agreeable verdure, to which the ſpringing up of their latter grain greatly contributes. The almond tree bloſſoms in February, and the trees begin to have leaves the beginning of March. During this month and April, nature aſſumes a gay and delightful appearance; but before the end of May all the fields are parched and barren; only ſome robuſt plants are capable of withſtanding the heat. From this time there is no rain till about the middle of September, when a little generally falls, which refreſhes the air, and beſtows a more agreeable aſpect to the country. For twenty or thirty days after this, the air becomes ſerene and temperate, which ended, the invariable weather begins, and the winter comes on gradually, though the trees retain their leaves till the middle of November. Some begin to make fire at the end of this month, and ſome have none all the year.

The coldeſt winds in the winter blow from between the north-weſt and the eaſt, though thoſe neareſt the eaſt are moſt ſharp: but from the beginning of May to the end of September, the ſame winds are as hot as if they came out of an oven, and yet the water is much cooler than when there is a weſterly wind, which is the coldeſt in the hot months, and is much more frequent; for the hot winds blow very ſeldom, but when they do, they bring on a faintneſs, attended with difficulty of breathing, which obliges the inhabitants to cloſe their doors and windows.

The inhabitants of Aleppo, though of different religions, ſeem to be much the ſame ſort of people. The number of ſouls in the city and ſuburbs is computed at about two hundred and thirty-five thouſand, of whom two hundred thouſand are Turks, thirty thouſand Chriſtians, and five thouſand Jews. Of the Chriſtians the greater number are Greek, next to them the Armenians, then the Syrians, and, laſtly, the Maronites, each of whom have a church in the city called Judida, in which quarter, and the parts adjacent, moſt of them reſide. The common language is the vulgar Arabic, but the Turks of condition uſe the Turkiſh. Moſt of the Armenians can ſpeak the Armenian; ſome few Syrians underſtand Syriac, and many of the Jews, Hebrew; but ſcarce one of the Greeks underſtand a word of Greek; however, in their manners, they are all much alike.

Aleppo is 70 miles eaſt of Scanderoon, on the ſea coaſt, and 175 north-by-eaſt of Damaſcus. Long. 37. 40. E. Lat. 36. 12. N.

ALES, or HALES, (ALEXANDER) a celebrated Engliſh divine, of the order of the Cordeliers, called the Irrefragable Doctor, and the Fountain of Life, taught Philoſophy and Divinity at Paris, where he died, in 1245. He compoſed a Body of Divinity by order of Innocent IV. which is the only work certainly known to be his.

ALES, (ALEXANDER,) in Latin Aleſius, a celebrated divine of the confeſſion of Augſbourg, was born at Edinburgh, April 23, 1500. He very early entered the liſts againſt Luther, but beginning to waver, he was perſecuted, and obliged to fly to Germany, where his doubts being removed, he embraced Lutheraniſm, and perſevered in it till his death, which happened on the 27th of March, 1565. He wrote a Commentary on St. John, on the Epiſtles to Timothy, and on the Pſalms, &c.

ALESHAM, a ſmall neat town in Norfolk, with a market on Tueſdays, and two fairs, on March 23, and the laſt Tueſday in September, for lean cattle, ordinary horſes, and petty chapmen. It is 15 miles north of Norwich, and 121 north-eaſt-by-north of London. Lon. 19. 1. E. Lat. 52. 53. The town conſiſts of about four hundred pretty good houſes, but the ſtreets are narrow, tho' well paved.

ALESSANO, a ſmall town of Naples, in the kingdom of Naples, with a biſhop's ſee, and the title of a duchy. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth-eaſt of Otranto. Long. 19. 27. E. Lat. 40. 12. N.

ALESSO, or ALESSIO, a town of Turky in Europe, in the province of Albania, with a ſtrong fort, and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on one ſide of the gulph of Venice, near the mouth of the river Drin, twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Antivari, and forty weſt of Albanopoli. Long. 20. 16. E. Lat. 41. 48. N.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT, the ſon of Philip, king of Macedon, and Olympia, was born at Pella, three hundred and fifty-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra. In his youth, he broke the horſe called Bucephalus, which no other perſon dared to ride, ſaved the life of his father in battle, became the admiration of the moſt experienced commanders, and gained the affection of the people by his good offices and liberality. Having ſucceeded his father when twenty years of age, he conquered Thrace and Illyrium, deſtroyed Thebes, and at the taking of that city, preſerved Pindar's houſe and family, on account of his poems. He then declared war againſt the Perſians, forced the paſſage of the Granicus, ſubdued, with ſurpriſing rapidity, Lydia, Ionia, Caria, Pamphilia, and Cappadocia. At length, he defeated the army of Darius near the Iſſus, took his treaſures, and made a great number of of prisoners, among which were the mother, the wife, the son and two daughters of that unfortunate prince. We cannot sufficiently praise his noble behaviour to those princesses: This is, perhaps, the most beautiful incident in his whole life. The victory of the Issus was followed by the reduction of many important cities and provinces. After the taking of Tyre, he marched against the Jews, with whom he was offended; but Jaddus, their high-priest, meeting him, and shewing him the book of Daniel, where it is written, that a Grecian prince would destroy the empire of the Persians, he obtained of him whatever he asked. From thence Alexander going into Egypt, built Alexandria: at length, he defeated Darius at the battle of Arbella, three hundred and thirty years before Christ. The unhappy death of that prince, massacred by the traitor Bessus, made the conqueror shed tears. At last, having defeated king Porus, and extended his conquests even into India, he died at Babylon, either by poison or a drunken debauch, aged thirty-two, three hundred and twenty-four years before the Christian æra.

Alexander was of the middling size, and rather short than tall; his neck bent a little forward; he had a sparkling eye, and an elevated look. He had an insatiable desire after the false glory of being a great conqueror; to which he added an unhappy fondness for Bagoas, an eunuch, and the foolish vanity of passing for the son of Jupiter, which has made some authors imagine that he was not Philip's son, but that of Nectenabo, one of the Egpptian magi, who was a lover of Olympias. Passion and wine also led him to commit the greatest extravagancies, of which he himself was ashamed, especially of his putting Clytus to death. Setting aside these and some other vices, he was a most accomplished prince: he had a particular regard for the sciences, and for learned men; he always honoured Aristotle his preceptor; he loaded him with wealth, and, in the midst of his conquest, sent him eight hundred talents, (a prodigious sum) to enable him to pursue his enquiries into natural history; he was so fond of Homer, that he always carried him about him. He would never suffer more than three men to represent his person, Praxiteles in sculpture, Lysippus in casting figures, and the celebrated Apelles in painting.

ALEXANDER (JANNEUS) king of the Jews, the brother of Aristobulus, and the son of Hircanus, was a very cruel prince, and killed himself by immoderate drinking, seventy-nine years before Christ.

ALEXANDER (SEVERUS) emperor of Rome, succeeded Heliogabalus, in 208. He conquered the Germans and Persians, and was murdered, by order of Maximinus, at Sichlengen, near Mentz, in 235. He was a just and amiable prince, a lover of the arts and sciences, and of all the employments that contribute to the happiness of a people. One Turinus, who had a share in his confidence, collected sums of money by making people believe that he would advance them, by representing them in a favourable light to the emperor. Alexander ordered him to be put to death, by being fastened to a stake surrounded with lighted straw and wet wood, while a herald cried, "The seller of smoke is punished with smoke." This prince had a great inclination to the Christian religion, and would never permit the pompous titles to be given him that were bestowed on his predecessors.

ALEXANDER, bishop of Jerusalem, celebrated for his piety, his learning, and his sufferings, died in prison, in 203. He had an affection for Origen, and had collected a fine library at Jerusalem.

ALEXANDER (St.) bishop of Alexandria, was the successor of Achillas. He excommunicated Arius, assisted at the council of Nice, and died in a very advanced age, in 326.

ALEXANDER I. (St.) whom St. Irenæus reckons the fifth bishop of Rome, succeeded St. Evaristus, in the year 109, and died in the year 119. There is no account of his life; and the epistles which are attributed to him are supposititious. He was succeeded by St. Sixtus.

ALEXANDER II. a native of the Milanese, whose real name was Anselm. He was bishop of Lucca, when he was elected pope, in 1061, after the death of Nicholas II. but Agnes, the wife of Henry IV. being prejudiced against him by Guibert, governor of Italy, and solicited by the bishops of Lombardy, opposed his election, and caused Cadalous, bishop of Parma, who took the name of Honorius II. to be also advanced to the papal chair, which gave rise to a schism, which, notwithstanding its being condemned by several councils, lasted till his death. Alexander II. recovered the countries that had been usurped by the Norman princes, and died on the 22d of April, 1073. He wrote a great number of epistles, and was succeeded by Hildebrand, who assumed the name of Gregory VIII.

ALEXANDER III. a native of Sienna, cardinal and chancellor of the Roman church, was elected pope, after the death of Adrian IV. on the 7th of September, 1159, when the cardinals John Morson and Guy de Crême, being dissatisfied with his election, chose Octavian, who took the name of Victor IV. and the emperor, Frederic Barbarossa, caused him to be acknowledged in a council held on the 12th of February, 1160. Some time after, Victor dying, Guy de Crême was chosen in his room, under the name of Paschal III. who also dying, John, abbot of Sturm, was elected under the title of Calixtus III. In short, after great disturbances, a reconciliation was brought about at an interview between Alexander III. and the emperor, and Calixtus, the antipope, abjured the schism, which did not prevent his party electing another, whom they named Innocent III. Long before this, Alexander went to France, where he was received by king Lewis the Young with great respect. He took part with Becket against Henry II. king of England, and at last procured a kind of reconciliation between them. He granted several privileges to the doge of Venice, and was the author of the Venetian ceremony of marrying the sea on Ascension-day. In short, he endeavoured to extend the power of the church, and confined to the sovereign pontiff alone the canonization of saints, though this right was before invested in all metropolitans. He wrote many epistles, and died at Rome, on the 30th of August, 1181.

ALEXANDER IV. nephew to pope Gregory IX. and Innocent III. succeeded Innocent IV. on the 25th of December, 1254. He opposed Mainfroy, the natural son of the emperor Frederic, and gave the investiture of Sicily to prince Edmund, son to the king of England. After the example of his uncle Gregory IX. he sided with the religious mendicants against the university of Paris; and, in 1255, at the desire of St. Lewis, established inquisitors in France. He sent the bishop of Orvietta to Theodore Lascaris to unite the Greek and Latin churches, and resolved to renew the war against the infidels; but these projects produced no effect. He granted dispensations and extraordinary privileges, with a facility of which there are but few examples, and died at Viterbo, on the 25th of May, 1261. He was succeeded by Urban IV.

ALEXANDER V. a poor mendicant of the island of Candia, became cordelier and doctor of the Sorbonne, then bishop of Novarre, at length archbishop of Milan, and a prince of the holy Roman empire, and at last was elected pope at the council of Pisa, in 1409. He was used to say, that he could never, like his predecessors, be tempted to aggrandize his relations, since he never knew either a father, a mother, a brother, a sister, or a nephew. He died in 1410.

ALEXANDER VI. born at Valencia in Spain, was elected pope on the 11th of August, 1492. He distributed his whole fortune in bribing the suffrages. While cardinal, he had four sons and one daughter by Vanotia, a Roman lady, the wife of Dominic Arimano. The second of these sons, named Cæsar Borgia, was cardinal, and at length duke of Valentinois; and for this son the pope had such an affection, that, to advance him, he overturned all laws divine and human, sacrificing every thing to his avarice and ambition, usurping the possessions of others, and setting up benefices to sale, which occasioned this distich:

Vendit Alexander claves altaria Christum.
Vendere jure potest, emerat ille prius.

Promotion now by Alexander's sold,
Who barters God and godliness for gold;
And righteously, no doubt, he gets the pelf,
Since he but vends that which he bought himself.

But this pope attempting to poison several cardinals, in order to seize their fortunes, was poisoned himself, and died on the 8th of August, 1503, aged seventy-two years. See the article BORGIA.

ALEXANDER VII. whose real name was Fabio Chigi, was born at Sienna, on the 16th of February, 1599. His family seeing he was a hopeful youth, sent him young to Rome, where he soon engaged the friendship of the marquis Pallavicini, who recommended him so effectually to pope Urban VIII. that he soon procured him the post of inquisitor at Malta; after which, he was made cardinal and secretary of state by pope Innocent X. and in the year 1655 was chosen pope by the votes of all the sixty-four cardinals who were in the conclave. After the election he was carried, according to custom, to St. Peter's church, there to receive the adoration of the cardinals upon the great altar; but while they were paying it, he continued prostrate on the ground, with a crucifix in his arms. When he was arrived at his apartment in the Vatican, he ordered that his coffin should be made and put under his bed, that the continual thoughts of death might put him in mind of leading a holy life. Another remarkable circumstance in his life was his affability to strangers. Some English gentlemen at Rome, desirous to be witnesses of it, one day mixed with those who went to pay their respects to him on their knees. The pope asked them who they were, and afterwards whether they were not Proteſtants, which they owned; whereupon his holineſs ſaid, with a ſmiling countenance, "Get up then, I will "not ſuffer you to commit what, in your opinion, is an "act of idolatry. I ſhall not give you my bleſſing, ſince "you do not believe me to be what I am; but I will pray "to God, that he will pleaſe to render you capable of re-"ceiving it." He loved the belles lettres, and to talk with learned men upon poetry, hiſtory, and politics, and was fond of ſtately buildings. He embelliſhed the city of Rome; gave ſatisfaction to the king of France on the inſult received by the duke of Crequi his ambaſſador; confirmed the bull publiſhed by pope Innocent X. againſt the five famous propoſitions of Janſenus, and gave encouragement to men of learning. He died in 1667. His poems were printed at the Louvre, in 1656, in folio.

ALEXANDER VIII. was born at Venice, on the 10th of April, 1610. He was the ſon of Mark Ottoboni, great chancellor of that republic, and ſucceeded pope Innocent XI. on the 6th of October, 1689. He gave conſiderable ſums, both to the emperor Leopold I. and the Venetians, to enable them to carry on a war againſt the Turks, and advanced his family in a very ſhort time; when it being repreſented to him, that he ſhewed too much eagerneſs and precipitation in promoting them, he obſerved, that he had been pope twenty-three hours and a half. He died a few months after, on the 1ſt of February, 1691, and was ſucceeded by Innocent XII.

ALEXANDER I. ſurnamed the Fierce, king of Scotland, was the ſon of Malcolm, and in the beginning of his reign was much diſquieted by the rebellions of his barons, and by robbers who plundered the people; but ſuppreſſing both, he reigned ſeventeen years, and died without iſſue, in 1124.

ALEXANDER II. aſcended the throne of Scotland in 1214, and took the city of Carliſle from Henry III. king of England, which was afterwards exchanged for Berwick. He reigned thirty-five years, and died in 1242, at fifty-one years of age.

ALEXANDER III. was crowned king of Scotland in 1249. The Cummings, lords of Scotland, took arms againſt him, and taking him priſoner, confined him at Striveling; but he was afterwards releaſed by his ſubjects. He married the daughter of Henry III. king of England, and was at length killed by a fall from his horſe, on the 10th of April, 1290, after his having reigned forty-two, or, according to others, thirty-ſeven years.

ALEXANDER FARNESE, cardinal, one of the greateſt and moſt pious prelates of the ſixteenth century, died on the ſecond of March, 1589. He was uſed to ſay, that he found nothing more inſupportable than a cowardly ſoldier and an ignorant eccleſiaſtic.

ALEXANDER FARNESE, duke of Parma and Placentia, and one of the greateſt generals in the ſixteenth century, ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Lepanto, and brought all the Netherlands, of which he was governor, under the obedience of Spain. He died at Arras, on the 2d of December, 1592, of the wounds he had received at the ſiege of Rouen.

There have been many other princes of this name.

ALEXANDER NEQUAM, or NECKHAM. See NECKHAM.

ALEXANDER (WILLIAM) an eminent nobleman, ſtateſman, and poet of Scotland, in the reigns of king James and king Charles I. His poetry for purity and elegance is far beyond moſt of the productions of the age in which he lived. He wrote, 1. A collection of poems, entitled Aurora. 2. Four tragedies, viz. Crœſus, Darius, The Alexandrian, and Julius Cæſar. 3. Dooms-Day, a poem; and other pieces. He projected the ſettlement of Nova-Scotia, was made lieutenant of that country, and created earl of Stirling, and ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland. He died February 12, 1640.

ALEXANDER AB ALEXANDRO, a Neapolitan lawyer of great learning, flouriſhed about the year 1521. He wrote, 1. Four Diſſertations on the wonderful Things which had then lately happened in Italy. 2. Dies Geniales; and other pieces.

ALEXANDER (NOEL or NATALIS) a Dominican friar, and one of the moſt laborious writers of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Rouen, in Normandy, January 19, 1639, was made doctor of the Sorbonne, in 1675, and died at Paris on the 21ſt of Auguſt, 1724. He wrote, in Latin, 1. An Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, in twenty-ſix volumes, octavo, 2. Theologia Dogmatica, &c. i. e. Poſitive and Moral Divinity, according to the Order of the Catechiſm of the Council of Trent, in ten volumes, octavo. 3. A Commentary upon the four Goſpels, in folio; and many other voluminous works.

ALEXANDRA, the daughter of Hyrcanius, and the wife of Alexander, the ſon of Ariſtobulus, king of the Jews, and the mother of Ariſtobulus, the high prieſt, and Mariamne, the wife of Herod the Great. The ambition and enterpriſing ſpirit of this princeſs occaſioned her deſtruction and that of her family. She had recourſe to the famous Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, whom ſhe deſired to procure from Antony the poſt of high-prieſt for her ſon. Herod was no ſooner acquainted with theſe ſecret practices, than pretending to be reconciled to her, he conferred that dignity on Ariſtobulus. The mother and ſon knew Herod too well not to apprehend that, by this ſeeming favour, he intended their deſtruction. They, however, diſſembled their ſuſpicions, but reſolving to ſcreen themſelves from that monarch's reſentment, contrived cheſts in the form of coffins, in which they were to conceal themſelves, and thus be ſecretly conveyed to Cleopatra, their protectreſs. Herod being informed of this project, prevented its being put in execution, and cauſed the high-prieſt to be drowned. Alexandra, more exaſperated than ever againſt the tyrant, revolved in her mind a thouſand projects of revenge, which the fear of a diſcovery prevented her executing. She ſent to Hyrcanius, her father, to attempt a revolution, and perſuaded him to retire among the Arabs, by whoſe aſſiſtance he might be enabled to re-aſcend the throne. The good old man, leſs from ambition than affection for his daughter, prepared to follow her advice; but Herod prevented him, and cauſed him to be put to death. The ſame king alſo took away the life of Mariamne, who had loved him with an extraordinary affection. Alexandra ſhewed, on this occaſion, how much fear is capable of ſubduing the mind; ſhe ſeemed to approve of Herod's cruelty, and carried her flattery ſo far as to pretend that her daughter had deſerved the death ſhe ſuffered; but her diſſimulation could not conceal her views; for the tyrant, diſcovering that ſhe continued her intrigues, and endeavoured to render herſelf miſtreſs of two fortreſſes in Jeruſalem, cauſed her to be put to death in the twenty-eighth year before the birth of Chriſt.

ALEXANDRETTA, which the Turks call Scanderoon, is a town in Syria, at the extremity of the Mediterranean Sea. It is the port of Aleppo, from which it is diſtant twenty-eight or thirty leagues. It is little elſe now but a heap of ruined houſes, which are chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who keep tippling-houſes for ſailors. The air is very unwholeſome; and therefore the better ſort of inhabitants, during the hot weather, go and live at a village called Bayland, on a mountain about ten miles off, where there is wholeſome water and excellent fruit. That which ſurprizes ſtrangers moſt, when they arrive at this place, are the pigeons which carry letters to Aleppo, which they reach in about three hours: theſe pigeons are of a ſingular kind, and are very much celebrated throughout the Eaſt. Long. 37. 5. E. Lat. 36. 35. N.

ALEXANDRIA, in Egypt, otherwiſe called Skanderia by the Turks, was formerly a rich, famous, and beautiful city, firſt founded by Alexander the Great. It is now ſo far ruined, that in many places the heaps of rubbiſh over-top the higheſt houſes. The foreigners are lodged in places called fundicks, which are like the caravanſeras or public inns. Nothing now remains of old Alexandria but the walls and ſome buildings almoſt ruined near the French fundick; for thoſe at preſent near the ſea-ſide were built by the Turks, as may be readily perceived by their faſhion, for they are all low ill-ſhaped houſes.

This city has three ports, the firſt of which is called the Old Port, which is large, and yet but few veſſels come in on account of the difficulty of the entrance: there are two caſtles on each ſide to defend it. The two others are only divided by a ſmall iſland formerly called the Pharos, which was farther from the land than it is at preſent, for it is now joined thereto by a ſtone bridge of ſeveral arches, through which the water runs. In the middle of the iſland there is a ſquare tower, which is the magazine of the grand ſeignor's powder. At the end of the iſland is a chapel, called Farillon, built where the Pharos ſtood, which was once ſaid to be one of the ſeven wonders of the world.

Some parts of the old walls of the city are yet ſtanding. They are flanked with large towers, about two hundred paces diſtant from each other, with ſmall ones in the middle. Below are magnificent caſemates, which may ſerve for galleries to walk in. In the lower part of the towers is a large ſquare hall, whoſe roof is ſupported by thick columns of Thebaic ſtone. Above this are ſeveral rooms, over which there are platforms more than twenty paces ſquare.

The next piece of antiquity is the pillar of Pompey, which ſtands upon an eminence, about two hundred paces from the city, and is placed upon a ſquare pedeſtal about ſeven or eight feet high; the pedeſtal ſtands upon a ſquare baſe, one of whoſe ſides is twenty feet. Sandys ſays, it is thirty-ſix palms round, and eighty-ſix in height, each palm conſiſting of nine inches. It is a ſingle ſtone, which ſome called Theban marble, others granite. On the top is a very fine capital. It is hard to ſay what machines they had in former times to raiſe ſuch a vaſt ſtone as this; for Thevenot, in his laſt viſit, by meaſuring the ſhadow, found it to be ſeventy-five royal feet of Paris, which is equal to eighty Engliſh.

A few

A few paces from hence ſtood Cæſar's palace; but there remains little elſe but a few porphyry pillars and the front, which is almoſt entire, and looks very beautiful. The palace of Cleopatra was built upon the walls facing the port, having a gallery on the outſide, ſupported by ſeveral fine columns. Not far from Cleopatra's palace are two obeliſks: one of theſe is thrown down and almoſt buried in the ſand; and though the other ſtands upright, the pedeſtal is hid by the ſand that ſurrounds it. They are of granite; and each of the four ſides are covered with hieroglyphics.

About ſeventy paces from Pompey's pillar, is the khalis, or the canal of the Nile, which was dug by the ancient Egyptians, to convey the water of the Nile to Alexandria, and fill the ciſterns under the city. On the ſide of the khalis, are gardens full of orange and lemon trees; and the fields are full of caper and palm-trees. On the top of a hill is a tower, on which a centinel is always placed to give notice of the ſhips that are coming into the port, by means of a flag. From this hill may be ſeen the ſea, the whole extent of the city, and the parts round it.

On the ſouth-weſt ſide of the city, at a mile's diſtance, there are catacombs cut out of a rock, which thoſe that enter muſt creep upon all four; but the roof is ten feet high: on each ſide are ſepu'chres, cut out of the rock, of which there are four rows one above another. The bones in theſe places were very hard and looked very freſh. Over-againſt this there is another, that runs a long way, but will not admit a man to ſtand upright. Theſe were doubtleſs burying-places belonging to the city. The Romans called ſuch places catacombs. Alexandria is about fifty leagues north of Cairo. Long. 31. 15. E. Lat. 31. 12. N.

ALEXANDRIA, a ſtrong and conſiderable city of Italy, in the Alexandrin, belonging to the duchy of Milan, with a good caſtle built in 1178, in honour of pope Alexander III. This pope made it a biſhopric, with ſeveral privileges and exemptions. Prince Eugene of Savoy took this city in 1706, after three days ſiege. The French took it in 1745; but the king of Sardinia, to whom it belongs by the treaty of Utrecht, retook it in 1746. The fortifications of the town are triffing, but the citadel is conſiderable. It is fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Caſal, thirty-five north-by-weſt of Genoa, and forty ſouth-by-weſt of Milan. Long. 8. 40. E. Lat. 44. 53. N. The country about this town is called the Alexandrin.

ALEXIUS COMNENES, emperor of Conſtantinople, uſurped the throne from Nicephorus Botoniates; but he was at laſt conquered by the croiſaders, in the battle of Epidamnus, in 1067, He died in 1118.

ALEXIUS MICHALOWITZ, czar of Muſcovy, ſucceeded Michael, his father, in 1645, took Smolenſko, with great part of Lithuania, in 1654, and died in 1676.

ALEXIUS, a Piedmonteſe, was born of a noble family, and was acquainted with the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Arabic, and ſeveral other languages. He travelled fifty-ſeven-years in order to learn the ſecrets of nature, and piqued himſelf upon not communicating them to any body; but having ſeen a poor ſick man die, whom he could have cured, had he communicated his ſecret to the ſurgeon who took care of him, he was ſeized with ſuch remorſe of conſcience, that he became almoſt a hermit, put his ſecrets in order, and a ſelect collection of them was printed at Baſil, in 1563.

AL-FARGANENSIS (AHMED EBN COTHAIR) or AL-FRAGANIUS, a celebrated Arabian aſtronomer, flouriſhed in the time of khalif Al-Maimoun, who died in 833. He wrote an Introduction to Aſtronomy, on which Abulfaragus beſtowed great praiſes; Golius printed it at Amſterdam, in 1669, with very curious notes.

ALFENUS VARUS (PUBLIUS) born at Cremona, was firſt a ſhoemaker, then a diſciple of the celebrated lawyer Servius Sulpitius, and at length conſul. He wrote forty books of Digeſts, and ſome books of Collections, which are quoted by Aulus Gellius.

ALFIDENA, an ancient town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Hither Abruzzo, with the title of a marquiſate. Long 14 5. E. Lat. 41. 18. N.

ALFONSO, or ALPHONSO, IX. king of Leon and Caſtile, ſurnamed the Noble and Good, aſcended the throne in 1158, when but four years of age. He recovered by conqueſt all that his neighbours uſurped from him during his infancy, but was defeated by the Moors, and wounded in the thigh, in a great battle fought in 1195: however, he ſome time after took his revenge, by defeating them in a battle in which he killed twenty thouſand men: he alſo gained a ſignal victory over them at the battle of Muradat, in 1212, where they loſt near one hundred thouſand foot and thirty thouſand horſe. This prince died in 1214, aged ſixty.

ALFONSO, or ALPHONSO, X. king of Leon and Caſtile, celebrated for his application to aſtronomy, aſcended the throne in 1252. The firſt difficulties he fell into were occaſioned by his reſolution to divorce his queen, on account of her ſterility, and ſending to the court of Denmark for another; but the queen's pregnancy prevented her diſgrace, and ſhe had afterwards nine children. Alfonſo had the unhappineſs of being neither beloved by his ſubjects nor by the neighbouring kings; and yet his learning, knowledge, eloquence, and policy made a great noiſe in diſtant countries, and induced one part of the German electors to confer the imperial crown on him, while the other part choſe Richard, earl of Cornwall; but Alfonſo not going to ſupport the party which elected him by his preſence, his title of emperor had never any reality. He was ſeveral times expoſed by the repeated conſpiracies of the grandees, and at length ſaw his ſon Sancho at the head of a powerful faction; and, in a word, prince Emanuel, his uncle, pronounced a ſentence of depoſition againſt him in a full aſſembly of the ſtates. A civil war enſued, which was put an end to by the death of Alfonſo, which happened in the year 1284. He was the firſt king of Caſtile who permitted the public acts to be drawn up in the vulgar tongue. He cauſed the Bible to be tranſlated into the ſame language, was at vaſt expence in aſtronomical obſervations, and was the author of the famous Alfonſine tables.

ALFONSO, or ALPHONSO, XI. king of Leon and Caſtile, ſucceeded his father, Ferdinand IV. in 1312. He, in conjunction with the king of Portugal, killed two hundred thouſand Moors, in a battle fought on the 30th of October, 1340. It is ſaid, that after this battle, the ground was covered with dead bodies for three leagues in compaſs; and that the booty taken at that time was ſo great, that the price of gold fell one ſixth. He died of the plague, at the ſiege of Gibraltar, on the 27th of March, 1350, aged thirty-eight years.

ALFONSO D'ESTE, duke of Ferrara and Modena, had for his implacable enemies pope Julius II. and Leo X. He married Lucretia Borgia, the daughter of pope Alexander VI. and died on the 31ſt of October, 1683.

ALFONSUS, or ALPHONSUS, I. king of Portugal, was the ſon of Henry of Burgundy, of the houſe of France. He defeated five Mooriſh kings at the battle of Ourique, in 1139, and the ſame year aſcended the throne. It is ſaid, that he took for his arms as many bezants, or crown-pieces, as he had conquered kings. He inſtituted the order of Avis, and died at Coimbra, on the 9th of November, 1185, aged ſeventy-ſix.

ALFONSUS V. king of Portugal, ſurnamed the African, from his taking Tangiers, Arzilla, and Alcazar-Chequer, in 1471. He died on the 24th of Auguſt, 1481, at forty-nine years of age. In his reign, the Portugueſe diſcovered Guinea, and brought from thence a great quantity of gold.

ALFONSUS VI. king of Portugal, was born on the 28th of Auguſt, 1643. When ſcarce ſeven years of age, he diſcovered ſigns of madneſs, which afterwards encreaſed with his ambition. His elder brother dying, he came to the throne, under his mother's regency, on the 15th of November, 1656, when his bad qualities encreaſing, he diſregarded all advice, and attended by a number of abandoned fellows, committed, in the night, innumerable outrages in the ſtreets and lewd houſes, which obliging the queen dowager to retire from court, he formed two companies, the one of foot, the other of horſe, which he called his low and high patrole, compoſed of the moſt profligate men in the kingdom. With theſe troops he went out every night, and attacked indifferently all he met. They who accompanied him had generally their ſwords by their ſides without ſcabbards, that they might be the readier to execute his commands; they were generally blacked, that the brightneſs of the ſteel might not betray their deſigns; and thoſe who produced them ſtained with blood were ſure to obtain his praiſe. To ſtop ſome reports that were raiſed of his frigidity, he not only went to lewd houſes, but had lewd women brought to him at his country-ſeat at Alcantara, boaſting publicly, in the moſt filthy terms, of his committing the moſt indecent actions with them; but notwithſtanding this, his queen ſued him for impotency, and obtained not only a divorce, but a diſpenſation for marrying his younger brother Don Pedro, who, on the performance of that ceremony, took poſſeſſion of the palace in 1667, made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon, forced Alfonſus to ſign a writing, in which he declared, that he freely reſigned the kingdom to his brother, who was immediately acknowledged by the ſtates as prince regent. Don Alfonſus was then ſent into the iſland of Tercera, where he continued ſeveral years, and was afterwards removed to the caſtle of Cintra, ſeven leagues from Liſbon, where he died, on the 12th of September, 1683.

ALFONSUS, or ALPHONSUS, I. king of Naples, and V. of Arragon, ſucceeded his father Ferdinand, king of Arragon, in 1416, and being adopted by Jane II. queen of Naples, in conſequence of his delivering her, when beſieged in her capital by Lewis of Anjou, obtained a right to her dominions; but ſhe afterwards cancelling the adoption, he, by his courage and abilities, added that kingdom to his hereditary dominions. He was a prince endowed with noble qualities, was a great lover of literature and learned men, and was the glory and ornament of Spain. He died at Naples, on the 27th of June, 1458, aged ſixty-four, leaving his dominions in Spain to his brother, and the kingdom of Naples to his natural ſon Ferdinand.

ALFONSUS, or ALPHONSUS ZAMORA, a learned Jew, who, being converted to Chriſtianity, was employed by cardinal Ximenes in the Complutenſian Bible. He alſo wrote a Hebrew and Chaldee Dictionary, and ſeveral other works. He died about the year 1530.

ALFONSUS, or ALPHONSUS CASTRO. See CASTRO.

ALFORD, a town in Lincolnſhire, with a market on Tueſdays for proviſions and a little corn, and two fairs, on Whitſun-Tueſday and November 8, for cattle and ſheep. It is ſeated on a ſmall brook that runs through the town, and is a compact place. It is ſix miles from the ſea, and twenty north of Boſton. Long. 0. 15. E. Lat. 53. 30. N.

ALFRED, or ÆLFRED, the Great, king of England, was the fifth and youngeſt ſon of Æthelwolf, king of the Weſt Saxons, and was born at Wantage, in Berkſhire, in 849. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf, during the reign of his brother Ethelred, in ſeveral engagements againſt the Danes, and upon his death ſucceeded to the crown, in the year 871, and the twenty-ſecond of his age. At his aſcending the throne he found himſelf involved in a dangerous war with the Danes, and placed among ſuch circumſtances of diſtreſs as called for the greateſt valour, reſolution, and all the other virtues with which he was adorned. The Danes had already penetrated into the heart of his kingdom; and before he had been a month upon the throne, he was obliged to take the field againſt thoſe formidable enemies. After many battles gained on both ſides, he was at length reduced to the greateſt diſtreſs, and was entirely abandoned by his ſubjects, except by a few of his domeſtics, who were unwilling to forſake him; but as theſe would be an uſeleſs expence, and could be but of little ſervice, he diſmiſſed them all, that he might with the greater eaſe ſhift for himſelf. He then retired to the iſle of Athelney, in Somerſetſhire; and having concealed himſelf there about a year, a more happy ſcene began to open; for being informed of the defeat of the Daniſh troops under Hubba, and the death of the general, he ſent to his friends to let them know where he was; and having conſulted them, gave them orders to draw together, in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, ſmall bodies of troops, that might be ready to join each other at a minute's warning; and, in order to diſcover the ſituation of the enemy, boldly entered the Daniſh camp in the diſguiſe of a harper, and ſtaid amongſt his enemies ſeveral days; when returning to Athelney, and making known the negligence and ill condition of the Daniſh troops, he appointed the Great Wood, now Selwood foreſt, for the rendezvous of all his troops: they aſſembled with the utmoſt ſecrecy and expedition; he appeared before the Danes, at the head of an army, before they had the leaſt intelligence of his motions; and falling upon them in the midſt of their conſternation, gained a complete victory over them at Eddington; and thoſe who eſcaped, flying to a caſtle, were beſieged, and obliged to capitulate. He then agreed to give up the lands of Eaſt-Anglia, to thoſe who conſented to embrace Chriſtianity, and obliged the reſt to give hoſtages for their quitting the iſland. Guthrum, the Daniſh general, with thirty chiefs of the army, and many of the common ſoldiers, were ſoon after baptized, when he gave the general the name of Æthelſtan, and beſtowed on him the kingdoms of Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland, to hold of him by fealty and homage. Alfred now reigned in peace for ſeveral years; till at length another party of Danes arrived, but were by his bravery and prudence entirely defeated. He now built gallies to ſecure the coaſt, fortified the kingdom with caſtles and walls, and that nothing might be wanting to render him abſolute maſter of the kingdom, the Welch ſubmitted to his government.

This prince was the friend of liberty, juſtice, and learning. He drew up an excellent body of laws for the government of the nation, inſtituted the method of trial by juries, divided the kingdom into counties, hundreds, and tythings, regulated the militia, and promoted the intereſts of learning and virtue. He would ſuffer no unlearned perſon to bear office in his reign. He himſelf engaged in the noble employment of improving the minds of his ſubjects, and for this purpoſe wrote little moral ſongs and fables, which he adapted to the humour of the people, and in which he, in the moſt lively manner, expoſed the deformity of the reigning vices, and the lovelineſs of the oppoſite virtues. He alſo wrote, among many other works, an Abridgment of the laws of the Trojans, Greeks, Britons, Saxons, and Danes, and tranſlated the greateſt part of the New Teſtament into Engliſh. This great and excellent prince died on the 28th of October, 900, aged fifty-two, after a reign of twenty-eight years and ſix months.

ALFRED, or ALFRID, natural ſon of Oſwy, king of Northumberland, was made king of Deira by his father; but the Deirians, as ſoon as they heard of Oſwy's death, revolted againſt Alfred, and ſubmitted to Egfrid, Oſwy's legitimate ſon; but that king being afterwards killed in a battle againſt the Picts, and leaving no iſſue, Alfred was ſent for to Ireland, whither he had retired, and invited to take poſſeſſion of the crown of Northumberland, after which he reigned twenty eight years, and dying in 705, was ſucceeded by his ſon Oſred.

ALFRETON, a town in Derbyſhire, ſix miles from Cheſterfield, with a fair for horned cattle on the 30th of July, and a market on Fridays. It is a diſcharged vicarage of ſixteen pounds a year. Long. 0. 35. W. Lat. 53. 6. N.

ALGARVA, a ſouthern province of Portugal, is bounded on the weſt and ſouth by the ocean, on the eaſt by Andaluſia, and on the north by the mountains called Seras de Caldraon, which ſeparate it from Alentejo. It is large, and well watered by many ſmall rivers, and contains four cities, Tavilo, Faro, Silves, and Lagos, a few remarkable towns, and a great number of villages. It produces great plenty of figs, dates, almonds, olives, and excellent wine; but its greateſt advantage is derived from fiſhing. The Moors were in poſſeſſion of this province for one hundred and eighty years, but they were driven from thence by Alphonſo III. about the year 1260.

ALGARVIA, a province of Spain, in the moſt northern part of New Caſtile. It is a very fruitful country.

ALGIERS, or AL-JEZIRAH, one of the ſtates of Barbary in Africa. It has the Mediterranean Sea on the north, mount Atlas on the ſouth, which ſeparates it from Biledulgerid, the kingdom of Fez on the weſt, and that of Tunis on the eaſt. It is about ſix hundred and ſixty miles in length, but in breadth not half ſo much. It is governed by a dey under whom each province has a bey; but it may more properly be called a republic of ſoldiers under the protection of the ſultan of the Turks.

In this province there are a great many ruins of towns and caſtles built by the Romans. The inhabitants of the mountains are divided into ſeveral tribes, who are often at variance among themſelves, and yet will unite againſt the Turks, and are able to raiſe an army of forty thouſand men. Their only weapons are javelins and arrows. When the women are not well uſed, they will elope from their huſbands, and ſeek for refuge in another mountain, carrying their jewels along with them, and what other valuable things they can.

The country about Algiers, the capital city, is very beautiful, and produces plenty of all ſorts of pulſe, fruit, and flowers. It yields a charming proſpect, being diverſified with riſing hills and pleaſant vales, which never loſe their verdure; for there is not only a conſtant ſupply of young graſs, but the trees are full of leaves all the year, which is owing to the coolneſs of the ſoil, it being always well watered, inſomuch that neither the heat of the ſummer nor the coolneſs of winter can ever ſtrip them of their green livery. But at the ſame time we ought to obſerve, that the winters here are always very mild. There are a multitude of vines of a ſurpriſing beauty, which are exceeding fruitful, and often form a kind of natural arbor. The trees begin to bloſſom in February, and in May and June the fruit is ripe. For a dozen miles about Algiers there is a plain terminated by a mountain, in which there are ſaid to be twenty thouſand gardens: there are many without houſes, but only huts made with the branches of trees. Near the city there are handſome country-houſes, where the ſlaves are ſent to keep every thing in order. Beyond the mountain there is another beautiful plain, well watered and very fruitful, being near thirty miles in length. It is called the plain of Mattejar, and corruptly Muteejah. It produces a crop twice, and ſometimes thrice a year. Near the ſea, there are barren ſpots, thick woods, and venomous reptiles.

The fields and gardens are not incloſed with walls, but with Barbary fig-trees, which take root from a leaf that becomes the trunk of the tree, and the leaves which proceed from thence become branches. They are of very quick growth, and being prickly, make excellent hedges, which, being continually green, have a very fine effect. The rind of the fruit is very thick, and not good to eat. Orange, citron, and other fruit-trees are in great plenty, but the fruit is not very tempting, becauſe they never cultivate the trees, but leave every thing to nature.

When women of faſhion go into the country, they ſit croſs-legged upon a ſaddle made fit for that purpoſe, incloſed in a large covering with gauze or twigs woven together, covered with fine white clear linen, and open at the top; through this incloſure they can ſee and not be ſeen.

ALGIERS, a city, is the capital of the above kingdom, and is built on the declivity of a hill by the ſea ſide, in the form of

of an amphitheatre: at ſea it looks like the top-ſail of a ſhip. The tops of the houſes are quite flat and white; inſomuch, that when it is firſt diſcovered, you would take it to be a place where they bleach linen. One houſe riſes above another in ſuch a manner that they do not hinder each other's proſpect. The ſtreets are ſo narrow, that they will ſcarce admit two perſons to walk a-breaſt, and the middle part is lower than the ſides. When any loaded beaſts, ſuch as camels, horſes, mules, or aſſes, paſs along, you are forced to ſtand up cloſe to the wall to let them paſs by. There is but one broad ſtreet, which runs through the city from eaſt to weſt, in which are the ſhops of the principal merchants, the market for corn and other commodities.

The lower part of the walls of the city are of hewn ſtone, and the upper part of brick; they are thirty feet high on the land ſide, and forty towards the ſea; the foſſes, or ditches, are twenty feet broad, and ſeven deep. There is no ſweet water in the city; and though there is a tank or ciſtern in every houſe, yet they often want water, becauſe it rains but ſeldom: the chief ſupply is from a ſpring on a hill, the water of which is conveyed by pipes to above a hundred fountains, at which a bowl is faſtened for the uſe of paſſengers. The common reſervoir is at the end of the mole, where the ſhips take in their water. Every one takes his turn at theſe places, except the Turks, who are firſt, and the Jews laſt.

There are five gates, which are open from ſun-riſing till ſun-ſetting; and ſeven forts, or caſtles, without the walls, the greateſt of which is on the mole without the gate, all of which are well ſupplied with great guns. There are ten large moſques, and fifty ſmall ones; three great colleges, or public ſchools, and a great number of petty ones for children. The houſes are ſquare, and built of ſtone and brick, with a ſquare court in the middle, and galleries all round.

There are ſaid to be about one hundred thouſand inhabitants in the city, comprehending five thouſand Jewiſh families, beſides Chriſtians. There are four fundics, or public inns, ſuch as are in Turky, and ſix cazernes, or barracks, for the unmarried Turkiſh ſoldiers, which will hold ſix hundred each. There are no inns for Chriſtians to lodge in, but only a few tippling-huts kept by ſlaves, for the accommodation of Greeks and the poorer ſort of travellers, where any thing may be had for money. Here are bagnios, or public baths, in the ſame manner as in Turky, at a very moderate rate. The women have baths of their own, where the men dare not come.

Without the city there are a great number of ſepulchres, as alſo cells, or chapels, dedicated to maraboots, or reputed ſaints, which the women go to viſit every Friday. The Turkiſh ſoldiers are great tyrants; for they not only turn others out of the way in the ſtreets, but will go to the farm-houſes in the country for twenty days together, living on free quarters, and making uſe of every thing, not excepting the women. The Algerines eat as in Turky, ſitting croſs-legged, round a table about four inches high, and uſe neither knives nor forks: before they begin every one ſays, Be iſme Allah, in the name of God. When they have done, a ſlave pours water on all their hands as they ſit, and then they waſh their mouths. Their drink is water, ſherbet, and coffee. Wine is not allowed, though drank immoderately by ſome.

They have no phyſicians among them, for they take no internal remedies, for they ſay it is tempting God. One of the deys might have been cured of a fever by an ingenious French ſurgeon who was his ſlave; but he refuſed it, ſaying the number of his days was appointed from all eternity. Long. 3. 30. E. Lat. 36. 40. N.

ALGEZIRA, a town of Andaluſia in Spain, with a port on the coaſts of the Straits of Gibraltar. It was by this city that the Moors entered Spain, in 713; and it was taken from them, after a very long ſiege, in 1344. It was called Old Gibraltar, and is abont four leagues from the New. Long. 5. 2. W. Lat. 36. 0. N.

ALGHIER, or ALGERI, a town in Sardinia, upon the weſtern coaſt of that iſland, between Saſſeri and Boſa. It is a biſhop's ſee. Though it is not large, it is well peopled, and has a commodious port. The coral fiſhed for on this coaſt is in the higheſt eſteem of any in the Mediterranean. Long. 5. 2. W. Lat. 36. 0.

ALGONQUINS, a people of North-America. They are ſavages, and live a wandering life, between the river Ondouac and the lake Ontario.

ALGOW, a territory of Suabia, in Germany, has the lake of Conſtance on the weſt, the river Lech on the eaſt, the Danube on the north, and Tirol on the ſouth. It contains ſeveral free cities, as Iſnes, Wangen, Lindaw, Biberach, Memmingen, &c. and ſeveral ſtates, the principal of which are the biſhopric of Augſburg, the marquiſate of Burgaw, the abbey of Kempten, the barony of Waldbourg, and the counties or earldoms of Konigſeck and Rechberg.

ALHAMA, a city of Spain, in the kingdom of Granada, is ſeated in a narrow valley, ſurrounded with mountains, which are very high and craggy. The ſoil is very fruitful in all things that ſerve for the convenience or pleaſures of life; but nothing has rendered it ſo famous as its baths, which are the moſt agreeable, and are kept in the beſt repair of any in Spain. They are a little below the city, and have ſeveral ſprings, from whence proceed a water ſo clear and fine, that you may ſee the ſmalleſt object on the gravel at the bottom. They are juſt warm enough to bathe in without the help of art; they are accounted very wholeſome when drank, and are uſed both ways for various diſeaſes. The beſt ſeaſons are in March and September. The baths are made of hewn ſtone, with ſteps to go down as deep as you pleaſe. People flock to theſe baths from all parts, partly for health, and partly for pleaſure. A little above there are dreadful rocks, between which runs the Rio Frio, or the Cold River, with a great noiſe, forming ſeveral natural caſcades. The waters of the baths run into the Rio Frio, and with it into the ſea, which is twenty-ſeven miles diſtant. Long. 1. 10. W. Lat. 36. 59. N.

ALHAZEN, a famous Arabian author, who, about the year 1100, compoſed a large volume on Optics, and other works.

ALI, the couſin and ſon-in-law of Mahomet, ought, perhaps, to have been khalif after Mahomet's death, but being oppoſed by Omar and Othman, he retired into Arabia, and there made a collection of the doctrines of Mahomet, in which he permitted many things that were condemned by Abubeker, which gained him many proſelytes. After the death of Othman, he was declared khaliff by the Ægyptians and the inhabitants of Mecca and Medina, in the year of the Hegira 35, and of our Lord 655; but after a reign of four years and three-quarters, he was mortally wounded in a moſque, and died three or four days after, A. D. 660.

Ali had nine wives, who brought him fourteen ſons and eighteen daughters. If we conſider him, with regard to his courage, moderation, piety, and underſtanding, he will be found one of the greateſt men that was ever born among the Arabians. The Perſians annually celebrate the day of his martyrdom, follow his doctrine, and hold the memory of Abubeker, Omar, and Othman, in abhorrence, while the Turks reverence them and deteſt Ali.

ALIA, in Grecian antiquity, ſolemn games annually celebrated at Rhodes, in honour of the Sun. In theſe games, the combatants were not only men, but boys; and the victors were rewarded with a crown of poplar.

ALI BASHA, one of the greateſt commanders the Ottoman empire has produced, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſuch a manner in a war againſt the Perſians, that the emperor Amurath IV. gave him one of his ſiſters in marriage. He died in 1663, aged ſeventy.

ALICANT, a large ſea-port town, in the province of Valencia and territory of Segura. It is ſeated between the mountains and the ſea, and has a caſtle thought impregnable; but ſome think it ſtands too high. The port is defended by three baſtions furniſhed with artillery. It uſed to be often viſited by the Algerine pirates, to prevent which watch-towers were built to give notice to the town of the approach of an enemy's ſhip. It was taken from the Moors in 1264. The caſtle was taken by the Engliſh in 1706, and held out a ſiege of two years before it was retaken by the French and Spaniards, and at laſt ſurrendered upon honourable terms, after part of the rock was blown up on which the caſtle ſtood, and the governor killed. The houſes are high, well built and furniſhed, and a very great trade is carried on here, particularly in wine and fruit. It is ſeated in the Mediterranean, on a bay of the ſame name, thirty-ſeven miles north-eaſt of Murcia, and ſeventy five ſouth of Valencia. Long. 0. 36. W. Lat. 38. 24. N.

ALICATA, a town in Sicily, remarkable for its good wine, is ſeated in a peninſula near the ſea, and was plundered by the Turks in 1543. It is ſituated twenty-eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Girgenti, and fifty ſouth-weſt of Modica. Long. 15. 20. E. Lat. 37. 11. N.

ALITES, in Roman antiquity, a name given to ſuch birds as afforded matter for auguries by their flights.

ALKMAAR (HENRY D') a poet of the fifteenth century, was the author of the Fable of Reynard, a German poem, in which are ingeniouſly repreſented moſt of the faults of mankind, under the character of beaſts, and eſpecially the fox, one of the principal characters. The moral of this poem is very good, the thoughts and the ſtyle have a pleaſing ſimplicity; hence it has been tranſlated into moſt of the languages of Europe. Mr. Gottſched has juſt given a magnificent edition of it in German, adorned with plates, and with ſome preliminary diſſertations on the author, and the merit of the work.

ALLANCHES, a ſmall town of France, in Auvergne, and in the duchy of Mercour. Long. 3. 8. W. Lat. 45. 12. N.

ALLADIUS, ſurnamed the Sacrilegious, on account of his impiety, was king of the Latins, and is ſaid to have counterfeited thunder with machines of his own invention. This was then conſidered as a moſt dreadful crime, for which, we are told, he was killed by thunder from heaven, about the year 855 before the Chriſtian æra.

ALLATIUS (Leo) keeper of the Vatican library, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the ſeventeenth century. He publiſhed ſeveral manuſcripts, ſeveral tranſlations of Greek authors, and ſeveral pieces of his own compoſing. He died at Rome, in 1669, being then eighty-three years old.

ALLEGRANZA, a ſmall iſland of Africa, and one of the Canaries. It lies to the north of Gratioſa, to the north-weſt of Rocca, and to the north-eaſt of St. Clare. There are ſeveral forts built upon it.

ALLEGRE, a town of France, in Auvergne, and the generality of Riom. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, where is a large ſtrong caſtle, which commands the town. On the top of this mountain, there is a great lake. Long. 3. 50. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

ALLEIN (Richard) the ſon of a clergyman of the ſame name, rector of Dichet, in Somerſetſhire, was born in the year 1611, and ſucceeded Richard Bernard in the rectory of Batcomb, in Somerſetſhire, in the year 1641. He was a man of great learning, piety, and an unblameable life, but not being able to come up to the terms of conformity at the Reſtoration, was ejected from his living after he had held it upwards of twenty years. He wrote ſeveral books on religious ſubjects, and died Dec. 2, 1681.

Allein (Joseph) the ſon of Tobias Allein, was born in the Devizes, in Wiltſhire, in 1633, and educated at Oxford. In 1655, he became aſſiſtant to Mr. Newton, in Taunton-Magdalen, in Somerſetſhire; but was deprived for nonconformity. In 1663, he was committed to Ivelcheſter jail, for preaching and praying with his own family and others that were in his houſe, and for this crime was confined in one room with ſeven miniſters and fifty quakers, and fined one hundred marks. He was a man of great learning, and greater charity, and his writings breathe a deep ſenſe of piety. He wrote, among other works, an Alarm to the Unconverted, of which above one hundred thouſand have been ſold. He died in 1668.

ALLEN (John) archbiſhop of Dublin, in the reign of king Henry VIII. was the author of ſeveral Latin pieces, among which is an Epiſtle concerning the Signification of the Pall, and ſeveral other things relating to the Romiſh church. His death, which happened in 1534, was very tragical; for, being taken by the rebel Thomas Fitzgerald, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Kildare, he was, by his order, cruelly murdered by having his brains beat out. This happened at Tartane in Ireland, in the fifty-eighth year of his age. In deteſtation of this horrid fact, the place where it was committed was afterwards hedged in, and ſuffered to lie waſte.

Allen, Allyn, or Alan (William) an Engliſh cardinal. See Alan.

Allen, or Alleyn, (Thomas) a famous philoſopher, mathematician, and antiquary, born at Utoxeter, in Staffordſhire, Dec. 21, 1542. He was honoured with the eſteem of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonages of his time, while he was conſidered by the ignorant vulgar as a magician. He wrote, in Latin, the Second Book of Claudius Ptolemy, on the Judgment of the Stars, with an Expoſition. He alſo wrote Notes on ſome of Lilly's books, and other pieces.

Allen (Thomas) a learned divine, diſtinguiſhed by his knowledge of the various branches of literature, was born at Utoxeter, in Staffordſhire, in the year 1573, and educated at the univerſity of Oxford. He wrote Obſervations on St. Chryſoſtom's Book upon Iſaiah, printed in ſir Henry Saville's edition of that author.

Allen, Edward. See Alleyn.

ALLENDORF, a town of Germany, in the circle of the Upper Rhine, and in the landgravate of Heſſe. It is remarkable for its ſalt-pits and three ſtone bridges. It is ſeated on the river Weſer, and is ſurrounded with mountains. Long. 10. 5. E. Lat. 51. 26. N.

ALLESTRY, or Allestree, (Richard) D. D. an eminent divine, born at Uppington, in Shropſhire, in March, 1619, and educated in the grammar-ſchool at Coventry, and afterwards at Chriſt-church in Oxford. His parts, which were extraordinary, were improved by a no leſs extraordinary induſtry. He took up arms for king Charles I. and was ſometimes ſeen with his muſket in one hand and his book in the other. He was very active in the ſervice of king Charles II. before his reſtoration, and was employed by the royaliſts in tranſacting buſineſs with that prince during his exile; but was at laſt ſeized at Dover by a party of ſoldiers, and committed priſoner to Lambeth-houſe, where he was confined ſix or eight weeks; but ſoon after the Reſtoration, he was made canon of Chriſt-church, created doctor of divinity, chaplain in ordinary to the king, and was ſoon after appointed regius profeſſor of divinity. In 1665, he was appointed provoſt of Eton college, where he raiſed the ſchool, which he found in a low condition, to an uncommon pitch of reputation. The weſt ſide of the outward quadrangle of that college, was built from the ground at his expence. The excellent Dr. Hammond, who was his intimate friend, left him his valuable library, which he himſelf afterwards bequeathed to his ſucceſſors in the divinity chair. He was eminent for his piety, benevolence, and integrity, for the ſincerity of his friendſhip, and his diſintereſted temper. He wrote ſeveral works, and a collection of his ſermons were printed after his deceaſe, by Dr. Fell, biſhop of Oxford. He died Auguſt 28, 1680.

ALLEY (William) biſhop of Exeter in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at Great-Wycomb, in Buckinghamſhire, and having ſtudied at both univerſities, obtained a benefice; but upon queen Mary's acceſſion, he quitted it and practiſed phyſic, till queen Elizabeth mounted the throne, when he acquired ſuch reputation by his divinity-lecture at St. Paul's, that he obtained the biſhopric of Exeter. He wrote The Poor Man's Library, two volumes, and an Hebrew Grammar; and when the verſion of the Bible was undertaken by the command of queen Elizabeth, he tranſlated the Pentateuch. He died April 15, 1570.

ALLEYN (Edward) a celebrated comedian, in the reigns of queen Elizabeth and king James I. was born at London, September 1, 1566. How early he appeared upon the ſtage is not mentioned; but thus much is certain, that, by the year 1592, he was at the head of his profeſſion. He was one of the original actors in the renowned Shakeſpeare's plays, as alſo in thoſe of Ben Johnſon; the laſt of whom has borne teſtimony to his merit in an elegant copy of verſes inſerted among his epigrams. He was likewiſe maſter of a play-houſe of his own building, and was keeper of the king's wild beaſts, or maſter of the royal bear-garden; and, having by all theſe means acquired a large fortune, he perpetuated his name by founding Dulwich college, in Surry, for the maintenance of ſix poor men, ſix poor women, and for the maintenance and education of twelve poor boys. What is moſt ſingular in this charity is, that the maſter and wardens are always to be of the name of Alleyn. There is a very idle and ridiculous tradition relating to the foundation of this college, which is, that Mr. Alleyn playing a dæmon, with ſix others, in one of Shakeſpeare's plays, he was in the midſt of the play ſurprized by an apparition of a real devil acting his part among the reſt of the dæmons, which ſo worked on his fancy, that he made a vow to leave off acting, and ſpend his fortune in endowing a college. Mr. Alleyn died Nov. 25, 1626.

ALLEYN (Charles) an Engliſh poet, in the reign of Charles I. He was educated at Sidney-college, Cambridge, and coming to town, became aſſiſtant to Mr. Thomas Farnaby, the famous grammarian, and afterwards tutor to the ſon of Edward Sherburne, eſq. In 1631, he publiſhed two poems on the famous victories of Creſci and Poictiers, obtained by king Edward III. and his brave ſon, the Black Prince. He alſo wrote a poem in honour of king Henry VII. and the victory near Boſworth, by which he obtained the crown; and a tranſlation, from the Latin, of the Hiſtory of Eurialus and Lucretia. He is ſaid to have died in 1640.

ALLIER, a river that riſes in the duchy of Magdeburg, and runs north-weſt through the duchy of Lunenburg, in Lower Saxony, and paſſing by the city of Zell, continues its courſe north-weſt till it falls into the river Weſer, a little below Verden.

ALLIX (Peter) a very learned and celebrated Proteſtant divine, born at Alençon, in France, in the year 1641, and being obliged to leave that country on the revocation of the edict of Nantes, retired into England, where he was made chancellor of Windſor, and at length treaſurer of the church of Saliſbury. He wrote a Diſſertation on the Life and Writings of Tertullian, and many other pieces, ſome of which were in defence of the reformed religion. He died at London, February 21, 1717.

ALLUCIUS, prince of the Celtiberians in Spain, whom Scipio Africanus conquered, two hundred and ten years before the Chriſtian æra. After the battle, there was brought to Scipio a young woman of extraordinary beauty found among the priſoners. Scipio hearing that ſhe was to be married to the young Allucius, had him brought to him with the lady, and having taken them aſide, ſaid to Allucius, "We have kept her for you with the greateſt care, "in order to make you a preſent worthy of yourſelf and me. "All the recompence I demand is, your being the friend of "the republic." The young prince, tranſported with joy, took Scipio by the hand, and prayed to God to reward this generous action. The relations of the lady, however, forced Scipio to take a ſum of money for her ranſom, on which the general called Allucius, and, giving it to him, ſaid, ſaid, " Receive this money from my hands, as a ſecond " portion, which I preſent to you."

ALMACARRON, a ſea-port town of Spain, in the province of Murcia, at the mouth of the river Guadalantin. It is about twenty miles weſt of Carthagena, and is remarkable for the prodigious quantity of alum found in its territory. Long. 1. 15 W. Lat. 37. 40. N.

ALMAIN (JAMES) profeſſor of divinity in the college of Navarre, at Paris, and one of the ſubtleſt logicians and beſt ſchoolmen of his time. He was choſen to write in favour of Lewis XII. againſt pope Julius II. and to defend the authority of councils againſt Cajetan. He died in 1515.

ALMANSOR, the name of three famous Mahometan princes; the firſt of which was king of Cordoua, and died in 1002, after his having taken Barcelona, and gained great advantages over the Chriſtians. The ſecond, named Joſeph Almanſor, was king of Morocco, and was defeated by the Chriſtians in Spain, in the year 1158. In ſhort, the third, named Jacob Almanſor, was the ſon of Joſeph: he rendered himſelf maſter of Morocco, Fez, Tremecen, and Tunis, and gained the famous victory of Arcos, in Caſtile. Pope Innocent III. ſent him a brief in 1119, to facilitate the purchaſe of Chriſtian ſlaves.

ALMANZA, a little town of the province of New Caſtile, in Spain, where the confederate army, commanded by the earl of Galway, was defeated by the French and Spaniards, commanded by the duke of Berwick, in 1707. Moſt of the Engliſh were either killed or taken priſoners, they being abandoned by the Portugueſe horſe at the firſt charge. It is fifty miles ſouth-weſt of Valencia. Long. 1. 19. W. Lat. 38. 54. N.

ALMARUS, ELMARUS, ELMERUS, or ÆLMERUS, an abbot of the monaſtery of St. Auſtin at Canterbury, in the beginning of the eleventh century. He was made biſhop of Saliſbury; but afterwards becoming blind, he reſigned his biſhopric, and returned to the abbey. There is one thing very remarkable related of him, which is, that one day, as the boy who attended him was bringing him his dinner, a kite ſuddenly came down and carried away the victuals in its talons. The boy, amazed at ſo odd and unexpected an accident, firſt told Almerus, and then went back to the kitchen for more meat. Almerus reſolved within himſelf not to eat fleſh, unleſs the kite brought back the fleſh it had taken, ſuppoſing that this was a ſign of its being unlawful. The boy, who knew nothing of this, was ſurprized a ſecond time; for, before he got to the kitchen door, the kite ſtooping again, dropped the victuals into his platter, and he returning reported this to Almerus, who, giving thanks to God, ſat down to dinner without ſcruple. It muſt be confeſſed, that this ſtory has the air of a fiction.

ALMEDA, a town of the province of Eſtramadura, in Portugal, ſeated on the Tajo, oppoſite to Liſbon, from which it is ten miles diſtant. Long. 9. 30. W. Lat. 38. 42. N.

ALMEIDA, a frontier town of Portugal, in the province of Tra los Montes, upon the confines of the kingdom of Leon. Long. 9. 30. W. Lat. 38. 42. N.

ALMELOVEEN (THEODORE JANSON D') an able phyſician and learned writer of Holland, was profeſſor of hiſtory, of the Greek tongue, and of medicine, at Harderwick. He wrote notes on ſeveral ancient authors, and likewiſe left ſeveral curious works, which are eſteemed, the principal of which are, 1. De Vitis Stephanorum. 2. Onomaſticon Rerum inventarum. 3. Bibliotheca promiſſa & latens. 4. Amænitates. 5. Plagiariorum Syllabus. 6. Faſti conſulares. He died at Amſterdam, in 1742.

ALMERIA, a ſea-port town of Spain, in the province of Granada, and the ſee of a biſhop. The land near it is very fruitful, well watered, and ſurrounded with mountains; but, notwithſtanding theſe advantages, it is but thinly peopled. Long. 3. 20. W. Lat. 36. 51. N.

ALMISSA, a ſmall ſtrong town in Dalmatia, formerly famous for its piracies. It belongs to the Venetians, and is ſeated at the mouth of the river Celina, ten miles eaſt of Spalatto. Long. 39. 33. E. Lat. 43. 56. N.

ALMUNECAR, a ſmall town of Spain, in the province of Granada, ſeated upon the Mediterranean, with a good fort, defended by a ſtrong citadel. It is fifty miles from Malaga. Long. 3. 45. W. Lat. 36. 50. N.

ALMOHADES, the name of the fourth race of the kings of Fez and Morocco. The founder of this race was Abdalla the Mohavedin.

ALMOPS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Neptune and Athamantis, one of the giants who made war upon Jupiter.

ALMORAVIDES, a people of Africa, who lived about mount Atlas, and, in 1052, expelled the Zenets out of Fez. Their firſt king was Abul Texif, whoſe ſucceſſors enlarged the dominions they received from him; and the ſecond of them, called Joſeph, built the city of Morocco, which he made his capital. This race was extinguiſhed by Abdalla the Mohavedin.

ALNWICK, a thoroughfare town in Northumberland, on the road to Scotland. Here Malcolm, king of Scotland, making an inroad into Northumberland, was killed, with Edward his ſon, and his army defeated by Robert Mowbray, earl of this county, anno 1092. Likewiſe William, king of Scotland, in 1174, invading England with an army of eighty thouſand men, was here encountered, his army routed, and himſelf made priſoner. The town is populous, and in general well built; it has a large town-houſe, where the quarter-ſeſſions and county-courts are held, and members of parliament elected. It has a ſpacious ſquare, in which a market is held every Saturday. The fairs are on Palm-ſunday eve, for ſhoes, hats, and pedlar's ware: On May the 12th, unleſs it happens on a Sunday, and then the Saturday before, for horſes, horned cattle, and pedlary; the laſt Monday in July, for horned cattle, horſes, linen, and woollen cloth; on the firſt Tueſday in October, for horſes, horned cattle, and pedlar's ware; and on the Saturday before Chriſtmas-day, for ſhoes, hats, poultry, and woollen cloth.

Alnwick appears to have been formerly fortified, by the veſtiges of a wall ſtill viſible in many parts, and three gates which remain almoſt entire. It is governed by four chamberlains, who are choſen once in two years out of a common council, conſiſting of twenty-four members. It is defended or rather ornamented by a ſtately old gothic caſtle, which has been the ſeat of the noble family of Piercy, earls of Northumberland. As the audits for receipt of rents have ever been in this caſtle, it has always been kept in tolerable repair, and, not many years ago, it was repaired and beautified by the earl of Northumberland, who made very conſiderable alterations, upon a moſt elegant plan, with a view to reſide in it ſome part of the ſummer ſeaſon.

The manner of making free-men is peculiar to this place, and indeed is as ridiculous as ſingular. The perſons who are to be made free, or as the phraſe is, leap the well, aſſemble in the market-place, very early in the morning, on the 25th of April, being St. Mark's day. They appear on horſeback, with every man his ſword by his ſide, dreſſed in white, and with white night-caps, attended by the four chamberlains and the caſtle bailiff, mounted and armed in the ſame manuer; from hence they proceed, with muſic playing before them, to a large dirty pool, called Freeman's-Well, where they diſmount, and draw up in a body, at ſome diſtance from the water, and then ruſh into it all at once, and ſcramble through the mud as faſt as they can. As the water is generally very foul, they come out in a dirty condition; but, taking a dram, they put on dry cloaths, and remount their horſes and ride full gallop round the confines of the diſtrict, and then re-enter the town, ſword in hand, and are met by women dreſſed in ribbons, with bells and garlands, dancing and ſinging. Theſe are called timber-waſts. The houſes of the new free-men are on this day diſtinguiſhed by a great holly-buſh, as a ſignal for their friends to aſſemble and make merry with them, after their return. This ceremony is owing to king John, who was mired in this well, and who, as a puniſhment for not mending the road, made this a part of their charter. Alnwick is three hundred and ten miles north by weſt from London, thirty-three north of Newcaſtle, and twenty-nine ſouth of Berwick. Long. 1. 10. Lat. 55. 24.

ALOIDES, in fabulous hiſtory, a name given to Oetus and Ephialtes, the ſons of Aloeus and Iphimedia; others ſay that Neptune was their father, and that this marine Deity made them grow every year a foot and a half in ſtature, and as much in compaſs. They confederated with the giants, declared war againſt Jupiter, and laid Mars in irons, who was afterwards delivered by Mercury. Nothing leſs would ſerve them than the marrying of Juno and Diana; Jupiter however diſappointed this project, and they were at laſt ſhot to death by Apollo and Diana.

ALOST, a town in Flanders, belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, ſeated on the river Dender, in the midway between Bruſſels and Ghent. It has but one pariſh, but the church is collegiate, and has a provoſt, a dean, and twelve canons. Beſides, here is a convent of Carmelites, another of Capuchins, another of bare-footed Carmelites, three nunneries, an hoſpital, and a convent of Guillemins, in which is the tomb of Theodore Martin, who brought the art of printing out of Germany into the Low Countries. He was a friend of Eraſmus, who wrote his epitaph. The Jeſuits began to build a church here in 1717. Long. 4. 10. E. Lat. 49. 55. N.

ALPAIDE, concubine to Pepin, and mother of Charles Martel. Provoked at the liberty with which Lambert, biſhop of Liege, uſed in cenſuring Pepin's amours, ſhe, it is ſaid, prevailed on Pepin to conſent to the plot ſhe had laid againſt that prelate's life, and he accordingly met with the ſame fate as St. John the Baptiſt. This woman retired at laſt into a monaſtery, where ſhe died.

ALP-ARSLAN, the ſecond ſultan of the dynaſty of the Selgiucides, and one of the braveſt and moſt powerful monarchs of Aſia, ſucceeded Togral Beg, his uncle, in 1063. He gained a great number of victories, and died at Meru in Khoraſan, in his expedition againſt Turqueſtan, in the year 1072. The following epitaph is to be ſeen on his tomb at Meru: "All ye who have ſeen the greatneſs of "Arp-Arſlan, raiſed even to the heavens, come to Meru, "and ye ſhall ſee it buried under the duſt."

ALPHERY (MICKEPHER) was born in Ruſſia, and though of the imperial family, left that country in the latter end of the ſixteenth century, when it was divided by inteſtine quarrels, and came to England, where he received his education at Oxford; entered into holy orders, and in 1618, had the rectory of Wooley in Huntingtonſhire, and continued there with his flock, though twice invited back to his native country, by ſome who would have done their utmoſt to ſet him on the throne of his anceſtors. Yet in 1643, he underwent the ſevereſt trials from the rage and blind zeal of ſome ſectaries, who, not ſatisfied with depriving him of his living, procured a file of muſquetteers to pull him out of his pulpit, as he was preaching on a Sunday, turned his wife and children out of his houſe, and threw his goods into the ſtreet. He was however greatly aſſiſted by the preſbyterian miniſter that came in his room, who not only paid him the fifth part of the annual income of the living, which was the allowance made by parliament for ejected miniſters; but treated him with great humanity and friendſhip. At the reſtoration he was reſtored to the poſſeſſion of his living, and died at upwards of eighty years of age.

ALPHONSO. See ALFONSO.

ALPHONSUS. See ALFONSUS.

ALPINI (PROSPERO) a learned phyſician, born at Maroſtica, in the ſtate of Venice, on the 23d of November, 1553. He was profeſſor of botany at Padua, where he obtained great reputation, and died on the 23d of November, 1616. His principal works are 1. An excellent Treatiſe on Balm. 2. De præſagienda vitâ & morte, of which Boerhaave has given a new edition. 3. De Medicina methodica. 4. De Plantis Ægypti, &c.

ALPS, a great chain of mountains, famous for their extent and height. They begin on the ſide of France, towards the coaſt of the Mediterranean Sea, near Monaco, between the ſtate of Genoa and Nice, and terminate in the gulph of Cornaro, which makes part of the gulph of Venice. They bound Italy on the weſt and north, and ſeparate it from France and Germany. They form a kind of natural rampart, which it would be very difficult to ſurmount with all the luggage and baggage of an army, if Italy had but one maſter; for then there would be force enough to guard all the paſſes, which are extremely difficult. The mountains are very broad, for they contain all the county of Nice, and Upper Provence, almoſt all Dauphiny, Savoy, le Valais, Swiſſerland, the country of the Griſons, Tirol, the biſhopric of Trent and Brixen; the archbiſhopric of Saltzburg, Carinthia, and Carniola. Theſe mountains were formerly divided into ſeveral parts, called 1. The Maritime Alps, which extend from Monaco to the Mediterranean Sea, as far as mount Viſo, where is the ſource of the Po. The moſt celebrated of theſe mountains, at preſent, are mount Camelion, and the mountains of Tenda, which are all in the county of Nice. 2. The Cottian Alps, which reach from mount Viſo to mount Genis, between Dauphiny and Piedmont. 3. The Greek Alps: theſe extend from mount Cenis, between Savoy and Piedmont, as far as St. Bernard. 4. The Pennine Alps: theſe reach into the country of the Valais, between Great St. Bernard and mount St. Gothard; among which are mount Sempron, over which is the paſſage from the Valais to the Milaneſe. 5. The High Alps: this part of the Alps has the leaſt extent, but is thought to be the higheſt. It is called St. Gothard, and is between the Valais, Swiſſerland, the Griſons, and the Milaneſe. It comprehends Criſpaltberg, wherein is the northern ſource of the Rhine, and the mountain de la Sourche, from whence the Rhone and Teſino proceed; laſtly, mount Grimſel, which gives birth to the Aar and the Ruſs. 6. The Lepontian Alps, on the ſouth of the High Alps, between the ſources of the Rhine and the lake Major. 7. The Rhetic Alps, on the eaſt ſide of the High Alps, between the Griſons and the Valtelins, in which are the mountains Bernini and Broulio, from whence proceed the rivers Inn, Adige, Addua, and Oglio. 8. The Tridentine Alps, between Tirol and the biſhopric of Trent, on the eaſt ſide of the Rhetic Alps. The moſt conſiderable mountain is the Grand Brenner, or the mountain of Tirol. 9. The Noric Alps, to the eaſt of the Tridentine, towards the ſources of the rivers Drave and Tajamento, between the archbiſhopric of Straſburgh and the ſtate of Venice. 10. The Carnic Alps, to the eaſt of the Noric, which reach from the ſource of the Tajamento to that of the Liſonzo, between Carinthia and Frioul. 11. The Julian Alps; theſe are the moſt eaſterly of all, and reach from the river Liſonzo to the gulph of Cornero, between Carniola on the north and a great part of Frioul, with Iſtria on the ſouth. In this part are the Monti della Vena, which lies to the ſouth of the lake Czirnics, and the Monti de Charſo, which are towards the county of Gorizs, and the city of Trieſt. Theſe are ſo called from Julius Cæſar, who was the firſt that lead an army over them.

ALPAXARRAS, mountains of Spain, in the province of Granada, on the coaſt of the Mediterranean Sea. They are about ſeventeen leagues in length, and eleven in breadth, and reach from the city of Velez to Almeria. They are inhabited by Moors, who are the remains of the diſperſion and ruin of their empire. They embraced the Chriſtian religion, but preſerve their own manner of living, and their language, though much corrupted. There are here fruit-trees of a prodigious height and thickneſs, and a rivulet between Pitros and Portugos, which dyes linen that is dipt in it black in an inſtant; near which, is a cavern, the ſtreams that proceed from which are ſo malignant, that they deſtroy the animals that come near it. The mountains are extremely well peopled by theſe Moriſcos, who preſerving the induſtrious diſpoſition of their anceſtors, cultivate the ſoil extremely well, and plant fruit-trees and vines, which give the mountains a very agreeable aſpect. They carry their wine, raiſins, and fruit to Velez, Malaga, and other convenient places to ſell, from whence they are ſhipped off to foreign countries.

ALREDUS, ALFREDUS, or ALUREDUS, of Beverley, an antient Engliſh hiſtorian, who flouriſhed in the reign of Henry I. and died about the year 1128. He wrote the Annals of Britain, which he carried down to the twenty-ninth of Henry I. of which Mr. Hearne publiſhed an edition at Oxford, in 1716.

ALRESFORD, a town of Hampſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, chiefly for ſheep. It is ſeated on the river Itching, on the road from London to Southampton, which feeds a great pond to the left of the town. It is governed by a bailiff and eight burgeſſes, and has a fair on June 24th, for horſes, ſheep, and cows. Part of a Roman highway runs from hence to Alton. It is a rectory, with the mediety of Old Alresford, of 49 l. 12 s. 8 d. in the king's books. It is ſixty miles weſt-ſouth-weſt of London, and eighteen miles eaſt-north-eaſt of Southampton. Long. 0. 48. Lat. 51. 26. N.

ALSACE, a province of France, bounded on the eaſt by the Rhine, on the ſouth by Swiſſerland, on the weſt by Lorrain, and on the north by the palatinate of the Rhine. It was formerly a part of Germany, but was given to France by the treaty of Munſter. In general it is one of the moſt fruitful and plentiful provinces in Europe, it abounding in corn, wine, wood, flax, tobacco, pulſe, fruits, &c. The woods which divide it from Lorrain are very high, and generally covered with fir, beech, oak, and horn-beam. Thoſe on the ſide of Swiſſerland are leſs high, and furniſhed with all ſorts of wood, as well for fuel as building. The country itſelf is diverſified with riſing hills and fertile vales, beſides large foreſts; but that between the rivers Ill, Hart, and the Rhine, as far as Straſburgh, is narrow, and not very fruitful, for there are no vines, and but few good meadows, on account of the frequent overflowing of the Rhine; it producing nothing but rye, barley, and oats. That part which is ſurrounded by the mountains of Ill, and the plain from Soults in High Alſace, as far as two leagues above Haguenau, is very fruitful, in wine, grain, and forage. That land that runs along the ſide of the mountain above Soults and Betfort, about the breadth of three leagues, is much leſs fruitful, being full of wood, and the arable ground is ſpungy, and hard to plough. But the other ſide is full of meadows, and there the inhabitants employ themſelves in grazing cattle. The canton which extends itſelf towards Swiſſerland, and runs towards the mountains as far as Altkirk, Baſil, and Mulhauſen, is more fertile. The land of Haguenau, called the plain of Mariendat, is only a ſandy heath, which produces nothing but Turky corn, and is unfit for vines, on account of the proximity of the foreſt, and the woods that ſurround it. The fields from the mountains of Savern, and the plain of Straſburgh, as far as the Rhine, are the moſt fruitful of all the cantons in this province. They abound in all ſorts of grain, tobacco, pulſe, ſaffron, and hemp. The rivers of this province are the Rhine, the Ill, the Bruſch, the Maſtick, the Soor, the Zinzel, and others of leſs note.

In High Alſace, there are mines of ſilver, copper, and lead; they however work none but thoſe of Giromany, from which they annually draw one thouſand ſix hundred marks of ſilver, each mark being eight ounces, in a year; and twenty-four thouſand pounds of copper; but the expence of working them is almoſt equal to the profit. There are iron works in ſeveral parts of Alſace, and particularly at Betford. There is a mineral ſpring at Sultſbach, near Munſter, in High Alſace, which is in great reputation for the palſy, weakneſs of the nerves, and the gravel.

The original inhabitants of Alſace are honeſt and good natured, but wedded to their own manners and cuſtoms. The fruitfulneſs of their country renders them indolent and inactive; for the Swiſs make their hay and reap their corn as well as manage the vintage of High Alſace, which ſends a great deal of money out of the province. The common language is the German, however, the better ſort of people ſpeak French in the towns; and even in the country they ſpeak French well enough to be underſtood.

ALSEN, an iſland belonging to Denmark, in the Baltick, near Appenrade and Fleenſbourg, ſeated one hundred miles weſt of Copenhagen. It has nothing remarkable but the two caſtles of Sunderbourg and Nordbourg. It produces a great quantity of aniſeed.

ALSFIELD, a town of Germany, in the landgravate of Heſſe Caſſel, ten miles north-weſt of Marpurg, and thirty-five ſouth of Heſſe Caſſel. Long. 9. 5. E. Lat. 50. 40. N. It is an ancient town, and well-built; and the inhabitants were the firſt of this country who embraced the Reformation.

ALSOP (VINCENT) born in Northamptonſhire, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, was one of the miniſters ejected for nonconformity in 1662; after which, he ſometimes ventured to preach at Wellingborough and Oakham, in Rutlandſhire, and was once confined ſix months in priſon for praying by a ſick perſon. After the Revolution, he conſtantly preached in London. A book he wrote againſt Dr. Sherlock, in a humorous ſtyle, intitled Antiſozzo, made him well known to the world. He was the author of ſeveral other works, and died on the 8th of May, 1703.

ALSTEDIUS (JOHN HENRY) a German Proteſtant divine, who applied himſelf chiefly to the digeſting of all parts of the arts and ſciences into certain ſyſtems. His Encyclopedia, in four volumes folio, is reckoned the moſt valuable of all his works. He died in 1638.

ALSTON, or ALSTON-MOOR, a town in Cumberland, twenty miles eaſt of Carliſle, and on the borders of Northumberland. It has a market on Saturdays, and two fairs for horſes, horned cattle, linen and woollen cloth, viz. on the laſt Thurſday in May, and the firſt Thurſday in September.

ALTAMONT, a very handſome town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in Calabria Citerior, fifteen miles north-weſt of Baſigniano. Long. 16. 22. E. Lat. 39. 40. N.

ALTAMURA, a little town of the kingdom of Naples, in the territory of Barri, at the foot of the Apennines. Long. 16. 4. E. Lat. 41. 0. N. It has the title of a principality.

ALTAR, a place on which ſacrifices were anciently offered to ſome deity. The Pagans at firſt made their altars of turf, and afterwards of ſtone, marble, or wood. That of Apollo, in the iſland of Delos, was of horn. They were of different forms as well as materials; ſome were round, ſome ſquare, and ſome oval; their height was alſo various. The ſacrifices to the Infernal Gods were made in holes of the earth; to the Terreſtial Gods the altars were almoſt level with the ground; but thoſe to the Cœleſtial Gods were higher; and that to Jupiter Olympus was almoſt twenty-two feet high; but that of the Jews to Jehovah was but low, for they were forbid to make any ſteps to go up to the altar, leſt they ſhould diſcover their nakedneſs. At firſt they were to be made of earth, and afterwards of rough ſtone; for if it was worked with any tool, it was ſaid to be polluted. The altar for the tabernacle erected by Moſes in the wilderneſs was made of Shittim wood, being about two yards and a half ſquare, and a yard and a half high. It was overlaid with braſs, and at each corner was a horn of the ſame wood, to tie the animals to that were to be ſacrificed; and this might be carried about on the ſhoulders of the prieſts: it was placed in the open air before the tabernacle; and the burnt-offerings were to be, as the Scripture expreſſes it, "for a ſweet ſavour to the Lord." Among four-footed beaſts, they only ſacrificed bulls, goats, and rams. The altar that Jacob ſet up in Bethel was nothing but a ſtone which ſerved him for a bolſter in the night: that of Gideon was a ſtone before his houſe. Beſides the altar for burnt-offerings, they had an altar for incenſe, and an altar for the ſhew bread, both which were made of Shittim wood overlaid with gold. After the return from captivity, their altar for burnt-offerings was a large pile built with unhewn ſtones, which they went up to, not by ſteps, but by a gentle aſcent.

The altars of the Pagans were placed not only in temples, but in the high-ways, groves, and on the tops of mountains; and when any fled to one of theſe for refuge, it was not lawful to take them away by force; but they would make a fire near it to drive them out, and then it was ſaid to be done by the God Vulcan; but this was ſeldom ſuffered. Romulus made this a means of peopling the infant city of Rome, gathering together a crowd of debtors, ſlaves, and criminals. Likewiſe they touched the altar when they took an oath to obſerve any agreement, compact, and alliance, if the occaſion was ſolemn. Thus, in Virgil, to confirm a treaty of peace between Æneas and Latinus, the latter ſpeaks thus, after having made an oath:

To ſanctify my word, behold, I ſtand,
And on theſe hallow'd altars lay my hand:
Whate'er enſues, misfortunes or ſucceſs,
No time ſhall break this ſolemn league of peace,
Nor ſhake my purpoſe; but entire and whole
I'll keep the ſacred tenor of my ſoul.

The Roman Catholicks likewiſe have their altar, which is built of ſtone, to repreſent Chriſt, as they ſay, who is the chief corner-ſtone. They go up to it by three ſteps, which are covered with a carpet: it is commonly adorned with natural and artificial flowers, according to the ſeaſon of the year: ſome are ſet off with ſilver, gold, and jewels.

ALTDORF, a large handſome town in Swiſſerland, and the chief of the canton of Uri, is ſituated below the lake of the four cantons, in a plain, at the foot of a mountain, whoſe paſſages are difficult, and ſerve inſtead of fortifications. It has four churches and two convents; St. Martin's church and that of the Holy Croſs are the fineſt. The town-houſe and the arſenal are worth ſeeing. There was a caſtle here, but it is now demoliſhed. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth of Zurich, ten ſouth-eaſt of Lucerne, and thirty weſt of Glaris. Long. 8. 30. E. Lat. 46. 50. N.

ALTEA, a ſmall town of Spain, in the kingdom of Valencia. It was taken in 1705, with all Valencia, for the archduke Charles, but was loſt by the battle of Almanza. It is ſeated near the Mediterranean Sea, thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Valencia, and one hundred and ten ſouth-by-eaſt of Madrid. Long. 0. 15. W. Lat. 46. 34. N.

ALTEMBURG, a ſmall town in Tranſylvania, with a caſtle, ſeventeen miles ſouth-eaſt of Wiſemburg.

ALTENA, a ſmall town of Germany, in Lower Saxony, upon the north bank of the Elbe, belonging to the king of Denmark. It was burnt by the Swedes in 1712, but has been ſince re-built. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 53. 51. N.

ALTENBERG, an ancient town of Germany, with a good caſtle placed on a rock, in the circle of the Upper Saxony, and in Miſnia. It was formerly an imperial city, but at preſent belongs to the houſe of Saxony. The town itſelf is ſeated on the river Pleiſs, thirty miles ſouth-eaſt of Meiſſen, and twenty ſouth of Leipſic. The college has always been in a flouriſhing condition. In 1705, there was a nunnery founded for women of a high rank, who are Proteſtants. Long. 15. 8. E. Lat. 50. 59. N.

ALTENBURG, a ſmall town of Hungary, in the territory of Moſon, near the Danube. It is a fortified town, about fifty-five miles from Vienna. Long. 35. 30. E. Lat. 48. 15. N.

ALTENBURG, a ſmall town of Tranſylvania, eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Weiſſemburg, and thirty-ſix ſouth of Clauſenburg. Long. 23. 5. E. Lat. 46. 25. N.

ALTENBURG, a ſmall ſtrong town of Hungary, ſeated in a marſh, with wide ſtreets. It is near the river Danube, and is ſurrounded with deep ditches. It is fifteen miles ſouth of Preſburg, forty ſouth-eaſt of Vienna, and ſixty-five ſouth-weſt of Buda. Long. 17. 56. E. Lat. 44. 0. N.

ALTESSERA. See HAUTESERRE.

ALTHÆA, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Æneas, king of Calidonia, and the mother of Meleager, threw into the fire the fatal brand, on which, by the decree of the Deſtinies, the life of her ſon depended. See MELEAGER.

ALTHAMERUS (ANDREW) a Lutheran miniſter at Nuremburg, who publiſhed, before the middle of the ſixteenth century, ſome works in divinity, and notes upon Tacitus De Situ, Moribus, & Populis Germaniæ. He was ſuch an enemy to the doctrine of the merit of good works, and ſo ardent in rejecting it, that he inveighed againſt St. James the Apoſtle in a moſt outrageous manner.

ALTHUSIUS (JOHN) a German Proteſtant and a civilian, flouriſhed about the end of the ſixteenth century. He wrote a book of politics, which incenſed ſome civilians againſt him, for maintaining that the ſupreme power is lodged in the people. He alſo compoſed a treatiſe De Juriſprudentia Romana; one De civili Converſatione; and another intitled, Dicæologia, &c.

ALTILIUS (GABRIEL) a native of the kingdom of Naples, and biſhop of Buxenta, flouriſhed about the end of the fifteenth century. He was chiefly valued on account of his Latin verſes; and it is remarkable, that an Epithalamium, written on the marriage of Iſabel of Arragon, was the principal cauſe of his being raiſed to the dignity of a prelate.

ALTING (HENRY) profeſſor of divinity at Heidelberg and Groningen, was born at Embden, on the 17th of February, 1583. He was a man of great learning and merit, and wrote a great number of books, chiefly on divinity. He died Auguſt 25, 1644.

ALTING (JAMES) ſon of the former, was born at Heidelberg, on the 27th of September, 1618, and was profeſſor of divinity at Groningen. He preached well in three languages, viz. German, Dutch, and Engliſh; and wrote five volumes in folio, which conſiſt of analytical, exegetical, practical, problematical, and philoſophical tracts; but they were not publiſhed till after his death, which happened on the 20th of Auguſt, 1679.

ALTKIRK, a town of Alſace in Germany, ſeated on the river Ill, forty-five miles from Straſburg. Long. 7. 20. E. Lat. 47. 40. N.

ALTMUL, a river of Germany, which riſes in Francotiia, and runs ſouth-eaſt by Anſpach, and then turning eaſt paſſes by Papenheim and Aichſtet, falling into the Danube at Kellheim, twelve miles above Ratiſbon.

ALTON, a town in Hampſhire, between Farnham and Alresford, fifty miles weſt-ſouth-weſt from London, with a market on Saturday for cattle and proviſions, and a fair on December 29, for cattle and toys. It is a vicarage, rated at fifteen pounds in the king's books. Long. 0. 46. W. Lat. 51. 5. N.

ALTON, or ALVETON, a village in Staffordſhire, five miles north of Utoxeter. There are the ruins of a caſtle here, which ſome would have to be built before the Norman conqueſt; but Dr. Plot is pretty certain that it was erected by Theobald de Verdun, in the beginning of the reign of Edward II. a great part of the walls are ſtill ſtanding, but they are in a very ruinous condition.

ALTORF, a town of the circle of Franconia, in Germany. It has a phyſic-garden, with two thouſand different plants; a theatre for diſſections, which has many curioſities in the anatomical way; and a handſome library. It is ſubject to the houſe of Brandenburg, and is ſeated on the confines of Bavaria, fifteen miles from Nuremberg. Long. 9. 35. E. Lat. 47. 46. N.

ALTORF, the capital of the canton of Uri, in Switzerland, and the ſeat of its court of juſtice. It ſtands in a plain, near the lake of Lucerne, at the foot of the Alps, twenty three miles ſouth-eaſt of Lucerne. The houſes are very neat, the ſtreets well paved, and the gardens and country-houſes about it are delightful. This town is difficult of acceſs, becauſe it ſtands almoſt at the bottom of the dangerous precipices of mount St. Gothard, near which the Ruſs, the Teſin, the Rhine, and the Rhone have their ſources. It has four churches, two convents, a town-houſe, and an arſenal, likewiſe a particular fabrick for cutting and poliſhing cryſtal. They have a hot ſouth wind in ſummer, which ripens the fruit ſooner than in the neighbouring cantons. Long. 8. 50. E. Lat. 46. 50. N.

ALTRINGHAM, a town in Cheſhire, ten miles eaſt of Warrington, with a market on Tueſdays, and two fairs, on Auguſt 5, and Nov. 2, for cattle and drapery goods. It is one hundred fifty-two miles north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 30. W. Lat. 53. 25. N.

ALTZEG, a town and caſtle of Germany in the Lower Palatinate, the capital of a territory of the ſame name, with an old caſtle. It is ſeated on a rivulet, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Mentz, and fifteen north-weſt of Worms. Long. 7. 25. W. Lat. 49. 44. N.

ALVA DE TORMES, a conſiderable town of Spain, in the kingdom of Leon, and territory of Salamanca, with a very handſome caſtle. It is ſeated on the north bank of the river Tormes, thirteen miles from Salamanca. Long. 6. 1. W. Lat. 41. 0. N.

ALVARES DE LUNA, the favourite of John II. king of Caſtile, was famous for the abſolute authority he for many years preſerved over his ſovereign, and the puniſhment he at laſt ſuffered. He was the natural ſon of Alvaro de Luna, lord of Canate in Arragon and was born about the year 1388. He was made lord of the bed-chamber in 1408, and by his inſinuating addreſs raiſed himſelf to the higheſt poſts in the ſtate. Out of the forty-five years he ſpent at court, he enjoyed for thirty of them ſuch an entire authority over the king, that nothing could be done without his expreſs orders; and the king himſelf had not the liberty ſo much as to change his officers or ſervants, or even his cloaths and diet, without his approbation. He had all the places in the kingdom at his diſpoſal, was maſter of the treaſury, and by his profuſe bounty had gained the affections of the people; and, in ſhort, he wanted nothing but the name of king to render his grandeur complete. The king was however ſufficiently informed of the conduct of his favourite; but he had ſuffered him to grow ſo very formidable, that he durſt not complain: but, at laſt, Alvares proceeding ſtill greater lengths in the abuſe of his power, an accuſation was formed againſt him, full of the moſt ſhocking crimes, and he was ſeized and condemned, on the 5th of July, 1453, to loſe his head, which was executed at Valladolid, with all the circumſtances of infamy imaginable.

ALVAREZ (FRANCIS) chaplain to Emanuel. king of Portugal, was ſent ambaſſador from that prince to David, king of Ethiopia, in which country he ſtaid ſix years, and wrote a very particular deſcription of that king's dominions. He died in 1540.

ALVAREZ (EMANUEL) a celebrated Portugueſe grammarian, was born in the iſland of Madeira, on the 4th of June, 1526. Having entered into the ſociety of the Jeſuits, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his probity and his prudence, and became rector of the colleges of Coimbra, Evora, and Liſbon. He was well acquainted with polite literature, and for many years applied himſelf to the inſtruction of youth in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. He died at the college of Evora, on the 30th of December, 1582. His Latin Grammar is much eſteemed; it is intitled, De Inſtitutione Grammatica, and has had many editions.

ALVAREZ DE PAZ (JAMES) an eminent Jeſuit in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Toledo, in Spain, and wrote ſeveral devotional treatiſes. The Jeſuit who writes his life very gravely tells us, that while he was compoſing it, he ſeemed ſurrounded with a celeſtial light and ſplendor, and that there ſtood by him a perſon, in the figure of a venerable man, who whiſpered to him what he wrote. He died January 17, 1620.

ALVAREZ ALBORNOS. See ALBORNOS.

ALYATES, king of Lydia, and the father of Crœſus, ſucceeded Sadiates, about ſix hundred and fourteen years before the Chriſtian æra. He prepared for carrying on a war with Cyaxares, king of the Medes; but when the two armies were ready to engage, they were prevented by an eclipſe of the ſun, the cauſe of which they were entirely unacquainted with, and therefore inſtantly concluded a peace. Alyates died five hundred and fifty-ſeven years before the birth of Chriſt.

ALYTARCHIA, in Grecian antiquity, an officer, who, in the games celebrated in honour of the Gods, preſided over the Alytai, or officers who carried rods to clear the way and preſerve order.

AMABLE, prieſt of Riom, in Auvergne, lived in the fifth century, and is commended by Gregory of Tours as a man of extraordinary ſanctity, and one that wrought many miracles. "I have ſeen, at his tomb, ſays he, one who was "poſſeſſed of a devil ſet free. I have ſeen one that was "guilty of perjury become as ſtiff as an iron bar, and after "the confeſſion of his crime, become as free as he was "before." St. Amable died at Riom, in 475; and it is firmly believed there, that when this ſaint travelled to Rome on foot, the ſun attended him as a ſervant, carrying his gloves and cloak over his head like an umbrella, during the great heat, and in bad weather to keep off the rain; and St. Amable's picture is ſeldom drawn without his gloves and cloak being repreſented hanging in the air by a ſunbeam.

AMADABAT, the capital of the kingdom of Guzurat, in the empire of the great mogul, is the ſeat of a rajah, a kind of vice-roy, who maintains twelve thouſand horſes and fifty elephants for the emperor's ſervice. It is a very large populous town, ſtanding in a beautiful plain, watered by a little river. Its circumference, comprehending the ſuburbs and adjacent villages, which ſeem to be part of it, is ſeven leagues. It is incloſed with walls of ſtone and brick, flanked with round towers, forty feet high and eleven thick. There are twelve gates, and a ditch fifteen fathom broad; but in many places it is without water. The meydan-ſhaw, or royal market place, is one thouſand ſix hundred feet long, and half as many broad, beſet all along with palm and date-trees, mixed with citron and orange-trees, whereof there are ſo many in the ſtreets, that at a diſtance the city looks like a foreſt. Theſe not only charm the ſight, but keep off the ſcorching beams of the ſun. Beſides this, there are four bazars, where all kinds of merchandiſe are ſold. The ſtreets are wide, but unpaved, and the houſes built with brick hardened in the ſun, and flat at the top. There are here many magnificent buildings, particularly the rajah's houſe, and the moſques, of which there are thirty great ones, beſides thoſe that are ſmall. The caſtle is large, built of free-ſtone, and one of the moſt conſiderable in the kingdom. The royal palace is built of brick. Over the gate is an orcheſtra for the muſicians, who play in the morning, at noon, in the evening, and at midnight. All the apartments are ſumptuous, gilt, and adorned with paintings, but the contrivance of the whole does not diſcover a great deal of art. Long. 72. 12. E. Lat. 23. 0. N.

The ſepulchres are the moſt remarkable curioſities of the city, at ſome diſtance from which is one to the memory of the king's preceptor, who is famous for the miracles he is ſaid to have performed after his death. It is a marble ſtructure, ſupported by four hundred and forty large pillars, thirty feet high. At the entrance is a large ciſtern full of water, incloſed with a wall, and enlightened with windows, to which the Mahommedans go in pilgrimage. There are a great number of gardens about the city, and one, called the Royal Garden, which is ſo advantageouſly ſeated, that it yields a delightful proſpect all round the country. There is likewiſe a highway, which leads to a village ſix leagues diſtant, on both ſides of which is a double row of cocoa-trees. On theſe there are apes as big as greyhounds, of a greeniſh brown colour, with white beards and eye-brows. They frequently repair to the city to be fed by the Banians, who are fond of them. Thus encouraged, they go into the houſes with all imaginable freedom; and ſometimes their number is ſo great, that the venders of raw and preſerved fruits have much ado to keep them out of their clutches.

Amadabat has within its territory twenty-five great towns, and two thouſand nine hundred and ninety-eight villages, the revenue of which amounts to above ſix millions of crowns, with part of which the rajah maintains the army, which is employed in keeping garriſon and ſuppreſſing robbers; though ſometimes, it is ſaid, he takes money to connive at them. There is a courteval, or lieutenant, immediately under the emperor, who interferes in the political and civil government.

All religions are tolerated here; but Mahommedaniſm is moſt predominant, being that of the great mogul. The Banians are very numerous; and as they hold the tranſmigration of ſouls, they will not put any animal to death; but a particular account of their ſtrange opinions, cuſtoms, and practices, will be given in its proper place.

The cocoa-trees lately mentioned ſerve to maintain a great number of wild fowl, particularly parrots, and birds of the ſame kind: the largeſt of theſe is called an Indian crow. There is one ſort of a pear colour, with a tuft or crown on its head, called a cockatore, which word they pronounce very diſtinctly, and always in the ſame tone you ſpeak to them, whether in a whiſper or a ſhrill voice: they build their neſts in towns. There is a leſſer ſort, which are valuable for their variety of colours, they being chequered with a lively carnation and a bright green: they build their neſts at the ends of the branches of trees, to preſerve them from ſerpents. They are great devourers of fruit, and make ſad havock among the rice, which the Banians never endeavour to prevent: they give the ſame freedom to wild ducks, herons, and cormorants, of which there are great plenty in the river. In the foreſts, they have fallow deer, roebucks, wild aſſes, wild boars, and hares. Their tame animals are buffaloes, oxen, cows, and ſheep. In the river, they have great plenty of fiſh. They have excellent water, but no wine, inſtead of which they have toddy, which is the ſap of the cocoa-tree; and from rice, ſugar, and dates, they extract a liquor well known by the name of arrack. Their noxious animals are crocodiles, that do a great deal of miſchief, and ſerpents, which are here very dangerous. In the woods, there are lions, leopards, tygers, elephants, and rhinoceroſſes. Beſides theſe, they have bats of a monſtrous ſize, with very long wings, and bodies as big as a hen; their wings are bare, and their legs are ſo faſtened to them that they can neither walk nor ſtand, but they faſten themſelves to trees, by a hook of the thickneſs of a finger, which grows out of each wing; they are very nimble, have exceeding ſharp teeth, and do a great deal of damage to the fruit.

Their manufactures are ſilks and cottons of various kinds, gold and ſilver brocades, and carpets. They traffic in muſk, ambergreaſe, opium, borax, ſalt-petre, gum-lac, ginger, myrobalans, indico, ſugar, honey, preſerves, &c. Here are alſo diamonds; but they are brought from other places, and are not ſo cheap as elſewhere.

AMADAN, or HAMADAN, a town of Perſia, in Aſia. It is ſeated in Irack Agemi, between Tauris and Iſaphan, at the foot of a mountain, where there are a great many ſprings, which water the adjacent country. The extent of the city is very large; but there are a great many waſte ſpots within it, as well as cultivated land. The houſes are built of brick hardened in the ſun, and have but a very indifferent aſpect. There is but one tolerable ſtreet, and that is where ſtuffs, garments, and the like, are expoſed to ſale: it is ſtrait, long, and wide; and the ſhops are very well furniſhed. There are a great many brick ruins, which are an evidence of its former greatneſs. The adjacent parts are fruitful in corn and rice, inſomuch that the neighbouring provinces are ſupplied from hence. The air and waters are very unwholeſome, eſpecially to ſtrangers. The Armenians have a church in this town, but it is a very ill contrived ſtructure. The Jews have a ſynagogue near a tomb where they pretend Eſther and Mordecai lie interred. To this place they come in pilgrimage from ſeveral parts of the Levant. About a league from Amadan, there is a mountain called Nalbana, which abounds with all ſorts of curious herbs. In the ſpring, people flock to it from all parts to recover their health, by ſucking in the ſalutary effluvia with their breath. Long. 47. 4. E. Lat. 35. 15. N.

AMADEDDULAT, the firſt ſultan of the race of the Buides, conquered in a ſhort time Perſia, Irac, and Carimania, fixed his ſeat at Schiras in 933, and died in 949. He was a brave and generous prince, and all his enterprizes were attended with ſucceſs.

AMADEUS V. ſurnamed the Great, count of Savoy in 1285, was a wiſe and warlike prince. He engaged in thirty-two ſieges, and whatever he undertook was attended with ſucceſs. In 1311, he aſſiſted the knights of Malta, in defending the iſland of Rhodes againſt the Turks; and ſince that time, the dukes of Savoy have taken the croſs of Malta for their arms. He died at Avignon, in 1323, aged ſeventy four.

AMADEUS VI. called the Green Count, from his appearing at a tournament in green armour, was count of Savoy in 1343. He was one of the greateſt princes in his time; he went into Greece to the aſſiſtance of the emperor John Paleologus, and was the arbitrator of Italy. After a glorious reign, he died in 1383.

AMADEUS VIII. ſurnamed the Pacific, ſucceeded Amadeus VII. in 1391, and raiſed Savoy into a duchy in 1416. He was ſo wiſe that he was called the Solomon of the Age, and the greateſt princes frequently choſe him for arbitrator. In 1434, he left his dominions to his ſon, and retired to the priory of Repaille, where he founded the military order of St. Maurice. He was there taſting the innocent pleaſures of the country, when he was elected pope in the council of Baſil, on the 24th of June, 1440. He took the name of Felix V. though Eugenius IV. then ſat in the papal chair; however, in 1449, he reſigned the pontificate to Nicholas V. who made him dean of the ſacred college. He died at Geneva, on the 7th of January, 1451, aged ſixty-nine.

AMAGA, the queen of Medoſac, king of the Sarmatians, along the coaſt of Pontus, who being continually plunged in debauchery, ſhe placed herſelf at the head of the government, gave public audiences, went herſelf to place troops to defend the entrance of the kingdom, repulſed the incurſions of the enemies of the Sarmatians, and flew to the aſſiſtance of the neighbouring ſtates, when they were in danger of being overpowered. The reputation of Amaga ſpread through all Scythia; and thoſe of Tauricus Cherſoneſus, having received great injuries from a king of Scythia, who was their neighbour, entered into an alliance with her. Upon this, ſhe wrote to the king, to order him not to diſturb the peace of the Cherſoneſus; but he paying no regard to this demand, ſhe choſe a hundred and twenty of the braveſt and ſtrongeſt men in her dominions, gave them three horſes each, and, in the ſpace of twenty-four hours, marched with them two hundred ſtadii, which is about one hundred and fifty miles, and arriving ſuddenly at the royal city, killed the advanced guards. The Scythians, who had no expectation of ſuch a viſit, thought the enemy much more numerous. Amaga proceeded even to the palace, broke open the gates, killed the king and thoſe of his relations and friends who oppoſed her, and thus having obtained the country, placed on the throne the ſon of him ſhe had ſlain, recommending to him to govern with juſtice, and to reſpect both the barbarians and the Greeks in his neighbourhood.

AMAJA (FRANCIS) one of the moſt celebrated lawyers in Spain, was born at Antequera, became profeſſor of civil law at Oſſuna and Salamanca, and died at Valladolid, in 1640. He wrote a Commentary on the three laſt Books of the Code, and ſeveral other works.

AMAK, a celebrated Perſian poet, under the reign of Khedber Khan, was born at Bochara, and particularly excelled in writing eulogies.

AMAK, a ſmall iſland in the Baltic Sea, near Copenhagen, from which it is ſeparated by a ſmall canal, over which there is a draw-bridge. There is a good citadel, which they call Chriſtian Haven. It is remarkable for a village of Dutch, who are deſcended from a colony that ſettled there to make butter and cheeſe for the court. They retain their own language, manner of dreſs, and other cuſtoms. Long. 12. 10. E. Lat. 55. 20. N.

AMAL, a town of Sweden, in the province of Daland, ſeated on the river Weſer. It has a good harbour, and carries on a large trade, eſpecially in timber, deals, and tar. Long. 12. 40. E. Lat. 58. 50. N.

AMALARIC, or AMAURY, king of the Viſigoths, was the ſon and ſucceſſor of Alaric. He married Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis, in the year 517; but treated her with ſuch cruelty, that ſhe ſent her brother Childeberg a veil ſtained with her blood; on which that prince, in order to be revenged, entered the country of the Viſigoths, and defeated Amalaric, who was ſlain in battle, in 531.

AMALARIUS FORTUNATUS, archbiſhop of Treves, and one of the moſt famous prelates in the time of Charlemagne, was ſent by that prince on an embaſſy to Michael Curopalatus, emperor of the Eaſt, and died at his return, in in 814. He was the author of a Treatiſe on the Sacrament of Baptiſm, printed under the name of Alcuinus.

AMALARIUS, deacon of the church of Metz, and afterwards abbot, was a celebrated writer of the ninth century, whom ſome have very improperly confounded with Amalarius Fortunatus. He compoſed De eccleſieſticis ſeu divinis Officiis, and ſome other works.

AMALASONTHA, or AMALASUNTHA, daughter of Theodoric, king of the Oſtrogoths, was a princeſs of great wit, and perfectly ſkilled in the Greek and Latin languages; ſhe even ſpoke the languages of the different people that compoſed the Roman empire, and never made uſe of an interpreter in anſwering them. She married Eutharic, grandnephew of Thraſimond, by whom ſhe had Athalaric. That prince having ſucceeded to the dominions of his grand-father, but being too young to govern by himſelf, Amalaſuntha took upon herſelf the adminiſtration of affairs, and rendered her prudence admired. Alaric dying, and that princeſs being deprived both of her huſband and ſon, ſhe cauſed Theodatus, her couſin-german, the ſon of Amalafreda, king Theodoric's ſiſter, to be placed on the throne; but he repaid this favour with the blackeſt ingratitude; he ſhut her up in a caſtle, built in the midſt of a little iſland in the lake of Bolſena. and put her to death, in the year 544: it is even ſaid, that he himſelf ſtrangled her in a bath. Her murder was however revenged, for the emperor Juſtinian, who having a great eſteem for that princeſs, ſent Beliſarius againſt the Goths, and that great general ruined their dominions in Italy.

AMALECK, the ſon of Eliphaz, and grandſon of Eſau, was the father of the Amalekites, a people of Idumea, frequently mentioned in the Old Teſtament.

AMALFI, a pretty large town of the kingdom of Naples, is ſeated on the gulph of Salerno, about three leagues from the city of the ſame name. It is the ſee of an archbiſhop, and famous for being the birth place of Flavius Gioia, who, as they ſay, invented the mariner's compaſs, about the beginning of the fourteenth century. The parts about it are very delightful, and produce excellent fruits. It is thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Salerno, ten ſouth-eaſt of Sorento, and eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Naples. Long. 15. 20. E. Lat. 40. 35. N.

AMALRIC, (ARNAUD) archbiſhop of Narbonne, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his zeal againſt the Albigenſes. He united the princes of Spain againſt the Moors; and thoſe princes gained a celebrated victory over them, on the 16th of July, 1212, of which Amalec, who was preſent at the battle, has given a particular relation. He died in 1225.

AMALTHEA, the Cumean ſybil, who, 535 years before Chriſt, preſented Tarquin the Proud nine books on the deſtiny of Rome, and demanded three hundred crowns for them. Tarquin, it is ſaid, ſhewing great contempt for the books, ſhe burnt three of them before him. Some days after ſhe returned and preſented him with the ſix books that remained, demanding the ſame ſum; ſhe was again refuſed, and revenged herſelf in the ſame manner, by burning three others. The king ſurprized at her behaviour, aſked what ſhe would have for the three laſt books, and the ſybil diminiſhing nothing of the ſum ſhe had at firſt demanded, he conſulted the pontiffs, who adviſed him to pay her the three hundred gold crowns. Theſe books were held in ſuch veneration at Rome, that two magiſtrates were appointed to keep and conſult them upon extraordinary occaſions.

AMALTHEA, in pagan mythology, the daughter of Meliſſus, king of Crete, and the nurſe of Jupiter, whom ſhe fed with goat's milk and honey. According to others, Amalthea was a goat, which Jupiter tranſlated into the ſky, with her two kids, and gave one of her horns to the daughters of Meliſſus, as a reward for the pains they had taken in attending him. This horn had the peculiar property of furniſhing them with whatever they wiſhed for, and was thence called the cornucopia, or horn of plenty.

AMALTHEUS, (ATTILIUS) archbiſhop of Athens, was born of a family in Italy eminent for producing men of the greateſt merit and learning. He lived in the fifteenth century, and made a conſiderable progreſs in the ſtudy of the civil and canon law, and in that of divinity. He was a man of a noble, generous, and diſintereſted ſpirit, was raiſed to the ſee of Athens by pope Paul V. and ſent to Cologne in the character of nuncio, which office he diſcharged with vaſt applauſe.

AMALTHEUS, (JEROME, JOHN-BAPTISTA, and CORNELIUS) three celebrated Latin poets, born in Italy. They lived in the ſixteenth century, and their poems were printed at Amſterdam in 1685. The fineſt piece in theſe collections is an epigram on two beautiful children, who had each loſt an eye.

Lumine Acon dextro, capta eſt Leonilla ſiniſtro:
Et poterat formâ vincere uterque deos.
Parce puer, lumen quod habes concede ſorori,
Sic tu cæcus amor, ſic erit illa Venus.

Acon's left eye is deſtitute of light,
And darkneſs hangs o'er Leonilla's right:
Bating theſe blemiſhes, the beauteous pair
In charms with the immortals might compare:
His eye to her reſign'd wou'd change the ſcene,
Would make him love's blind god, and crown her beauty's queen.

AMAMA, (SIXTINUS) profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue, in the univerſity of Franeker, was a perſon of very great learning. He publiſhed a Criticiſm upon the Tranſlation of the Pentateuch; collated the Dutch tranſlation of the Bible with the original, and the moſt accurate tranſlations, and wrote a Cenſure of the Vulgate tranſlation of the hiſtorical books of the Old Teſtament, Job, the Pſalms, and Canticles. He died in December, 1629.

AMANCE, a town in the duchy of Lorrain, upon a rivulet of the ſame name, five miles eaſt of Nancy, and one hundred and eighty-five eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 10 E. Lat. 48. 45. N.

AMAND (MARK ANTHONY GERARD, Sieur DE SAINT) a French poet, born at Roan in Normandy, in 1594. He wrote a conſiderable number of poems, the greateſt part of which are of the burleſque and amorous kinds. He died in 1661.

AMAND (ST.) a city of France, in Bourbonois, on the confines of Berry, ſeated upon the river Cher. It was built in 1410 on the ruins of Orval. It is one hundred and forty miles from Paris. Long. 3. 30. E. Lat. 46. 32. N.

AMAND (ST.) a city of the Low Countries, in the earldom of Flanders, ſeated upon the river Scarpe. It contains about ſix hundred houſes, and three or four thouſand inhabitants. The abbot of the place is the temporal lord, and diſpoſes of the magiſtracy. It was given to France by the treaty of Utrecht. It is one hundred and twenty miles eaſt of Paris. Long. 2. 35. E. Lat. 50. 27. N.

AMANTEA, a ſea-port town of Naples, near the bay of Euſemia, in the province of Calabria, twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Coſenza. Long. 16. 20. E. Lat. 39 15. N.

AMAPALLA, a city and port-town of North-America, in the province of Guatimala, ſeated on the gulph of the ſame name, in the Pacific Ocean. Long. 63. 20. W. Lat. 12. 30. N.

AMARA, a famous mountain of Abyſſinia in Africa, that is very high and of difficult acceſs. But on the top there is a large plain, and a city of the ſame name, the capital of the kingdom of Amara. It is ſaid that in this city there is a kind of an academy, where they keep the children of the emperor of Abyſſinia, and all the princes of the blood, with great care, to prevent an inſurrection; and when the emperor is dead, they chooſe the moſt worthy to ſucceed him. But Michael of Tripoly, the Abyſſinian ambaſſador, ſays that mountain is called Oouhni, in the province of Oinadaga, two days journey diſtant from Goadar; and that every night they are ſhut up in a cave, and taken out again every morning.

AMASEUS (ROMULUS) profeſſor of Greek and Latin at Bologna, and ſecretary to that ſenate; lived in the ſixteenth century, and gained great reputation by his learning and employments. He publiſhed a tranſlation of Pauſanias, &c. a volume of Orations, and other pieces. He died in 1558.

AMASIA, an ancient city in Natolia. It is remarkable for being the birth-place of Strabo, the celebrated geographer. It is the capital of a territory of the ſame name, in which are produced the beſt wine and fruits in Natolia. It is ſeated thirty miles north-weſt of Tocat, and thirty from the Black Sea. Long. 36. 10. E. Lat. 39. 33. N.

AMASIS, from being a common ſoldier, became king of Egypt, about five hundred and ſixty-nine years before Chriſt. His ſubjects at firſt deſpiſed him on account of the meanneſs of his extraction, but he had the art by mildneſs and policy to conquer their averſion. It is ſaid that he made a law by which all his ſubjects were obliged, once a year, to give an account of their manner of life, to a magiſtrate appointed for that purpoſe.

AMATRICE, a ſmall town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Abruzzo, with the title of a principality. Long. 13. 30. W. Lat. 42. 35 N.

AMAURI, the name of two kings of Jeruſalem; the firſt, a warlike but avaricious prince, died in 1174; the ſecond, Amauri of Luſignan, who died 1205.

AMAURI DE CHARTRES, lived in the thirteenth century, and was condemned as an heretic by Innocent III. his diſciples maintained, that there was no other heaven but the ſatisfaction of doing well; and no other hell but ignorance and ſin. Theſe opinions were condemned in a council held at Paris in 1209.

AMAZIAH, king of Judea, eight hundred and thirty-nine years before Chriſt, revenged the death of Joaſh his father, and at length defeated the Idumeans: elated with this ſucceſs, he wrote to Joaſh, king of Iſrael, that if he and all his his people would not obey him, he would declare war againſt him. On which Joaſh replied, "There was formerly a tall cedar on Mount Lebanon, whoſe daughter the thiſtle aſked in marriage for his ſon; but while the thiſtle was making this demand, a wild beaſt came and trampled it under his feet. Improve by this example, and undertake nothing beyond thy ſtrength." Amaziah, provoked at this anſwer, made war againſt Joaſh, but was conquered. He was ſome time after ſlain in a conſpiracy, eight hundred and ten years before the Chriſtian æra.

AMAZONS, a nation of female warriors, whoſe exiſtence has been eſteemed merely fabulous by Strabo, Arrian, Palephates, and ſome of the moderns; while others maintain, that their exiſtence is ſufficiently proved by the teſtimony of ſuch of the hiſtorians of antiquity as are moſt worthy of credit, by the monuments which many of them have mentioned, and by medals, ſome of which are ſtill remaining, and that there is not the leaſt room to believe that what is ſaid of them is fabulous.

The Scythians had a great part of Aſia under their dominion upwards of four hundred years, till Ninus, the founder of the Aſſyrian empire, conquered all the countries ſubject to the Scythians. After his death, which happened about the one thouſand one hundred and fiftieth year before the Chriſtian æra, and that of Semiramis and their ſon Ninias, Ilinus and Scolopites, princes of the royal blood of Scythia, were driven from their country by other princes, who, like them, aſpired to the crown. They departed with their wives, their children, and their friends, and followed by a great number of young people of both ſexes, paſſed into Aſiatic Sarmatia, beyond mount Camaſſus, where they formed an eſtabliſhment ſword in hand, ſupplying themſelves with the riches they wanted, by making excurſions into the countries bordering on the Euxine Sea. The people of thoſe countries exaſperated by the incurſions of their new neighbours, united, ſurpriſed, and maſſacred the men.

The women then reſolving to revenge their death, and at the ſame time to provide for their own ſecurity, reſolved to form a new kind of government, to chooſe a queen, enact laws, and maintain themſelves without men, even againſt the men themſelves. This brave deſign was not ſo very ſurpriſing as it at firſt ſight appears; for the greateſt number of the girls among the Scythians had been inured to the ſame exerciſes as the boys, to draw the bow, to lance the javelin, to manage other arms, to riding, hunting, and even the painful labours that ſeem reſerved for men, and many of them, as among the Sarmatians, accompanied the men in war. Hence they had no ſooner formed their reſolution, than they prepared to execute it, and exerciſed themſelves in all military operations. They ſoon ſecured the peaceable poſſeſſion of the country; and not content with ſhewing their neighbours that all their efforts to drive them thence, or to ſubdue them, were ineffectual, they made war upon them, and extended their own frontiers. They had hitherto made uſe of the inſtructions and aſſiſtance of a few men that remained in the country, but finding at length that they could ſtand their ground, and aggrandize themſelves without them, they killed all thoſe whom ſlight or chance had ſaved from the fury of the Sarmatians, and forever renounced marriage, which they now conſidered as an inſupportable ſlavery. But as they could only ſecure the duration of their new kingdom by propagation, they made a law to go every year to the frontiers, to invite the men to come to them, and to deliver themſelves up to their embraces, without choice on their part, or the leaſt attachment, and to leave them as ſoon as they were pregnant. All thoſe whom age rendered fit for propagation, and were willing to ſerve the ſtate by breeding girls, did not go at the ſame time in ſearch of men; for in order to obtain a right to promote the multiplication of the ſpecies, they muſt firſt have contributed to its deſtruction, nor was any thought worthy of giving birth to children till ſhe had killed three men.

If from this commerce they brought forth girls, they educated them; but with reſpect to the boys, if we may believe Juſtin, they ſtrangled them at the moment of their birth: according to Diodorus Siculus, they twiſted their legs and arms, ſo as to render them unfit for military exerciſes; but Quintius Curtius, Philoſtrates, and Jordarus, ſay, that the leſs ſavage ſent them to their fathers. It is probable that at firſt, when their fury againſt the men was carried to the greateſt height, they killed the boys; that when their fury abated, and moſt of the mothers were filled with horror at depriving the little creatures of the lives they had juſt received from them, they fulfilled the firſt duties of a mother, and to prevent their cauſing a revolution in the ſtate, maimed them in ſuch a manner as to render them incapable of war, and employed them in the mean offices which theſe warlike women thought beneath them; and, in ſhort, that when their conqueſts had confirmed their power, their ferocity ſubſiding, they entered into political engagements with their neighbours, and the number of the males they had preſerved becoming burthenſome, they, at the deſire of thoſe who rendered them pregnant, ſent them the boys, and continued ſtill to keep the girls.

As ſoon as the age of the girls permitted, they took away the right breaſt, that they might draw the bow with the greater force. The common opinion is, that they burnt that breaſt, by applying to it, at eight years of age, hot iron, which inſenſibly dried up the fibres and glands. Some ſeem to ſay that they did not make uſe of ſo much ceremony, and that when the part was formed they got rid of it by amputation. In ſhort, ſome authors with much greater probability aſſert, that they employed no violent meaſures, but by a continual compreſſion of that part from infancy they prevented its growth, at leaſt ſo far as to hinder its ever being incommodious in war.

The Amazons were commonly cloathed in the ſkins of the beaſts they killed in hunting, which were tied on the left ſhoulder, and leaving the right ſide uncovered, fell down to their knees. It appears that in war the queens and other chiefs carried a corcelet, or ſlight armour for the body, formed of ſmall pieces of iron, in the manner of leaves or ſcales, faſtened by a girdle, below which the coat of arms hung to the knee. The head was armed with a helmet and plume of feathers. The reſt of their arms were a bow and arrows, lances, javelins, a battle-axe, and buckler nearly in the form of a creſcent, about a foot and half in diameter, with the points upward. Thaleſtris appeared before Alexander with two lances in her hand, though ſhe only came to make him a gallant requeſt. Thoſe who accompanied her bore battle-axes with two edges, the handles of which were as long as the wood of a javelin.

They are ſaid to have made great conqueſts, and to have obtained very extenſive dominions, particularly Crimea and Circaſſia, and to have rendered Iberias, Colchis, and Albania tributary to them. They enjoyed their power for ſeveral centuries, but an expedition into Greece, and into the iſland of Achilles, is ſaid to have ruined their empire.

AMAZONS, (the river of) called by the Spaniards Maranon, is the greateſt river in the world. It is ſo called from the above warlike women, for the Spaniards who firſt paſt through the country on its banks, having ſome ſmart ſkirmiſhes with the natives, and afterwards examining the ſlain, found the bodies of ſome women among them. Orellana was the firſt who diſcovered this river, about the year 1539. The Maranon, after iſſuing from the lake from whence it takes its riſe, in about eleven degrees of ſouth latitude, runs towards the north to Jaen de Bracamoros, for the length of ſix degrees, from whence it directs its courſe towards the eaſt, almoſt parallel to the equinoctial line, as far as the North Cape, where it diſcharges itſelf into the ocean, directly under the equator. It runs from Jaen, where it begins to be navigable, thirty degrees of longitude, according to Condamine, who was ſent into theſe parts by the French king, to diſcover the true meaſure of the earth. This is equal to one thouſand eight hundred miles of ſixty to a degree. But if the turnings and windings are reckoned, it will then be at leaſt two thouſand ſeven hundred miles. It receives from the north and ſouth a prodigious number of rivers, ſome of which run one thouſand five hundred miles, and are not inferior to the Danube or Nile.

AMBAR, a river which riſes in the ſouth-weſt part of Bavaria, and runs to the north-eaſt by Landſperg and Dachan, and falls into the Iſer a little above Landſhut.

AMBARVALIA, in Roman antiquity, were feaſts celebrated by the Roman huſbandmen twice a year. The firſt in the ſpring was in order to render Ceres propitious; when each maſter of a family furniſhed a victim, with an oaken wreath round its neck, which he led thrice round his grounds, luſtrating them with milk and wine, and followed by all his family, ſinging hymns, and dancing in honour of the goddeſs. At the end of harveſt there was a ſecond feſtival, in which they preſented to Ceres the firſt fruits of the ſeaſon, and made an entertainment for their relations and neighbours. At theſe feſtivals they ſacrificed to Ceres a ſow, a ſheep, and a bull or heifer.

Theſe ceremonies were alſo performed in a more public manner by an order of prieſts called Fratres Arvales.

AMBERG, a city of Germany, the capital of the palatinate of Bavaria, with a good caſtle, ramparts, baſtions, and deep ditches. It is ſeated near the confines of Franconia, on the river Wils, about thirty miles from Ratiſbon. It drives a trade in iron and other metals, found in the neighbouring mountains. It is thirty miles eaſt of Nuremberg, and twenty-three north of Ratiſbon. Long. 12. 4. E. Lat. 29. 46. N.

AMBERT, a ſmall Town of France, in Lower Auvergne, the chief place of a ſmall territory called Livradois. It is remarkable for its paper manufactory and camblets. Long. 3. 35. E. Lat. 45. 28. N.

AMBIGATUS, king of the Gauls, in the time of Tarquin the Elder, about five hundred and ninety years before Chriſt. Livy repreſents him as a very powerful prince.

AMBITUS, in Roman antiquity, a perſon's going round the city to ſolicit the intereſt and votes of the people, in order to obtain ſome place of honour or profit. On theſe occaſions the candidates, in their walks, took the meaneſt perſons by the hand, and not only uſed the familiar terms father, brother, friend, but called them by their names, and for this purpoſe had commonly a monitor to aſſiſt them, who whiſpered every body's name in their ears.

AMBLESIDE, a town in Weſtmoreland, with a market on Wedneſdays, and a fair on Wedneſday after Whitſunday for horned cattle, and another on October 29th for horned cattle and ſheep. It is ſeated at one end of Winandermeer, thirteen miles north-weſt-by-weſt of Kendal, and thirty miles ſouth-eaſt-by-ſouth of Cockermouth, Long. 2. 49. W. Lat. 54. 30. N.

AMBLETEUSE, a ſmall maritime town, of Picardy, in France. The harbour is defended by a battery of cannon. It is eight miles north of Boulogne, and one hundred and ſixty-two from Paris.

AMBOISE, a ſmall town of France, in Tourain, with a caſtle, one hundred and eight miles from Paris. Long. 1. 30. E. Lat. 47. 25. N.

AMBOISE (AIMERY) grand maſter of the order of St. John, of Jeruſalem, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by gaining a glorious naval victory in 1510, over the ſultan of Egypt. He died in November 13th, 1512.

AMBOISE (GEORGE) cardinal, archbiſhop of Rouen, and prime miniſter to Lewis XII. king of France, was born in the year 1460. He began his office of prime miniſter with leſſening the taxes, till he reduced them to one third of what they were before. He regulated the laws and the adminiſtration of juſtice, and went into Normandy to eſtabliſh his new code there. He took all poſſible care to make trade and the ſciences flouriſh, was a great encourager of learning, extremely generous, and what is very extraordinary, he never held but one church preferment at once, and had no other revenue but that of his biſhopric, and his ſalary as prime miniſter, beſides his own eſtate, which was inconſiderable, and the preſents he ſometimes received from the king. He died at Lyons, lamented by all France, on the 25th of May, 1510, aged fifty.

During his ſickneſs, he very frequently ſaid to a virtuous Celeſtine brother, who ſerved him, "Ah brother John, I "wiſh I had been all my life brother John." Among the noble actions related of him, it is ſaid, that a gentleman of Normandy offering to ſell him his eſtate, in order to give a portion to his daughter, who was juſt married, he generouſly refuſed the purchaſe, and lent him the ſum he wanted without intereſt.

AMBOISE (MICHAEL D') ſeignor of Chevillan, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He wrote ſeveral books, and among the reſt one entitled, Veneral Epiſtles, Fancies, Complaints, Epitaphs, thirty-four Rondeaux, and three Ballads.

AMBOISE (FRANCIS D') lived in the latter end of the ſixteenth and beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries, and deſerves a place among thoſe whom learning has advanced to honour. He was the ſon of a ſurgeon to Charles IX. of France, and was by gradual ſteps raiſed to be counſellor of ſtate. He publiſhed a great many French verſes, and ſome Latin pieces. He alſo took great pains in collecting the manuſcripts of Peter Abelard, which he publiſhed, and prefixed to them an apologetic preface. He wrote ſeveral theatrical pieces, which he had repreſented, but would not ſuffer them to be printed. His friends however ſtole one of his comedies, which is a very merry piece, called The Neapolitans, and got it printed.

AMBOYNA, the chief of the Molucca iſlands, in the Eaſt Indies. It has a very fine bay, where ſhips may ride ſafe at anchor near the ſhore. About two leagues within the bay, is a Dutch fort, or caſtle, garriſoned with eight hundred men. This iſland had a great number of villages and plantations, but they are moſt of them deſtroyed. It has many high ſteep mountains, with villages at the top, which are watered with fine ſprings, and the vallies are full of trees, that afford ſhady walks. The air is however unwholeſome, and they have a diſtemper here which reſembles the French pox, except its not being ſo painful, nor does it corrode the bones.

This iſland produces millet, tobacco, cocoa-nuts, potatoes, Pinang oranges, lemons, citrons, bamboo canes, and other fruits. There are a few nutmegs, but not very good. The chief produce are cloves, which grow on a tree of the ſize of a cherry-tree, which has the appearance of a laurel as to its leaves. The bark is greyiſh, like that of an olive, and the fruit at firſt is green, then of a pale red, and laſt of all of a dark yellow, inclining to black. The cloves are gathered once a year, from the beginning of October till February. Here is likewiſe the ſagoe-tree, a kind of a palm, of the pith of which they make bread, and by cutting off one of the branches near the top, the ſap will flow out; this is very ſweet, and will ferment into a ſort of wine. A bitter root called oubat will keep it from turning, which otherwiſe it ſoon will, like vinegar. Some trees will yield thirty quarts in twenty-four hours. Long. 126. 20. E. Lat. 3. 36. S.

The men wear large whiſkers, and but little hair upon their chin, and have only a ſlight piece of ſtuff wrapt round their middle. The women tie their hair in knots; the maids are bought of their fathers before they are married, and if the wife proves barren, the marriage is diſſolved. Some of the natives are Mahomedans, and ſome Chriſtians; but they are all ſaid to be lazy, deceitful, and treacherous, and will rather chooſe to die than leave their ancient cuſtoms. They make war with ſmall ſwift veſſels, in ſhape like dragons, with regard to the head and tail. Their houſes are built of Bamboo canes and ſagoe-trees. They ſleep on mats. Their weapons are bows and arrows, javlins, ſcymitars, and targets. They have likewiſe trunks, out of which they ſhoot poiſoned arrows. The women are very amorous, and if they are deceived by their gallants, they give them a ſlow poiſon, which cauſes them to linger a great while before they die.

AMBROSE, deacon of Alexandria, was of an illuſtrious and rich family; but was more eminent ſtill for his wit and happy genius, and eſpecially for his piety. He lived in the third century, and was the patron and friend of Origen. He boldly acknowledged his belief in Jeſus Chriſt before Maximin, and died in the year 250.

AMBROSE (St.) biſhop of Milan, and one of the moſt eminent fathers of the fourth century, was deſcended of an illuſtrious Roman family, and born in Gaul, in the year 333, or as others ſay in 340. His birth is ſaid to have been followed by a remarkable preſage of his future eloquence, for a ſwarm of bees came and ſettled upon his lips as he lay in his cradle. He was very early governor of the provinces of Liguria and Æmilia. He ſettled at Milan, till the year 374, when, upon the death of Auxentius, biſhop of that city, there was a warm conteſt between the Catholics and Arians, on the choice of a new biſhop, and this conteſt was ready to break out into an open ſedition, when Ambroſe thought it his duty, as governor, to go to the church, in order to compoſe the tumult. He addreſſed himſelf to the people in a gentle and pathetic ſpeech, exhorting them to proceed to their choice in a calm and friendly manner; but while he was ſpeaking, the whole aſſembly cried out with one voice, "Let Ambroſe be biſhop." Surpriſed with ſuch a ſudden and unexpected incident, he immediately retired, and made uſe of every artifice to divert them from their reſolution of chuſing him; but at laſt being obliged to comply, he was baptiſed, and ordained biſhop: when beſtowing all the money he poſſeſſed to the poor, and having intruſted his brother with the management of his affairs, he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of divinity, and the diſcharge of his epiſcopal functions, which he performed with a dignity and reſolution that did honour to his character, particularly on the following occaſion. While the emperor Theodoſius was in Italy, an inſurrection happened at Theſſalonica, in which ſeveral of the magiſtrates were ſtoned, and their bodies dragged along the ſtreets; of which Theodoſius being informed, raſhly gave orders, that a certain number of the inhabitants ſhould be indiſcriminately put to death; on which the city was filled with the blood of the innocent; ſeven thouſand perſons being ſlain; among whom were ſeveral ſtrangers. On this occaſion, ſays Sozomen, a merchant came and offered to die for his two ſons, who were ſeized, promiſing the ſoldiers to reward them for this favour, by giving them all his gold. They gave him leave to chooſe one of his ſons, ſaying they could not ſpare both, becauſe they wanted to complete the number. The father in a dreadful ſuſpence ſtood looking ſometimes at one, and ſometimes at the other, with a mind filled with agony, and incapable of determining, till he ſaw them both ſlain before his face. Some time after, Theodoſius coming to Milan, went to receive the ſacrament at the great church, where Ambroſe meeting him at the door, denied him entrance, and repreſented his guilt in the moſt forcible and pathetic terms. The emperor was ſtruck with his words, and with great uneaſineſs of mind returned to his palace; but about a year after, Ambroſe being convinced of the ſincerity of his repentance, admitted him into the church. St. Ambroſe died on the 4th of April, 397. The beſt edition of his works is that of Paris, 1691, in two volumes folio.

AMBROSE, general of the order of Camaldoli, was born at Portico, a ſmall town in Romania: he diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the councils of Baſil, Ferrara, and Florence, where he was admired for the fluency with which he ſpoke Greek. He wrote a tranſlation of ſeveral Greek authors, and other books; and died on the 21ſt of October, 1439.

AMBROSE (ISAAC) an eminent preſbyterian miniſter, was educated at Brazen-noſe college, Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and became miniſter of Preſton, and afterwards of Garſtang, in Lancaſhire; where he was in 1662 ejected for non-conformity. It was uſual with him to retire every year for a month into a little hut in a wood, where he ſhunned all ſociety, and devoted himſelf to religious contemplation. Dr. Calamy obſerves, that he had a very ſtrong impulſe on his mind, of the approach of death, and took a formal leave of his friends at their houſe, a little before his departure; and the laſt night of his life he ſent his diſcourſe concerning angels to the preſs. The next day he ſhut himſelf up in his parlour, where, to the great ſurpriſe and regret of all who ſaw him, he was found juſt expiring. He died in 1663-4, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age. He wrote ſeveral other books, as the Prima, Media, & Ultima, or the Firſt, Middle, and Laſt Things; Meditations on Man's Miſery, &c. His works were printed together in folio, in 1674 and 1689.

AMBROSIA, in mythology, the ſolid food of the gods, in contradiſtinction to their drink, which was called nectar.

AMBROSIA, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival obſerved in moſt cities of Greece, in honour of Bacchus.

AMBROSIUS AURELIANUS, or AURELIANUS AMBROSIUS, a famous general of the antient Britons, and afterwards king, was of Roman extraction. His ſucceſs againſt the Saxons, whom Vortigern had invited into England, was ſo conſiderable, that the Britons obliged Vortigern to yield to him all the weſtern part of the kingdom, and ſoon after withdrawing their allegiance, Vortigern retired to a caſtle in Wales, where being beſieged by Ambroſius, the caſtle took fire, and the unhappy prince periſhed in the flames, leaving Ambroſius ſole monarch of Britain, who now took the imperial purple, after the manner of the Roman emperors. He after this diſtinguiſhed himſelf highly by his valour and conduct in ſeveral engagements with the Saxons, but is ſaid to have been at laſt killed in a battle fought in the year 508, againſt Cerdic, one of the Saxon generals.

AMBURBIUM, in Roman antiquity, a proceſſion made round the walls of Rome, in which the Romans led a victim, and afterwards ſacrificed it, in order to avert ſome calamity with which the city was ſuppoſed to be threatened.

AMELIA, an epiſcopal city of Italy, in the ſtate of the church, ſeated on a mountain, in the duchy of Spoletto, twelve miles from the city of that name. Long. 13. 20. E. Lat. 42. 33. N.

AMELIA ELIZABETH of Hanau, the wife of William V. landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, and regent of his dominions after his death, rendered herſelf famous in the ſeventeenth century by her courage and her politics. She had a ſhare in the great affairs which, at that time, employed the beſt part of Europe. She entered into the regency at a time when the country of Heſſe had been exhauſted by the preceding wars, during the life of her huſband, who died young in 1637. Her relations and neareſt neighbours thought that period a proper time to invade the country of Caſſel; but they had ſoon reaſon to repent, when they found that it was defended by a lady of an heroic mind, ſkilled in the affairs of the cabinet. George, landgrave of Darmſtadt, endeavoured to recover whatever his anceſtor Philip the Magnanimous had poſſeſſed; but ſhe drove him from the countries in diſpute, and obliged him to come to an accommodation. The greateſt part of her regency was paſſed in giving battles and recovering towns; and the manner in which ſhe acted, ſhewed that ſhe knew as much as her generals, and that there never was a lady more intrepid, or more moderate in adverſity. She was admired for her being indefatigable in government, and the expedition with which ſhe carried on her affairs; for her eloquence in council; her readineſs in comprehending the opinions of others, and her prudence in chooſing the beſt. She ſpoke in a graceful manner, was affable to every one, and generous in rewarding the ſervices rendered her; was fond of polite literature, and rewarded men of learning. She reſigned the regency in the year 1650, and reſtored her dominions to her ſon, which were then much more extenſive than when ſhe undertook the government.

AMELIUS, a platonic philoſopher, in the third century, whoſe true name was Gentilianus. He was a native of Tuſcany, and was twenty-four years a diſciple of Plotinus at Rome. He made copious collections of whatever he had heard in philoſophical conferences, and from theſe compoſed an hundred treatiſes. He afterwards wrote forty books againſt Zoſtrianus, and a work intitled, The difference between the Doctrine of Numenius, and that of Plotinus.

AMELOT DE LA HOUSSAIE, (ABRAHAM NICHOLAS) a French author, born at Orleans, in 1634. His principal works are 1. A French tranſlation of Balthaſar Gratian's Courtier. 2. Of Machiavel's El Principe. 3. Of the Annals of Tacitus, with Remarks; and, 4. Of Father Paul's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent. He alſo wrote the Hiſtory of the Government of Venice, and other works. He died at Paris in 1706.

AMELOTTE (DENYS) born at Saintes in 1606, was a famous French writer among the Roman Catholics. He was ordained prieſt in 1632, and wrote, 1. A French tranſlation of the New Teſtament. 2. An Abridgment of Divinity. 3. A Catechiſm for the Jubilee. 4. A kind of Chriſtian Manual; and, 5. The Life of Charles de Condren, ſuperior of the congregation of the Oratory.

AMENECLES, a Corinthian, and the firſt of the Greeks who built gallies with three ranges of rowers.

AMERBACHIUS (JOHN) a native of Retlingen in Suabia, and a learned printer at Baſil in the fifteenth century, whoſe editions are accurate and valuable.

AMERICA, or the New World, is bounded on all ſides by the ocean, and is called one of the four parts of the world; but it is much the greateſt. It was firſt diſcovered by Chriſtopher Columbus, a Genoeſe, in 1491, and was called America from Americus Veſpucius, a Florentine, who made ſome farther diſcoveries of the ſouth part of that continent. It is about ſeven thouſand miles long, and in ſome places three thouſand ſix hundred and eighty broad, in others not above ſixty.

It has been long diſputed which way this part of the world came to be peopled, concerning which there are various conjectures, moſt of which are very wide of the truth. The difficulties ariſe from hence: All the people, except thoſe of the north, are of a kind of copper colour; they have no hair on any part of their bodies, except the head, which is long and black. It was formerly ſaid that they plucked up their beards by the roots as faſt as it grew, but this is denied by thoſe who have lived among them. They ſpeak a vaſt number of languages, but none of them have any affinity with thoſe which we are acquainted with. Their animals are generally different from thoſe in other parts, though called by the ſame names: for inſtance, the American oſtrich has three toes, one of which grows backward; whereas the Aſian and African oſtrich has only two toes before, and none backwards, beſides other material differences. At its diſcovery it had no horſes, cows, hogs, goats, ſheep, &c. ſo common in all other parts.

There is no doubt to be made but the inhabitants of the old world were aſtoniſhed when they were told that another vaſt continent had been diſcovered, which they never had any account of before. However, no ſooner had Chriſtopher Columbus found out certain iſlands, and eſpecially that now called Hiſpaniola, where there was gold, but it was immediately called by ſome known name or other. Some affirmed that it was the Zipanori of Marco Polo, the Venetian. Robert Stephens believed that America was the place where Solomon ſent his fleet to fetch gold, and Columbus thought he had found the Eaſt Indies, by ſailing to the weſt. Arius Montanus not only placed Ophir and Parvaim in the new world, but concluded that Jectan, the ſon of Heber, was the perſon that peopled it, and had given his name to Juktan, a chimerical city of Peru; that Ophir his ſon ſettled in Mexico; that Jobab, another ſon, inhabited the coaſts of Paria; and that the oriental mountain Sephar, where Moſes ſaid the children of Jectan proceeded to, was the famous chain of mountains called the Andes, which run from north to ſouth the whole length of Peru and Chili. Several famous men, encouraged by his authority, embraced the ſame opinion. The Spaniards affirmed, that when their kingdom was invaded by the Moors, part of their people fled to America, and declared they had only recovered ſome provinces of their empire, which the misfortunes of the times had deprived them of, and for that reaſon they had an inconteſtible right to poſſeſs them. Oviedo, one of their moſt celebrated authors, affirmed the iſlands called the Antilles were the famous Heſperides mentioned by the poets, and that God had only reſtored that which belonged to Spain three thouſand one hundred and fifty years before, in the time of king Heſperus, and that St. James and St. Paul had preached the goſpel in thoſe parts; and others ſaid it was the Atlantis of Plato.

We ſhall now proceed to give a general account of this part of the world, leaving particulars to diſtinct articles. The air of America muſt be very various, becauſe it lies under all the different zones, and has conſequently all the variations of climate that are to be found in all the other parts of the earth.

The ſame may be ſaid with reſpect to the ſoil; but if we except the northern and ſouthern countries, which from their ſituation are cold and barren, the reſt produces moſt of the metals, gems, trees, plants, and fruits, that are to be found in the other parts of the world, and ſome of them in greater abundance, and higher perfection. Thus the gold and ſilver of America have been brought in ſuch quantities to Europe, as to lower the value of thoſe precious metals; and the ſame may be ſaid of its diamonds, pearls, emeralds, amathyſts, and other gems. To theſe may be added a variety of other commodities, which though eſteemed leſs valuable, are of much greater uſe, as cochineal, braſil, logwood, indigo, anatto, fuſtic, the cacao, or chocolate nut, ſugar, rice, pimento, ginger, tobacco, cotton, the balſams of Tolu, Peru, and China, ſarſaparilla, ſaſſafras, Jeſuits bark, mechacan, caſſia, tamarinds, lignum vitæ, ambergris, hides, furs, and a great variety of beautiful and medicinal woods, roots, and plants; to which, before the diſcovery of America, we were either entire ſtrangers, or forced to buy at an extravagant rate from Aſia and Africa. In America, a variety of the moſt excellent fruits grow wild in the greateſt perfection; and the ſoil is ſo ſurpriſingly fertile, that many exotic plants flouriſh there in as great perfection as in their native ſoil.

Yet, notwithſtanding this amazing plenty and variety, at the firſt diſcovery of this vaſt continent, our kind of ſheep, goats, aſſes, and horſes, were not to be found there; but theſe have ſince been brought thither, and in thoſe fertile paſtures have encreaſed ſo faſt, that the inhabitants are well ſtocked with them; but, in the room of theſe domeſtic animals, they had many others to which we were utter ſtrangers. America has two principal gulphs, that of St. Lawrence to the north-eaſt and that of Mexico, in which is the mouth of the river Miſſiſipi. There are four famous rivers: that of the Amazons, lately deſcribed; the Plata, which riſes in Peru, near a town of the ſame name, and having received the Paraguay and Parana, falls into the ocean which lies to the ſouth-eaſt; the river St. Lawrence, which traverſes Canada from the ſouth-weſt to the north-eaſt, paſſes by Quebec, and falls into the gulph of St. Lawrence; and the Miſſiſipi, which runs from the north to the ſouth, and falls into the gulph of Mexico.

The moſt conſiderable chain of mountains in South America is the Andes, which is the higheſt and longeſt chain of mountains in the world. In North America, are the Aligany mountains, which ſome have called the Apalachian; they run on the back of the Britiſh ſettlements, from Carolina to New York.

America is divided into,

I. The dominions of Great-Britain, which contain the countries about Hudſon's Bay, Canada, Nova Scotia, New England, New York, the Jerſeys, Penſylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Carolina, Georgia, Eaſt and Weſt Florida, on the continent; with the iſlands of Newfoundland, Cape Breton, St. John's, Providence, Jamaica, St. Chriſtopher's, Antigua, Nevis, Dominica, Barbuda, Anguilla, Montſerrat, Tobago, St. Vincent, Barbadoes, Granada, and the Granadillos, &c.

II. The dominions of Spain contain Louiſiana, Old Mexico, New Mexico, and California, in North America; the extenſive countries of Terra Firma, Peru, and Paraguay, in South America; with the valuable iſlands of Cuba, half of St. Domingo or Hiſpaniola, Porto Rico, Trinidad, and Margarita, in North America; Chiloe, the King's or Pearl iſlands. Juan Fernandes, and the Gallipagos iſlands in the Pacific Ocean.

III. The dominions of France now conſiſt of only part of Guiana in South America, and the iſlands of Martinico, Guadaloupe, half of Hiſpaniola, Marigalante, Deſeada, St. Bartholomew's, and St. Martin's.

IV. The dominions of Portugal conſiſt of the rich and extenſive country of Braſil, in South America.

V. Thoſe of the Dutch conſiſt of Surinam, on the continent of South America; the iſlands of Curaſſao, Bonaire, and Aruba, near the coaſt of Terra Firma, with St. Euſtatia and Sala, two of the Caribbee iſlands.

VI. Thoſe of the Danes, which conſiſt of the iſlands of St. Thomas and St. Croix.

VII. The parts ſtill in the poſſeſſion of the native Indians are the countries to the north and the weſt of our colonies, thoſe north-weſt of Mexico, the greateſt part of Guiana, and all the moſt ſouthern part of the continent, as Patagonia, and the iſland Terra del Fuego.

AMERICUS VESPUCIUS, a Florentine, who, under the auſpices of Emanuel, king of Portugal, in the year 1497, made a few inconſiderable diſcoveries in South America, and drew a map of the country, on which account the New World was, from his name, called America, though it had been already diſcovered by Chriſtopher Columbus, a Genoeſe. If, therefore, it was proper for it to receive the name of any European, it would certainly have been more proper to have given it that of Columbia, from the great man who made it known to the Europeans.

AMERSFORT, a city in the Netherlands, in the province of Utrecht, ſeated on the river Ems, thirteen miles from Utrecht, and twenty-four from Amſterdam. The moſt remarkable things are the town-houſe, the grand place, which is triangular, the public walk planted with trees, and the great church dedicated to St. George. There are two more churches, and other public buildings. The land to the eaſt and ſouth of this city is very fruitful; on the north there is nothing but paſture-ground, and on the weſt it is woody. Not far from hence is a mountain called Amersfort-Berg, on which they have planted a viſta of trees, which reaches to Utrecht Long. 5. 20. E. Lat. 52. 14. N.

AMERSHAM, or AGMONDESHAM, a market-town in Buckinghamſhire, conſiſt of about two hundred houſes, with a free-ſchool, and four alms-houſes. It ſends two members to parliament, and has a market on Tueſday. It is a rectory rated at 48l. 16s. 8d. in the king's books. The market-houſe is a very handſome ſtructure. The diſtance from London is twenty-nine miles north-weſt, and thirty-one ſouth-weſt of Buckingham. The fairs are on Whit-Monday, and Sept. 19, for ſheep. Long. 0. 15. W. Lat. 51. 47. N.

AMES (WILLIAM) D. D. a learned Independent divine, famous for his controverſial writings, was born in 1576, and educated at Chriſt's college, in Cambridge. In the reign of king James I. he left the univerſity, and ſoon after the kingdom, on account of his being unwilling to conform to the rules of the church, and retired to the Hague, where he had not been long before he was invited to accept of the divinity-chair in the univerſity of Franeker, in Frieſland, which he filled, with admirable abilities, for above twelve years, during which his fame was ſo great, that many came from remote nations to be educated under him. He from thence removed to Rotterdam, where he continued during the remainder of his life. His controverſial writings, which compoſe the greateſt part of his works, are chiefly againſt Bellarmine and the Arminians. He alſo wrote, 1. A freſh Suit againſt Ceremonies. 2. Lectiones in Pſalmos Davidis. 3. Medulla Theologiæ; and ſeveral pieces relative to the ſciences. He died of an aſthma, at Rotterdam, in Nov. 1633.

AMIANUS MARCELLINUS, an hiſtorian, born at Antioch. He wrote, in Latin, an intereſting hiſtory of which there are now only eighteen books extant. Though a Pagan, he ſpeaks with candour and moderation of the Chriſtian religion, and even praiſes it: his hero is the emperor Julian. He died about the year 390. The beſt edition of his Hiſtory is that of Gronovius, in 1693.

AMIENS, a city of France, and the capital of Picardy. It contains about thirty-five thouſand inhabitants, and has a cathedral called Notre Dame, which is a very fine church, three hundred and ſixty-ſix feet long, and one hundred and thirty-two feet high. It has ten pariſh-churches, and ſeveral religious houſes for both ſexes. It is an agreeable city, with large ſtreets, fine houſes, and ſeveral ſquares, among which that of Des Fleurs and the great market are the chief. There is a pleaſant walk on the ramparts, on account of the trees planted thereon. The river Somme enters the city by three different canals, under as many bridges, which are united at the other end of the city, where is the bridge of St. Michael. It was taken by the Spaniards, in 1597. Some of the ſoldiers were diſguiſed like peaſants, and conducted a cart loaded with nuts; when the gate was open, they let one of the bags of nuts fall down, which being ſcattered about, the guard amuſed themſelves in gathering them up, by which means the Spaniards, watching the opportunity, entered the city and took it. It was retaken ſome time afterwards by Henry IV. who fortified it with a citadel, which is ſuppoſed to be one of the beſt and moſt regular in Europe. It is ſeated ſeventy-five miles north of Paris, twenty ſouth of Abbeville, and ſeventy ſouth of Calais. Long. 2. 30. E. Lat. 49. 34. N.

AMILCAR, the name of ſeveral Carthaginian captains, the moſt celebrated of which is Amilcar Barcas, the father of Hannibal, who, during five years, infeſted the coaſt of Italy; when the Romans ſending out their whole naval ſtrength, defeated him near Trapani, two hundred and forty-two years before Chriſt; and this put an end to the firſt Punic war. Amilcar began the ſecond, and landed in Spain, where he ſubdued the moſt warlike nations; but, as he was preparing for an expedition into Italy, he was killed in battle, two hundred and twenty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra. He left three ſons, whom he had educated, as he ſaid, like three lions, to tear Rome in pieces, and made Hannibal, his eldeſt ſon, ſwear to an eternal enmity againſt the Romans.

AMMANATI (LAURA BATTIFERRI) an Italian lady of diſtinguiſhed genius and learning, was the daughter of John Antony Battiferri, and was born at Urbino, in 1513. She married Bartholomew Ammanati, a celebrated architect and ſculptor; ſpent her whole life in the ſtudy of philoſophy and polite literature, and is eſteemed one of the beſt Italian poets of the ſixteenth century. The principal merit of her poems conſiſt in a noble elevation, their being filled with excellent morals, and their breathing a ſpirit of piety. The academy of Intronati, at Sienna, chooſe her one of their mem-members. She died in November, 1589, at ſeventy-ſix years of age.

AMMIRATI, or AMMIRATO, (SCIPIO) an eminent hiſtorian, born at Lecca, a city in the kingdom of Naples, on the 27th of September, 1531. He went into Florence, where the grand duke loaded him with benefits, and even made him his chancellor. He wrote an Hiſtory of Florence, in two volumes folio, and a great number of other works on different ſubject, and died January 30, 1600.

AMMON, the father of the Ammonites, was the ſon of Lot by his youngeſt daughter. Gen. xiv.

AMMON, king of Judah, was the ſon of Manaſſeh. He was very guilty of idolatry, and after a reign of two years was murdered by his own ſervants, about the ſixty-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra. He was ſucceeded by Joſiah his ſon.

AMMON, in Pagan mythology, a name given to Jupiter in Libya, where he was worſhipped under the form of a ram. His oracles laſted till the time of Theodoſius.

AMMONIUS, ſurnamed SACEAS, was born in Alexandria, and flouriſhed about the beginning of the third century. He was one of the moſt celebrated philoſophers of his age. He took great pains in reconciling the differences between the Platoniſts and Peri, atetics, in which he gained great reputation. Plotinus and Origen were both his diſciples. He died about the year 230.

AMMONIUS, ſurnamed LITHOTOME, a celebrated ſurgeon of Alexandria, ſo called from his inventing the operation of drawing the ſtone out of the bladder.

AMMONIUS (ANDREW) a native of Lucca, came, in the beginning of the ſixteenth century to ſeek his fortune in England, and lived for ſome time at ſir Thomas Moore's, and afterwards in St. Thomas's college. He was at length made ſecretary to Henry VIII. and honoured by pope Leo X. with a public character at the court of that prince. He applied himſelf to the belles lettres and to Latin poetry, and publiſhed ſeveral poems. He died of the ſweating-ſickneſs in 1517, before he was forty-years of age.

AMMONIUS (LIVINUS) diſtinguiſhed himſelf among the Carthuſians of Flanders, not only by the employment of procurator, with which he was honoured in Ghent, his native country, but alſo by his learning and piety. He was greatly eſteemed by Eraſmus, who looked upon him as one who had got the better of the prejudices common to thoſe of his profeſſion.

AMONTONS (WILLIAM) a famous French mathematician, born in 1663. Before he was twenty-four years of age, he preſented a new hygroſcope to the Royal Academy of Sciences, which was very much approved; and in 1695, he publiſhed, in French, Obſervations and Experiments concerning the Manner of making a new Hour-Glaſs, and on Barometers, Thermometers, and Hygroſcopes. This is the only book he wrote beſides the pieces inſerted in the Memoirs of the Royal Academy of Sciences, and the Journal des Scavans. He died Oct. 11, 1705.

AMORGUS, an iſland in the Archipelago, about thirty-ſix miles in circumference. It is exceeding ſteep towards the north-eaſt; and the town is three miles weſt from the port, which is built in the form of an amphitheatre round a rock, with an old caſtle. Three miles from the town, on the edge of the ſea, is a large houſe, where a hundred caloyers or Greek monks are lodged. Within it is a guard-room, with huge wooden clubs to defend the entrance, which is by a wooden ladder. Here is the image of the Virgin Mary, which, they ſay, was brought there by an inviſible power, and that it continues to work miracles. In the other part of the iſland is a miraculous urn, which, they pretend, often fills itſelf with water. The inhabitants of this iſland are very affable, and the women pretty; but their habit is very ſingular. Their head-dreſs is a ſcarf of yellow linen, which covers the upper part of the head and the lower part of the face, and they wind it afterwards in the manner of a turban. The land is well improved, and yields corn, oil, and wine in great plenty; the bunches of grapes are exceeding large, and each grape is oval, and an inch and a half in length; they are of a whitiſh green, exceeding ſweet, and of an exquiſite taſte. Long. 26. 15. E. Lat. 36. 30. N.

AMOS, the third of the twelve leſſer prophets, was an herdſman of the city Tekoa. He propheſied under Uzias and Jeroboam II and foretold the captivity and re-eſtabliſhment of the ten tribes. He was put to death by Amaſius, prieſt of Bethel, about ſeven hundred and eighty-five years before Chriſt.

He ought not to be confounded with Amos, the father of Iſaiah.

AMOUR (WILLIAM DE ST.) a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, and canon of Beauvais, was born at St Amour, in Franche Comté, and vigorouſly defended the rights of the univerſity of Paris, who ſent him to Rome for that purpoſe. His book on the Perils of the latter Times was condemned by Alexander IV. He was even baniſhed to St. Amour; but after the death of that pope, returned to Paris, and was received there with applauſe. He wrote ſeveral other works beſides that already mentioned, and died Sept. 13, 1272.

AMOUR (LEWIS GOURIN DE ST.) a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, and rector of the univerſity of Paris, was ſent to Rome to defend the cauſe of the advocates for Janſenus. He was excluded the Sorbonne for not ſigning M. Arnauld's condemnation, and died on the 15th of November, 1687. His Journal was printed in 1662, in folio.

AMOUR (St.) a ſmall town of France, in the Franche Comté, ſixteen miles from Tournis. Long. 15. 28. E. Lat. 46. 30. N.

AMOUR, a river whoſe ſource is in Siberia, in about fifty-four degrees north latitude. It runs through Chineſe Tartary, and falls into the Tartarian Sea. The Chineſe call it Sagalian Oula.

AMOY, an iſland, in the province of Fokien, in China, where the Engliſh had a factory; but they have abandoned it. Long. 136. 0. Lat. 24. 30. It has a fine port, that will contain many thouſand veſſels. The emperor has a garriſon here of ſix or ſeven thouſand men.

AMPASA, a ſmall country of Africa, on the coaſt of Zanguebar, between the line and the kingdom of Melinda. The king is a vaſſal of the Portugueſe. Ampaſa is the capital of the country. Long. 40. 25. E. Lat. 1. 30. S.

AMPATRES, a people of the iſland of Madagaſcar, in a very fruitful country, but full of woods, in which they build their villages. They are addicted to robbery.

AMPHARES, one of the Lacedæmonian Ephori, and the principal cauſe of the tragical death of Agis, king of Sparta. See the article AGIS.

AMPHIARAUS, in Pagan mythology, a celebrated prophet, who poſſeſſed part of the kingdom of Argos. He was believed to excel in divining by dreams, and is ſaid to be the firſt who divined by fire. Amphiaraus knowing, by the ſpirit of prophecy, that he ſhould loſe his life in the war againſt Thebes, hid himſelf, in order to avoid engaging in that expedition; but his wife Eriphyle, being prevailed upon by a preſent of a necklace, diſcovered the place in which he had concealed himſelf; ſo that he was obliged to accompany the other princes who marched againſt Thebes, which proved fatal to him; for the earth being ſplit aſunder by a thunder-bolt, both he and his chariot were ſwallowed up in the opening. When he ſet out on this expedition, he was ſo provoked at his wife, that he enjoined his children to put her to death as ſoon as their age would allow them, which was accordingly performed by Alcmeon. See the articles ALCMEON and CALLIRHOE.

Amphiaraus, after his death, was ranked among the Gods; temples were dedicated to him; and his oracle, as well as the ſports inſtituted to his honour, were very famous.

AMPHICTYONS, Αμφικτυονες, in Grecian antiquity, an aſſembly of the deputies regularly ſent from the ſeveral Grecian ſtates to Delphi, in ſome meaſure reſembling the diet of the German empire. Theſe aſſemblies, which met twice a year, that is in ſpring and autumn, decided all diſputes between the Grecian ſtates, and their determinations were eſteemed ſacred and inviolable. Theſe aſſemblies were, it is ſaid, inſtituted by Amphictyon, the third king of Athens, about one thouſand four hundred and ninety-nine years before Chriſt.

AMPHILOCHIUS, biſhop of Iconium, in the fourth century, was the friend of St. Gregory Nazienzen and St. Baſil. He aſſiſted at the firſt general council of Conſtantinople in 381, and preſided at the council of Sidæ. Amphilochius, obſerving that the emperor Theodoſius encouraged the Arians, went to his palace, and approaching Arcadius, his ſon, careſſed him as if he had been an infant, but did not treat him with the cuſtomary reſpect. Theodoſius, enraged at an affront offered to himſelf in the perſon of his ſon, ordered the biſhop to be thruſt out of the palace, when, turning to Theodoſius he cried, "My lord, you cannot "bear that your ſon ſhould be injured, and are diſpleaſed "at thoſe who do not treat him with reſpect; can you then "doubt, that the God of the univerſe alſo abhors thoſe "who blaſpheme againſt his only ſon." Theodoſius, upon this, called back the biſhop, begged his pardon, and ſoon after publiſhed ſevere laws againſt the aſſemblies of the Arians. St. Amphilochius died about the year 394.

AMPHILOCLES, in Pagan mythology, the ſon of Amphiaraus and Eriphyle, was both a king and a prophet, for he reigned at Argos; but not being able to maintain himſelf in that kingdom, he built a city in the bay of Ambraccia; but his brother Mopſus and he quarrelling, they killed each other in a duel.

Amphilocles had an altar erected to him at Athens, which did not contribute ſo much to the glory of his name, as an oracle he had at Mallus in Cilicia.

AMPHION, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Jupiter and Antiope, played ſo well on the lyre, that the rocks were ſaid to follow him, and the ſtones, moved by his harmony, ranged themſelves in order, and formed the walls of Thebes. He married Niobe, whoſe inſult to Diana occaſioned the loſs of their children; when the unhappy father, filled with deſpair, attempted to deſtroy the temple of Apollo, but was puniſhed by the loſs of his ſight and ſkill, and caſt into the infernal regions.

This fable is founded on Amphion's civilizing the manners of the moſt ſavage among mankind by his eloquence; but the charms of oratory loſe all their influence, when the orator himſelf becomes prophane and impious.

AMPHIPOLIS, a town of Turky in Europe, anciently the capital of Macedonia, ſeated on the river Strymon, ſeventy miles north eaſt of Salonichi. Long. 40. 16. E. Lat. 41. 38. N.

AMPHITHEATRE, in antiquity, a ſpacious edifice, built either round or oval, for the convenience of beholding the combats of wild beaſts, gladiators, and other ſports. The loweſt part was called arena, from its being ſtrewed with ſand; round which were vaults, ſtiled cavæ, in which were confined the wild beaſts appointed for the ſhews; above which was a large circular periſtyle, called the podium, adorned with columns, where the emperors, ſenators, and other perſons of diſtinction, were ſeated; and above theſe were circular rows of benches, riſing one above another, which were entered by avenues, at the end of which were gates, called vomitoriæ.

AMPHITRITE, in Pagan mythology, the Goddeſs of the ſea, the daughter of Nereus, and the wife of Neptune, who had courted her for a long time to no purpoſe, till he ſent the dolphin to intercede for him, who ſucceeding, the God rewarded him, by placing him among the ſtars.

AMPHYTRION, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Alcæus, and the huſband of Alcmena, vanquiſhed the Teleboans by the aſſiſtance of Cometho, the daughter of Pteleraüs. Mean while Jupiter went to ſee Alcmena under the form of Amphytrion, and lying with her, begat Hercules; and Amphytrion coming home the night after, begat another ſon called Iphicles. See ALCMENA.

AMPTHIL, a town in Bedfordſhire, pleaſantly ſituated between two hills. It has a market on Thurſdays, and is forty-three miles north-north-weſt of London, and ſix miles ſouth of Bedford. The fairs are on May 4, and December 11, for cattle.

AMPURIAS, the capital of the territory of Ampurdan, in Catalonia, ſeated at the mouth of the river Fluvia, ſixty miles north eaſt of Catalonia. The land about it is barren, full of briars and bulruſhes, except in ſome places, which produce flax. Long. 2. 56. E. Lat 42. 5. N.

AMRAS, a ſtrong caſtle of Germany, ſeated in Tirol, a mile and a quarter ſouth-eaſt of Inſpruck. It is full of rarities of every kind, and has a library, with the portraits of many learned men. Long. 11. 40. E. Lat. 47. 0. N.

AMRI, king of Iſrael, built Samaria, ſurpaſſed all his predeceſſors in impiety, and died about nine hundred and eighteen years before Chriſt.

AMSBURY, or AMBERSBURY, a town in Wiltſhire, with a market on Fridays, and four fairs, on May 17, June 22, October 6, and the firſt Wedneſday after December 12, for horſes, ſheep, pigs, and horned cattle. It is the Pagus Ambri, famous for a monaſtery built by one Ambrus, and afterwards for a nunnery of noble women. There is a nobleman's ſeat here, built by Inigo Jones, to which new works were added under the direction of lord Burlington. It is eighty miles weſt of London, and ſix miles north of Saliſbury. Long. 1. 20. W. Lat. 51. 29. N.

AMSTERDAM, the capital city of the province of Holland, and of the United Netherlands, is ſeated on the river Amſtel and an arm of the ſea called the Wye. It is a very large trading city, and may be called the magazine of the univerſe. If its preſent ſtate be compared with what it was formerly, it will appear to be a great wonder, that in ſo ſhort a time it could attain ſuch grandeur, beauty, and magnificence. However, the air is but indifferent, which proceeds from the marſhes that ſurround it, and render it almoſt inacceſſible; but this inconvenience is abundantly recompenſed by the utility of its commerce, which its port ſerves greatly to promote; for it will contain above a thouſand large ſhips.

In 1204, it was nothing but a ſmall caſtle, called Amſtel from the name of the river, which its lords made a retreat for fiſhermen, who at firſt lived in huts covered with thatch; but it ſoon became conſiderable, and had a bridge and towers built about it, inſomuch that it roſe to a ſmall city; though till the year 1490, it was ſurrounded with nothing but a weak palliſado; and then the walls were built with brick, to defend it from the incurſions of the inhabitants of Utrecht, with whom the Hollanders were often quarrelling; but ſome months afterwards it was almoſt reduced to aſhes. In 1512, it was beſieged by the people of Guelderland; but not being able to take it, they ſet fire to the ſhips in the harbour.

In 1525, John of Leyden, the pretended king of Munſter, got into the city in the night-time, attacked the town-houſe, and defeated thoſe that made any reſiſtance. At length they barricaded the avenues to the market-place with wool and hop-ſacks, where John was with ſix hundred men, and ſo put a ſtop to their fury till day appeared, at which time the citizens fell upon them on all ſides, and forced them to retire into the town-houſe, where they were all cut to pieces, except a very few. About ten years after, there was another tumult raiſed by a parcel of fanatics, conſiſting of men and women, who ran about the ſtreets ſtark naked, and had a deſign of making themſelves maſters of the town houſe. Their ſhrieks and cries, which were dreadful enough, ſoon alarmed the inhabitants, who ſeized the greateſt part of them, and gave them the chaſtiſement they deſerved. It was one of the laſt cities that embraced the reformed religion; and when it was beſieged by the Hollanders, in 1578, for ten months before it capitulated, one article of the capitulation was, a free exerciſe of the Roman Catholic religion; but this was not obſerved by the Proteſtants, for they ſoon drove the eccleſiaſtics, monks, and nuns, out of the city, broke the images, and demoliſhed the altars. From this time it became the general rendezvous of all nations and of every ſect, which raiſed it to that degree of grandeur and opulence it now enjoys. The citizens were obliged to enlarge their bounds ſeveral times; and in 1675, they encreaſed it to its preſent extent. It was ſurrounded with a brick wall, and a large ditch, eighty feet broad, full of running water. The walls were fortified with twenty-ſix baſtions, on each of which there is now a wind-mill. There are eight gates towards the land, and one towards the water.

Amſterdam, being ſeated in a marſhy ſoil, is built on piles of wood, for which reaſon no coaches are allowed, except to great men and phyſicians, who pay a tax for that privilege; and all kinds of goods are drawn on ſledges. Beſides, it ſtands ſo low, that they would be expoſed to inundations, if they did not ſecure themſelves by dikes and ſluices. The fineſt ſtreets are, the Keyſar's Graft, or Emperor's Canal; the Heer Graft, or Lords Canal; the Cingel; and the ſtreet of Haerlem. The principal canal is remarkable for its houſes, which are magnificent ſtructures, of an equal height. There are three prodigious ſluices, and a great number of ſtone bridges over the canals, which croſs the city in many parts, and render the ſtreets clean and pleaſant. The canals are deep, their ſides are lined with hewn ſtone, and have generally rows of trees planted on each ſide.

The fineſt is that called the Ammarack, which is formed by the waters of the Amſtel, into which the tide comes up, and upon the ſides of which are two large quays. This canal has ſeveral bridges: the principal is that next the ſea, called Pont-Neuf, or the New Bridge; it is ſix hundred and ſixty feet long, and ſeventy broad, with iron baluſtrades on each ſide; it has thirty-ſix arches, of which eleven are very high, and eight are ſhut up to incloſe the yachts. From this bridge there is a moſt charming proſpect both of the city, port, and ſea. The port is a mile and half in length, and above a thouſand paces in breadth: it is always filled with a multitude of veſſels, which look like a foreſt, or rather a floating city. The ſtreets in general are well paved, and the houſes built of brick or ſtone. Towards the ſides of the haven, the city is incloſed with great poles driven into the ground, which are joined by large beams placed horizontally. There are openings to let the ſhips in and out, which are kept ſhut every night at the ringing of a bell. Amſterdam is computed to be half as big as London; and the number of houſes are ſaid to amount to twenty-ſix thouſand and thirty-five. The ſtreets are but ordinary; the principal of theſe is the Dam.

The public buildings are very magnificent. The ſtadt-houſe was began to be built in 1648; it is founded upon fourteen thouſand wooden piles, and its front is two hundred and eighty-two feet long, its ſides two hundred and fifty-five feet, and its height to the roof one hundred and ſixteen. There is a marble pediment in the front, whereon a woman is carved in relievo, holding the arms of the city; ſhe is ſeated in a chair, ſupported by two lions, with an olive-branch in her right hand; and on each ſide are four Naiads, who preſent her with a crown of palm and laurel; and two other marine goddeſſes preſent her with all manner of fruit; beſides, there is Neptune with his trident, accompanied with Tritons, a ſea-unicorn, and a ſea horſe. On the top ſtand three ſtatues in bronze, repreſenting Juſtice, Strength, and Plenty. On the top of the ſtructure is a round tower, fifty feet above the roof, adorned with ſtatues, and an harmonious chime of bells, the biggeſt of which weighs about ſeven thouſand pounds, and the next ſix thouſand; they are made to play different tunes every month. It has never a handſome gate, but only ſeven doors to anſwer to the number of the United Provinces. On the floor of the great hall are repreſented two globes, the ce-leſtial and terreſtial, which are twenty-two feet in diameter, and ſixty-nine in circumference; they are made of black and white marble, and are inlaid with jaſper and copper. In general, all the chambers are enriched with paintings, carvings, and gildings. While this ſtadt-houſe was building, the old one was ſet on fire, and conſumed with all the archives and regiſters.

Under the ſtadt-houſe is a prodigious vault, wherein is kept the bank of Amſterdam, where there is a vaſt quantity of ingots both of gold and ſilver, as alſo bags, which are ſuppoſed to be full of money. The doors are proof againſt petards, and are never opened but in the preſence of one of the burgomaſters. The priſons for debtors and criminals are likewiſe under the ſtadt-houſe; as alſo the guard room for the citizens, wherein the keys of the city are locked every night. At the end of the great hall is the ſchepens or aldermens chamber, where civil cauſes are tried. Beſides theſe, there are the chambers of the ſenate and council, the burgo-maſters chamber, the chambers of accounts, &c. In the ſecond ſtory is a large magazine of arms; and on the top of the building are ſix large ciſterns of water, which may be conveyed to any room in the houſe in caſe of fire, to prevent which the chimnies are lined with copper.

The bourſe, or exchange, where the merchants aſſemble, is all of free-ſtone, and built upon two thouſand wooden piles; its length is about two hundred feet, and its breadth one hundred and twenty-four; the galleries are ſupported by twenty ſix marble columns, upon each of which are the names of the people that are to meet there; they are all numbered, and there is a place fixed for every merchandiſe under ſome one of theſe numbers. On the right hand of the gate is a ſuperb ſtair-caſe, which leads to the galleries, on one ſide of which there are ſeveral ſhops, and on the other a place to ſell clothes. It is not unlike the royal exchange in London.

The houſe belonging to the Eaſt-India company contains large magazines, full of the different ſorts of commodities brought from the Eaſt-Indies. The building was uſed formerly for the city arſenal. There are ſeveral magnificent new buildings added to it. The directors hold their aſſemblies there twice a week. There are now ſeveral arſenals; that of the Eaſt-India company and that of the admiralty are near each other.

The academy, called the Illuſtrious School, is likewiſe a very fine building: it was formerly a convent belonging to the nuns of St. Agnes. Here they teach Latin, the oriental languages, theology, philoſophy, hiſtory, &c. The lawyers and phyſicians have likewiſe their ſchools. There are eleven churches belonging to the eſtabliſhed church, and one for Engliſh Preſbyterians, none beſides which are allowed to have bells; alſo other ſects may have churches except the Roman Catholics, who meet in private houſes without moleſtation. The Jews have two fine ſynagogues, one for the Portugueſe, and the other for the German Jews. Some of the churches are very ſtately buildings, but not ſo remarkable as to deſerve a particular deſcription.

Beſides theſe, there are ſeveral hoſpitals, or houſes for orphans, for poor widows, for ſick perſons, and for mad people; all which are regulated with much prudence. The Raſp-Houſe, which was formerly a nunnery, is now a ſort of a work houſe for men that behave ill. They are commonly ſet to ſaw or raſp Braſil wood, and if they will not perform their taſk, they are put into a cellar which the water runs into, where if they do not almoſt conſtantly ply the pump, they run the riſk of being drowned. There is likewiſe a ſpin-houſe for debauched women, where they are obliged to ſpin wool, flax, and hemp, and do other works. All the hoſpitals are extremely neat, and richly adorned with pictures. They are maintained partly by voluntary contributions, which are raiſed by putting money into the poor's boxes, fixed up all over the city; and partly by taxing all public diverſions, as well at fairs as otherwiſe. Likewiſe every perſon that paſſes through any of the gates at candle-light pays a penny for the ſame uſes. Theſe charities are taken care of by certain officers called deacons. The governors are nominated by the magiſtrates out of the moſt conſiderable men in the city.

The common ſort have places of diverſion called Spiel-Houſes, where there are muſic and dancing. They are much of the ſame kind as the hops which were ſo frequent about London. If ſtrangers go there, they muſt take care not to make their addreſſes to a woman that is engaged to any other man.

This city is governed by a ſenate or council, which conſiſts of thirty-ſix perſons, called a Vroedſhap, who enjoy their places for life; and when any of them dies, the remainder chooſe another in his ſtead. This ſenate elects deputies to be ſent to the States of Holland, and appoints the chief magiſtrate of the city, called Burgomaſters, or Echevins, who are like our aldermen. The number is twelve, out of which four are choſen every year to execute the office, and are called Burgomaſters Regent. Three of theſe are diſcharged every year to make room for three others. One of the four is kept in to inform the new ones of the ſtate of affairs, and alſo preſides the three firſt months in the year, and the others three months each. So that when they are in this office, they may be compared to the lord-mayor of the city of London. Theſe alterations and appointments are made by their own body. They diſpoſe of all inferior offices which become vacant during their regency. They have likewiſe the direction of all public works which regard the ſafety, tranquility, and embelliſhment of the city. The keys of the famous bank of this city are in the hands of theſe magiſtrates.

The college conſiſts of new burgomaſters or echevins, who are judges in all criminal affairs, without appeal; but in civil cauſes they may appeal to the council of the province. There are two treaſurers, a bailiff, and a penſionary. The bailiff continues in his office three years, and ſearches after criminals, takes care to proſecute them, and ſees their ſentence executed. The penſionary is the miniſter of the magiſtracy, well verſed in the laws, who makes public harangues, and is the defender of the intereſts of the city.

The city of Amſterdam contributes to the public income above fifty thouſand livres per day, beſides the exciſe of beer, fleſh, and corn, which in all amounts to above one million ſix hundred thouſand pounds ſterling a year, which is more than is paid by all the reſt of the provinces put together, and yet it bears but the fifth rank in the aſſembly of the ſtates of Holland, with this diſtinction, that whereas other cities ſend two members, this ſends four.

The militia of Amſterdam is very conſiderable, for they have ſixty companies, each of which has from two hundred to three hundred men. Jews and Anabaptiſts are excluded from this ſervice, for they are not admitted to bear arms. But they are obliged to contribute to the maintenance of the city guard, which conſiſts of one thouſand four hundred ſoldiers; as alſo to the night watch, who patrole about the ſtreets, and proclaim the hour. Beſides theſe, there are trumpeters on every church ſteeple, who ſound every half hour; and if there happens a fire, they ring the fire bell, and ſhow where it is. The inhabitants have excellent contrivances to bring it under ſpeedily.

The trade of Amſterdam is prodigious; for almoſt the whole trade of the Eaſt-India Company centers in this city, which beſides carries on a commerce with all the reſt of the world, inſomuch that it may be called the magazine or ſtore-houſe of Europe. They import a vaſt deal of corn from the Baltick, not ſo much for preſent conſumption, as to lay up againſt times of ſcarcity. The richeſt ſpices are entirely in the hands of the Eaſt-India company, who furniſh all Europe therewith. They have great ſtores of all warlike proviſions, with which they ſupply ſeveral nations, which is owing to their ingroſſing moſt of the iron works on the Rhine, and other great rivers that run into Holland. The longitude of Amſterdam is 4. 30. E. Lat. 52. 25. N.

AMULIUS, king of Latium, uſurped his brother Numitor's crown, and obliged Sylvia, his niece, to become a veſtal, in order to prevent her marrying; but at length ſhe was brought to-bed of Romulus and Remus, who ſlew Amulius, and reſtored Numitor to the throne, about ſeven hundred and fifty-four years before the Chriſtian æra.

AMURAT, or AMURATH I. the fourth emperor of the Turks, and one of the greateſt princes of the Ottoman empire, ſucceeded Solyman in 1360. He took from the Greeks Gallipoli, Thrace, and Adrianople, which laſt he choſe for the place of his reſidence. He defeated the prince of Bulgaria, conquered Miſnia, chaſtiſed his rebellious baſhas, and is ſaid to have gained thirty-ſix battles.

This prince, in order to form a body of devoted troops that might ſerve as the immediate guards of his perſon and dignity, appointed his officers to ſeize annually, as the imperial property, the fifth part of the Chriſtian youth taken in war. Theſe, after being inſtructed in the Mahometan religion, inured to obedience by ſevere diſcipline, and trained to warlike exerciſes, were formed into a body diſtinguiſhed by the name of Janiſſaries, or New Soldiers. Every ſentiment which enthuſiaſm can inſpire, every mark of diſtinction that the favour of the prince could confer, were employed in order to animate this body with martial ardour, and with a conſciouſneſs of its own pre-eminence. The Janiſſaries ſoon became the chief ſtrength and pride of the Ottoman armies, and were diſtinguiſhed above all the troops whoſe duty it was to attend on the perſon of the ſultan. At length the death of Lazarus, deſpot of Servia, who had endeavoured in vain to ſtop the progreſs of Amurath's arms, touched Milo, one of his ſervants, in ſo ſenſible a manner, that, in revenge, he ſtabbed the ſultan in the midſt of his troops, and killed him upon the ſpot, A. D. 1389, after he had reigned thirty-three years.

AMURATH, or AMURAT II. the tenth emperor of the Turks, and one of the moſt famous Ottoman princes, was the eldeſt eldeſt ſon of Mahomet I. whom he ſucceeded in 1421 He beſieged Conſtantinople and Belgrade without ſucceſs; but took Theſſalonica from the Venetians, and rendered the prince of Boſnia, and that of Albania tributary to him. By the inroads he made into Hungary and Greece, he obliged the Chriſtian princes to enter into a league againſt him; and into this league Ladiſlaus, the king of Hungary, entered, tho' he had juſt before made a peace with Amurath, which he ſwore to upon the Goſpels, and Amurath upon the Koran. This ſtep was taken by Ladiſlaus at the inſtigation of pope Eugenius, and other princes; but the Chriſtian army was entirely defeated. Bonfinius relates, that at the beginning of the battle, Amurath ſeeing his ſoldiers put to flight, took out of his boſom the treaty he had made with the Chriſtians, and opening it, lifted up his eyes to heaven, crying out "Behold, O Jeſus! the league "the Chriſtians have made with me, and have ſworn to "by thy ſacred name; if thou art a God, revenge the "wrong done to thy name and me." And no ſooner had he ſaid this, as that author tells us, but the Chriſtian army began to give way. In this battle Ladiſlaus behaved with aſtoniſhing bravery, but his horſe was at laſt killed under him, and being abandoned and trodden under foot, he loſt his life. However, after this great ſucceſs, Amurath met with an obſtacle to his deſigns, from the valour and conduct of Scanderbeg, who, with a ſmall body of forces, defeated three powerful armies, and obliged a fourth, with the emperor Amurath at their head, to retire with loſs, when Amurath, chagrined with his ill ſucceſs, and weakened by the infirmities of age, fell ſick and died, on the 11th of February, 1451. It is obſerved to this prince's honour, that he always kept the treaties he made with the utmoſt fidelity.

AMURATH, or AMURAT III. the ſixteenth emperor of the Turks, a cruel prince, and a moſt formidable enemy of the Chriſtians, was the eldeſt ſon of Selim II. and ſucceeded his father in the year 1575. On his aſcending the throne he cauſed five of his brothers to be ſtrangled. He invaded Perſia with prodigious armies, and after ſeveral battles loſt and won, concluded a peace to the diſadvantage of the Perſians. He ordered an ambaſſador from Poland to be cut to pieces, with all his retinue. In 1596 his army was defeated by the emperor Rodolphus, when Mahomet, Amurath's nephew, with ten thouſand Turks, were ſlain. In 1592, Sinan, one of his generals, marched into Hungary, with the emperor's ambaſſador in chains; but was the next year defeated. Amurath died in 1595, at forty-two years of age, after he had reigned twenty years.

AMURATH, or AMURAT IV. emperor of the Turks, ſucceeded Muſtapha in 1623. He took Bagdat in 1638, and died on the 8th of February, 1640, aged forty-one.

AMYMONE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Denaus, who, as ſhe was ſhooting in the woods, happened to wound a ſatyr, who upon this attempted to raviſh her; but imploring the aid of the Gods, Neptune came to her aſſiſtance, ſaved her from the ſatyr, but deflowered her himſelf, and by him ſhe had Nauplius.

AMYNTAS I. king of Macedonia, ſucceeded his father Alcetas about 556 years before the Chriſtian æra, and reigned about fifty years.

AMYNTAS II. king of Macedon, the father of Philip, and grandfather of Alexander the Great, ſucceeded Pauſanias, about three hundred and ninety-two years before the Chriſtian æra. His army was defeated by the Illyrians and Olynthians. He died three hundred and ſixty-ſeven years before the birth of Chriſt.

There were many other princes and lords of Greece of the ſame name.

AMYNTOR, in fabulous hiſtory, king of the Dolopians, was killed by Hercules, for denying him a free paſſage thro' his dominions.

AMYOT (JAMES) biſhop of Auxerre, great almoner of France, and one of the moſt learned men of the ſixteenth century, was born at Melun, Oct. 30, 1514, and ſtudied philoſophy at Paris. He tranſlated into French, 1. The Amours of Theagines and Charicloa. 2. Plutarch's Lives and Morals. 3. Several books of Diodorus Siculus; and, 4. ſome Greek Tragedies. He died Feb. 6, 1593.

AMYRAULT (MOSES) miniſter and profeſſor of divinity at Saumur, was born at Bourgueil, a ſmall town of Touraine, in France, in September, 1596. He publiſhed a piece in which he attempted to explain the myſtery of predeſtination and grace, which occaſioned a controverſy between him and ſome other divines. He alſo wrote, An Apology for the Proteſtants, a Paraphraſe on the New Teſtament, and ſeveral other books. He was honoured with the friendſhip of ſeveral great men; and cardinal Richelieu, in particular, had ſuch an eſteem for him, that he cauſed him to be conſulted on the great deſign he had formed of re-uniting the Proteſtant and Romiſh churches. For this purpoſe Mr. de Villeneuve, lord-lieutenant of Saumur, having invited him and father Audebert to dinner, treated Mr. Amyrault with extreme reſpect, placed him above the Jeſuit, and cauſed grace to be omitted. After dinner the Jeſuit began with owning, that he was ſent by the king and his eminence to propoſe an agreement in point of religion; and declared that the Roman Catholics were ready to ſacrifice to the public tranquility the invocation of ſaints, purgatory, and the merit of good works; that they would ſet bounds to the pope's power; and that, in caſe they ſhould meet with oppoſition from the court of Rome, they would lay hold on that occaſion to create a patriarch; that the laity ſhould be allowed the communion in both kinds; and that they would give up ſeveral other points, provided they found in the Proteſtants a ſincere deſire of peace and union; but upon Mr. Amyrault's touching upon the doctrine of the euchariſt, he proteſted, that as to that tenet no alteration would be admitted. Upon which the other anſwered, that if ſo, they could come to no agreement. This extraordinary conference laſted about four hours. The Jeſuit required ſecreſy; but Mr. Amyrault proteſted that he would acquaint his colleagues with the whole affair, which he did that very night. This eminent divine died in 1664.

AMYRUTZES, a peripatetic philoſopher, born at Trebizond, lived in the fifteenth century, and was at firſt in great eſteem at the court of the emperor David, his ſovereign, on account of his writing in favour of the Greeks, againſt the deciſions of the council of Florence; but at laſt, he forfeited, by his apoſtacy, all the reputation he had gained. He accompanied the emperor David to Conſtantinople, whither that prince was carried, after the reduction of Trebizond, in 1461; when being ſeduced by the ſultan's promiſes, he renounced the Chriſtian religion, and embraced Mahometiſm, changing his name to that of Mahomet Beg. Mahomet II. honoured him with ſeveral employments in the ſeraglio, and by his order he tranſlated many books of the Chriſtians into Arabic.

ANA, ANAH, or ANNA, the capital of part of Arabia Deſerta, was formerly a celebrated mart town, but is at preſent not much frequented. It ſtands on the river Euphrates, which divides it into two parts. That on the farther ſide is not large, and is encompaſſed with old walls, and ſo ſurrounded by the water of the river, that there is no entering it without a boat. That on this is very large, but very ill provided with walls and ditches, inſomuch that any perſon may go in and out at any time of the night. The houſes are built of brick and ſtone, and are ſquare, terraſſed on the top, and generally but one ſtory high. Each has a garden planted with date, citron, lemon, and pomegranate trees, which yield delicate fruit; and near the town, beyond the Euphrates, there are a great number of ſummer-houſes, ſeated on the hills. The country about it is exceeding pleaſant and fruitful, being full of all the trees juſt mentioned, beſides olives, and great plenty of corn and cotton. The town is chiefly inhabited by Arabians, but there are Jews and other ſtrangers. The caravans paſs through this place when they travel over the Little Deſart to go to Bagdat. It is under the dominion of an Emir, tributary to the Grand Seignor, and is two hundred and ſixty miles from Aleppo, one hundred and thirty-five from Felujah, where old Babylon moſt probably ſtood, and one hundred and forty-ſeven from Moſul, built near Old Nineveh. Long. 42. 45. E. Lat. 33. 25. N.

ANACHARSIS, a famous philoſopher, the brother of Cadovides king of Scythia, lived in the time of Crœſus, five hundred and forty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra. He went to Athens in order to learn the language, manners, and laws of the Greeks, and by his conferences with Solon, rendered himſelf illuſtrious for his learning, his contempt for riches, and the auſterity of his life. He had a quick and lively genius, with a ſtrong and maſterly eloquence; his ſpeeches were delivered in a pathetic ſtile; and as he was fond of poetry, he wrote a poem upon war, that contained nine hundred verſes. On his return to Scythia, he attempted to change the ancient cuſtoms of that country, and to eſtabliſh thoſe of Greece: but this proved extremely diſpleaſing to his countrymen, and fatal to himſelf; for as he was performing ſome ceremonies in honour of Cybele, he was ſhot with an arrow and killed.

ANACLATERIA, in antiquity, a feſtival celebrated when a king or prince came of age, and aſſumed the reins of government, proclamation being them made of this great event, that the people might come and ſalute their prince, and congratulate him upon his new dignity.

ANACLETE, biſhop of Rome, about the year 77. There is no account of the circumſtances of his life. He was ſucceeded by St. Clement. He ought not to be confounded with the antipope Anaclete, who died in 1138.

ANACLINOPALE, among the ancients, a kind of wreſtling performed on the ground, the combatants voluntarily throwing themſelves down for that purpoſe.

ANACOANA,

ANACOANA, the wife of Carnabo, cacique or ſovereign of Maguana, in the iſland of Hiſpaniola, and the moſt powerful prince in the iſland. This princeſs, who had a genius much above thoſe of her ſex and nation, entertained a great eſteem for the Spaniards, and ſought all occaſions of ſerving them. After the death of her huſband, ſhe retired to her brother Bechechio, the cacique of Xiragua Don Bartholomew Colombus, brother of the celebrated Chriſtopher Columbus, knowing her regard for the Spaniards, reſolved to take advantage of it, and went to Xiragua. Bechechio did not like the Spaniards, but being preſſed by the ſollicitations of his ſiſter, conſented to ſubmit to them, and to pay them tribute. He therefore gave the Spaniards a good reception, and Don Bartholomew treated him in a very friendly and obliging manner. The country of Bechechio producing no gold, it was agreed that he ſhould furniſh a certain quantity of proviſions and cotton. Some time after, when Bechechio had collected the tribute, he ſent advice of it to Don Bartholomew, who immediately ſent a veſſel to Xiragua, and went thither himſelf by land, when he was received by the brother and ſiſter with the moſt diſtinguiſhed honours. The veſſel being the firſt ſeen on the coaſt, excited the curioſity of Ancoana and the cacique, who examined it with great aſtoniſhment, and cauſed it to be loaded with a greater quantity of cotton and caſſava than had been agreed upon. The Spaniſh veſſel, at parting, ſaluted them with a diſcharge of their guns, they were terrified; but finding that their fear excited the laughter of the Spaniards, they recovered their courage.

Bechechio dying in 1503, and leaving no children, Ancoana ſucceeded him. She had now changed her ſentiments with reſpect to the Spaniards. The ingratitude with which they had returned the benefits ſhe had conferred on them, had made hatred ſucceed to friendſhip. The Spaniards therefore reſolved to get rid of her. To ſucceed in this, they repreſented her as a rebel, and accuſed her before Ovando, the governor-general, of meditating ſome treachery. Ovando, fearing that ſhe would be before-hand with him, loſt no time, but marched from the city of Domingo to Xiragua at the head of ſeventy horſe, and three hundred foot. Ancoana, who had no diſtruſt, thought that Ovando came to ſee her as a friend, and to give him a more honourable reception, aſſembled all her vaſſals, and marched at their head to meet the Spaniſh governor. The throng of people who followed her, danced after the manner of the country, and ſent forth cries of joy. The queen made an obliging compliment to Ovando, and conducted him to her houſe, amidſt the acclamations of her people. A feſtival had been prepared in a ſpacious hall, and the repaſt was followed by ſports and dances that laſted ſeveral days. During the pleaſures of this feaſt, the Spaniſh general was guilty of the blackeſt treachery. He deſired the queen to partake of a feaſt he would give her in the Spaniſh taſte. Ancoana, accompanied by all her chiefs, repaired to it on the following Sunday. She was introduced, with all her attendants, into a large hall in a ſquare, where the feaſt ought to have been celebrated. The Spaniards made her wait ſome time; they at length appeared, but it was in order of battle. The infantry, who marched firſt, ſeized all the avenues of the ſquare. Ovando at length advanced at the head of the cavalry, and inveſted the houſe in which the queen was. The cavalry then drew their ſabres, and the foot put to the ſword a multitude of Indians, who had been drawn by curioſity to attend the queen, and had aſſembled in the ſquare. After this maſſacre, the cavalry diſmounted and entered the hall where the queen was. Ovando cauſed the inferior caciques and other illuſtrious vaſſals who had accompanied that princeſs, to be faſtened to ſtakes. After which he ordered fire to be ſet to the houſe, and they were all conſumed by the flames. As to Ancoana, ſhe was loaded with chains, and taken to St. Domingo, where ſhe was ſoon brought to her trial, and being declared a rebel, was publicly hanged.

ANACREON, an excellent Greek poet, born at Teos, a city of Ionia, lived about five hundred and thirty-two years before the Chriſtian æra. Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, invited him to his court, and made him ſhare with him in his buſineſs and his pleaſures. He had a delicate wit, as may be judged from the inexpreſſible beauties and graces that ſhine in his works; but he was fond of pleaſure; was of an amorous diſpoſition, and addicted to drunkenneſs; yet notwithſtanding his debaucheries, he lived to the age of eighty-five. We are told, that in his old age he lived upon dried grapes, and that he was at laſt choaked by a grape ſtone ſticking in his throat.

There is but a ſmall part of Anacreon's works that remain, for beſides his odes and epigrams, he compoſed elegies, hymns, and iambics. His poems, which are extant, were reſcued from oblivion by Henry Stevens, and are univerſally admired. The verſes of Anacreon are ſweeter, ſays Scaliger, than Indian ſugar. His beauty and chief excellence, ſays Madam Dacier, lay in imitating nature, and in following reaſon, ſo that he preſented to the mind no images but what were noble and natural. The odes of Anacreon, ſays Rapin, are flowers, beauties, and perpetual graces; it is familiar to him to write what is natural and to the life, he having an air ſo delicate, ſo eaſy, and ſo graceful, that among all the ancients there is nothing comparable to the method he took, nor to that kind of writing he followed. He flows ſoft and eaſy, every where diffuſing the joy and indolence of his mind through his verſe, and tuning his harp to the ſmooth and pleaſant temper of his ſoul. But none has given a juſter character of his writings, than the God of Love, as taught to ſpeak by Mr. Cowley.

All thy verſe is ſofter far
Than the downy feathers are,
Of my wings, or of my arrows,
Of my mother's doves and ſparrows;
Graceful, cleanly, ſmooth, or round,
All with Venus' girdle bound.

ANADEIA, in Grecian antiquity, a ſtool, on which a perſon accuſed was placed when he made his defence.

ANAGNOSTA, in antiquity, a ſort of literary ſervant retained in the families of the great, to read to them during their meals, or whenever they were at leiſure.

ANAMABOE is a populous town in the kingdom of Fantin, in Guinea, about two miles and a half from Cormentin, and ſeven miles from Mouree. The natives are generally great cheats, and muſt be carefully looked after in dealing with them, and their gold well examined, for it is commonly adulterated. It lies under the cannon of the Engliſh caſtle, which is a neat place, built with ſtone, brick, and lime, and ſeated on a rock about thirty paces from the ſtrand. It has convenient lodgings, and proper warehouſes. The landing is pretty difficult, on account of the rocks, and therefore thoſe that come here to trade are forced to go aſhore in canoes. The earth here is very proper to make bricks, and the oyſters, when burnt, afford good lime; and as here is plenty of timber, there are all the materials for building. The country at Anamaboe is full of hills, beginning at a good diſtance from the town, and affording a very pleaſant proſpect. Indian corn and palm wine are very plenty, as alſo paraqueetos of the ſize of ſparrows; their bodies are of a curious green, and their heads and tails of a beautiful red. They have a green fruit called papas, as big as a ſmall melon, and which has a taſte like a cauliflower. Anamaboe is much frequented by the Engliſh ſhips and others for corn and ſlaves, which laſt are ſometimes to be had in great numbers.

ANASTASIUS I. emperor of the Eaſt, ſucceeded Zeno in the year 491. He was not only obliged to ſtruggle with the different parties which divided the church, but likewiſe ſeveral times engaged in war againſt the Perſians, and the Bulgarians, which laſt firſt began to appear under his reign, and yet at the very beginning of it he eaſed the people of a very heavy tax, under which they had groaned for a long time. He prohibited fighting with wild beaſts, erected ſeveral buildings, and as much as poſſible avoided dangerous wars. This prince died July 10, 518, in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

ANASTASIUS II. emperor of the Eaſt, ſucceeded Bardanes in 713, was confined in a monaſtery in 716, and died in 719.

ANASTASIUS I. pope, ſucceeded Sinicius on the 14th of March, 398. He reconciled the Eaſtern to the Roman church, condemned the Origeniſts, and died in 402.

ANASTASIUS II. elected pope on the 28th of November, 496, wrote to the emperor Anaſtaſius in favour of the Catholic religion, and to Clovis to congratulate him on his converſion. He died November 16, 498.

ANASTASIUS III. elected pope in 910, governed the church for ten years.

ANASTASIUS IV. was elected pope on the 9th of July, 1153, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his charity during a great famine. He died on the 4th of December, 1154.

ANASTASIUS V. elected pope in oppoſition to Benedict III. in 855, but was at length driven from the papal chair.

ANASTASIUS SINAITA, a celebrated monk of Mount Sinai, was elected patriarch of Antioch in 561, and died on the 21ſt of April, 599. He wrote many treatiſes in Greek, the principal of which is intitled the Guide.

ANASTASIUS, ſurnamed BIBLIOTHECARUS, abbot, library keeper of the church of Rome, and one of the moſt learned men of the ninth century, aſſiſted in 869 at the fourth general council, the acts and canons of which he tranſlated from the Greek into Latin. He alſo compoſed the lives of ſeveral popes, and other works, the beſt edition of which is that of the Vatican.

ANATOLIA, or NATOLIA. See NATOLIA.

ANATOLIUS, biſhop of Laodicea, in Syria, was an eminent writer among the Chriſtians. He was born at Alexandria, and flouriſhed about the year 270, under the emperors Carus and Probus. He was well ſkilled in arithmetic, metic, geometry, aſtronomy, natural philoſophy, logic, and rhetoric. He wrote a book concerning Eaſter, and ten books of Arithmetic.

ANATHEMATA, in Grecian antiquity, preſents offered to the Gods, and placed, or hung up, in their temples, either to pacify them when angry, to obtain ſome future benefit, or as a grateful acknowledgment of ſome paſt favour. Theſe conſiſted of crowns and garlands, rich garments, gold cups, or any thing that might contribute to the ornament or enriching of the temples, or be conſidered as a teſtimony of the gratitude of the giver.

ANAXAGORAS, one of the moſt celebrated philoſophers of antiquity, was born at Clazomenæ, in Ionia, about five hundred years before the Chriſtian æra, and was a diſciple of Anaximenes. He laid the foundation of that ſublime and victorious eloquence which made his diſciple Pericles ſo powerful, and taught him to fear the Gods without ſuperſtition. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the novelty of his doctrine, and held that there were hills, valleys, and inhabitants in the moon, and that the ſun was a maſs of fire bigger than Peloponeſus, &c. But the moſt commendable part of Anaxagoras's ſyſtem was, that he was the firſt who maintained that a wiſe and intelligent Being had given motion to matter, and digeſted the chaos into order. He died at Lampſacus, and is ſaid to have lived ſeventy-two years.

ANAXAGORIA, in Grecian antiquity, an anniverſary feſtival obſerved by the people of Lampſacus in honour of Anaxagoras.

ANAXANDER, king of Sparta, defeated the Meſſenians, and drove them out of Peloponeſus, about eight hundred and ſixty-four years before the Chriſtian æra. This prince being aſked why the Lacedemonians had no treaſury, he replied, "It is for fear thoſe ſhould be corrupted who keep the keys."

ANAXANDRIDES, king of Sparta, is the only man of his country who had two wives at one time. As his firſt wife appeared barren, the ephori inſiſted upon his divorcing her, and marrying another, by whom he might have children: but as he was very fond of his wife, he proteſted that he would never divorce her: when the ephori ſeeing him fixed in this reſolution, propoſed his marrying another without divorcing the firſt. This ſecond propoſal he accepted, but would not ſuffer his two wives to live under the ſame roof. His new ſpouſe was ſoon delivered of Cleomenes, and at the ſame time the firſt proved with child, on which the new queen's domeſtics ſpread abroad ſlanderous reports in order to raiſe a belief that this was only an artifice, deſigned to deceive the people, by introducing a ſuppoſititious child; which rumour made ſuch an impreſſion on the ephori, that when the time of her delivery drew near, they placed guards about the queen to prevent their being impoſed upon: however, it proved no fiction. The ſecond wife's ſon had ſcarce common ſenſe, while the abilities of Doreius ſurpaſſed all thoſe of his age; yet Cleomenes, notwithſtanding his ſtupidity, was afterwards called to the crown. The firſt of theſe queens was afterwards delivered of twins; theſe were the brave Leonidas and Cleombrotus.

ANAXANDRIDES, a comic poet, born at Camirus, in the iſle of Rhodes, three hundred and ſeventy-ſix years before Chriſt, and was the firſt, according to Suidas, who brought upon the ſtage love adventures, and the misfortunes that befal young women on loſing their virginity. He wrote ſixty-five plays, but was at length condemned by the Athenians to be ſtarved to death for cenſuring their government.

ANAXARCHUS, a famous philoſopher, born at Abdera, and the favourite of Alexander the Great. He ſupported with heroic courage the torments inflicted on him by Nicocreon, tyrant of Cyprus.

ANAXIDAMUS, king of Sparta, about ſeven hundred and twenty-three years before Chriſt. Being aſked who commanded at Sparta, he anſwered, the laws.

ANAXIMANDER, a celebrated Greek philoſopher, born at Miletus, and the diſciple of Thales, flouriſhed about five hundred and forty-ſeven years before Chriſt. He was the firſt, according to Pliny, who invented the ſphere, and who, according to Strabo, made geographical maps. He diſcovered the obliquity of the ecliptic, and framed horoſcopes to denote the tropics and equinoxes.

ANAXIMENES, a famous Greek philoſopher, born at Miletus, and the friend, ſcholar, and ſucceſſor of Anaximander. He ſuppoſed that all things were generated by a ſucceſſive condenſation and rarefaction of air, the earth, water, and fire, being firſt produced out of it, and then the other parts of the univerſe. He alſo held that motion was from all eternity, and that the ſun gained its heat from the ſwiftneſs of its courſe. Pliny aſſerts, that he was the firſt who made a ſolar quadrant. He flouriſhed about five hundred and forty-ſeven years before the Chriſtian æra.

ANAXIMENES, the ſon of Ariſtocles of Lampſacus, was the diſciple of Diogenes the Cynic, and of Zoilus, the railer againſt Homer. He was preceptor to Alexander of Macedon, and followed him to the wars. The people of Lampſacus having incenſed Alexander by joining with the Perſians, they ſent Anaxemenes to intercede with that prince, that they might not be deprived of their wives, their children, and their country: when Alexander knowing the cauſe of his coming, ſwore by the Gods, that he would do the very reverſe of what he deſired of him. Upon this Anaximenes cried, "Grant me the favour, O king, to "enſlave the wives and children of the people of Lamp-"ſacus, to burn their temples, and lay their city level with "the ground." Alexander being unable to evade this ſtratagem, or to diſpenſe with his oath, was obliged, againſt his will, to pardon the inhabitants of Lampſacus.

ANCARANO, a town of Italy, in the March of Ancona, five miles north of Aſcoli, and thirty-one north-eaſt of Rome. Long. 13. 54. E. Lat. 42. 48. N.

ANCASTER, a town in Lincolnſhire, on the Roman way, called the Hermen Street, now called the High Dyke Road. It has been a ſtrong city, entrenched and walled round. At the end of the town, where the Dovecoat ſtands, is Caſtle Cloſe, in which the foundations ſtand every where above ground, and it is encompaſſed by a ditch and a rampire. There has been a prodigious quantity of Roman coins found here, inſomuch that ſeveral people have traded in them for many years. They are likewiſe found in great plenty on all the hills round the town, eſpecially ſouthward, and towards the caſtle pits. After a ſhower the ſchool-boys and ſhepherds uſed to look for them on the declivities, and ſeldom returned empty. There is a vaſt variety of theſe coins.

Ancaſter conſiſts of one ſtreet, running north and ſouth along the road, and there is a ſpring at both ends of the town, which may be the reaſon for ſettling here, for there is no more water between this and Lincoln. This has been a populous place, for here are great quarries about it, and the rock lies very little under the ſurface. From Ancaſter Heath there is a view of the ſea, and Boſton ſteeple, which is very high. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth of Lincoln, twenty-five north of Stamford, and one hundred and fourteen north-by-weſt of London.

ANCENIS, a ſmall town of France, in Britany, ſeated on the river Loire, ſifteen miles eaſt of Nantes, and twenty-five weſt of Angiers. Long. 1. 5. W. Lat 47. 22. N.

ANCHARANUS, or DE ANCHARANO, (PETER) an eminent civilian, who flouriſhed about the year 1380, was born at Bologna, and wrote, 1. Select Queſtions from all the beſt Civilians, in three vols. folio. 2. Counſels or Anſwers at Law; and, 3. Commentaries on the Six Books of the Decretals. He died about the year 1410.

ANCHISES, in fabulous hiſtory, a Trojan prince, the ſon of Capys, was ſo agreeable in the eyes of Venus, that ſhe offered herſelf to him in the form of a beautiful nymph, deſiring him to preſent her to his relations, in order to have their marriage ſpeedily ſolemnized; but he telling her, that nothing ſhould prevent his enjoying her on the ſpot, ſhe took him at his word, and they went to bed; but towards evening, Anchiſes fell aſleep, and at his waking was ſenſible that he had lain with a goddeſs, and apprehending that this would ſhorten his days, was under great concern; but Venus encouraged him; told him that ſhe ſhould bear him a ſon, who ſhould be called Æneas; and let him at the ſame time know, that if he ever boaſted of the favour ſhe had granted him, he would be thunder ſtruck by Jupiter. Some time after, as he was drinking with his friends, the ſecret eſcaped him, on which it is ſaid, that he was ſtruck by thunder, and that this occaſioned the loſs of his ſight.

ANCHORETS, religious perſons, who in the primitive times of Chriſtianity, ſequeſtered themſelves from the reſt of the world, having nothing but a cell or cave to live in ſome deſart or unfrequented place. When there came ſeveral of theſe cells to be near one another, but not contiguous, the place was called Laura, and each Anchoret or Monk provided for himſelf. If they lived together in one habitation, and had all things in common, then it was called Cœnobium.

ANCILLON (DAVID) a miniſter of the reformed church at Metz, where he was born, March 17, 1617. He obtained an extenſive reputation by his learning, eloquence, and virtue, and was even highly reſpected by thoſe of the Roman Catholic communion. He publiſhed a book, in quarto, in which the whole diſpute concerning Traditions is fully examined: he alſo wrote an Apology for Luther, Zuinglius, Calvin, and Beza, and ſeveral other pieces. He died at Berlin, September 3, 1692.

ANCILLON (CHARLES) ſon of the preceding, was born at Metz, July 29, 1659, and was inſpector of the courts of juſtice which the French had in Pruſſia, counſellor of the embaſſy, and hiſtoriographer to the king of Pruſſia. He wrote, 1. A book on the Unlawfulneſs of revoking the Edict of Nantes. 2. Political Reflections, ſhewing that the perſecution of the reformed is contrary to the intereſt of France,

France, and other pieces. He died at Berlin, July 5, 1715.

ANCLABRIS, in Roman antiquity, the table on which the prieſts ate their part of the ſacrifices.

ANCLAM, a ſtrong city of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony. It is ſeated among good arable lands, and excellent paſture. It has four pariſh churches, but has no buildings that are particularly remarkable. The commodities of this place may be ſent abroad by the river Pene. It is forty-five miles north-weſt of Stetin. Long. 14. 5. E. Lat. 54. 10. N.

ANCOBER, a territory on the gold coaſt of Guinea, with a river of the ſame name, whoſe length is uncertain, that is, how far it is up the country; however, as far as it is known, the banks are very pleaſant, adorned with fine lofty trees, which afford the moſt agreeable ſhade in the world. Among theſe there are very beautiful birds, and very diverting monkeys. There is likewiſe a very populous village on the weſtern ſhore.

ANCONA (the marquiſate of) a province in the pope's territories in Italy. It lies between the gulph of Venice and Mount Appenine, which bound it on the north; Abruzzo is on the eaſt, the duchy of Spoletta, and that of Urbino on the weſt. The air is indifferent, but the ſoil is fruitful, particularly in hemp and flax; and there is great plenty of wax and honey. It contains ſeveral large towns, as Fermo, Loretto, Recanati, Macerata, Jeſi, Tolentino, Aſcoli, Oſimo, St. Severino, Monte Alto, Camerino, and Ripatranſone, which are all archiepiſcopal or epiſcopal ſees. Ancona is the capital.

ANCONA, a ſea-port town of Italy, and capital of the marquiſate of that name, in the eccleſiaſtical ſtate, and the ſee of a biſhop. It was formerly the fineſt port in all Italy, but was almoſt ruined, and its trade loſt; however, it has begun to revive ſince it was made a free port. Its harbour is the beſt in all the pope's dominions. The town lies round it on two hills, one of which is at the point of Cape St. Cyriaco, from whence there is a delightful proſpect. On the other the citadel ſtands, which commands the town and harbour. The ſtreets of this city are narrow and uneven; and the public and private buildings inferior to other great towns in Italy. The cathedral is a low dark ſtructure, and though the front is covered with fine marble, the architecture has neither beauty nor regularity. The church of St. Dominic, and that of the Franciſcans, have each an excellent picture of Titian. The exchange, where the merchants meet, is a handſome ſquare portico, in which is an equeſtrian ſtatue of Trajan, who firſt built the port. At the four corners are four other ſtatues. The triumphal arch of Trajan remains almoſt entire, with its inſcription. The common people in this town are a little particular and fantaſtical in their dreſs, but the better ſort follow the French mode. It is a great thorough-fare from the north of Italy to Loretto, which renders proviſions very dear. The tide does not riſe here above a foot, and near the Mediterranean it is ſcarce viſible. Long. 15. 5. E. Lat. 43. 36. N.

ANCOURT (FLORENT CARTON D') an eminent actor and comic writer in France, was born at Fontainbleau, in October 1661. He wrote fifty plays, which are printed in nine volumes, a tranſlation of the Pſalms into French verſe, and other pieces that have never been printed. He died December 6, 1726.

ANCRE (Mareſchal D'). See CONCINI.

ANCRE, a ſmall town of France, in Picardy, with the title of a marquiſate, thirteen miles north-eaſt of Amiens, and thirteen north-weſt of Peronne, ſeated on a little river of the ſame name. Long. 2. 45. E. Lat. 49. 59. N.

ANCUS MARTIUS, the fourth king of the Romans, ſucceeded Tullus Hoſtilius, ſix hundred and thirty-nine years before Chriſt. He defeated the Latins, ſubdued the Fidenates, conquered the Sabines, Volſcii, and Veientines, enlarged Rome by joining to it Mount Janicula, and made the harbour of Oſtia. He died about ſix hundred and fifteen years before the Chriſtian æra.

ANCYLE, in Roman antiquity, a ſhield or brazen target, which, it is ſaid, fell from heaven in the reign of Numa Pompilius, when all Italy, and eſpecially Rome, was afflicted with a terrible peſtilence. At which time a voice was alſo heard, declaring, that Rome ſhould be miſtreſs of the world, as long as they ſhould preſerve this ſacred buckler. To ſecure this invaluable treaſure, Numa cauſed eleven more ſhields of the ſame form to be made, ſo like it, that it was impoſſible to diſtinguiſh the difference. Theſe he intruſted to an order of prieſts he inſtituted, called Salii, or the prieſts of Mars, in whoſe temple the twelve ancilia were depoſited. The number of theſe prieſts was alſo twelve, choſen out of the nobleſt families; and on the feſtival of Mars, which was obſerved on the firſt of March, they annually carried the ancilia with great ceremony round the city, claſhing their bucklers, dancing, and ſinging hymns to the Gods, in which they were joined by a chorus of virgins, choſen to aſſiſt on this occaſion.

ANDALUSIA is the moſt weſtern province of Spain, having Eſtramadura and La Mancha on the north; the kingdom of Granada on the eaſt and ſouth, beſides the ſtraits of Gibraltar and the Ocean; and the kingdom of Algarva in Portugal, on the weſt, from which it is ſeparated by the river Guadiana. It is about one hundred and eighty-two miles long, and a hundred and fifty broad. Its principal rivers are Guadalquivir, which runs acroſs it longwiſe, and divides it into two parts. The Xenil which riſes in the kingdom of Granada, near the capital, and enters Andaluſia, watering it from the ſouth-weſt to the north-weſt, and runs into the Guadalquivir. The Odier in the weſtern part runs north and ſouth, and falls into the Ocean. The Rio Tinto runs parallel with the Odier, and falls into the Ocean near its mouth. The water of this river is ſo bitter it is not fit for drinking, and is pernicious to herbs, plants, and the roots of trees. No fiſh can live in it, and yet they ſay it cured the diſeaſes of the horned cattle. There are other rivers of leſs note, which require no particular deſcription. The chief cities and towns are Seville the capital, Baeza, Gibraltar, Corduba, Cadiz, Medina Sidonia, Jaen, Port St. Mary, &c. It is the beſt, moſt fruitful, and the richeſt part of all Spain; and where nature has been moſt laviſh of her gifts. There is a good air, a ſerene ſky, a fertile ſoil, and a great extent on the ſea coaſt, fit for commerce.

ANDALUSIA (NEW) a part of the continent of South America, in Terra Firma, whoſe bounds are not well determined.

ANDAMAN, certain iſlands on the eaſt ſide of the entrance in the Bay of Bengal. The inhabitants are a harmleſs inoffenſive people, living chiefly on the rice, fruits, and herbs, with which they furniſh ſhips that come that way. They ſeldom eat any fleſh at all, though ſome writers of voyages have repreſented them as cannibals. Long. 92. 0. E. Lat. from 10 to 15. N.

ANDELLE, a river of France, in the government of Normandy, that riſes in the pariſh of Forge, and falls into the Seine. It carries large rafts of timber, cut down in the woods of Lyons and Peitre, down to Paris.

ANDELY, a town of France, in Normandy, divided in two by a paved road; one of which is called Great Andely, and the other Little Andely. Great Andely is ſeated in a valley, on the rivulet Gambon. There is here a fountain called St. Clotilda, to which pilgrims reſort from all parts on her feaſt-day to have their diſorders cured. Little Andely is ſeated on the river Seine, twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Rouen, five from Ecouy, and fifty north-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 25. E. Lat. 49. 20. N.

ANDEOL, a town of France, in the Vivarez, five miles ſouth of Viviers. Long. 2. 50. E. Lat. 44. 24. N.

ANDERNACHT, a city of Cologn, in the circle of the Lower Rhine. It ſtands on the Rhine, on a plain, at the foot of the hills, and is fortified with a wall, caſtle, and bulwarks. It has a trade in ſtone jugs and pitchers, which are ſent to the mineral waters at Dunchſtein. There are three monaſteries here, and ſeveral churches. It is eight miles north-weſt of Coblentz, and thirty ſouth of Cologn. Long. 7. 4. E. Lat. 50. 27. N.

ANDERO (ST.) a ſea-port town in the bay of Biſcay, in Old Caſtile, ſeated on a ſmall peninſula. It is a trading town, and contains about ſeven hundred houſes, two pariſh churches, and four monaſteries. It is ſixty miles weſt of Bilboa, and eighty north of Burgos. Here the Spaniards build and lay up ſome of their men of war. Long. 4. 30. W. Lat. 43. 20. N.

ANDERSON (Sir EDMUND) lord chief juſtice of the common pleas, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at Broughton in Lincolnſhire. He was eſteemed a very rigid and ſevere judge, particularly againſt the diſſenters; but was the author of ſome books that have been much eſteemed, viz. Reports of Caſes in the Common Pleas, folio; and Reſolutions and Judgments on Caſes in all the Courts of Weſtminſter, in the latter End of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, quarto. He died Auguſt 1, 1605.

ANDES, a great chain of mountains in South America, which run north and ſouth from the moſt northern part of Peru to the ſtraits of Magellan, between three and four thouſand miles, and are the longeſt and the moſt remarkable in the world. The Spaniards call them the Cordillera de los Andes; they form two ridges, the lowermoſt of which are overſpread with woods and groves, and the uppermoſt are covered with everlaſting ſnow. Thoſe that have been to the top, aſſirm that the ſky is always ſerene and bright, the air cold and piercing, and yet ſo thin that they were ſcarce able to breathe, and the reſpiration was much quicker than ordinary; and this is attended with reaching and vomiting. When they looked downwards, the country was hid by the clouds that hovered on the mountain's ſides. Many may ſuppoſe that the tops of theſe mountains are like ſo many irregular pyramids; but this is a miſtake, for there are regular plains on the top, of hundreds of miles in length, which being elevated above the regions of the clouds, are illuminated with the pureſt and moſt vivid light. There are no winds, no fogs, no graſs, plant, herb, or tree; and it is ſo cold, that a traveller would be in danger of his life, unleſs he was well cloathed. Sometimes men and horſes are found dead with cold, with little or no alteration in a great number of years; theſe places being inacceſſible to heat, rain, and inſects.

The mountains juſt mentioned, which have been frequently aſcended, are much inferior in height to many others in this enormous chain. The account given of the mountain called Pichincha, by the mathematicians ſent by the kings of France and Spain, to make obſervations in relation to the figure of the earth, differs in ſeveral particulars from thoſe juſt mentioned. The above mathematicians, who were for ſome time ſtationed upon it, found, that though it is almoſt directly under the equator, the cold on its top is extremely intenſe; the wind was violent, and they were frequently involved in ſo thick a fog, that an object at ſix or eight paces diſtance was ſcarcely diſcernible. The air grew clear by the clouds deſcending nearer to the ſurface of the earth, when they, on all ſides, ſurrounded the mountain to a vaſt diſtance, repreſenting the ſea, with their rock ſtanding like an iſland in the centre. When this happened, they heard the dreadful noiſe of the tempeſts, that diſcharged themſelves on the city of Quito, and the neighbouring country. Looking down, they ſaw the lightning iſſue from the clouds, and heard the thunder roll far beneath them. While the lower parts were involved in thunder and rain, they enjoyed a delightful ſerenity; the wind was abated, the ſky clear, and the enlivening rays of the ſun moderated the ſeverity of the cold. But, when the clouds roſe, their thickneſs rendered reſpiration difficult; ſnow and hail fell continually, and the wind returned with all its violence; ſo that it was impoſſible to overcome entirely the fear of being, together with their hut, blown down the precipice, or of being buried in it, by the daily accumulations of ice and ſnow. Though the ſmalleſt crevice viſible in their hut was ſtopped, the wind was ſo piercing, that it penetrated through; and, though the hut was ſmall, crowded with inhabitants, and had ſeveral lamps conſtantly burning, the cold was ſo great, that every perſon was obliged to have a chafing-diſh of coals, and ſeveral men were conſtantly employed every morning to remove the ſnow which fell in the night. By the ſeverity of this cold, their feet were ſwelled, and grew ſo tender, that they could not walk without extreme pain; their hands were covered with chilblains, and their lips ſo ſwelled and chopped, that every motion in ſpeaking made them bleed. Though this mountain is famous for its great height, it is one thouſand two hundred and ſeventy-eight yards, in a perpendicular line, lower than the mountain of Cotopaxi; but it is impoſſible to conceive the coldneſs of the ſummit of the laſt mentioned mountain, from that felt on this; ſince it muſt exceed every idea that can be formed by the human mind, though they are both ſeated in the midſt of the torrid zone. In all this range of mountains, there is ſaid to be a conſtant inferior boundary, beyond which the ſnow never melts; this boundary, in the midſt of the torrid zone, has been found to be two thouſand four hundred and thirty-four fathoms above the level of the ſea. The ſnow indeed falls much lower, but then it is ſubject to be melted the very ſame day. It is affirmed that there are in the Andes, ſixteen volcanoes or burning mountains, which throw out fire and ſmoak with a terrible noiſe.

As all or moſt rivers have their ſource in mountains, it is no wonder a great number run down the ſides of theſe. Some hurry along with a prodigious rapidity, while others form beautiful caſcades, or run through holes in rocks, which look like bridges, of a ſtupendous height. There is a public road through the mountains, one thouſand miles in length, part of which runs from Quito to Cuſco.

ANDOVER, a large market town in Hampſhire, being about three furlongs on the London road, and as much tranſverſe. It is ſeated on a branch of the river Teſt, and ſends two members to Parliament. It has ſeveral inns, which afford good accommodation for travellers, and has a market on Saturday, well ſtocked with proviſions. The fairs are Mid-lent Saturday, for cheeſe, horſes, and leather; May 12, for leather and millinery goods; and November 16, for ſheep, horſes, leather, and cheeſe. It is governed by a bailiff, a ſteward, a recorder, ten approved men, and twenty-two capital burgeſſes, who yearly chuſe the bailiff, and he elects two ſerjeants at mace to attend him. The living is a vicarage, valued at 171 l. 4 s. 4 d. in the king's books. It is ſixty-five miles weſt-by-ſouth of London, and ten north-by-weſt of Wincheſter. Long. 0. 56. W. Lat. 51. 20. N.

ANDRADA (Diego de Payva) a learned Portugueſe divine, born at Conimbria. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the council of Trent, to which he was ſent by king Sebaſtian, and alſo by writing ſeveral pieces in defence of the canons of that council. He died in 1578.

ANDRARUM, a town of South Gothland, in Sweden, two miles and three quarters ſouth of Chriſtianſtadt. There is here the greateſt allum work in the whole kingdom.

ANDREAS (John) a celebrated canoniſt in the fourteenth century, was born at Mugello, near Florence, and was profeſſor of canon law at Padua, Piſa, and afterwards at Bologna. It is ſaid that he macerated his body with faſting, and lay upon the bare ground every night for twenty years together, covered only with the ſkin of a bear. His daughter was ſo well accompliſhed in learning, that when he had not time himſelf, he ſent her to read lectures in his place. From his love to his mother and this daughter, both of whom were named Novella, he entitled his commentaries upon the Decretals of Gregory X. The Novellæ. He died of the plague at Bologna, in 1348.

Andreas (John) a Mahometan, born at Xativa, in the kingdom of Valencia, ſucceeded his father in the dignity of alfaqui, of that city; but being preſent at a ſermon in the great church of Valencia, on the day of the Aſſumption of the Bleſſed Virgin, in the year 1487, he was converted to Chriſtianity; afterwards he received holy orders, and wrote a book intitled, The Confuſion of the Sect of Mahumed.

ANDREAS (James) a famous Lutheran divine, born at Waibling, in the duchy of Wirtemberg, March 25, 1528. He wrote a book on the Lord's Supper, in which he propoſed a method of agreement with the Roman Catholics, upon that difficult point of controverſy. He wrote in Latin a Defence of Luther, and, in 1586, engaged in a conference with Theodore Beza, concerning the Lord's ſupper, the perſon of Chriſt, predeſtination, baptiſm, the reformation of the popiſh churches, &c. He died on the 7th of January, 1590.

ANDREINI (Isabella) a native of Padua, was a woman of great beauty and virtue, an excellent poeteſs, and one of the beſt comedians in all Italy. She wrote ſeveral poems, and the Intenti of Padua thought they did their academy an honour in making her a member of it. She died June 10, 1604, in the forty-ſecond year of her age.

ANDRELINUS (Publius Fauſtus) a native of Forli, in Italy, and profeſſor of poetry and rhetoric, in the univerſity of Paris. He was poet laureat to Lewis XII. and beſides his poems, wrote a work in proſe, called Moral and Proverbial Letters. He died in 1518.

ANDREW (St.) one of the apoſtles, and the brother of St. Peter. He was at firſt one of the diſciples of John the Baptiſt; who brought him to the knowledge of Chriſt, by ſaying, "See the Lamb of God, who taketh away the ſins "of the world;" and afterwards Andrew told Peter that he had ſeen the Meſſiah, and brought him to Chriſt. St. Andrew is thought to have preached the Goſpel in Scythia, and to have ſuffered martyrdom there. He is commonly repreſented faſtened to two pieces of wood fixed acroſs each other in the form of an X; but his being thus crucified has no foundation in antiquity.

Andrew II. king of Hungary, in 1205, ſurnamed Hieroſolymitanus, from his going on a croiſade to the Holy Land, where he gave diſtinguiſhing marks of his bravery. He was afterwards involved in ſeveral wars, from which he happily extricated himſelf, and died in 1235. It is ſaid that from him the Hungarian gentlemen obtained the charter of their privileges; which contains this ſingular clauſe, "That if "he, or his ſucceſſors, ſhould oppreſs his ſubjects, and "deprive them of their privileges, they ſhould be allowed "to recover them without being chargeable with the crime "of treaſon."

ANDREWS (Lancelot) biſhop of Wincheſter, was born at London, in 1565, and educated at Cambridge. After ſeveral preferments, he was made biſhop, firſt of Chicheſter, then of Ely, and, in 1618, was raiſed to the ſee of Wincheſter. This very learned prelate, who was diſtinguiſhed by his piety, charity, and integrity, may be juſtly ranked with the beſt preachers and completeſt ſcholars of his age; he appeared to much greater advantage in the pulpit than he does now in his works, which abound with Latin quotations and trivial witticiſms. His ſermons, though full of puns, were ſuited to the taſte of the times in which he lived, and were conſequently greatly admired. He was a man of polite manners and lively converſation, and could quote Greek and Latin authors, or even pun with king James. He had, 1. a ſhare in the tranſlation of the Pentateuch, and the hiſtorical books from Joſhua to the firſt book of Chronicles excluſively. He alſo wrote, 2. Tortura Torti, in anſwer to a work of cardinal Bellarmine, in which that cardinal aſſumes the name of Matthew Tortus. 3. A Manual of Private Devotions: and 4. A Manual of Directions, for the Viſitation of the Sick; beſides the ſermons and tracts in Engliſh and Latin, publiſhed after his death. There is a pleaſant ſtory related of him in the Life of Waller Waller the poet. When that gentleman was young, he had the curiosity to go to court; and stood in the circle to see king James dine; where, among other company, there sat at table two bishops, Neile and Andrews. The king proposed aloud this question, Whether he might not take his subjects money, when he needed it, without all this formality of parliament? Neille replied, "God for-"bid you should not; for you are the breath of our nostrils." Andrews declined answering, and said he was not skilled in parliamentary cases; but, upon the king's urging him, and saying he would admit of no evasion, the bishop replied very smartly, "Then, I think, your majesty may very "lawfully take my brother Neile's money; for he offers "it." This excellent prelate died on the 2d of September, 1626.

ANDREWS, or ANDREWE, (EUSEBIUS) a gentleman of a good family, who served king Charles I. in the honourable post of colonel, with great loyalty and courage, till the surrender of Worcester in 1645; but afterwards taking measures for the recovery of the Isle of Ely, he was seized and committed close prisoner to the Tower for high-treason; and being prosecuted before Bradshaw, upon his own narrative of his conduct, which, at Bradshaw's request he had drawn up, he was condemned, and beheaded on Tower-hill, on the 22d of August, 1650.

ANDREW'S (ST.) was once the metropolis of Scotland, and the place where the first university was founded. The cathedral church, which was reckoned a very fine one, is now in ruins. It is seated in a plain, which has a prospect of the German Ocean. The greatest ornament is the university, which consists of three colleges, the Old College, St. Leonard's College, and the New College. Each college has a principal, and out of these a rector is chosen yearly. The students wear red gowns. The houses of this town are gone much to decay, though they are built of free-stone, the inhabitants having neither manufactures nor trade; however, the number of them are said to exceed four thousand. The church of the Holy Trinity is an ancient and stately edifice, built with fine free-stone, in the form of a cross; and at its west end is a handsome spire. The other two churches are now no more than chapels to the colleges. The land about the city yields good wheat and barley; and the downs called the Links are very pleasant. The harbour has suffered very much by the encroachment of the sea, and is now very dangerous; and though there was a brief granted for the reparation of it in 1728, yet it proved insufficient for the designed purpose. It is thirty miles north-east of Edinburgh, and forty-six east-north-east of Stirling. Long. 2. 25. W. Lat. 56. 18. N.

ANDREW'S (St.) a town of Germany, in the circle of Austria, and in the duchy of Carinthia. It is a bishop's see, and seated on the river Lavant, eighty-five miles from Vienna. Long. 15. 7. E. Lat. 46. 40. N.

ANDRIA, ανδρεῖα, in Grecian antiquity, public entertainments instituted at Crete by Minos, and, after his example, appointed by Lycurgus at Sparta, of which a whole city or tribe partook. They were managed with the greatest frugality; and youth, in particular, were obliged to repair thither, as to schools of sobriety and temperance.

ANDRIA is a city in the kingdom of Naples, and a bishop's see, in the territory of Bari. It is pretty large, well peopled, and seated in a spacious plain, four miles from the Adriatic coast, four miles south of Barletta, and five south-west of Trani. Long. 17. 4. E. Lat. 41. 15. N.

ANDRISEUS, a man of mean extraction, who pretending to be the son of Perseus, the last king of Macedon, whose person he resembled, took upon him the name of Philip; for which reason he was called Pseudo-Philippus, the False Philip. He conquered Macedonia when it was subject to the Romans, behaved with the utmost pride, haughtiness, and cruelty; but being defeated by Q. Cæcilius Metellus, that general had the honour of a triumph, and Andriseus walked before his chariot in chains, about one hundred and forty-seven years before Christ.

ANDROGEUS, in fabulous history, was the son of Minos, king of Crete, and was murdered by the Athenian youth and those of Megara, who envied his being always victor at the Attic games. But Minos having taken Athens and Megara, obliged the inhabitants to send him an annual tribute of seven young men and as many virgins, to be devoured by the Minotaur; but Theseus delivered them from that tribute.

ANDROMACHE, the wife of Hector, the mother of Astyanax, and daughter of Etion, king of Thebes in Cilicia. After the death of Hector and the destruction of Troy, she married Pyrrhus, and afterwards Helenus the son of Priam, with whom she reigned over part of Epirus.

ANDROMACHUS, a native of Crete, and physician to the emperor Nero, A. D. 65, invented theriaca, and gave a description of that medicine, in elegaic verses addressed to Nero.

ANDROMEDA, in fabulous history, the daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopea, was fastened to a rock by the nymphs, in order to be devoured by a sea-monster; but being seen by Perseus, he loosened her, and brought her to her father, who gave her to him in marriage.

ANDRONICUS I. emperor of the East, caused Alexius II. who had been put under his care, to be strangled, and then took possession of the throne of Constantinople, in 1183; but the people becoming exasperated at his cruelties, proclaimed Isaac Angelus emperor, and put Andronicus in irons; they then put out his eyes, and having led him through the city in an ignominious manner, hanged him on the 12th of September, 1185.

ANDRONICUS (LIVIUS) the most ancient of the Latin poets, whose first piece was represented two hundred and forty years before Christ. This is the fixed epocha of Latin poetry.

ANDRONICUS, a Peripatetic philosopher, born in the island of Rhodes, came to Rome in the time of Pompey and Cicero, and strenuously endeavoured to raise the character of Aristotle, whose writings he made known, after he had reduced them to a more methodical order. He also wrote a Paraphrase upon several of Aristotle's works.

ANDRONICUS of Thessalonica, one of the learned men who quitted Greece after the taking of Constantinople, in 1453. He passed into Italy, and taught Greek at Rome, Florence, and Paris, and died about the year 1478.

ANDROS, an island in the Archipelago, with a town of the same name, subject to the Turks. It is about eighty miles in circumference, and contains a great many villages; and the inhabitants are almost all of the Greek communion. It is well stocked with priests and monks, called papas and caloyers, and yet they are extremely ignorant. It is the most fruitful island in all the Archipelago, and yields a great quantity of silk. There is said to be about six thousand inhabitants, besides those of the villages Arni and Amoldeos, who are about two hundred, and have a different language and customs, and are called Albanois. There are seven monasteries, a great number of churches, and a cathedral for the bishops of the Roman Catholic persuasion. The Jesuits had a house and a church in this island; but they were forced to quit them long ago. Here are some delightful vallies; but the air is bad, and the water of the city worse. The people are civil; and the women would be agreeable enough, if it was not for their dress, which is very unbecoming; for they stuff out their clothes without the least regard to their shape; but the Albanese women make a much better appearance. In general, the inhabitants of the city are diligent in the management of their affairs, and yet are lovers of good chear and merriment. The peasants make wicker-baskets, wherewith they supply the greatest part of the Archipelago. They have all sorts of game in the woods and mountains, but know not how to take them for want of guns. Their principal food is goats-flesh; for there is no fish to be met with on their coasts. When they are sick, they are obliged to let the disease take its natural course, they having neither physician nor surgeon. A cadi, assisted by a few of the principal persons of the island, has the management of civil affairs, and his residence is in the castle: an aga, who presides over the military force, lives in a tower without the city. Long. 25. 30. E. Lat. 37. 50. N.

ANDUXAR, a city in the province of Andalusia, in Spain, seated on the Guadalquivir. It is pretty large, indifferently rich, and is defended by a good castle. It is adorned with handsome churches and several religious houses, and inhabited by many families of high rank. The land about it abounds in corn, wine, oil, honey, and fruit of all sorts; and the inhabitants carry on a considerable trade in silk. Long. 4. 2. W. Lat. 37. 45. N.

ANDUZE, a town of France, in Lower Languedoc, seated on the river Gardon, twenty-five miles north of Montpellier, twenty north-west of Nimes, and three hundred and fifty south-by-west of Paris. Long. 3. 42. E. Lat. 43. 39. N.

ANEAU, in Latin Anulus, (BARTHOLOMEW) professor of rhetoric at Lyons, and a man of great learning, in the sixteenth century, was born at Bourges in France. He propagated the doctrines of the Reformation among his scholars, which was done so secretly for a long time, that it was not publicly known, and at first was only complained of; but on the 21st of June, 1565, which was the festival of the Holy Sacrament, as the procession was passing along, a large stone was thrown from one of the windows of the college upon the host and the priest who carried it, upon which the people, enraged at this insult, broke into the college in a body, and assassinated Mr. Aneau, whom they imagined to have been the occasion of it; and the next day the college was shut up by order of the city.

ANELLO (THOMAS) usually called, by contraction, MASSANIELLO, was a poor fisherman, born at the city of Naples, in the year 1623, when the kingdom of Naples was ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. The inhabitants had for ſome time been oppreſſed with the moſt burthenſome taxes, and a new deſign was formed to lay a tax on all ſorts of fruit, the principal food of the poor, when Anello, who was then in the twenty-fourth year of his age, hearing the murmurs of the people, reſolved to redreſs their grievances. He was a ſtout fellow, of a middle ſtature, and a good countenance, but meanly dreſſed, and went bare-footed. He firſt aſſembled a number of boys between ſixteen and ſeventeen years of age, many of whom uſed to aſſemble in the market-place to pick up ſuch fruit as fell, and taught them ſuch cries as ſuited his purpoſe, and theſe ſoon amounted to upwards of two thouſand. Of theſe he made himſelf general, but gave them no other arms than a weak cane to each. After ſome trifling tumults, the people aſſembled in great numbers in the market-place, exclaiming aloud at the intolerable grievances under which they groaned, and proteſting that they would no longer ſubmit to them. Maſſaniello leaped upon the higheſt table among the fruiterers, and addreſſing himſelf to the crowd, compared himſelf to Moſes, who delivered the Egyptians from the rod of Pharaoh, and to Peter, who, like him, was but a fiſherman, yet reſcued Rome and the world from the ſlavery of Satan, promiſing that he would deliver them from their oppreſſions, and was ready to lay down his life in ſuch a glorious cauſe. Thus he inflamed the minds of the people, whoſe hearts were ſoon diſpoſed to join their aſſiſtance. They began with ſetting fire to the houſe next to that where the toll for fruit was collected, both which were burnt to the ground, with all the books of account, goods, and furniture. The ſhops were inſtantly ſhut up, and many thouſand people uniting, they plundered the toll-houſes in the other parts of the city of all their writings and books, great ſums of money, and and many rich moveables, which they burnt in the ſtreets. The people, meeting with no reſiſtance, marched towards the viceroy's palace, preceded by Maſſaniello's two thouſand boys, each having a piece of black cloth for a flag on the top of his cane; and theſe, with loud and doleful cries, excited the compaſſion, and implored the aſſiſtance of their fellow-citizens.

On their approaching the palace, the people cried out, that they would not only be freed from the fruit-tax, but all others, eſpecially that on corn. Then diſarming the guards, they entered and rifled the palace, while the viceroy, getting into his coach, ſtrove to eſcape to the church of St. Lewis, which he accompliſhed by promiſing the people to redreſs their grievances, and throwing money among the crowd. The people now applied to the prince of Biſignano, whom they eſteemed their friend, to be their interceſſor and defender; but he, finding himſelf unable to quell their fury, took the firſt opportunity of leaving the city; when the people, finding themſelves without a leader, called out for Maſſaniello, who accepting that poſt, they appointed Genoino, a prieſt of approved knowledge, temper, and abilities, to attend his perſon. Maſſaniello, by his good ſenſe, ſpirit, and bravery, now won the hearts of all the people ſo far, that they were willing to confer on him the ſupreme power. A ſtage was therefore erected in the midſt of the market-place, where he received petitions, and paſſed ſentence in all cauſes, both civil and criminal. He had now under his command no leſs than a hundred and fifty thouſand men, beſides an incredible number of women, who, like ſo many Amazons, appeared with arms of various ſorts. A liſt was made of above ſixty perſons concerned in the taxes, who were ſaid to have fattened on the blood of the people; and to render them an example to future ages, their houſes and goods were ordered to be burnt, which was executed with ſuch order, that very little was carried away; and ſeveral, for ſtealing only trifles from the flames, were, by Maſſaniello's command, hanged in the market-place, by the public executioner.

Mean while the viceroy thought of every method to appeaſe the people, and applying to the archbiſhop, of whoſe paternal care and affection they had no doubt, he gave him the original charter of Charles V. which they had long inſiſted upon, it exempting them from all taxes, and likewiſe a writing, in which he granted a full pardon for all that had paſſed. The archbiſhop prevailed on Maſſaniello to aſſemble all the chief commanders of the people; but when there was reaſon to hope for a ſpeedy accommodation, five hundred armed banditti entered the city on horſeback, and ſeveral ſhot were fired at Maſſaniello, ſome of which narrowly miſſed him. The viceroy was immediately ſuſpected; the people barricadoed the ſtreets, and orders were inſtantly given to cut off the aqueducts leading to the caſtle, where the viceroy and principal officers of ſtate were; but the viceroy applying again to the archbiſhop, that prelate aſſured them of the ſincerity of his good intentions, his abhorrence of the banditti's deſigns, and his reſolution to endeavour to bring them to puniſhment. The treaty was thus renewed; when it being thought proper that Maſſaniello ſhould viſit the viceroy in the palace, he gave orders that all the ſtreets leading to it ſhould be clean ſwept, and the windows and balconies be hung with the richeſt ſilks and tapeſtries; then pulling off his mariner's habit, and dreſſing himſelf in cloth of ſilver, with a plume of feathers in his hat, he mounted a prancing ſteed, and, with a drawn ſword in his hand, went attended by fifty thouſand of the choiceſt of the people. He converſed with the viceroy in a balcony, where he gave him ſurpriſing proofs of the ready obedience of the crowds before it; whatever cry he gave out was inſtantly echoed; he put his finger on his mouth, and there was ſo profound a ſilence, that not the leaſt ſound was heard; at length he ordered them to retire, and they preſently obeyed. The next Sunday the capitulations were ſigned, and confirmed by oath, in the cathedral church, to be obſerved for ever. Maſſaniello now declared, that having completed this important affair, he would return to his former buſineſs; but whether through fear, or the perſuaſions of his friends, or the effects of phrenzy, which ſeems to be the caſe, for he had ſeldom either eat or ſlept during the whole tranſaction, he ſtill continued his authority, which he executed in a very capricious and tyrannical manner, till four gentlemen aſſaſſinating him, he cried out, "Ungrateful traitors!" and falling, expired.

ANGELA MERICI, or ANGELA DE BRESCIA, foundreſs of the order of the Urſulines, was a native of Dezenzano, on the lake of Garda. She founded her order in 1527, and died in 1540, aged thirty-four.

ANGELIC (JOHN) a Dominican monk, who immortalized his name by his virtue and his paintings. Nicholas V. employed him in painting his chapel, and offered him the archbiſhoprie of Florence, which Angelic declined accepting His pictures are on religious ſubjects. He died at Rome, in 1455, aged ſixty-eight.

ANGELIS (DOMINICO D') principal hiſtoriographer to the king of Naples, was born October 14, 1675, at Lecce, the capital of Otranto, in the kingdom of Naples, of one of the nobleſt and moſt conſiderable families of that city. He obtained a great reputation for learning, and was the author of ſeveral pieces relating to the hiſtory of literature. He died Auguſt 9, 1719.

ANGELO BUONAROTI (MICHAEL) an incomparable painter, ſculptor, and architect, was born in 1474, at the caſtle of Chiuſi, in the territory of Arezzo, in Tuſcany, and was put to nurſe at Settiniano, a village famous for the reſort of ſculptors, of whom his nurſe's huſband was one, whence it it is ſaid, that Michael Angelo ſucked in ſculpture with his milk. His inclination to deſigning obliged his parents to place him with Dominico Ghirlandaio, under whom he made ſuch progreſs as to raiſe the jealouſy of his ſchool-fellows to ſuch a degree, that one of them, named Torrigiano, gave him ſuch a blow on the noſe, that he carried the marks of it to his grave. He at length erected an academy of painting and ſculpture at Florence, under the protection of Lorenzo di Medicis, who was a lover of the fine arts; but upon the troubles of the houſe of Medicis, he was obliged to remove to Bologna. About this time, he made an image of Cupid, and carrying it to Rome, broke off one of the arms, and then buried it in a place which he knew was ſoon to be dug up. The Cupid being found, was ſold to the cardinal of St. Gregory for an antique; but Angelo diſcovered the fallacy, by ſhewing the arm he had reſerved for that purpoſe.

In ſhort, he obtained ſo great a reputation at Rome, that he was employed by pope Sixtus to paint his chapel. Upon the death of pope Julius II. he went to Florence, where he performed that admirable piece of ſculpture, the tomb of the duke of Florence; but he was there interrupted by the wars, and even obliged by the citizens to work on the fortifications of the city. He therefore removed to Ferrara, and from thence to Venice, where the doge would have entertained him in his ſervice; but he would only draw for him the deſign of the bridge Rialto. Upon his return to Florence, he painted the fable of Leda, with Jupiter in the form of a ſwan, for the duke of Ferrara, which was ſent into France, where it was purchaſed by Francis I. but the amorous paſſion of Leda was repreſented in ſo lively and laſcivious a manner, that afterwards Monſ. de Noyers, miniſter of ſtate, out of a ſcruple of conſcience, cauſed it to be burnt. By the order of Paul III. he painted the laſt judgment, the moſt celebrated of all his pieces.

He is eſteemed the greateſt deſigner that ever lived; and it is allowed, that no painter ever underſtood anatomy ſo well; yet he is ſaid to have overcharged his deſigns, to have taken too many liberties againſt the rules of perſpective, and to have underſtood but little of colouring. However, he had perfections ſufficient to recommend him to the notice of moſt of the princes of Chriſtendom. In architecture he is ſaid to have ſurpaſſed all the moderns, in proof of which are mentioned the Capitol and St. Peter's at Rome, St. John's of Florence, the Palazzo Farneſe, and his own houſe.

He

He was alſo an excellent poet. He died at Rome immenſely rich, in the year 1564, at ninety years of age. But his body was brought to Florence by Coſmo de Medicis, and interred in the church of St. Clara, where he has a monument of marble, adorned with the figures of painting, ſculpture, and architecture.

ANGELO, a ſmall ſtrong town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Capitanata, five miles north of Manfredonia. Long. 15. 56. E. Lat. 41. 43. N.

ANGELOS (LA PUEBLA DE LOS) a city of North-America, in the province of Tlaſcala, ſixty miles from the city of Mexico. It was formerly an Indian town; but in 1530, it was intirely forſaken by the natives, which was owing to the cruelty of the Spaniards. A ſucceeding viceroy of Mexico recalled them back by a milder treatment, ſettling ſome Spaniards there at the ſame time. It is now very populous, which is owing in a great meaſure to the goodneſs of the air, and the fruitfulneſs of a delightful plain, in which it ſtands. The buildings are chiefly of ſtone, and the ſtreets clean and regular. There is a ſquare in the middle formed by the croſſing of the ſtreets, with piazzas on three of the ſides, full of ſhops: on the other ſide a ſtately cathedral is erected all of ſtone, with a beautiful front and three high towers. There are other churches, and convents for both ſexes, which carries a ſhew of devotion; but they pay little regard to their vows; for the prieſts, monks, and nuns are ſaid to be as debauched as the reſt of the inhabitants, which occaſioned ſome to call it Puebla de los Diabolos, the Town of Devils. The inhabitants of this place have a mint, and manufactures of cloth, hats, and glaſs, which laſt is very uncommon in theſe parts. Long. 103. 12. W. Lat. 19. 13. N.

ANGELUS (CHRISTOPHER) a learned Greek, born in the Peloponneſus, was obliged by the Turks to abandon his country on account of his religion; on which he came to England, and ſtudied three years in Trinity-college, Cambridge, and afterwards in Baliol-college, Oxford, where he was of great ſervice in inſtructing the younger ſcholars in the Greek language. He wrote a work on the Cuſtoms of the Greeks, which has been tranſlated from the Greek into the Latin; he alſo wrote ſome other pieces. He died in 1638.

ANGERBURG, a handſome town in the kingdom of Pruſſia, ſurrounded with palliſadoes, with a ſtrong caſtle, and ſeated on a lake of the ſame name, from whence the river Angerac riſes.

ANGERMANIA, a province in Sweden, bounded on the north by Lapland and Bothnia, on the eaſt by the gulph of Bothnia, on the ſouth by Medelpadia, and on the weſt by Jemti and Herndel. It has but few towns, and thoſe of no conſideration, it being full of rocks and foreſts.

ANGERMOND, a town of the duchy of Berg, in Germany, on the eaſt ſide of the Rhine, nineteen miles north of Duſſeldorp, and ſubject to the elector palatine. Long. 6. 20. E. Lat. 51. 10. N.

ANGERONA, in Pagan mythology, the Goddeſs of Silence, worſhipped by the ancient Romans, who repreſented her with her mouth ſhut, and a finger to her lips; and her image was placed under the altar of the Goddeſs of Pleaſure, to ſignify the ſatisfaction that proceeds from ſilence.

ANGERONALIA, in Roman antiquity, feaſts celebrated on the 21ſt of December, in honour of Angerona, the Goddeſs of Silence.

ANGERS, a great city of France, and capital of the duchy of Anjou, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated a little above the place where the Sarte and the Loire loſe themſelves in the Maine. This laſt river divides the city into two equal parts. There are twelve pariſhes in the city and four in the ſuburbs, which contain upwards of thirty-ſix thouſand inhabitants. Beſides theſe, there are eight chapters, and a great number of convents for both ſexes. Its greateſt extent is along the declivity of a hill, which reaches quite down to the river ſide. The caſtle is flanked with eighteen large round towers and a ſtrong half-moon. From the platform there is a very delightful proſpect.

The cathedral church is remarkable for the length and height of its great nave, which is without pillars, and is thought to be the fineſt in France. It contains a treaſure which is never ſhown but on great feſtival-days. Over the great gate are three very high ſteeples, the middlemoſt of which is ſupported by the other two, and ſeems to be ſuſpended in the air: it is very much admired by ſtrangers. At the foot of the caſtle there is a chain, which reaches to the other ſide of the river, and is faſtened to a tower, which prevents the entrance by the river into the city. Near the church of St. Michael is the handſomeſt ſquare in the city, from whence runs a ſtreet which has the name of the church, on one ſide of which is the town-houſe, which has a fine tower, with a clock raiſed upon an arch, which ſerves for a paſſage into the great ſquare. There are two large bridges, which keep up a communication between the two parts of the city, in the leſſer of which there is another ſquare, which ſerves for a market. The univerſity of Angers was founded in 1398, and the academy of belles lettres, in 1685. This laſt conſiſts of thirty academicians. At the end of the ſuburb of Breſigny are the quarries of Angiers ſo famous for the fine ſlate which is got from thence. The pieces are of the thickneſs of a crown-piece, and a foot ſquare. All the houſes in Angers are covered with this ſlate, which has gained it the appellation of the Black City. It is one hundred and ſixty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 30. W. Lat. 47. 28. N.

ANGHIERA (the earldom of) is a large province of the duchy Milan, in Italy, bounded on the north by the Swiſs governments in Italy, and by the Vallais; on the eaſt by the valley of Aouſta; on the ſouth by the Vercellois and the Noverois; and on the weſt by the territory of Milan. The eaſtern part contains the great valley of Seſſia, and ſeveral others which paſs under the ſame name; and the weſtern extends round the lake Major. It is very fruitful, containing, beſides Anghiera the capital, Arona, Vogogne, Domo d'Oſcela, and Margozzo. The city Anghiera is on the eaſtern ſhore of the lake Major. Long. 9. 5. E. Lat. 45. 42. N.

ANGILBERT (St.) abbot of Centula, or St. Requier, in the ninth century, was deſcended from a noble family of Neuſtria. He was educated at the court of Charlemagne, where he ſtudied the languages with that prince and the other courtiers, under the learned Alcuinus, who afterwards conſidered him as his ſon. Charlemagne, having cauſed his ſon Pepin to be crowned king of Italy, made Angilbert that prince's firſt miniſter; he therefore went with him into Italy, and returned ſome years after to France, when Charlemagne gave him his daughter Bertha in marriage. Thus Angilbert being ſon-in-law to Charlemagne, was made duke or governor of the coaſt of France from the Schelde to the Seine, and the king alſo made him his ſecretary and prime miniſter; but Alcuinus, abbot of Corbie, prevailed on him to become a monk in the monaſtery of Centula, or St. Requier, with the conſent both of his wife and the king. Notwithſtanding his love of ſolitude, he was frequently obliged to leave the monaſtery, and attend to the affairs of the church and ſtate, and was three times ſent to the court of Rome; he alſo accompanied Charlemagne thither, in the year 800, when that prince was crowned in that city emperor of the Weſt. He died on the 18th of February, 814. Angilbert had ſuch a taſte for poetry, that Charlemagne called him his Homer. There are but few of his works remaining.

ANGIOLELLO (JOHN MARIO) was born at Vicenza, and compoſed, in Italian and the Turkiſh language, the Hiſtory of Mahomet II. which he dedicated to that prince. This work, though wrote with great freedom, was kindly received by the haughty ſultan, who gave him conſiderable marks of his liberality.

ANGLESEY, an iſland in the Iriſh Sea, and a county in Wales, ſeparated from Caernarvonſhire by a ſtreight or narrow arm of the ſea, called Menai or Menea. It was called by the Britons Mon, by the Saxons Moneg, and by the Engliſh Angleſey, or the Engliſh Iſland. It is about twenty-four miles in length, and ſeventeen in breadth, where broadeſt. It contains ſix hundreds, ſeventy-four pariſhes, and ſends two members to parliament, whereof one is for Beaumaris. The principal rivers are the Brant and the Keveny. The ſoil is ſtony, rocky, and mountainous; however, it produces corn and cattle, and there is plenty of fowl and fiſh. It was formerly covered with trees, which ſerved for a retreat to the Druids.

ANGLUS (THOMAS) an Engliſh prieſt, as well known by his pretending to explain the moſt impenetrable myſteries of religion by the principles of Ariſtotle, as by the multitude of little books which he wrote in the ſeventeenth century.

ANGOLA, a kingdom in Africa, to the ſouth of the line, lying along the weſtern ſea-coaſt, between five and ten degrees of latitude. It was firſt viſited by the Portugueſe, who have ſettled ſeveral colonies, and have converted great numbers of the negroes to Chriſtianity, ſuch as it is; for notwithſtanding this, they adhere to moſt of their old cuſtoms, go almoſt naked, and take as many wives as they pleaſe. The country is divided into ſeveral territories, or capitanaries. The air is exceeding hot and unhealthy; but the ſoil is very fruitful in paſture, vegetables, grain, and fruits; poultry and cattle are exceeding cheap; and there is a very beautiful creature, called zebra, elephants, and other creatures common to thoſe parts of Africa. The Negroes are large, ſtrong, and coal-black, but lazy. They have different languages; and every village has what we call a king; but they are ſubject to one potentate, who is obliged to acknowledge the Portugueſe for his maſters. From hence the Portugueſe annually ſupply their American dominions with ſlaves.

ANGOU-

ANGOULESME, a city of France, the capital of the duchy of Angoumais, and the ſee of a biſhop. It is ſeated on the top of a hill, ſurrounded with rocks, and the river Charante runs at the foot of it. The inhabitants are ſaid to be eight thouſand, and to drive a conſiderable trade in paper, which is their manufacture. It is two hundred and fifty miles ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 10. E. Lat. 45. 39. N.

ANGOUMOIS, a province of France, bounded on the north by Poitou, on the eaſt by Limouſin and March, on the ſouth by Perigord, and on the weſt by Saintonge. The principal rivers are the Touvre and the Charente. This laſt is full of excellent fiſh, and though it often overflows its banks, it is ſo far from doing any damage, that it greatly enriches the ſoil. The Touvre is full of trouts. The air is generally warmer than at Paris, though the country is hilly. The ſoil produces plenty of wheat, rye, oats, Spaniſh corn, ſaffron, grapes, and all ſorts of fruits. There are ſeveral iron mines, which yield a very good ſort of iron.

ANGOURA, ANGORA, or ANGORI, a city of Aſia, in Anatolia, formerly called Ancyra, and is yet full of remarkable antiquities, which are ſo many marks of its ancient magnificence. It is at preſent one of the beſt cities in Anatolia; its ſtreets are full of pillars and old marbles, among which, ſome are of porphyry and jaſper. The greateſt part of the pillars are ſmooth and cylindrical; ſome are channelled ſpirally; but the moſt ſingular are oval, with plate-bands before and behind from the top to the bottom of the pedeſtal. The houſes are now made of clay, which are ſometimes intermixt with fine pieces of marble. The walls of the city are low, with very mean battlements. The maſonry of the walls is intermixt with pillars, architraves, capitals, and other ancient fragments, eſpecially that of the towers and gates. The caſtle of Angora has a triple encloſure, and the walls are of large pieces of white marble, and a ſtone much like porphyry.

The baſha of Angora has about thirty purſes income; and there are about three hundred janizaries, under the command of a ſardar. The Turks are ſaid to be forty thouſand ſouls; the Armenians four or five thouſand, and the Greeks ſix hundred. The Armenians have ſeven churches, beſides a monaſtery, and the Greeks two. They breed the fineſt goats in the world, and their hair, which is of a dazling white, is as fine as ſilk, and nine inches in length; it is worked into very fine ſtuffs, particularly camblet. All the inhabitants are employed in this manufacture. There are ſeveral large caravans paſs through this city to different places. Long. 32. 5. E. Lat. 39. 30. N.

ANGRA, a maritime town, and capital of Tercera, and all the Azore iſlands. It is a biſhop's ſee, the reſidence of the governor, and is ſituated at the bottom of a ſmall bay, on the ſouth ſide of the iſland. It is ſurrounded with a wall and foſſe, and defended by a caſtle. It has five pariſh churches, one of which, called St. Salvadore, is the cathedral, four monaſteries, and four nunneries, beſides a tribunal for the inquiſition. The buildings in general are pretty good, and the ſtreets ſtraight and wide, but the furniture of the houſes are very indifferent. Here are magazines for men of war, containing anchors, cables, ſails, &c. and they provide corn and other refreſhments for merchant ſhips that call here in going or returning from their voyages. But they trade chiefly in the wood that grows upon theſe iſlands. The conſuls of ſeveral nations reſide here, though they have no great buſineſs to manage. As ſoon as winter begins it is very dangerous for ſhips to remain in the bay, eſpecially when the peak or high mountain is covered with dark clouds, and the birds make an unuſual cry about the city. Long. 28. 25. W. Lat. 39. 10. N.

ANGUILLA, or SNAKE ISLAND, is ſo called from its being a long narrow winding tract of land. It is about ten leagues in length, and about three in breadth. It is the moſt northerly of the Caribbees, belonging to Great Britain, and is ſituated one hundred miles north of St. Chriſtopher's, fifteen north latitude.

ANHALT, a principality of Germany, in the circle of the Higher Saxony. It is about eighteen leagues long, and two or three broad, and bounded on the ſouth by the earldom of Mansfield; on the weſt by the principality of Halberſtadt, on the eaſt by the duchy of Saxony; and on the north by the duchy of Magdeburg. The rivers are the Mulda and the Salda, which render it very fruitful, particularly in grain, with which the inhabitants make beer, and tranſport it into foreign countries. The principal towns are, Deſſaw, the capital, Zerbſt, Hartzkerode, Bernburg, and Pleſtaw.

ANIANE, a town of France, in Lower Languedoe, with a monaſtery of Benedictines. It is ſeated on the river Aire. Long. 3. 48. E. Lat. 43. 45. N.

ANICAN, a town in the kingdom of Fantin, in Guinea, about two miles from Anamaboe, on a little hill, two leagues eaſt of Mouree. The factories there have but little trade. The Portugueſe trade with tobacco pipes, tobacco, ſoap, rum, Brazil ſweetmeats, and other American commodities.

ANICETUS, a franchiſed ſlave, tutor to Nero in his infancy, and afterwards commander of his fleet, was the tool made uſe of by Nero in the bloody murder of Agrippina his mother, and in getting rid of his wife Agrippa, by Anicetus's charging her with having committed adultery with him.

ANICETUS (St.) a Syrian, was choſen biſhop of Rome in 158, after the death of Pius. He conferred with St. Polycarpe, in relation to the day when the feaſt of Eaſter ſhould be held, and though they were of different opinions, it made no breach in their peace, union, and charity. He died in 168, and was ſucceeded by St. Soter.

ANICIUS PROBUS (SEXTUS) præfectus prætorio, conſul of Rome, and one of the moſt illuſtrious magiſtrates of the empire, in the year 371. He was beloved by the people. Proba Falconia his wife, who had much wit and piety, compoſed the Life of Jeſus Chriſt in centos of Virgil.

ANJENGO, a ſmall town and factory on the Malabar coaſt, on the peninſula, on this ſide the Ganges. It belongs to the Eaſt India company, and the merchandiſe conſiſts chiefly in pepper and callicoes. Long. 76. 1. E. Lat. 7. 0. N.

ANJOU, a province and duchy of France, bounded on the eaſt by Touraine, on the ſouth by Poitou, on the weſt by Bretagne, and on the north by Maine. It is ſeventy miles in length, and in breadth ſixty. There are ſaid to be forty-nine rivers in this province, but the greateſt part of them are ſmall brooks, which dry up in the ſummer. However, there are five navigable rivers: the Loire, which divides it in two parts; the Vienne, the Toué, the Maienne, and the Sarte.

The air is temperate, and the country agreeably diverſified with hills and meadows. There are thirty-three foreſts of oak-trees mixt with beech. The country produces white wine, wheat, barley, rye, oats, peas, beans, flax, hemp, walnuts, and ſome cheſnuts. In Lower Anjou they make cyder. There are fruit trees of all kinds, and paſture proper for horſes. The greateſt riches of the province conſiſt in cows, oxen, and ſheep. There are ſeveral coal and iron mines, and yet there are but two forges in the whole province. There are quarries of marble and of ſlate to cover houſes, as well as ſalt-petre works. Beſides theſe, there are ſeveral glaſs-houſes, and quarries of white ſtone, proper for building on the ſide of the river Loire. The remarkable towns beſides Angers the capital, are Saumur, Briſac, Pons de Cea, La Fleche, and Beaufort.

ANNA, a town of Turky, in Aſia, ſeated on the weſtern bank of the river Euphrates, and is the pleaſanteſt place in all theſe parts, for there is plenty of olives, oranges, citrons, lemons, pomegranates, and dates. Of theſe laſt there are prodigious quantities, and there are two ſorts not common elſewhere. The fields are ſown with cotton, and the corn grows extremely high. The town is divided into two parts, the largeſt of which is ſurrounded with old walls, and the houſes are built with brick and ſtone, with gardens belonging thereto. It is one hundred and ſixty miles north-weſt of Bagdad, and one hundred and fifty ſouth by-weſt of Mouſſol. Long. 41. 35. E. Lat. 33. 30. N.

ANNA COMNENA, the daughter of Alexius Comnenus, emperor of Conſtantinople, and the empreſs Irene, was a princeſs diſtinguiſhed by her wit and learning. She was born in 1083, and at length married to Nicephorus Bryennius; but having ſucceſſively loſt her mother, her father, and her huſband, ſhe endeavoured to mitigate her grief by writing the hiſtory of her father's reign, from the year 1081, to 1118, including a hiſtory of the church of Conſtantinople. This work has been printed with learned notes by Mr. Ducagne, and M. Couſin has tranſlated it into French.

ANNAMABOE, an Engliſh factory on the coaſt of Guinea, in Africa, a little to the eaſtward of Cape Coaſt caſtle. A great many ſlaves are purchaſed there, and brought from thence to our plantations in America.

ANNANDALE, a dale or valley on the river Annan, in the eaſt part of Dumfriesſhire, in Scotland. The chief town is Annand, a royal burgh, ſeated not far from the mouth of the river of that name, which empties itſelf into Solway frith. It formerly had a caſtle, and was in good repute, but at preſent is but a poor town, the houſes being low and mean. Long. 1. 54. W. Lat. 54. 56. N.

ANNAPOLIS, the chief town in Maryland, in North-America, which as yet is but mean, becauſe the people in this province chooſe to live on their plantations, as in Virginia. Lord Baltimore is the proprietor, and the chief produce tobacco. Long 78. 10. W. Lat. 39. 25. N.

ANNAPOLIS ROYAL, the capital of Nova-Scotia, is ſeated in the bay of Fundy, and has a fine harbour, but there is a difficulty in entering in and coming out, and it is ſubject to fogs. The town is but ſmall, and yet there are ſome handhandſome buildings, though the generality are but two ſtories high. It is defended by new and regular fortifications, and batteries of guns towards the ſea. At the bottom of the harbour is a point of land, which divides two rivers, and on each ſide there are pleaſant meadows, which in ſpring and autumn are covered with all ſorts of freſh-water fowl. There is a trade carried on by the Indians with furs, which they exchange for European Goods. There is a governor reſides here, with an Engliſh garriſon. Long. 64. 5. W. Lat. 45. 10. N.

ANNE (St.) the mother of the Virgin Mary, and the wife of Joachim. We have no trace of this ſaint either in the holy ſcriptures, or in the writings of the three firſt ages of the Chriſtian church.

ANNE, ducheſs of Brittany, and queen of France, was the daughter and heireſs of Duke Francis II. and was born at Nants, on the 16th of January, 1476. She had been promiſed in marriage to Maximilian of Auſtria, but her father dying, ſhe was married to Charles VIII. of France. She had much wit, beauty, greatneſs of ſoul, and piety. She governed with much wiſdom during the king's expedition for the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples. After that prince's death ſhe married Lewis XII. who had conceived a paſſion for her while he was duke of Orleans. She died on the 9th of January, 1514.

ANNE OF AUSTRIA, queen of France, the eldeſt daughter of Philip III. king of Spain, and the mother of Lewis XIV. was declared regent of France on the 18th of May, 1643, and took the adminiſtration during the king's minority. She built the magnificent church of Val de Grace, and died at Paris, on the 20th of January, 1666, aged ſixty-four.

ANNE BOLEYN, queen of England. See BOLEYN.

ANNE, queen of Great Britain, the youngeſt daughter of king James II. and Anne Hyde, his firſt wife, was born on the 6th of February, 1665, and married to prince George of Denmark on the 17th of Auguſt, 1683, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children, who died young. Her perſon was of the middle ſize, majeſtic, and well proportioned; her face round and handſome; her complexion ruddy, her features regular, and her hair of a dark brown. This princeſs, who was poſſeſſed of moſt of the virtues that in private life adorn her ſex, ſucceeded her brother-in-law William III. on the 4th of May, 1702, and during her reign the honour of the Britiſh arms was carried to an amazing height, particularly by the duke of Marlborough, who, in her reign, humbled the pride of France, by a number of the moſt glorious victories. The nation being at the ſame time at war with Spain, the duke of Ormond and Sir George Rook took Vigo, when eleven French men of war were burnt, and ten taken; ſix galleons were ſunk, and eleven taken. On the 24th of July, 1704, Sir George Rook took Gibraltar, after a ſiege of two days. The next year the earl of Peterborough took the city of Barcelona, and ſeveral other places in Spain; and in 1706 the earl of Galway, at the head of twenty thouſand men, took Alcantara, a city of Portugal. In 1708 major-general Stanhope landed with three thouſand men on the iſland of Minorca, and attacked Fort St. Philip, where the garriſon, which conſiſted of a thouſand Spaniards and ſix hundred French, ſurrendered in three days; the men were made priſoners of war, and the whole iſland conquered in three weeks. See the articles CHURCHILL (JOHN) duke of Marlborough, ROOK (GEORGE) BUTLER (JAMES) duke of Ormond, &c.

Theſe wars were concluded by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, by which Spain and Spaniſh America were confirmed to king Philip; but the Netherlands and the Spaniſh dominions in Italy were ſeparated from that monarchy. Their Italian dominions conſiſted of the kingdoms of Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, and the duchy of Milan, of which Naples, Sardinia, and Milan were beſtowed upon the emperor; and Sicily, with the title of king, given to the duke of Savoy. The Dutch had a barrier given them againſt France in the Netherlands; while Harley and Bolingbroke, the new miniſtry, in complaiſance to France, only inſiſted on having Dunkirk demoliſhed, and the poſſeſſion of Gibraltar, Minorca, and Acadia, or Nova-Scotia, ſecured to the crown of England, though much better terms had been before offered by the French.

Queen Anne procured a law for the building of fifty new churches within the bills of mortality, with an augmentation of the livings of the poor clergy; and in 1706 the union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland took place. Parties ran very high in this reign, and Dr. Sacheverell endeavoured, in ſeveral ſermons, to raiſe a ſpirit of perſecution againſt the diſſenters, and his trial only ſerved to inflame the nation. The queen died at Kenſington on the firſt of Auguſt, 1714, in the 50th year of her age, and the thirteenth of her reign, having had the misfortune to loſe her royal conſort, prince George of Denmark, about ſix years before. She was ſucceeded by George I.

ANNE IWANOWNA, czarina or empreſs of Ruſſia, was the youngeſt daughter of the czar John Alexiowitz, and was born on the 7th of January, 1696. She married Frederic William, duke of Courland, who died without iſſue on the 21ſt of January, 1711. The czar Peter Alexiowitz II. dying in 1730, ſhe was immediately acknowledged and proclaimed empreſs of all the Ruſſias at Moſcow. That princeſs then reſided at Mittau in Courland, and deputies being ſent for her, ſhe repaired to Moſcow on the 19th of February, and after ſpending ſome days at a neighbouring convent, made her public entry into that capital on the 26th.

The deputies who had been ſent to Mittau, had preſented her from the high council ſome articles that greatly limited her power, which ſhe had ſigned; after which the high council, the generals, and nobility, endeavoured to make her accept of ſome other conditions; but on the 8th of March, three hundred and ninety gentlemen, moſt of them poſſeſſed of civil and military employments, with the veltmarſhal Trubetzkoi, and the knees Alexis Czerſkaſki, ſenator, preſented themſelves at the palace, and demanded an audience of the new czarina: ſhe granted it them, and at the ſame time the members of the high council were aſſembled. Trubetzkoi then entered the hall of audience, with all his followers, and preſented to the empreſs a memorial, in which it was obſerved that ſome of the articles ſhe had ſigned being prejudicial to the ſtate, it was neceſſary that the council ſhould deliberate again on that ſubject, and deſired her to permit them, and to this ſhe conſented. In the afternoon the marſhal again entered the hall of audience, and informed the czarina that the council had unanimouſly agreed that a monarchical government was alone ſuitable to the empire of Ruſſia, and that he was deputed by the council to entreat her acceptance of the entire ſovereignty, and to preſerve the ſame authority that her predeceſſors had enjoyed The czarina accepted this offer, and the articles ſhe had ſigned were torn in pieces. She at length united in one body the high privy council, and the ſenate, under the name of the regency, and made it conſiſt of twenty-one members. Her coronation was performed with the greateſt magnificence, in the great church of Moſcow, on the 9th of May, 1730, and on the 28th of December, 1731, ſhe publiſhed a manifeſto, which regulated the future ſucceſſion to the throne of Ruſſia. This princeſs died at Peterſburgh on the 28th of October, 1740, in the forty-eighth year of her age.

ANNECY, a city of Savoy, ſeated between Chamberry and Geneva, on the bank of a lake of that name, from whence run ſeveral brooks, which flow through the town, and uniting at length form a river. There are piazzas in moſt of the ſtreets of the town, which ſerve to ſhelter the inhabitants from rain. It has ſeveral collegiate and pariſh churches, as well as convents for men and women. The lake is about nine miles long, and four broad. Long 6. 12. E. Lat. 45. 53. N.

ANNESLEY (ARTHUR) earl of Angleſey, and lord privy-ſeal in the reign of king Charles II. was the ſon of Sir Francis Anneſley, Bart. lord Mount Norris and viſcount Valentia, in Ireland, and was born at Dublin on the 10th of July, 1614. He was for ſome time at the univerſity of Oxford, and afterwards ſtudied the law at Lincoln's Inn. He had a conſiderable hand in the public tranſactions of the laſt century; for in the beginning of the civil war he ſat in the parliament held at Oxford, but afterwards became reconciled to the oppoſite party, and was ſent commiſſioner to Ulſter, to oppoſe the deſigns of the rebel Owen Roe O Neal. He engaged in ſeveral other affairs with great ſucceſs. He was preſident of the council of ſtate after the death of Oliver, and was principally concerned in bringing about the Reſtoration, ſoon after which, king Charles II. raiſed him to the dignity of a baron, by the title of lord Anneſley, of Newport Pagnell, Bucks, and a ſhort time after he was made earl of Angleſey. During that reign he was employed on ſome very important affairs, was made treaſurer of the navy, and afterwards lord privy-ſeal. In October, 1680, his lordſhip was charged by one Dangerfield, in an information delivered upon oath, at the bar of the houſe of commons, with endeavouring to ſtifle evidence in relation to the popiſh plot, and to promote the belief of a preſbyterian one. The uneaſineſs he received from this attack did not prevent his ſpeaking his opinion freely of thoſe matters in the houſe of lords, particularly in regard to the popiſh plot. About the ſame time he anſwered the lord Caſtlehaven's Memoirs, in which that nobleman endeavoured to paint the Iriſh rebellion in the lighteſt colours, and a ſharp diſpute was raiſed, which ended in the ſeals being taken from him. He was a perſon of great abilities, had uncommon learning, and was well acquainted with the conſtitution and laws of England. He wrote, beſides the above-mentioned work, 1. The Privileges of the Houſe of Lords and Commons ſtated. 2. A Diſcourſe on the Houſe of Lords. 3. Memoirs. 4. The Hiſtory of the Troubles in Ireland, from the Rebellion in 1641, till the Reſtoration. 5. Truth Unveiled, in Behalf of the Church of England; and ſome other works. He died in April, 1686, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, and was ſucceeded by his ſon James.

ANNESLEY, or ANELY, (SAMUEL) an eminent Nonconformiſt miniſter, was born at Harley, in Warwickſhire, about the year 1620, and was educated at Oxford. He was a pathetic preacher, and a pious and very charitable divine; but in 1662 was ejected for non-conformity. It is remarkable that he conſtantly laid by the tenth part of his income for the uſe of the poor. He publiſhed ſeveral ſermons, and died in 1696.

ANNICERIS, a Greek philoſopher of the Cyrenaic ſect, who gave the name of Annicerians to his diſciples, was born at Cyrene. He placed all good in pleaſure, and conceived virtue to be only commendable ſo far as it produced pleaſure; yet he affirmed, that we ought voluntarily to ſubject ourſelves to pain and trouble out of regard to our friends. He lived about three hundred and forty years before Chriſt.

ANNIUS OF VITERBO. a famous impoſtor. See NANNIUS.

ANNOBON, a ſmall iſland in Africa, upon the coaſt of Guinea, belonging to the Portugueſe. The land is very high and mountainous, and in the greateſt heat of the day there is always a thick ſtinking fog, which renders the iſland very unwholſome. The inhabitants cultivate all the ſoil in the plains, and half way up the hills, it being very proper to produce grain. There are coco trees, lemons, citrons, bannanas, and palm trees, every where to be met with; and you may have hogs, goats, ſheep, and fowls, almoſt for nothing. The natural inhabitants are blacks, and go almoſt naked, only hiding what decency obliges them to conceal; and provided they can ſay their Pater-noſter, Ave-Maria, and confeſs themſelves to the prieſt, they are reckoned good Chriſtians; but then they muſt bring ſome offerings to the prieſts. The women in general are very great libertines, and ſeldom fail of ſeducing the Europeans that land in this iſland. The whites treat them all as ſlaves, and they are accounted very diſhoneſt. Long. 5. 10. E. Lat. 1. 50. S.

ANNONAY, a ſmall town of France, in the Upper Vivarais, ſeated on the river Deunre, twenty-three miles from Vienna. Long. 4. 52. E. Lat. 45. 15. N.

ANSE, an antient town of France, in the Lyonois, ten miles north of Lyons, ten weſt of Trevoux, and twenty-five ſouth of Maçon. Long 6. 55. Lat 45. 55. N.

ANSEGISUS, a celebrated abbot of Fontenelle, was eſteemed by the biſhops and prieſts of his time. He wrote a Collection of the Capillaries of Charlemagne, and Lewis the Debonair, of which Baluze gave a good edition in 1676. Anſegiſus died in 834.

ANSELM, archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reigns of William Rufus and Henry I. was born at Aoſt, a town at the foot of the Alps, in the year 1033. He lived in continual variance with theſe two monarchs, and ſpent a good part of his time in Italy and France, but was at laſt reconciled to Henry I. He was the firſt who reſtrained the Engliſh clergy from marrying. The large edition of his works is divided into three parts, the firſt of which is intitled Monologia, and contains dogmatical tracts: the ſecond, devotional and practical tracts; and the third takes in his letters. He died at Canterbury in 1109, and was canonized in the reign of Henry VI. The author of St. Anſelm's Life has the weakneſs to aſſert that he wrought many miracles, that he extinguiſhed fires, calmed tempeſts, and healed diſeaſes, only by making the ſign of the croſs; and that a ſhip in which he ſailed had a large hole in one of her planks, nevertheleſs it took in no water ſo long as the holy man was on board.

ANSELM, biſhop of Lucca, in 1061, was born at Mantua, and died on the 18th of March, 1086. He wrote a treatiſe againſt the antipope Guibert, and many other works.

ANSELM, a native of Laon, and dean and archdeacon of that city, taught with reputation in the univerſity of Paris, and afterwards in the dioceſe of Laon. He died on the 15th of July, 1117. We have an interlineary gloſſary of his on the Bible, printed with that of Lira.

ANSELM, a bare-footed Auſtin friar, born at Paris, was the author of, 1. Le Palais de l' Honneur. 2. A genealogical Hiſtory of the illuſtrious Houſes of France; and other pieces. He died Jan 17, 1694, aged ſixty-nine.

ANSELME (ANTHONY) a celebrated preacher, and member of the academy of inſcriptions and belles lettres at Paris, was born at Iſle-Jourdain, in Lower Armagnac, on the 13th of January, 1652. He ſtudied at Gimont, and afterwards at Toulouſe, and diſcovered in his youth great talents for preaching. He twice gained the prize for odes at the floral games of Toulouſe. The marquis de Monteſpan having heard him preach, entruſted to him the education of the marquis d' Antin, his ſon, who was then but ten years old. The biſhop of Tarbes endeavoured to retain him, by making him arch-prieſt of Bagnieres, one of the beſt benefices in his dioceſe; but he thanked the prelate, and went to Paris with his pupil. As ſoon as he had finiſhed the young lord's education, he engaged again in the miniſtry, and preached for above thirty years with univerſal applauſe. At length the duke d'Antin cauſed to be revived in his favour the title of hiſtoriographer of buildings. In 1710 he was nominated an aſſociate of the academy of inſcriptions and belles lettres, and was afterwards made a member of that academy. He had, ever ſince the year 1699, the rich abbey of St. Severus, in Gaſcony. He publiſhed a number of ſermons, panegyrics, and funeral orations, in ſeven volumes, octavo, and many diſſertations in the Memoirs of the Academy of Inſcriptions. He died at the above abbey on the 8th of Auguſt, 1737, at eighty-ſix years of age.

ANSER, a Latin poet, the friend of Mark Anthony, whoſe actions he deſcribed in verſe.

ANSLO, a ſea-port town of Norway, in the province of Aggerhuys, with a biſhop's ſee. The ſupreme court of juſtice is held here for Norway. It is ſeated on a bay of the ſame name, thirty miles north-weſt of Frederickſtadt, and two hundred and fifty weſt of Stockholm. Long. 10. 14. E. Lat. 59. 24. N.

ANSON (GEORGE) a celebrated admiral, whoſe merit, as a naval commander, raiſed him to the rank of nobility, was the ſon of William Anſon, Eſq. of Huckborough, in Staffordſhire. He early took great delight in reading and hearing the accounts of our moſt diſtinguiſhed navigators and admirals; whence his father gave him an education ſuitable to his genius, and bred him to the ſea. In 1722 he was made captain of the Weazle ſloop, and the next year of the Scarborough man of war, in which ſtation he behaved with the greateſt bravery and intrepidity. On the breaking out of the Spaniſh war, he was given the command of five ſhips, deſtined to attack the Spaniards in the South Sea. His departure was, however, unaccountably deferred till after the proper ſeaſon. He ſailed about the middle of September, 1740, and in the moſt tempeſtuous weather arrived in the latitude of Cape Horn; and after a moſt dreadful paſſage of forty days, he doubled that dangerous cape in March, 1741, loſing four or five men in a day by the ſcurvy. He at length arrived in the Centurion, and was joined by the Trial ſloop, off Juan Fernandes, in June, when his men, being ſo diſabled with that fatal diſeaſe, that it was with the greateſt difficulty they got on ſhore, he himſelf generouſly ſet an example to the officers, in carrying and aſſiſting the ſick. He was ſoon after joined by the Anna pink, and the Glouceſter man of war. The far greater part of the men were recovered, and the ſhips refitted in that delightful iſland, which he left in September. He then took ſeveral prizes from the Spaniards, and burnt the town of Paita, which the governor refuſed to ranſom. His behaviour to the priſoners of both ſexes was full of humanity, and filled the Spaniards with amazement. He ſtayed on the coaſt of America till May, 1742. He then croſſed the Pacific Ocean, in the Centurion only, the other veſſels having been deſtroyed. The ſcurvy broke out afreſh, but his crew recovered in the delightful iſland of Tinian, where he happily landed. He ſailed from thence in October, for China, ſtayed there till the beginning of 1743, then returned to the Philippine Iſlands, to wait the galleon, which he met with on the 20th of June, and took her. Having ſold that veſſel in China, he ſet ſail for England, with an immenſe treaſure, in December, 1743; and on the 15th of June, 1744, he arrived at Spithead, having failed in a fog through the midſt of a French fleet then cruizing in the channel.

In a ſhort time after his return, he was appointed rear-admiral of the blue, and one of the lords of the admiralty. The next year he was made rear-admiral of the white, and the following year vice-admiral of the blue, at which time he was choſen to repreſent the borough of Heydon in parliament. In 1747, being on board the Prince George of ninety guns, in company with admiral Warren, and twelve other ſhips, he intercepted, off Cape Finiſterre, a powerful fleet, bound from France to the Eaſt and Weſt-Indies; when, by his valour and conduct, he again enriched himſelf and his officers, and at the ſame time ſtrengthened the Britiſh navy, by taking ſix men of war, and four Eaſt-Indiamen, not one of them eſcaping. On this occaſion, M. Jonquiere, on preſenting his ſword to the conqueror, ſaid, Monſieur, vous avez vaincu l' Invincible, & la Gloire vous ſuit. Sir, you have conquered the Invincible, and Glory follows you, pointing to the ſhips, named the Invincible and the Glory, he had taken. For his ſignal ſervices, his late late Majeſty created him Baron of Soberton, in Hants. The ſame year he was appointed vice-admiral of the red, and on the death of Sir John Norris, was made vice-admiral of England. In 1748 he was made admiral of the blue; he was afterwards appointed firſt lord of the admiralty, and was at length made admiral and commander in chief of his Majeſty's forces. He died ſuddenly, after having been walking in his garden, at his ſeat at Moor-Park, in Hertfordſhire, on the 6th of June, 1762. He was of a calm, cool, and ſteady diſpoſition, but is ſaid to have been frequently a dupe at play. His voyage round the world has been tranſlated into moſt of the European languages. Though it is printed under the name of his chaplain, it was compoſed under his lordſhip's own inſpection, and from the materials he himſelf furniſhed, by the ingenious Mr. Benjamin Robins.

ANSPACH (the marquiſate of) is a ſmall territory of Franconia, in Germany, bounded on the north by the biſhoprick of Wartſburg and by that of Bamberg, which likewiſe lies to the weſt; the earldoms of Holach and Oeting, with the biſhoprick of Aichſtet, lie on the ſouth; and the palatinate of Bavaria and the territory of Nuremberg on the eaſt. The country is fruitful, interſperſed with woods, which render it agreeable for hunting. Beſides the city of Anſpach, which is the capital, the chief towns are Kreglin, Swaſbach, Kreilſheim, Rot, and Waſſer-Truding.

ANSPACH is a ſmall, but pretty town, it is very well built, and has ſeveral churches. It is walled round, but has no other fortifications. In the palace, there is a remarkable cabinet of curioſities. It is ſeated on a river of the ſame name, twenty-eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Nuremberg. Long. 10. 42. E. Lat. 49. 14. N.

ANSTRUTHER, a parliament town in Scotland, ſeated on the ſouth-eaſt coaſt of the ſhire of Fife forty-five miles north-eaſt of Edinburgh. Long 2 25. W. Lat 56. 15. N.

ANTÆUS, in fabulous hiſtory, a giant of Libya, the ſon of Neptune and Terra. He was of an immenſe ſtature, and having formed the deſign of erecting a temple to Neptune of mens' ſculls, forced all he met to wreſtle with him, and then ſtrangled them. At laſt he challenged Hercules, who flung him thrice, and thought each time he had killed him; but on his touching the ground, he renewed his ſtrength; when Hercules, perceived this, he held him up in the air, and ſqueezed him to death.

ANTE, a river of France, in the government of Normandy, that riſes beyond Falaiſe, and after a courſe of four miles, falls into the Vire.

ANTEGO, or ANTIGUA, one of the Caribbee iſlands inhabited by the Engliſh, is about ſixty miles in circumference, and contains five pariſhes, four of which are towns, viz St John's Town the capital, Falmouth, Parham, and Bridge-Town. The name of the remaining pariſh is St. Peter's. In 1707, it was ſaid to contain eight thouſand whites and twenty-four thouſand blacks. The inhabitants make about ſixteen thouſand hogſheads of ſugar every year, but not half ſo much rum, and plant but very little tobacco. Their chief inconvenience is the want of water, which obliges them to ſave as much rain-water as they can, and to fetch freſh water from the other iſlands. There are ſeveral good harbours, but dangerous to ſail into without a pilot, on account of the rocks. There were ſome Engliſh families ſettled here ſo early as 1536; but they did not make any figure till 1680. In 1736, the Negroes deſigned to riſe and make themſelves maſters of it, which would have been effected, if the plot had not been timely diſcovered. Many of the ring-leaders were puniſhed with death in different manners. The weather is hotter here than at Barbadoes, and the ſoil is ſandy; however they have the ſame animals as in the other iſlands, with very great plenty of fowl and black cattle; and wild cinnamon grows in the lower parts of the iſland. Long. 62. 5. W. Lat. 17. 30. N.

ANTENOR, a Trojan prince, who lived at the time of the ſiege of Troy. He is ſaid to be the founder of Padua; but this ſuppoſition is without any foundation.

ANTEQUIERA, a handſome large city of Spain, in the kingdom of Granada, ſeated partly in a plain and partly upon a hill. The higheſt part of all is taken up by the caſtle royal and the houſes of the nobility. It was built by the Moors, who having a deſign to make a ſtrong city, built a caſtle upon an eminence at its extremity, which they fortified as well as they could, with iron gates and othe works, in their manner, and built that part of the city-wall which regards the mountains, but the Chriſtians built the reſt. Within the incloſure of the citadel, there is an arſenal, which contains a very great quantity of antique arms amaſſed by the Moors. The lower part of the city is inhabited by huſbandmen and mechanics, who bring in a conſiderable revenue. The land about it is very fruitful, being full of a great many ſprings and brooks. In the mountain there is an inexhauſtible quarry of fine ſtone, proper for building; and the waters that gather between the mountains in the winter time is by the heat of the ſun in ſummer turned into ſalt, which is very fine, and ſufficient to ſerve the whole province. There are likewiſe quarries of plaiſter, very proper for building; and when it is powdered and paſſed through a fine ſieve, it ſerves to make large jars and bottles, to keep wine, oil, pickles, and what elſe they pleaſe. Six miles from the city there is a medicinal ſpring, called Fuente de la Piedra, which is good for ſeveral diſeaſes, and particularly the gravel. It is thirty miles north of Malaga. Long. 4. 40. W. Lat. 36. 51. N.

ANTEQUIERA, a town of America, in New Spain, and in the province of Guaxaqua, ſeventy-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Guaxaqua.

ANTEROS, a Grecian by birth, was elected biſhop of Rome on the 23d of November, 235, and died on the 3d of January following.

ANTESIGNANUS (PETER) one of the beſt grammarians in the ſixteenth century. He was born in Languedoc, and publiſhed a Greek Grammar, and many other works

ANTHEMIUS, a celebrated architect, able ſculptor, and learned mathematician, was born at Tralles, and flouriſhed in the ſixth century, under the emperor Juſtinian.

ANTHERMUS, a famous ſculptor, born in the iſle of Chios, was the ſon of Micciades, and grandſon to Malas, who were both of them ſculptors.

ANTHOINE (NICHOLAS) was born at Brieu in Lorrain, and educated amongſt the Jeſuits, but afterwards turned Proteſtant, and at length embraced Judaiſm, for which he was ſtrangled and burnt at Geneva, in 1632.

ANTHONY, St. See ANTONY.

ANTHONY, MARK. See ANTONIUS MARCUS.

ANTHONY, or ANTONY, (Dr. FRANCIS) a learned phyſician and chemiſt of the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth centuries, was born on the 16th of April, 1550, and educated at Cambridge, where he applied himſelf to the theory and practice of chemiſtry; and, on his coming to London in 1598, publiſhed a treatiſe on the excellence of a medicine drawn from gold, which he called his aurum potabile; but not having taken the neceſſary precaution of obtaining a licence from the college of phyſicians, he was ſummoned, in 1600, before the preſident and cenſors, when, confeſſing that he had cured twenty perſons without a licence, he was fined and impriſoned; and afterwards perſiſting in the practice of phyſic, he again ſuffered the ſame effects of their diſpleaſure. He wrote ſeveral defences in Latin of his aurum potabile, and at length obtained a very extenſive and beneficial practice. He was a man of unaffected piety, untainted probity, modeſty, and unbounded charity. He died May 26, 1623.

ANTHONY (ST.) the moſt northern of the Cape de Verd iſlands, ſeven miles from St. Vincent. Here are two mountains, one of which is ſaid to be as high as the Pike of Teneriff. There is one village of twenty houſes, inhabited by blacks and a few white people, who have a governor, a captain, a prieſt, and a ſchool-maſter. The inhabitants of the whole iſland are about five hundred. Long. 17. 27. W. Lat. 18. 0. N.

ANTIBES, an ancient maritime town of Provence, in France, with a good port and caſtle. It is ſeated on the Mediterranean, about fifteen miles ſouth of Nice, and is remarkable for its monuments of antiquity, and the land about it produces excellent fruit. It is nine miles weſt of Nice, nine ſouth of Vence, ten ſouth-eaſt of Graſſe, and four hundred and forty-two ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 7. 5. E. Lat. 43. 35. N.

ANTICOSTE, an iſland lying before the mouth of the river St. Lawrence, in North-America. It is a barren place, and is ſubject to Great Britain. Long. 64. 16. W. Lat. from 49. to 52. N.

ANTIGINES, one of Alexander the Great's captains, had the ſecond of the prizes which that prince diſtributed among eight of the braveſt captains in his army. He delivered up Eumenes to Antigonus, who, after paying him the reward of his perfidy, ordered him to be burnt alive in an iron cage.

ANTIGONUS, one of the moſt brave and prudent of Alexander's generals, was made king of Aſia after that prince's death, three hundred and twenty-four years before Chriſt. He conquered Eumenes, and after he was betrayed and delivered up to him put him to death. He gained a great victory over Ptolomy Lagus, built the city of Atigonia, and was killed in a battle againſt Caſſander, Seleucus, and Lyſimachus, three hundred and one years before Chriſt, aged eighty. To one that wondered at the goodneſs of his temper in his old age, he ſaid, "I ought to preſerve by mildneſs what I have acquired by ſtrength." He was accuſtomed to ſay, that "Royalty is an honourable ſervitude; "and that if a man knew the weight of a crown, he would "be afraid to put it on his head."

ANTIGONUS, king of the Jews, and the ſon of Ariſtobulus II. having made an alliance with the king of the Parthians, took Jeruſalem, and cut off the ears of Hircanus, that he might be be incapable of enjoying the office of high-prieſt; but Herod, Hircanus's brother, having retaken Jeruſalem, ſent Antigonus to Mark Antony, who cut off his head, and put an end to the Aſmonean family, which had reigned one hundred and twenty-ſix years.

ANTINOUS, the favourite of the emperor Adrian, was born at Bithynus, in Bithynia. Some authors ſay, that he gave the emperor the greateſt mark of love that was poſſible; in ſhort, that he died for him. Others aſſure us, that he was drowned in the Nile, during Adrian's reſidence in Egypt, about the year 132 of the Chriſtian æra. However, the emperor not only ſhed tears at his death, but had temples and altars erected to him, and had the notion propagated, that Antinous gave forth oracles.

ANTIO, a promontory of Italy, in St. Peter's Patrimony, near which is an harbour lately made. It takes its name from the ancient city Antium, whoſe ruins extend over a long tract of land.

ANTIOCH, now ANTHAKIAH, an ancient and celebrated city of Syria, in Aſia, of which it was formerly the capital; but at preſent it is fallen from its ancient grandeur. It was founded by Seleucus Nicanor, and was the place of reſidence of ſeveral emperors, who took pleaſure in adorning it. Abou Obeida, general of the calif Omar, took it from the Greeks in 638; Godfrey of Bulloign took it from the Arabs in 1097; the ſultan Bandochdari retook it, by aſſault, in 1269, the Turks have poſſeſſed it ſince Selim I. deprived the ſultans of it. It is ſeated on the river Aſi, formerly called the Orontes When you advance towards it, on this river, it ſtill yields a ſurpriſing and delightful ſight; for it appears like a city in a foreſt, and a foreſt in a city, from the vaſt number of plantanes, poplars, ſycamores, and other trees, in and about it, as well as the fruit-trees that grow in the gardens, and the uninhabited parts of the town. Some of the walls are yet ſtanding, which are of a prodigious thickneſs. It was flanked with four hundred ſquare towers, ſome of which ſtill remain. Not many years ago, the houſes were only a few little huts ſcattered here and there among the ruins; but, by order of the Porte, the caſtle has been repaired, and ſome houſes built, which has invited Turks, Greeks, and Jews, to come and ſettle in it. It is above forty miles ſouth-weſt of Aleppo. Long. 37. 5. E. Lat. 36. 20. N.

ANTIOCHETTA, a town of Turky in Aſia, with the ſee of a Greek biſhop. It is in Caramania, over-againſt the iſland of Cyprus. Long. 32. 15. E. Lat. 36. 42. N.

ANTIOCHUS SOTOR, or THE SAVIOUR, king of Syria, and the ſon of Seleucus Nicanor, married Stratonice his mother-in-law, in the life-time of Seleucus, who had married her in his old age, and gave her freely to Antiochus, who was almoſt dying for her. He defeated the Bithynians, Macedonians, and Galatians, and died two hundred and ſixty-one years before Chriſt.

ANTIOCHUS THEOS, or THE GOD, king of Syria, made war againſt Ptolomy Philadelphus, and afterwards put an end to it by marrying Berenice, though he had already two ſons by Laodicea; but this lady, in revenge, poiſoned him, two hundred and forty ſix years before Chriſt; and by the artifices of a youth named Arteman, cauſed Antiochus, her ſon to be placed on the throne. At length ſhe poiſoned Berenice, with the ſon that princeſs had by Antiochus; but her cruelty did not remain unpuniſhed; for ſhe was killed in the war which Ptolomy Evergetes undertook in favour of his ſiſter Berenice.

ANTIOCHUS THE GREAT, king of Syria, ſucceeded his brother Seleucus Ceraunes, two hundred and twenty-three years before Chriſt. He was defeated in a bloody battle, by Ptolomy Philopater, near Raphia, two hundred and ſeventeen years before Chriſt. Some time after he took Sardes, attacked the Medes and Parthians, conquered Judea, Phœnicia, and Cœloſyria, and formed the deſign of reducing Smyrna, Lampſacus, and other cities of Aſiatic Greece. Theſe cities implored the aſſiſtance of the Romans, who ſent ambaſſadors to oblige him to reſtore to Ptolemy Philadelphus the countries he had taken from him, and to ſuffer the free cities of Greece to enjoy the bleſſings of peace. Antiochus being enraged, at the ſolicitation of Hannibal, declared war againſt the Romans; but was defeated by Acilius Glabrio, and loſt a great battle againſt Scipio Aſiaticus, near Magneſia; in ſhort, the Romans granted him a peace on very diſgraceful conditions. At laſt, finding his exchequer low, and going to recruit it with the plunder of the temple of Belus, he was killed by the rabble, who came to ſave the ſacred treaſure, about one hundred and eighty-ſeven years before Chriſt, and was ſucceeded by Seleucus Philopater.

ANTIOCHUS EPIPHANES, or THE ILLUSTRIOUS, uſurped the throne of Syria from his nephew Demetrius, one hundred and ſeventy-five years before Chriſt, and attempted to take Egypt from his nephew Ptolemy Philometor, but was repulſed. He depoſed Onias, the high-prieſt of the Jews, and beſieged and took Jeruſalem, one hundred and ſeventy-years before Chriſt, when he prophaned the temple of God, offered ſacrifices in it to Jupiter Olympus, carried away the ſacred veſſels, and committed the moſt monſtrous and horrid acts of cruelty. At his return to Antioch, one hundred and ſixty-ſeven years before Chriſt, he put to death the ſeven brothers, the Macchabees, with old Eleazer. However, Matthias and Judas Macchabeus defeated his armies; and he himſelf was routed by the Elymeans, and obliged to return to Babylon, where he was ſeized with a dreadful diſeaſe, and died in the greateſt inward agonies, one hundred and ſixty-four years before the Chriſtian æra. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Antiochus Eupator.

ANTIOCHUS EUPATOR, king of Syria, one hundred and ſixty-four years before Chriſt. By the advice of Lyſias, his ſon in-law, he entered Judea with an army of eighty thouſand foot and eighty elephants, but was defeated by Judas Macchabeus. He was killed by Demetrius, his couſin-german, one hundred and ſixty-two years before the Chriſtian æra.

There have been ſeveral other princes of the ſame name.

ANTIOCHUS OF ASCALON, a celebrated Stoic philoſpher, the diſciple of Carneades, the maſter of Cicero, and the friend of Lucullus and Brutus.

ANTIOPE, in fabulous hiſtory, the wife of Lycus, king of Thebes, who being deflowered by Jupiter in the form of a ſatyr, brought forth Amphion and Zethus.

Another Antiope was queen of the Amazons, and with the aſſiſtance of the Scythians, invaded the Athenians, but was vanquiſhed by Theſeus.

ANTIPAROS, an iſland in the Archipelago, over-againſt the iſle of Paros, from whence it is five miles diſtant. It is a rock about fifteen miles in circumference, flat, well cultivated, and produces as much barley as ſerves ſixty or ſeventy families, who inhabit a ſorry village, about a mile from the ſea. For ſpiritual matters it depends on the archbiſhop of Naxia. The inhabitants live upon rabbits, wild pigeons, and fiſh; but as for butcher's meat it is almoſt impoſſible to be had. It is ſubject to the Turks, who treat the inhabitants with great cruelty. This iſland has a wonderful grotto, which ſeems to afford a full proof of the vegetation of ſtone. Long. 25. 30. E. Lat. 37. 40. N.

ANTIPATER, the diſciple of Ariſtotle, and one of Alexander the Great's generals, was a man of abilities, and fond of the ſciences. He brought the revolted Thracians to reaſon, and defeated the Lacedæmonians, three hundred and thirty years before Chriſt; but was accuſed of poiſoning Alexander. He died three hundred and twenty-one years before the Chriſtian æra.

ANTIPATER, king of Macedon, and brother of Philip, ſucceeded Caſſander, two hundred and ninety-eight years before Chriſt. He cauſed Theſſalonica, his mother, to be killed, and was put to death by Lyſimachus.

ANTIPATER, an Idumean of illuſtrious birth, and poſſeſſed of great riches and abilities, taking advantage of the confuſion into which the two brothers Hyrcanus and Ariſtobulus plunged Judea, by their conteſt for the office of high prieſt, took ſuch meaſures as to gain Hyrcanus that office, and under his government to obtain the abſolute direction of all affairs, while his application to buſineſs and great abilities made him ſo conſiderable, that he was honoured as much as if he had been inveſted with the royal authority in form: but he was at laſt poiſoned by a Jew, named Malachus, forty-three years before the Chriſtian æra. He left among his other children, the famous Herod, king of the Jews.

ANTIPATER, of Sidon, a celebrated Stoic philoſopher and poet, about one hundred and thirty ſix years before Chriſt. We have ſeveral of his epigrams in the Anthologia.

ANTIPATER (L. COELIUS) a Latin hiſtorian, who lived about one hundred and twenty-four years before Chriſt. The emperor Adrian had ſo ſtrange a taſte as to prefer him to Salluſt.

ANTIPHILES, a celebrated Egyptian painter, the rival of Apelles, was particularly admired for his picture of a youth ſtooping down and blowing a fire he was kindling.

ANTIPHON, a famous Athenian orator, ſurnamed the Rhamnaſian, from his being born at Rhamnus, in Attica. He was the firſt who gave precepts in relation to eloquence, and reduced it to an art. He had Thucydides for his diſciple, and died about four hundred and eleven years before Chriſt.

ANTISTHENES, a Greek philoſopher, and founder of the ſect of the Cynics, was born at Athens. Laertius tells us, that there were ten volumes of his works. He was a man of great auſterity, and deſired the Gods rather to afflict him with madneſs than to give him an attachment to ſenſual pleaſures; and Theopompus commends him above all the diſciples of Socrates; as a man of ſo agreeable and charming a converſation, that he could draw over any perſon to whatever ever he pleaſed. He flouriſhed about three hundred and twenty-four years before the Chriſtian æra.

There were three other perſons of this name; one a philoſopher of the ſchool of Heraclitus; another an Epheſian; and the third an hiſtorian of Rhodes.

ANTIVARI, a ſtrong town of Dalmatia, in Turky in Europe, is ſeated on a rock in the gulph of Venice, ten miles north of Dulcigno. Long. 29. 15. E. Lat. 43. 0 N.

ANTONELLO OF MESSINA, a celebrated painter, who travelled from his own country to Flanders, towards the beginning of the fifteenth century, to learn the ſecret of painting in oil of John ab Eyk, commonly called John of Bruges; and returning to Sicily, and afterwards to Venice, was the firſt who practiſed and taught it in Italy. He died in the forty-ninth year of his age.

ANTONGIL, a great bay on the eaſt ſide of the iſland of Madagaſcar. Some ſay it is the beſt in the world for its largeneſs and the goodneſs of its bottom, the ſafety of the veſſels, and the fruitfulneſs of the earth which ſurrounds it. Long. 50. 0. Lat. 13. 0. S.

ANTONIA, the daughter of Marcus Antonius and Octavia, and one of the moſt beautiful and virtuous princeſſes of her time, married Druſus, the ſon of Livia, and brother of Tiberius, by whom ſhe had Germanicus, an accompliſhed prince, Claudius, who was afterwards emperor, and Livia, who rendered herſelf infamous by her crimes. She loſt her huſband while ſhe was yet young, and could never be prevailed upon to marry again, and thus gave an excellent example of continence in a debauched court. Antonia diſcovered to Tiberius the deſigns of Sejanus. She had at firſt ſome ſhare in the management of affairs under Caligula, her grandſon; but he at length gave her ſo much vexation, that ſhe died A. D. 38. It is probable, that ſhe was poiſoned by that unnatural prince.

ANTONIA, the younger ſiſter of the preceding, was wife to Lucius Domitius Ænobarbus, by whom ſhe had a ſon named Cneus Domitius, who was the father of the emperor Nero, and two daughters.

ANTONIA, the daughter of Claudius, whom Nero put to death, becauſe ſhe refuſed to marry him after the death of Poppea.

ANTONIANO (SILVIO) a very learned cardinal, born at Rome in 1540. It is ſaid, that, at ten years of age, he made verſes upon any ſubject that was propoſed to him, which were ſo proper and excellent, though pronounced extempore, that even a man of genius could not have compoſed as good without a great deal of care and time; and that he wrote with ſuch care and fluency, that he hardly ever made a blot or eraſure. He wrote, De Chriſtiana Puerorum Educatione, and ſeveral other works. He died in the ſixty-third year of his age.

ANTONIDES VANDER GOES (JOHN) an eminent Dutch poet, born at Goes, in Zealand, April 3, 1647. He wrote a Dutch tragedy, intitled Bellona aan Bond, i. e. Bellona chained; a poem, intitled the River Y; and ſeveral other works, which were printed in quarto, at Amſterdam, in 1714. He died in the flower of his age, in 1684.

ANTONIN, a ſmall town of France, in Rouergue. The fortifications are demoliſhed. It is ſeated on the banks of the river Aveirou. Long. 0. 55. E. Lat. 44. 10. N.

ANTONINUS PIUS (TITUS AURELIUS FULVIUS, or FULVUS BOIONIUS) the Roman emperor, was the ſon of Aurelius Fulvius, and was born at Lanuvium, in Italy, A. D. 86. He was made conſul in 120; and being adopted by Adrian in 138, and that emperor dying the ſame year, he was raiſed to the throne, and had the title of Pius given him by the ſenate. His conduct was throughout great and noble; he was careful of the public revenue, but, upon all proper occaſions, was extremely generous in the diſtribution of his own eſtate; he never engaged in war, but from abſolute neceſſity, having an averſion to the ſhedding of the blood even of his enemies; he was more intent upon preſerving the bounds of his empire, than of extending them; and often made uſe of Scipio's expreſſion, that he rather choſe to ſave one citizen, than to kill a thouſand enemies; he was ſo far from publiſhing any edict againſt the Chriſtians, that he even wrote ſome letters in their favour. This great and good emperor died regretted by all the world, on the 7th of March, 161, aged ſeventy-five.

ANTONINUS PHILOSOPHUS (MARCUS AURELIUS) the Roman emperor, was born at Rome, on the 26th of April, 121. Upon the death of Antoninus Pius, he was obliged by the ſenate to take upon him the goverment, in the managment of which he made Lucius Verus his colleague, which was the firſt time that the Romans ſaw their empire poſſeſſed by two princes in conjunction. Marcus Antoninus endeavoured by all proper methods to gain the love of the people, and Lucius Verus acted with the utmoſt modeſty and deference to his judgment.

The happineſs the empire enjoyed under this and the former emperor was interrupted, in the year 162, by a dreadful inundation of the Tiber, which deſtroyed a vaſt number of cattle, and occaſioned a famine at Rome. This calamity was followed by the Parthian war; and at the ſame time, the Catti ravaged Germany and Rhætia. The Romans having defeated the Parthians, who were obliged to abandon Meſopotamia, he and his colleague, in 166, had a triumph at Rome, and were honoured with the title of Fathers of their Country. That year was fatal, on account of a terrible peſtilence and famine: in that year likewiſe, the Marcomanni, and many other people of Germany, took up arms againſt the Romans; but the two emperors marching againſt them in perſon, obliged the Germans to ſue for peace. The war was, however, renewed the year following, and the two emperors marched again in perſon; but Lucius Verus, being ſeized with an apoplectic fit, died at Albinum.

In 174, when Albinus was vigorouſly carrying on the war againſt the Germans, a very extraordinary event is ſaid to have happened, which, according to Dion Caſſius, was as follows: Antoninus's army was blocked up by the Quadi, where there was no poſſibility of procuring water; they were worn out with fatigue and wounds, oppreſſed with heat and thirſt, and incapable of retiring or engaging the enemy; while they were in this ſituation, the ſky was in an inſtant covered with clouds, and there fell a vaſt quantity of rain; but when the Roman army were about to quench their thirſt, the enemy ruſhed upon them with ſuch fury, that they muſt have been defeated, had it not been for a ſhower of hail, accompanied with a ſtorm of thunder and lightning, which fell upon the enemy without hurting the Romans, who by this means gained the victory. The Pagans, as well as the Chriſtians, acknowledged the truth of this miraculous event, but aſcribed it to different cauſes: on Antoninus's pillar it is aſcribed to Jupiter, the God of rain and thunder; but the Chriſtians affirmed, that God granted this favour at the prayer of the Chriſtian ſoldiers in the Roman army, who are ſaid to have compoſed the twelfth legion; and we are told, that, as a mark of diſtinction, they received from Antoninus the title of the Thundering Legion.

Antoninus diſtinguiſhed himſelf, during his whole reign, by his benevolence, his mildneſs and condeſcenſion, he remitted the debts due to himſelf, made noble preſents to ſeveral cities, corrected many enormities, and introduced ſeveral excellent regulations. This excellent prince died on the 17th of March, A. D. 180. His Meditations, which he wrote in Greek, in twelve books, have been greatly admired by all good judges; and there have been ſeveral editions of them in Greek and Latin. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Commodus.

ANTONIO (ST.) one of the Cape de Verd ſlands, on the weſtern coaſt of Africa, fifteen miles from St Vincent. It is full of very high mountains, from whence proceed ſtreams of very good water, which render the land very fruitful. The principal town is ſeated among the mountains, and there are alſo ſome villages. Long. 26. 0. W. Lat. 18. 4. N.

ANTONIO (NICHOLAS) knight of the order of St. James, and canon of Seville, was born in that city, in the year 1617, and did great honour to the Spaniſh nation by his Bibliotheca of Spaniſh Writers, printed in two volumes, folio.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS) was one of the greateſt orators that ever appeared at Rome. His modeſty and other qualifications as a man of virtue, rendered him no leſs dear to a great number of illuſtrious perſons who were his friends, than his eloquence made him the admiration of the whole world. He was, however, unfortunately killed during thoſe bloody confuſions raiſed at Rome by Marius and Cinna. He was diſcovered in the place where he hid himſelf, and ſoldiers were ſent to diſpatch him; but his manner of addreſſing them had ſuch an effect, that none but he who commanded them, and had not heard his diſcourſe, had the cruelty to kill him. This happened ninety years before the Chriſtian æra.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS) eldeſt ſon to the preceding, had the ſurname of Creticus. He never raiſed himſelf beyond the pretorſhip; but executed that office with an uncommon extent of authority. He was guilty of a great deal of extortion: but the war of Crete, (the ſucceſs of which he imagined would be ſo eaſy, that he carried fewer arms in his fleet than chains for the conquered) proved ſo unfortunate, that he fell ſick at the diſappointment, and died.

ANTONIUS (CAIUS) brother to the preceding, was a man of the moſt irregular conduct. He was raiſed to the conſulſhip in preference to Cataline, by a very few voices; and governed Macedonia for three years, but with ſuch violence and extortion, that the ſenate, offended at his conduct, ſent a ſucceſſor in his place, and at his return to Rome, he was accuſed by Marcus Cælius, and though Cicero undertook his defence, was convicted and baniſhed.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS) the triumvir, commonly called by Engliſh writers MARK ANTONY, was the ſon of Marcus Antonius Creticus. He was very handſome in his youth, and adorned with many amiable qualities; but Curio, who loved him, plunged him into all manner of vices, and afterwards paid the debts he had contracted by his debaucheries. He alſo entertained a friendſhip for Clodius; but ſoon growing diſguſted with him, went into Greece, where he exercited his body in military labour, and his mind in the ſtudy of eloquence. He was at length ſent by Gabinius againſt Ariſtobulus, whom he conquered and took priſoner; and afterwards followed Gabinius into Egypt, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his clemency and valour. At his return to Rome, he, in conjunction with Curio, embraced Cæſar's party, and Marcus Antonius went with Quintius Caſſius, in the diſguiſe of ſlaves, to Cæſar's camp in Gaul, and adviſed him to march into Italy. Cæſar having made himſelf maſter of Rome, rewarded Marcus Antonius with the government of Italy, and at the battle of Pharſalia, gave him the command of the left wing of his army. The following year, Cæſar being created dictator, after the defeat of Pompey, made Marcus Antonius general of the horſe; and five years after, his colleague in the conſulſhip. One day, when Cæſar was celebrating the Lupercalia, cloathed in his triumphal garments, Antonius ran up to him and placed a crown on his head, as though he offered him the kingdom; but Cæſar ſeemed to reject it, yet Antonius perſiſted in offering it for ſome time; but at laſt deſiſted, and this incident ſeems to have haſtened Cæſar's death, who was aſſaſſinated the ſame year. Antonius then aſſembled the ſenate, when reading Cæſar's will, and ſhewing his bloody robe to the people, he harangued with ſuch ſucceſs, as to excite a ſedition. His power now encreaſed every day; but having quarrelled with Octavius, who was favoured by the people, he retired to Gaul. The ſenate ſuſpecting that he aſpired to the throne, ſent Octavius and the conſuls C. Panſa and A. Hirtius againſt him. Antonius however defeated them near Mutina, and was afterwards defeated in his turn; but notwithſtanding his defeat, he had the addreſs to bring over the ſoldiers of Lepidus to his party; he alſo brought Plancus to embrace his intereſt; and having raiſed ſix legions in Gaul, marched into Italy with ſeventeen legions, and ten thouſand horſe. So ſudden a change obliged Auguſtus and Lepidus to enter into a league with him, and thus was formed the celebrated triumvirate, that became fatal to ſo many great men, and among others to Cicero, to whoſe death Octavius conſented: as did Marcus Antonius to that of Lucius Cæſar his uncle; and Lepidus to that of Paulus his brother. The triumvirate having ſufficiently confirmed their power, reſolved on the death of Brutus and Caſſius. Octavius and Antonius marched againſt them into Macedonia, and defeated them, when Caſſius was ſlain by Antonius's order, and Brutus killed himſelf. After their death they divided the empire among themſelves: Auguſtus had Europe; Lepidus, Africa; and Marcus Antonius, Greece and Aſia; where he abandoned himſelf to debauchery, and conceived a violent paſſion for Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. During his abſence, Fulvia, his wife, quarrelled with Octavius, which occaſioned a new rupture, however, this war was but juſt begun when Fulvia died, and her death produced a freſh union, one of the conditions of which, was, that Antonius ſhould marry Octavia, the ſiſter of Auguſtus. Antonius, ſtill paſſionately in love with Cleopatra, left his children, and the virtuous Octavia, to go to Cleopatra in Egypt, and Octavia left Rome to bring back her huſband to his duty; but Antonius ordered her to ſtop at Athens. This contempt, and other motives, rekindled the war, which was terminated by the celebrated naval battle of Actium, thirty-one years before the Chriſtian æra. Cleopatra, who had brought ſixty veſſels to Antonius's aſſiſtance, fled; Antonius followed her, and this loſt the victory. The next year Auguſtus entered Egypt, and firſt ſeized Peluſium, Antonius fell on his cavalry, and defeated them; but he was at length conquered: at laſt, Cleopatra cauſing him to be told that ſhe had killed herſelf, he ran a ſword through his body; but not dying immediately, he heard that Cleopatra was ſtill alive, when cauſing himſelf to be carried to her, he died in her arms, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age. See CLEOPATRA, &c.

Antonius had great qualities; he was a brave and excellent general; a tender and generous friend; was eloquent, and capable of ſupporting the inclemencies of the ſeaſon; but his debaucheries, and fooliſh fondneſs for Cleopatra, were the cauſes of all his misfortunes.

ANTONIUS CAIUS, brother to the former, ſerved under Julius Cæſar in the war againſt Pompey, and was obliged, for want of proviſions, to ſurrender himſelf to the enemy, with the troops in Illyrium, under his command. After Cæſar's death he was taken priſoner by Brutus, who at firſt treated him with great reſpect; but afterwards, finding that he attempted to corrupt his army, and draw them over to the other party, he put him to death.

ANTONIUS (LUCIUS) brother to the former, had all the vices of his brother the triumvir, without any of his virtues. He was conſul the ſeven hundred and thirteenth year of Rome; and triumphed the firſt day of his conſulſhip, for a victory he pretended to have gained over ſome of the inhabitants of the Alps. Afterwards promiſing to aboliſh the triumvirate, he filled the whole city with joy, and was declared imperator; but marching againſt Octavius, he ſhut himſelf up in Peluſium, where he was at length obliged to ſurrender himſelf for want of proviſions; but Octavius gave him his liberty.

ANTONIUS (MARCUS JULIUS) ſon to the triumvir, by Fulvia, ſtudied under L. Craſſitius, the grammarian, and wrote a poem in heroic verſe, in twelve books, entitled Diomedeæ, with ſeveral treatiſes in proſe, and to him Horace addreſſed the ſecond ode of his fourth book. He was in great favour with Auguſtus, who advanced him from one poſt to another till he raiſed him to the conſulſhip; but he was very ungrateful to his benefactor, for he was one of the firſt who debauched his daughter Julia, which added to the ſuſpicion of his being engaged in a conſpiracy, occaſioned his being condemned to ſuffer death. Some hiſtorians ſay, that he killed himſelf, to prevent the infamy of this ſentence.

ANTONIUS (PRIMUS MARCUS) one of the greateſt generals of his time, was born at Toulouſe, in Gallia Narbonenſis, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by gaining ſeveral great victories over Vitellius, for Veſpaſian, near Cremona, A. D. 69, and afterwards gave ſignal proofs of his courage and conduct in reducing that city, and placing the crown on Veſpaſian's head; but his plundering and burning Cremona is an inconteſtible proof of his avarice and cruelty.

ANTONIUS GALATEUS, ſo called from his being born at Gallatina, a village in Italy, in the territory of Otranto, was a philoſopher, phyſician, poet, and geographer, and one of the moſt able men in the fifteenth century. We have ſeveral of his Latin and Italian poems, a Deſcription of Gallipoly, a Panegyric on the Gout, and other valuable works. He died about the year 1490.

ANTONIUS (NEBRISSENSIS) born at Lebrixa, in Andaluſia, in 1444, was one of thoſe who have moſt contributed to the revival of learning. After he had taught in the univerſity of Salamanca for twenty years, cardinal Ximenes fixed him in his univerſity of Alcala, where he continued till his death. He wrote, 1. Commentaries on many ancient Authors. 2. Several Lexicons. 3. The Hiſtory of Ferdinand and Iſabella, and a great number of other works. He died on the 11th of July, 1522, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

ANTONY (MARC). See ANTONIUS MARCUS, the triumvir.

ANTONY (St) the founder of the monaſtic order, was born at the village of Coma in Egypt, in 251, and was left a very great fortune by his parents. It is ſaid, that one day entering a church, and hearing that paſſage read, in which Chriſt ſays to the rich young man, "Go and ſell all that "thou haſt, and give it to the poor; then come and follow "me, and thou ſhalt have treaſure in heaven;" he inſtantly reſolved to quit the world, to divide his eſtate among his neighbours, to give the value of his moveables to the poor, and to retire into ſolitude: and accordingly built ſeveral monaſteries in the deſarts, and applied himſelf to prayer and meditation. The writers of his life ſay, that he was aſſaulted by divers temptations, and that the devils appeared before him under different frightful forms, and were very liberal of their blows. He died January 17, 356, aged one hundred and five.

ANTONY (St.) of Padua, was born at Liſbon, in 1195, and after leading a very auſtere life in his youth, at length embraced the order of St. Francis. Having embarked on board a ſhip, in order to convert the infidels of Africa, he was caſt away on the coaſt of Italy, where he ſtudied divinity, and preached with reputation. He at length went to Montpellier, Toulouſe, and Padua, ſettled in the laſt mentioned city, and died there on the 13th of June, 1231, aged thirty-ſix. The beſt edition of his works is that of 1641.

ANTONY, king of Navarre, before called the duke of Vendôme, came to the court of France after the death of king Francis II. and was declared lieutenant-general of the kingdom, during the minority of Charles IX. He then embraced the Catholic religion, and in conjunction with the duke of Guiſe, and the conſtable Montmorenci, formed that union which was called by the proteſtants, the triumvirate. He commanded the army at the taking of Rouen, in 1562, and died of his wounds at Andeli, on the 24th of November in the ſame year.

ANTONY OF MESSINA, alſo called ANTONELLO, a famous painter, born at Meſſina, was the firſt who taught in Italy the art of painting in oil; a ſecret he had learnt from John de Bruges. He flouriſhed about the year 1430.

There are many other eminent perſons of the name of Antony or Anthony, which may be found under their ſurnames.

ANTRIM, the moſt north-eaſt county of the province of Ulſter, in the kingdom of Ireland, is bounded by Londonderry on the weſt, from which it is ſeparated by the river Banne; part of Armagh on the ſouth; the county of Down on on the ſouth-eaſt, and on all the reſt by the ſea. It is forty ſix miles long, and twenty-ſeven broad, but is unequal both ways. Towards the north it has many large bogs and marſhes, but the other parts are pretty populous, and many of the inhabitants are Proteſtants. It is divided into eight baronies, and ſends ten members to parliament, two of which are for the county. There is a remarkable pile of rocks by the ſea-ſide, ſeven miles from Colerain, called the Giants Cauſey. It is eighty feet broad, and twenty feet high, above the reſt of the ſtrand. It conſiſts of many thouſand pillars, moſt of which ſtand perpendicular to the plane of the horizon, and ſo cloſe, that the blade of a knife can be hardly thruſt between them. They are chiefly pentagonal or hexagonal, that is with five or ſix ſides, but ſcarce any of the ſides have an equal breadth. Their diameter is from fifteen to twenty-four inches. They run from the bottom of a high hill into the ſea, nobody knows how far, but for ſix hundred feet in length they are viſible at low water. The chief towns are Antrim, Connor, Carrickfergus, and Belfaſt.

ANTRIM, is a conſiderable market-town and corporation, pleaſantly ſituated on both ſides of the corner of a water, called Lough Neagh, the Six-mile Water. It is united by a handſome bridge, and adorned by a fine park, as alſo a ſtately manſion-houſe. Here is an harbour for boats. Long. 6. 26. W. Lat. 54. 45. N.

ANTWERP, a city of the Auſtrian Netherlands, ſeated on the Scheld, in the duchy of Brabant, and is the capital of a marquiſate of the ſame name. It is a biſhop's ſee, and has very regular fortifications. It is ſeven miles in circumference, it being built in the form of a half moon, and ſurrounded with a beautiful wall, with baſtions faced with ſtone. The wall on the top is two hundred feet broad, and planted on each ſide with rows of trees, between which there are walks, with a moſt delightful proſpect of the adjacent country. The ſtreets are broad and regular, the buildings magnificent, and the whole beautiful and uniform. There are twenty-two ſquares, above two hundred ſtreets, eight great canals, and ſeventy-four bridges. Moſt of the houſes have court-yards and gardens behind. The chief ſtreet is called the Mere, where all the beſt taverns and coffee-houſes are, and the houſes are generally of free-ſtone. It has ſeveral beautiful buildings, and the cathedral church in particular is a noble pile, the ſteeple being one of the fineſt in the world, from whence may be ſeen Ghent, Mechlin, and Louvain. The altars are adorned with fine paintings, ſome of them by Rubens. The Jeſuits church is one of the fineſt in Europe, for its dimenſions, workmanſhip, and paintings. All the inſide is of white marble, intermixed with jaſper, porphyry, and gold; and the cieling is embelliſhed with forty-eight pictures of Rubens. Beſides, the college with its library are well worth ſeeing. Near the ramparts, on the back of the Scheld, ſtands the noble and rich abbey of St. Michael, celebrated for its fine apartments and beautiful refectory. There are ſeveral convents for men and women, particularly one for the Engliſh nuns of St. Tereſa, who never wear linen, nor eat fleſh, but lie upon ſtraw; the grates are ſo diſmal it looks like a priſon. Joining to the ſtreet called the Mere, ſtands the Exchange, the firſt built in Europe, and is the model of the Royal Exchange. It is placed in the centre of four large ſtreets, and the walks on each ſide are ſupported by forty-three pillars of blue marble, but none of them are alike. Underneath there are magazines for the merchants goods; and above, an academy for painting, ſculpture, architecture, and the mathematics. The town-houſe is likewiſe a magnificent ſtructure, built entirely of free ſtone, and has a fine frontiſpiece, adorned with ſeveral ſtatues, a ſmall cupola, and an eagle on the top. The houſe of the Hans Towns is a ſquare ſtone building, with magazines on the top for dry goods, and cellars for wet.

There are eighteen fine gates, eight of which ſtand by the water, with the quays near them, where veſſels are laden and unladen. The citadel is one of the ſtrongeſt and moſt regular in the world. It is of a pentagonal figure, and has five royal angles. The ſituation is on the ſouth ſide of the city, on the banks of the Scheld, and is about a mile in circumference. The French beſieged and took it in 1746.

The markets here are at their proper diſtances, every one being in a ſquare. The fiſh-market by the river-ſide is very ſpacious, but the moſt curious is the Friday-market, where all ſorts of goods, pictures and jewels, are ſold by auction. Antwerp had formerly a moſt flouriſhing trade, but it is now removed to Amſterdam, and other towns of Holland, the Dutch having built forts at the mouth of the Scheld. The city is governed by nine perſons, taken out of the nobility, and as many are nominated by the prefects or maſters of the ſtreets, who, together with eighteen of the principal citizens, make thirty-ſix; theſe are preſented to the prince, who appoints one half of them for a ſtanding ſenate; which afterwards chooſe two burgomaſters, or conſuls; one of whom repreſents the city at the convention of the eſtates, and the other adminiſters juſtice at home, having with the ſenate the cognizance of all cauſes, civil and criminal. The city has alſo a ſheriff, for the apprehending and executing malefactors; and a ſolicitor-general, to proſecute offenders in behalf of the city. The ſenate appoint all inferior officers, and elect another council of twelve, from among the deans, or maſters of the ſeveral trades or companies. At Antwerp you may negotiate bills of exchange for any ſum in any part of Europe. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

ANVARI, or ANVERI, one of the greateſt poets among the Perſians, was born at a village belonging to the city of Abiurd, in Khoraſan, and had the title of Soltan al Khoraſan, or king of Khoraſan, given him on account of the excellence of his poetry. He is conſidered as the firſt writer who corrected the Perſian poetry, by retrenching in his works whatever ſeemed too looſe and free. He died in the year 1200.

ANUBIS, in Pagan mythology, one of the Gods of the Egyptians, repreſented under the form of a man with a dog's head, holding a palm-branch in one hand, and a caduceus, or a wand with two wings on the top, and encircled by two ſerpents, in the other.

ANYTUS, a rhetorician at Athens, the declared enemy of Socrates, who, after the death of that philoſopher, was obliged to fly to Heraclea, where, according to Themiſtius, he was ſtoned to death, about three hundred and thirty-nine years before Chriſt.

AOUSTE, or AOSTE, a city of Italy, in Piedmont, capital of a duchy of the ſame name, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Doria, at the foot of the Alps, and is ſubject to the king of Sardinia. There are ſeveral monuments of the Romans remaining here, particularly a triumphal arch of Auguſtus, almoſt entire. The country about it is fertile in paſtures, and all ſorts of fruits. It is fifty miles from Turin, ſixty-five from Geneva, and thirty-eight from Suza. Long. 7. 33. E. Lat. 45. 38. N.

APALACHIAN MOUNTAINS, more properly called the ALIGANY MOUNTAINS, lie weſt from thoſe parts of the Britiſh plantations of America that are upon the ſea-coaſt, between thirty-ſix and forty-ſix degrees of north latitude. In North Carolina they are two hundred and forty miles from the ſhore, and in New Jerſey about one hundred and eighty.

APATURIA, Απατόρια, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival ſolemnized by the Athenians, in memory of a ſtratagem by which Melanthius, the Athenian king, overcame Xanthus, king of Bœotia. For a diſpute happening between the Athenians and Bœotians about a piece of ground, ſituated upon the confines of the two kingdoms, Xanthus propoſed that he and the Athenian king ſhould end the conteſt by ſingle combat. Thymætes reigned at that time in Athens, but declining the fight, was depoſed: but his ſucceſſor Melanthus, having accepted the challenge, met his enemy at the place appointed; when, as they were going to begin the fight, Melanthus pretending that he ſaw at Xanthus's back, a perſon cloathed in a black goat-ſkin, cried out that the articles were violated, upon which, Xanthus looking back, was treacherouſly ſlain by Melanthus. In memory of which Jupiter was ſurnamed Απατήνωρ, or the Deceiver; and Bacchus Μελαναιγὶς, or cloathed in a black goat-ſkin, and was honoured with a new temple, and the inſtitution of this feſtival; which laſted three days. On the evening of the firſt, each tribe had a ſeparate meeting, and a ſumptuous entertainment. On the ſecond, ſacrifices were offered to Jupiter and Minerva, when the children enrolled amongſt the citizens were placed cloſe to the altar; and it was uſual for perſons richly dreſſed to take lighted torches out of the fire, and to run about ſinging hymns in praiſe of Vulcan. On the third day, the young men, who till that time had remained unſhaved, had their hair cut off, before they were preſented to be regiſtered; when their fathers were obliged to ſwear that both themſelves and the young men's mothers were free-born; and it was then uſual to ſacrifice two ewes and a ſhe-goat to Diana.

APELLES, the greateſt painter of antiquity, was born in the iſle of Cos, and flouriſhed about three hundred years before Chriſt. All his works were eſteemed as maſter-pieces; but thoſe moſt admired were that of Fortune, that of Antigonus, which was drawn in profile to conceal the loſs of one of that prince's eyes; and that of Venus riſing out of the ſea; which was eſteemed his maſter-piece. Alexander the Great had ſo high an eſteem for him, that he would permit no other painter to draw his picture. It is ſaid, that while that prince was at Epheſus, viewing with admiration a picture of himſelf, drawn with amazing ſkill, an horſe being brought in by accident, neighed at the horſe which was painted in the ſame picture, being deceived by the exact imitation of nature; upon which, Apelles ſaid to

Ale-

Alexander, "The horſe O king is painted much better "than your majeſty." One of Apelles's chief excellencies was, his making his pictures ſo exactly reſemble the perſons painted, that the phyſiognomiſts could form a judgment as readily from his portraits as if they had ſeen the original.

APENINES. See APPENINES.

APENRADE, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleſwic, ſeated at the bottom of a gulph in the Baltic Sea, between Flenſbourg and Hadaſchleben. It is twenty-five miles north from Sleſwick. Long. 9. 28. E. Lat. 55. 4. N.

APENZEL, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of the ſame name, ſeated on the river Chuz, twenty-five miles ſouth of Conſtance, thirty-five eaſt from Zurich, Long. 9. 1. E. Lat. 47. 31. N. The canton itſelf conſiſts only of three or four vallies, and has the town and abbey of St. Gall on the north; the county of Tockenburg on the weſt; part of that county, and the bailiwic of Gams on the ſouth, and Rheinthal on the eaſt. It yields good paſture, and is filled with flocks that yield great quantities of milk, butter, and cheeſe, upon the ſale of which, and the linen manufactory, the people chiefly ſubſiſt. The inhabitants are rough and unpoliſhed, and finding but ſmall encouragement at home, are very forward to remove into other countries to ſeek their fortune. Both Papiſts and Proteſtants are tolerated in this canton, though the latter are more numerous. It is divided into two parts, the Inner and the Outer Apenzel, in which laſt the Proteſtants live, and the Papiſts in the other.

APER (MARCUS) a celebrated Latin orator, was born in Gaul, about the year 10. In his youth he made a voyage to Britain, where, he ſays, he ſaw a man who bore arms at the time that Cæſar firſt landed in this iſland. Aper at length went to Rome, where he frequented the bar, and acquired a great reputation, by the fineneſs of his genius and the force of his eloquence. Though a foreigner, he arrived by his merit to the principal offices of the ſtate, and became ſenator, queſtor, tribune, and prætor; but pleading had more charms for him than all theſe poſts. His maxim was, that all our deſigns and actions ought to tend to the public utility. He died about the year 85, and is believed to be the author of The Dialogue of the Orators, formerly attributed to Tacitus, or to Quintilian, at the end of whoſe works it is to be found. The beſt editions of his Dialogues are thoſe printed at Leyden and Rotterdam, at the end of Quintilian, in 1665, octavo; and at Amſterdam, at the end of Tacitus, in 1685.

APHION-KARAHISSART, a town of Anatolia, in Aſiatic, Turky. It was the firſt patrimony of Othman, the founder of the Turkiſh monarchy, at Conſtantinople. It is called Aphiom, or Aphion, from its producing a great deal of opium, which the Turks call Aphion. Long. 32. 18. E. Lat. 39. 45. N.

APHRODESIA, in Grecian antiquities, feſtivals in honour of Venus, obſerved in different parts of Greece; but the moſt remarkable was at Cyprus. At this ſolemnity, ſeveral myſterious rites were practiſed; and all that were initiated into them, offered a piece of money to Venus as an harlot.

APIAN (PETER) a learned mathematician, who died at Ingolſtadt, in Germany, on the 21ſt of April, 1552. He wrote a treatiſe on Coſmography, and other works.

APICIUS, there were three perſons of this name at Rome, famous for nothing but their gluttony: the ſecond of them lived in the reign of Tiberius, and kept a kind of ſchool of gluttony at Rome; but at length, having ſpent about two millions and a half in entertainments, he found himſelf much in debt, when ſearching into his affairs, and finding that he had but two hundred and fifty thouſand livres remaining, he poiſoned himſelf for fear of ſtarving.

APION, a famous grammarian, born at Oaſis, in Egypt, was a profeſſor at Rome in the reign of Tiberius. He was a man of learning, but had all the arrogance of a mere pedant. One of his principal works was his Antiquities of Egypt.

APIS, in Pagan mythology, one of the Egyptian Gods, worſhipped in the form of a living bull.

Mythologiſts ſay, that Apis was a king of the Argives, who, leaving his dominions to his brother, went into Egypt, where he was known under the name of Oſiris; that he married Iſis, and having civilized the Egyptians, and taught them the manner of planting the vine, they revered him after his death as a God, under the figure of a bull. This ſingularity, the ingenious abbe La Pluche explains in the following manner: Chance having produced a calf at Memphis, which had ſome ſpots nearly in the figure of a circle, or a creſcent, ſymbols highly reverenced among the Egyptians; thoſe marks were taken for the characteriſtics of Oſiris and Iſis, ſtamped upon the animal, and ſome extravagant perſons imagined, and perſuaded others, that this was an apparation of their ancient governor, a viſit which the protector of Egypt condeſcended to make them. This miraculous calf was therefore lodged in the fineſt palace in Memphis; all his motions were judged prophetical; the people flocked to him with their offerings, and he received the name of Apis, which ſignifies the Mighty God. After his death, they took care to replace him with another that had nearly the ſame ſpots; and when the mark were not exact, they improved them with a pencil. After a certain time, to prevent the indecency of his dying, they led him with great ceremony to a certain place, where they drowned him, and then interred him very devoutly. This melancholy ceremony was intermixed with torrents of tears, and was emphatically called Serapis, or the retreat of Apis; his ſucceſſor was ſought for, and thus this ſtrange devotion was perpetuated.

APOLLINARIS (CAIUS SULPITIUS) a celebrated grammarian, born at Carthage in the ſecond century. He had for his ſucceſſor in the profeſſion of grammar Helvius Pertinax, who was afterwards emperor. Apollinaris is ſaid to be the author of the verſes which ſerve as an argument to Terence's comedies.

APOLLINARIS SIDONIUS (CAIUS SOLLIUS) an eminent Chriſtian writer, and biſhop of Clermont, was born at Lyons, about the year 430, and is eſteemed the moſt elegant writer of his age, both in proſe and verſe. He died on the 21ſt of Auguſt, 487, or according to others, in 482.

APOLLINARIUS (CLAUDIUS) a learned biſhop of Hierapolis, who, about the year 170, preſented to Marcus Aurelius an excellent Apology for the Chriſtians.

APOLLINARIUS THE YOUNGER, thus called to diſtinguiſh him from his father, called Apollinarius the Elder, was at firſt lector or reader of Laodicea, and afterwards biſhop of that city. He was univerſally eſteemed the greateſt man of his age, both for learning and piety, and a moſt accurate and nervous defender of the faith againſt all its enemies; but notwithſtanding this, on his advancing ſome opinions that were not approved, he was anathematized as an heretic by the ſecond general council of Conſtantinople in 381.

APOLLO, in Pagan mythology, the God of Light, Medicine, Verſe, and Prophecy. According to Tully there were four dieties of this name; the firſt the ſon of Vulcan, and the tutelar God of the Athenians; the ſecond born in Crete; the third an Arcadian; and the laſt, to whom the greateſt honour is aſcribed, the ſon of Jupiter and Latona. This deity was ſo ſkilled in the uſe of the bow, that his arrows were always fatal. Python and the Cyclops experienced their force; for Apollo being enraged at Jupiter's killing his ſon Æſculapius, revenged himſelf on the Cyclops who had forged the thunderbolts for the father of the Gods, on which he was baniſhed from heaven, and forced to hire himſelf as a ſhepherd to Admetus, king of Theſſaly, when he invented the lyre, and became diſtinguiſhed for his ſkill in muſic, on which account the Muſes were under his immediate protection, and the graſhopper was conſecrated to him on account of its harmony. He was extremely jealous of rivalſhip on this head, and every one ſuffered who had the vanity to think they excelled the God of Harmony. See the articles MIDAS and MARSYAS.

In the character of the ſun he was repreſented in a chariot, drawn by four horſes; each night he went to reſt with Thetis in the Ocean, and in the morning the Hours got ready his horſes, and unbarred the gates of light. He reſembled his father Jupiter in his propenſity to love, and ſpent ſome time with Venus in the Iſle of Rhodes, when the ſky rained gold, and the earth was covered with lilies and roſes. For his other amours, ſee the articles DAPHNE, BOLINA, LEUCOTHOE, and CLYTIE.

He had a great number of names, which were either taken from his principal attributes, or places where he was worſhipped. Thus he was called Phœbus, on account of his ſplendor; Pæon, from his killing the python; Nomius and Agræus, from his feeding of cattle, and making laws; and Delius, either from his revealing things concealed, or his being born at Delos; and at Rome he was called Sol or the Sun. The principal places where he was worſhi ped, were, Claros, Patræa, Cyrrha, Cylla, Tenedos, Chryſus Abæa, a city in Lycia; at Miletus, and amongſt the Mæonians, from all which places he was denominated; but his moſt celebrated temple was at Delphos. See the article DELPHOS.

The ſacrifices uſually offered to Apollo were lambs, bulls, and oxen. The animals ſacred to this God were the wolf, from its acuteneſs of ſight; the cock, from his foretelling his riſing; the hawk, from its boldneſs of flight; the crow, from her augury; the ſwan, from her divining her own death; and the graſhopper, on account of its muſic. Of trees, the olive, laurel, palm, and juniper, were moſt in eſteem with him.

Mythologiſts have obſerved, that the four great attributes of Apollo, Divination, Muſic, Healing, and Archery, all manifeſtly refer to the ſun; that light diſpelling darkneſs is a ſtrong emblem of truth diſſipating error: What, ſay they, conduces more to life and health than the ſolar warmth? or can there be a juſter ſymbol of the planetary harmony than Apollo's lyre, the ſeven ſtrings of which repreſent the ſeven planets? As his darts deſtroyed the monſter Python, ſo his rays dry up the noxious moiſture which is pernicious both to health and vegetation. As to the origin of this god, the abbé la Pluche obſerves, that among the Egyptians, the decreaſe of the Nyle, which happened before the Sun entered into Sagittarius, was repreſented by an image armed with arrows, and ſubduing the monſter Python; this they called Orus, or the Deſtroyer, or Apollo, which has the ſame meaning; and that this emblem being carried into Greece by the Phœnicians, gave riſe to this deity, and many of the fables related of him.

APOLLODORUS, a celebrated painter of Athens, about four hundred and eight years before the birth of Chriſt, was the firſt who invented the art of mingling his colours, and of expreſſing the lights and ſhadows. He was admired alſo for his judicious choice of nature, and in the beauty and ſtrength of colouring ſurpaſſed all the maſters that went before him. He excelled likewiſe in ſtatuary.

APOLLODORUS of Athens, a celebrated grammarian, was the diſciple of Ariſtarchus, about one hundred years before the birth of Chriſt. No other of his writings have been preſerved, but an Abridgment of his Library of the Gods, which is of uſe for the underſtanding of mythology.

APOLLODORUS, a famous architect under Trajan and Adrian, was born at Damaſcus, and had the direction of the ſtone bridge which Trajan ordered to be built over the Danube in the year 104, and which was eſteemed the moſt magnificent of all the noble works of that emperor; but having offended Adrian, who valued himſelf on his ſkill in architecture, by giving his opinion too freely on ſome of his performances, he was accuſed of ſeveral crimes, under the pretence of which he was put to death.

APOLLONIUS of Perga, in Pamphylia, was a celebrated geometrician in the reign of Ptolemy Euergetes, about two hundred and twenty-four years before Chriſt. He wrote an excellent treatiſe on Conic Sections, the beſt edition of which is that printed at Oxford in 1710, in folio. He alſo wrote ſome other works.

APOLLONIUS RHODIUS, a celebrated Greek poet, born at Alexandria, in Egypt, and called Rhodius, or the Rhodian, from his teaching rhetoric a long time in the city of Rhodes. He was the diſciple of Callimachus, and lived under Ptolemy Evergetes about two hundred and thirty-two years before Chriſt. He ſucceeded Eratoſthenes, the grammarian, in the place of keeper of the Alexandrian library. His poem on the Expedition of the Argonauts was admired by the ancient critics, and is commended by Longinus. Of this work an elegant tranſlation into Engliſh has been lately publiſhed by the Rev. Mr. Ekins. Henry Stephens publiſhed, in quarto, this poem in Greek, in 1514, with the Scholia, and his own annotations; and in 1641, Jeremiah Hoelzlin publiſhed, at Leyden, an edition in Greek and Latin.

APOLLONIUS, of Tyana, was born about three or four years before the birth of Chriſt, and when he was but ſixteen years of age, ſet up for a ſtrict obſerver of Pythagoras's rule, renouncing wine, women, and all ſorts of fleſh; ſoon after he ſet up for a reformer, and choſe a habitation in the temple of Æſculapius, where he performed many cures. On his coming of age, he gave part of his wealth to his eldeſt brother, diſtributed another part to ſome poor relations, and kept very little for himſelf. It is apprehended that he knew all languages without having ever learned them, and underſtood the oracles which the birds delivered by their ſinging. In ſhort, his life is filled with abundance of fabulous particulars, and the Heathens put the pretended miracles of this man in oppoſition to thoſe of our Saviour. After having for a long time impoſed upon the world, and gained a great number of diſciples, he died in a very advanced age, about the end of the firſt century. His life, which is filled with abſurdities, was written by Damis, one of his diſciples.

APOLLONIUS, a Stoic philoſopher, born in the city of Chalcis, in Syria, was ſent for to Rome by the emperor Antoninus Pius, to be preceptor to Marcus Aurelius. Scarce was he arrived at Rome, when the emperor having ſent a perſon to conduct him to court, he anſwered, that it was not the buſineſs of a maſter to go in ſearch of his diſciple, but for the diſciple to go in ſearch of his maſter; upon which the emperor, laughing, ſaid, "It ſeems then that "it was more eaſy for Apollonius to come from Chalcis to "Rome, than from his lodgings to the palace." He, however, ſent Marcus Aurelius to him.

APOLLONIUS COLLATIUS (PETER) a prieſt of Navarre, who lived in the fifteenth century, and compoſed a poem on the Siege of Jeruſalem, by Veſpaſian and Titus, and ſome other works. Dupin conſiders him as one of the beſt of the Chriſtian poets, but others are of a different opinion.

APOLLOS, a Jew, originally of Alexandria, embraced Chriſtianity about fifty-four years after the birth of Chriſt, and acquired ſuch reputation at Corinth, that he was put on the ſame level with St. Peter and St. Paul, ſome ſaying that they were for St. Paul, and others that they were for Apollos.

APONIUS, an eccleſiaſtical author of the ſeventh century, who wrote a Commentary on the Canticles, which is eſteemed.

APONO (PETER DE). See ABBANO.

APOSTOLIUS (MICHAEL) a learned Greek, who flouriſhed in the fifteenth century, about the time when the empire of the Greeks, founded by Conſtantine the Great, was deſtroyed under Conſtantine Paleologus, the laſt Chriſtian emperor of the Eaſt. He wrote a conſiderable number of ſmall tracts, the greateſt part of which ſtill continue in manuſcript in ſeveral libraries.

APPENINES, a celebrated chain of mountains, commonly conſidered as a branch of the Alps. It runs along Italy throughout its whole length, even as far as the moſt ſouthern part of Naples. It has different names in different parts of the country, and contains the ſource of all the rivers that water Italy.

APPIAN, an eminent writer of the Roman Hiſtory in the Greek language, who flouriſhed under the reigns of the emperors Trajan, Adrian, and Antoninus Pius, about the year 120. Of the great number of books which he wrote, we have but a ſmall part now extant, which are his hiſtories of the Punic, Syrian, Parthian, Mithridatic, and Spaniſh wars, thoſe againſt Hannibal, the civil wars, thoſe in Illyricum, and a fragment of the Celtic or Gallic wars. The beſt edition of what remains of this author is that of Amſterdam, in 1670, two volumes, octavo.

APPIUS CLAUSUS, or CLAUDIUS SABINUS, a Sabine, and one of the principal inhabitants of Regillum, was remarkable for his authority and riches, but more ſtill for his virtue and eloquence. His merit, however, having drawn upon him the envy of his fellow citizens, he retired to Rome with all his family, attended, according to Plutarch, by five thouſand families. The Romans received them kindly, made them all citizens, gave each of them two acres of land, and to Appius five and twenty acres, and admitted him into the ſenate; in which office he diſtinguiſhed himſelf, by the wiſdom of his counſels, and the ſteadineſs of his reſolutions. He was made conſul four hundred and ninety-five years before Chriſt, and oppoſed, with all his eloquence, the creation of tribunes; but without effect.

APPIUS CLAUDIUS SABINUS, ſon of the preceding, had the ſame haughty temper and unconquerable firmneſs as his father, without his virtue and merit. Being made conſul, he oppoſed the incroachments of the tribunes, and the ſame year went againſt the Volſci, when he forced his ſoldiers to keep ſuch ſtrict diſcipline, as made them aſcribe his ſeverity rather to revenge than neceſſity. This rigour imbittered them againſt him, ſo that when he conducted them to the enemy, they threw away their arms and ran away. On their being returned to the territories of the republic, Appius made them encamp, and to puniſh their cowardice, ordered thoſe officers and centurions to be beheaded, who abandoned their poſts, and decimated, or put to death, every tenth ſoldier in the whole army. At his return to Rome, he ſtill farther exaſperated the people, by oppoſing the agrarian law, concerning the diſtribution of lands. At length the tribunes reſolved to ruin him, and cited him before the people as an enemy to the public liberty, and reproached him with his cruelty and inhumanity, in having put to death, by the public executioners, more ſoldiers than the enemy had killed in the heat of battle; but Appius anſwered this and other charges with ſuch ſtrength and eloquence, that the people, aſtoniſhed and aſhamed, durſt not condemn him: when the tribunes, fearing leſt he ſhould be acquitted, put off the judgment of his cauſe to another day. However, Appius, according to Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, imagining that he ſhould at laſt fall a ſacrifice to their reſentments, voluntarily put an end to his own life; though, according to Livy, he died a natural death.

APPIUS CLAUDIUS, the Decemvir. See VIRGINIA.

APPLEBY, the county town of Weſtmoreland, where the aſſizes are held, is ſeated on the banks of the river Eden, which almoſt ſurrounds it. It was formerly a very conſiderable town, and had great privileges; but it is long ago gone to decay, and now only conſiſts of mean houſes, in one broad ſtreet, which runs with an eaſy aſcent from north to ſouth; at the head of which is the caſtle, almoſt intirely ſurrounded by the river. It has two churches, a town-hall, in which the aſſizes are held, a county jail, and an hoſpital for a governeſs and twelve widows, founded in 1651, by a daughter of lord Clifford. It is governed by a mayor, twelve aldermen, a common-council, and two ſerjeants at mace, &c. Here is ſaid to be the beſt corn-market in theſe northern parts. The fairs are on Whitſun-eve for horned cattle; on Whit-Monday for linen cloth and merchandize; on Auguſt 10, for horſes, ſheep, and linen cloth; and on June 10, for cattle and ſheep: the market is on Saturday. It is ten miles eaſt-by-ſouth of Penrith, and two hundred and ſeventy north-weſt from London. Long. 3. 25. W. Lat. 54. 30. N.

APPLEDORE, a town in Kent, ſeated on the river Rother, ſix miles north of Rye, in Suſſex, and ſixty ſouth-eaſt-by-ſouth of London.

APRIES, king of Egypt, the ſame with Pharaoh Hophrah, in Jeremiah and Ezekiel, ſucceeded his father Pſammis five hundred and ninety-four years before Chriſt. He took Sidon, rendered himſelf maſter of the iſle of Cyprus, and returned loaded with ſpoils; but at length being defeated by the Cyreneans, Amaſis was elected in his room, and Apries ſtrangled about five hundred and ſixty-nine years before the Chriſtian æra.

APROSIO (Angelico) born at Ventimiglia, in the republic of Genoa, on the 29th of October, 1607, obtained great reputation among the learned, and wrote many books under fictitious names, as that of Maſoto Galiſtoni, Carlo Galiſtoni, Scipio Glareano, &c. His Bibliotheca Aproſiana, and his Farſa Poetica di Sapricio Saprici, have been much ſought after by the curious.

APTE, an ancient town of Provence, in France, and the ſee of a biſhop; is ſeated on the little river Calaron. It is the chief town of a Bailliage, and by that means enters into the general aſſemblies of the province. Here are very fine monuments of antiquity, beſides ſeveral convents for men and women. It is twenty miles north of Aix. Long. 5. 36. E. Lat. 43. 50. N.

APULEIUS (Lucius) a Platonic philoſopher, born at Madaura in Africa, lived in the ſecond century, under Antoninus and Marcus Aurelius. He married a rich widow, named Pudentilla, and was accuſed of murdering her ſon Pontianus, and of having made uſe of magical charms, in order to engage her affections; but he defended himſelf before the proconſul of Africa, in an apology which is ſtill extant, and which St. Auguſtin calls an eloquent and florid diſcourſe. The Pagans conſidered him as a great magician, and even ſome of them have preſumed to compare his pretended miracles with thoſe of Jeſus Chriſt. Beſides his celebrated work intitled the Golden Aſs, we have ſeveral other of his works, moſt of which treat of the Platonic philoſophy.

AQUÆUS (Stephen) in French de l'Aigue, lord of Beauvais in Berri, was eſteemed for his military actions and his writings, under the reign of Francis I. Among his other works are, his Commentary upon Pliny, and his Treatiſe on the Properties of Tortoiſes, Snails, Frogs, &c.

AQUAPENDENTE, a town of Italy, in the ſtate and patrimony of the church, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a mountain, near the river Paglia, ten miles eaſt of Orvieta, and fifty-eight north-by-weſt of Rome. Long. 12. 17. E. Lat. 44. 39. N.

AQUAPENDENTE. See Fabricius (Jerome).

AQUI, a town of Italy, in Montferrat, famous for its hot baths. It was taken by the Spaniards in 1745, and retaken by the Piedmonteſe in 1746. It was afterwards taken by the French, who blew up the fortifications, and then forſook it. It is ſeated on the north bank of the river Bormia, eighteen miles ſouth of Aſti, twenty-five north-weſt of Genoa, and thirty ſouth of Caſal. Long. 8. 40. E. Lat. 44. 45. N.

AQUAVIVA (Andrew Matthew) duke of Atri, in the kingdom of Naples, and ſon of Julius Aquaviva, added to the ſplendor of his birth a great ſhare of learning. He wrote a work intitled Encyclopedia, another in which he treats of moral virtue, and a book De Re Equeſtri. He died in 1528.

Aquaviva (Octavio) a celebrated cardinal, was the ſon of John Jerome Aquaviva, duke of Atri, of an illuſtrious family in the kingdom of Naples. After having made a progreſs in Greek and Latin authors, and in the law, he made himſelf known to pope Sixtus V. who gave him ſeveral preferments, and at length made him vice-legate of St. Peter's Patrimony. In 1591, he was made cardinal, then legate of the Campania of Rome, and at length legate of Avignon. He oppoſed the enterprizes of the Proteſtants, but loved and protected men of learning, and had always ſome learned men in his houſe. Having been nominated archbiſhop of Naples, he went thither and reſided in his dioceſe, where he died on the 15th of December, 1612, at fifty-two years of age.

AQUILA, ſurnamed Ponticus, from his being born at Synopus in the province of Pontus, was a learned mathematician under the emperor Adrian, who made him ſurveyor of his buildings, and gave him orders to rebuild Jeruſalem, which he called Ælia after his own name; on which occaſion, getting an inſight into the truth of the Chriſtian religion, he was baptiſed; but afterwards being excommunicated for ſome of his ſentiments, he embraced Judaiſm, and, learning Hebrew, tranſlated the Old Teſtament into Greek, about the year 129. His verſion is rendered word for word from the Hebrew text; but there is only a fragment of it remaining.

Aquila, a fine large city of Italy, and the capital of Abruzzo, ſeated on a hill, on the banks of the river Peſcara, near its ſource. It has an ancient caſtle, and is a biſhop's ſee immediately under the pope. The land about it produces great plenty of ſaffron. It was very near being all deſtroyed by an earthquake, in February, 1703. The firſt ſhock was ſo terrible, that the inhabitants abandoned the city; but returning to veſpers, it being Candlemas-day, the ſhocks followed one another with ſuch violence, that twenty-four thouſand people periſhed, and fifteen hundred were greatly hurt; eight hundred were killed in one ſingle church; many other churches, monaſteries, noble buildings, and the town-houſe, were either ſwallowed up or overturned, together with the greater part of the city and its walls. Aquila ſtands thirty miles from the ſea, one hundred and twelve north-weſt of Naples, eighty north-weſt of Rome, and about ſixteen from the confines of the pope's dominions. Long. 14. 20 E. Lat. 42. 20. N.

AQUILEIA, a patriachal city of Friuli, in Italy, near the north end of the gulph of Venice, was formerly very rich and the moſt trading town in all Italy; but it is at preſent ruined, partly by war, partly by its unwholeſome air, occaſioned by its ſtagnating waters, which are retained by the ruins of the city, inſomuch that at preſent there is not above thirty or forty poor houſes left, which chiefly belong to fiſhermen. It is fifty-eight miles north-eaſt from Venice. Long. 14. 8 E. Lat. 45. 55. N.

AQUILIUS Gallus, a learned Roman advocate, and the friend of Cicero, lived ſixty five years before the Chriſtian æra.

Aquilius Sabinus, a learned Roman orator, called the Cato of his Age, was conſul, A. D. 214 and 216.

Aquilius Severus, a Spaniſh writer, in the fourth century, wrote the hiſtory of his life, in the form of an itinerary, partly in proſe and partly in verſe, and gave it the title of the Cataſtrophe. He died about the year 370, in the reign of the emperor Valentinian.

AQUINAS (St. Thomas) ſtyled the Angelical Doctor, was of the ancient and noble family of the counts of Aquino, deſcended from the kings of Sicily and Arragon, and was born in the caſtle of Aquino, in the Terra di Lavora, in Italy, in the year 1224 or 1225. He taught ſchool-divinity in moſt of the univerſities of Italy, and at laſt ſettled at Naples, where he ſpent the reſt of his life in ſtudy, in reading of lectures, and acts of piety, and was ſo far from the views of ambition or profit, that he refuſed the archbiſhopric of that city, when it was offered him by pope Clement IV. He was very little ſkilled in hiſtory or polite learning, and knew nothing of the Greek language: his works, however, are very numerous, for they contain ſeventeen volumes in folio. He was canonized by pope John XXII. in the year 1323; and Pius V. gave him, in 1567, the title of the Fifth Doctor of the Church, and appointed his feſtival to be kept with the ſame ſolemnity as thoſe of the other four doctors.

AQUINO (Philip d') in Latin Aquinas or Aquinius, turned from Judaiſm, had a penſion from the clergy of France, and acquired much reputation by his knowledge of the Hebrew language, which he taught at Paris, in the reign of Lewis XIII. and by the books he publiſhed, among which is his Dictionarium Hebræo-Chaldæo-Thalmudico-Rabbinicum. His grandſon, Anthony D'Anquin, was firſt phyſician to Lewis XIV.

Aquino, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and the Terra di Lavoro, with a biſhop's ſee. It was ruined in the time of the emperor Conrade, and is reduced to a village of about thirty-five houſes. It is the birth place of the poet Juvenal and Thomas Aquinas. It is forty miles north-weſt from Capua. Long. 14. 30. E. Lat. 41. 32. N.

ARABELLA Stuart, daughter to Charles Stuart, younger brother to king James the Firſt's father, has merited a place in the Engliſh hiſtory. In the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, the pope formed a deſign to raiſe her to the throne of England, by marrying her to cardinal Farneſe, brother to the duke of Parma, who founded their right to the ſucceſſion of England on their being deſcended from the daughter of a baſtard of king Edward IV; and after queen Elizabeth's death, ſome Engliſh lords being apprehenſive that king James would confer all poſts of honour and profit on the Scots, conſpired to kill him, and ſet Arabella on the throne; but this conſpiracy being diſcovered, ſeveral of the lords were capitally puniſhed, and the reſt pardoned. Arabella, who had ſecretly married ſir William Seymour, ſon to the lord Beauchamp, was confined to her houſe at Highgate, and her huſband ſent to the Tower; but after they had ſuffered impriſonment for ſome time, they made their eſcape; when Arabella being taken, was in her turn confined in the Tower, where ſhe died, on the 17th of September, 1615.

ARABIA, a conſiderable country in Aſia, lying in between fifty-two and ſeventy-ſeven degrees of longitude, and twelve degrees thirty minutes and thirty-five degrees of north latitude. It is a peninſula, bounded on the weſt by the Red Sea, or Arabic Gulph; on the north by Syria; on the north-eaſt by the Euphrates, the gulph of Baſra, or Perſian gulph, and the gulph of Ormus; and on the ſouth by the ſtreights Bab-el-mandel, and the Arabian Sea. It is in length, from the ſtreights of Bab el-mandel to the north part near Aleppo, one thouſand three hundred and fifty miles; and in breadth, from Al-Ter near mount Sinai to cape Raſalgat, one thouſand two hundred and ſixty miles. It is divided into Arabia Deſerta, the Deſart Arabia, whoſe chief town is Anah; Arabia Petræa, which ſome tranſlate Stony Arabia, (but others affirm it is ſo called from its chief town, which was formerly Petræa; and Arabia Felix, or Arabia the Happy, the capital of which is Sanaa.

Arabia Petræa, which lies to the north, has a chain of mountains to the eaſt, and another to the ſouth, the firſt ſeparates it from Arabia Deſerta, and the other from Yoman. It was anciently the abode of the Idumæans, the Moabites, the Midianites, the Amalekites. In this country the Iſraelites wandered forty years after they came out of Egypt. It is a deſolate loneſome country, only diverſified by ſandy plains and mountains of naked rocks.

Arabia Deſerta is full of vaſt deſarts, from whence it doubtleſs took its name. Thoſe that have travelled over them affirm, that there is not a tree to be ſeen for a great many days journey, nor indeed any thing elſe but a boundleſs plain. There is but one ridge of mountains, about which travellers find tolerable water; but in other parts they may travel ſeveral days without, aud when they meet with any, it is ſeldom fit to drink. The only part where there is paſture, trees, and fruits, is on the borders of the Euphrates, where there are two tolerable towns, Anah and Tegba, not to mention the ruins of Palmyra, in which they made themſelves a kind of houſes or huts. Except the inhabitants of theſe, the reſt live in tents, and endeavour to rob the caravans, unleſs they are under the direction of one of their own ſkeiks, or governors.

Arabia Felix is the beſt country of the three, and yet has many barren mountains and deſarts, without habitations and without water. However, the fruitful parts produce drugs, dates, oranges, lemons, corn, grapes, ſpices, great quantities of coffee; and alſo olibanum, myrrh, caſſia, gum arabic, balm, and manna; and the ſea produces coral and pearls. Their horſes and camels are in high eſteem. They have no large rivers, and very few ſmall ones, the principal of which are Aftan, Falg, and Prim. The heats are here very great; but the length of the nights and the plentiful dews ſerve to refreſh the air and the earth.

The Arabians were formerly called Agarenians and Iſhmaelites; they afterward aſſumed the name of Saracens, which they thought more honourable. Mohammediſm had its birth in this country, and has ſpread prodigiouſly in Aſia and Africa. They founded the Saracen empire, on the ruins of which that of the Turks and Perſians have been raiſed. In general, they have a ſwarthy complexion, a ſtern look, and ſeem to be thoughtful and melancholy; they are ſober, very ſuperſtitious, uſe the name of God frequently, and yet many of them are cruel to foreigners, cheats in trade, and robbers in the deſarts. They may be ſaid to be be of two kinds, one of which live in tents, and the other in towns; the latter apply themſelves to manufactures, trade, and the ſciences; they principally cultivate philoſophy, aſtrology, medicine, and the mathematics. Thoſe that live at large in the fields and deſarts often remove from place to place in ſearch of forage; they are divided into tribes, each of which has a chief called a ſheik; they have always a great number on horſeback in ſearch of prey; for which reaſon, the merchants who travel in theſe parts always go together in caravans, that is, in large companies, many of whom are armed; and yet, notwithſtanding this precaution, they are often pillaged: however, they obſerve ſome rules in their robberies; they never ſteal from each other, nor murder ſtrangers, but in caſes of neceſſity, contenting themſelves with carrying off their riches; for this reaſon, the caravans that paſs from Baſra to Aleppo hire one of the ſheiks to be their ſafeguard, by whoſe means they paſs very ſafely throughout their whole journey. It muſt however be acknowledged, that thoſe Arabs who are ſettled in towns, and apply themſelves to agriculture, trade, and the mechanic arts, are remarkably diſtinguiſhed by their juſtice, temperance, and humanity.

In their converſations, they always place themſelves in a ring, ſitting croſs-legged, and croſſing their arms over their breaſts or ſingering their beards, which they always have in high veneration.

The Arabs who live in tents are called Bedouins: theſe are governed by emirs, who pay no ſubmiſſion to one another, unleſs they are of the ſame family; and he who is the head of thoſe that live between mount Sinai and Mecca aſſumes the title of king, to whom the Turks pay tribute, that he may not plunder their caravans of pilgrims that go to Mecca. The ſheiks, who command a leſſer number, obey the emirs; and the reſt ſerve for ſoldiers, ſubjects, and ſervants. Their arms are a ſword, a ſpear, an iron mace, and ſometimes a pole-ax. Their tents are made of goats hair, which are wove and ſpun by the women, and ſerve for their whole families; for in the winter, their horſes, as well as wives and children, all lodge together: the emirs, indeed, have two for themſelves and another for their ladies, beſides a little one for their ſervants. When they encamp, the emir's tent is in the middle, and the reſt all round, at a conſiderable diſtance: the place is generally on the top of a hill, that they may look all round them, to prevent being ſurpriſed, and to diſcover a booty. The common Arabs have no other furniture than mats, counterpanes, and cuſhions, with a ſtone for a bolſter, covered with a mat. In the ſummer-time, they lie in the open air. Their kitchen utenſils, if we may ſo call them, conſiſt in kettles, wicker-baſkets, a ſmall hand mill, a few pitchers, wooden bowls for their victuals, and goats-ſkin ſacks; but their princes have all ſorts of magnificent furniture ſuitable to their wandering life and particular cuſtoms. They can take down their tents, pack up their furniture, and decamp in two hours time. Their baggage is carried by camels and oxen; the women walk a-foot, carrying their young children in their arms; and the men mount their horſes, and put themſelves in a fighting poſture. At night they put out their lights, and the dogs rove round the camps, and give notice by their barking, if any thing does but ſtir.

The diet of the Arabs is generally milk-meats, honey, oil, rice, pulſe, beef, mutton, goats-fleſh, and the fleſh of camels. Their bread conſiſts of cakes, which they bake every day in pans, in the aſhes, or in ovens, which are ſometimes large jars made for that purpoſe; they are made of nothing but flour and water: their drink is water: they have coffee every morning for breakfaſt, and after meals; they always roaſt the berries the ſame day in a frying-pan, and beat them in a wooden mortar, while the water is boiling: their uſual dinners are boiled meat, with rice-ſoup and rice-pudding: the pudding is made with boiled rice, ſaffron, raiſins, vetches, and onions, to which they add butter fried with pepper: they have likewiſe ſoup, made with meat cut into bits, and a little rice-flour and parſley: they likewiſe make balls with wheat, ſalt, and pepper, and ſerve them up with ſour milk; theſe they count very delicious. Their butter is as rank as tallow; and therefore they dreſs beans, lentils, and other pulſe with oil. Beſides theſe, when they are near Syria, they get figs, raiſins, dates, apples, pears, dried apricots, and melons. Smoaking tobacco is of univerſal uſe among the men, women, and children. The greateſt perſons have their proviſions placed on a round piece of leather laid upon the ground, in diſhes and plates of copper, with wooden ſpoons, ſitting croſs-legged all round it, and a long piece of ſtriped linen ſerves for napkins. They always take out what they want with their right hand, without a fork, nor have they any knife, the meat being cut ready. When they have done, they get up, and ſay in their language, God be praiſed; then they drink, and waſh their hands with ſoap. Others ſucceed, till it comes to the turn of the ſervants, who, when they have done, fold up the table and carry it away. The common Arabs have neither tables nor cloths, but wooden bowls for their rice or meat, and piggins for their ſoup, which laſt they ſcoop out in the hollow of their hands; they likewiſe take their rice by handfuls, and when they have done, ſcour their hands with ſand, if they have no ſoap.

The dreſs of the emirs is like that of the Turkiſh quality; which, in winter, is a pair of linen drawers, or breeches; a fine ſhirt, the back part of the ſleeves of which hang to the ground; a caftan, of ſattin or mohair, made like a caſſock, which reaches down to the middle of their legs, and has large ſleeves; it is bound to the body with a leathern belt, ſix inches broad, with claſps to make it ſtraiter or let it out; it is embroidered with gold and ſilk, and ſet off with plates of gold; to this they hang a ſhort kniſe adorned with jewels; they have ſmall crooked poniards, with a ſhagreen ſcabbard, which they put through the belt; the hilt is of ſilver or ſome other valuable ſubſtance: over their drawers they wear a chackier, which ſerves for breeches, ſtockings, and ſhoes; they are made of red, purple, or violet, but never green, that being their prophet's colour; the foot is of yellow leather: the upper garment is a long cloth veſt, with ſleeves,

ſleeves, and lined with fur. Their aba, or riding-dreſs is made like a ſack, only open like a ſhirt before, with a hole for the neck; it is made of coloured cloth, and trimmed on the ſhoulders with gold or ſilver lace. Their turban is a piece of muſlin wrapped round a cap of crimſon velvet; the ends are run with gold or ſilver, and hang behind the back. They have very light Turky-leather boots to ride in, and which they can walk in with eaſe.

The ladies have muſlin drawers, and ſhifts embroidered with ſilk at the ends and on the ſeams; alſo little waiſtcoats of cloth of gold, ſattin, or other ſilk ſtuffs, faſtened with two buttons under a ſmall girdle of gold or ſilver gilt, or of gold and ſilk lace, with gold or ſilver claſps; the upper part of the waiſtcoat is open all along the breaſt, with buttons on each ſide, which are only for ornament, this part being never buttoned; the ſleeves are cloſe and ſhort, for they do not reach to the elbow, below which the ſhift-ſleeves appear and hang down to the ground: they have caftans, which they put on in winter, made like waiſtcoats, only they reach to the ground; they tuck up the ſkirts before, and draw them through the ſides of their girdle, that they may not be in the way, and to ſhow the embroidered flowers on their drawers and ſhifts: their upper garments are of ſattin and velvet, like the mens, and ſometimes of gold brocade. They walk bare-foot on carpets, while they are within; at other times, they wear ſmall neat ſlippers; and when they are abroad, they put on plained buſkins. Their head-dreſs is a gold or ſilver bonnet, made like a cap, and incircled with muſlin embroidered with gold and ſilk, over which is a fillet of coloured gauſe, which they faſten upon their forehead. When they go out, they throw a large muſlin veil over all, which covers their head, neck, face, and ſhoulders, falling down below their girdle.

The dreſs of the common Arabs conſiſts only in a coarſe ſhirt with long ſleeves, a pair of linen drawers, and a coarſe callicoe caftan, with a leathern belt about their middles, wherein they ſtick their poniard; they adorn the hilt with little pieces of ſilver money. In winter, they wear lambſkins ſewed together; and when the weather is a little warm, or when it rains, they turn the woolly ſide outwards: they wear no ſtockings: their turbans conſiſt of white muſlin wrapped round a red cap, one end of which hangs a little way down, and the other is wrapped about their necks to keep off the heat of the ſun. The mean ſort of women have only a blue ſhift, with a linen girdle, and a veil over their heads, which they wrap their necks in, and cover the lower part of their face up to their noſes. The maids cover their faces down to their eyes. In ſummer they go bare-foot, and in winter they wear ſlippers. When they cannot get veſts, they wear jackets quilted with cotton.

The ladies are tolerably handſome, and well ſhaped. The ordinary women are ſun-burnt, and very diſagreeable. They black the edges of their eye-lids, and the corners of their eyes, with a powder which they call kebel, and prick their lips to mark them with black ſpots, which never wear out, in the ſame manner as ſome in England have marked their arms. They alſo draw all ſorts of figures on their arms, and dye their nails of a reddiſh colour. They bore their ears in ſeveral places, and wear ear-rings in each hole. The ladies wear pearls and gold pendants, while the ordinary women are contented with glaſs beads, and bracelets for their arms, made with the ſame. Some wear hoops on their arms and ancles, made of gold, ſilver, pewter, braſs, or iron, according to their quality. Some hoops are made hollow, and are filled with little ſtones, which make a tinkling as they walk. The princeſſes wear rings and jewels on their great toes. Some wear rings in their noſtrils of a metal ſuitable to their quality. They are ſo large that the women may be kiſſed through them. Thoſe that are able wear pearls about their necks, and on their caps, or gold chains. They are likewiſe fond of faſtening ſmall pieces of gold coin about the ornaments of their head and necks; the ordinary ſort get ſmall ſilver pieces, which they reckon a principal ornament for the face.

Theſe Arabs never marry for love, for they never ſee their wives faces before the ceremony, unleſs it be done by ſtealth; that is, they hide themſelves behind the buſhes, near the place where the women go for water, and where they chat with each other with their faces uncovered. Sometimes, indeed, when the women have an inclination for a particular man, they will give him a tranſient view of their faces as they paſs by, and are not obſerved by others, and yet in ſuch a manner as to make it appear accidental. Sometimes the women that are his relations will contrive to give him a ſight; and if he likes her, gets his relations to aſk the father's conſent; and if he approves of the match, he ſells her for camels, ſheep, or horſes. This makes the daughters the principal riches of the family. When the parties are agreed, the man that is to perform the office of a cady, writes the covenant, and the names of the witneſſes, and then they are married. The poor, who cannot to pay for this, take one another's word before witneſſes. The bride is prepared with bathing, perfumes, and diſcolouring the face, in the manner above-mentioned: they paint figures on her arms, and every part of the body, and dreſs her with all the finery they can procure; then ſet her upon a mare or camel, covered with a carpet, and ſing her praiſes all the way to the bridegroom's abode. The men take care of the bridegroom, cauſing him to bathe, and then dreſs him, and carry him back in triumph on a mare. After this the men and women feaſt ſeparately, and at night they are brought together. When the women bring in the bride, the bridegroom ſits like a ſtatue, and takes no notice of what they do or ſay, till ſhe throws herſelf at his feet, at which time he claps a piece of gold or ſilver on her forehead. This is repeated thrice, and each time the bride comes in a different dreſs. This done, they are left to conſummate; if every thing happens right, he comes out again pleaſed, and receives freſh compliments, and the reſt of the night is ſpent in mirth, the different ſexes by themſelves. The common Arabs have but one wife, though their law allows more; but the higher ſort purchaſe concubines.

The diverſions of the men conſiſt in hunting, or in paſſing whole days together in ſmoaking, drinking coffee, and in telling ſtories. Sometimes they play at cheſs, draughts, or a game called Mongala, but never for money. Sometimes they buſy themſelves in training up their horſes. The women ſpend their time in viſiting, when they are not employed about their houſhold affairs. They ſing tolerably, and play upon inſtruments which have ſome reſemblance to violins, tabors, and drums. They likewiſe play with two ebony ſticks, as our boys do with ſnappers. Theſe inſtruments are ſeldom uſed, but at great entertainments. There is no dancing among them but by people who make it their employment.

The Arabs are naturally lean, ſtrong, and inured to hardſhips, which renders phyſic of little uſe. However, in caſe of pain, they cauteriſe the part. In the cold fit of an ague they get into the ſun; in the hot fit they remove into the ſhade. They are very patient under diſeaſes, and ſay there is no phyſician but God. However, they ſometimes venture upon the noſtrums of old women, and are very fond of charms. They hate bleeding, becauſe, as they ſay, the life is in the blood; but when they are wounded, they are glad of a ſurgeon's aſſiſtance if they can get it.

When a perſon is dead, they make a grave on a riſing ground, and when they have laid in the corpſe, they fill it with large ſtones, to preſerve the body from the beaſts. The men ſeem to be very patient, but the women ſcream out as loud as they can, ſcratch their arms, hands, and face, tearing their hair, and throwing handfuls of earth on their head and face; in ſhort, they ſeem to be frantic. The cuſtoms laſt ſpoken of relate to the Arabs that dwell in Paleſtine.

The language of the Arabs in general is very ancient, and the moſt copious in the world. Thoſe that underſtand it ſay it is the moſt beautiful. The Arabs have produced many learned men, eſpecially in medicine. They have had univerſities at Conſtantine, Tunis, Tripoli, Fez, and Morocco; and when they carried their conqueſt into Spain, they created one at Corduba. They make uſe of lunar years, and their epocha begins Wedneſday the 16th of July, 622, which they call the Hegira, which is the time that Mahommed fled from Mecca.

ARABIC GULPH, called the RED SEA, but very improperly, becauſe the ancient writers gave that name to the ſea between the mouth of the Perſian Gulph and the river Indus. And though we often meet with this name in the Engliſh tranſlation, it is not at all countenanced by the original. The Hebrew word is Suph, which ſignifies a Sea of Weeds. It reaches from the Straits of Bab-el-Mandel to the town of Suez, at the extremity of the Gulph, and is one thouſand and twenty miles in length, but the greateſt breadth is not above one hundred and ninety. The navigation here is dangerous, on account of the banks of ſand, ſmall iſlands, and ſhoals, that are met with along the coaſts. It is moſt remarkable for the great quantity of coral in ſeveral places found at the bottom.

ARABSCHAH, a celebrated doctor of the Muſſulmans, wrote a hiſtory of Tamerlane in Arabic, and other works, and died at Damaſcus, the place of his birth, in 1450.

ARACAN, the capital of a ſmall kingdom to the north-eaſt of the bay of Bengal. It has the conveniency of a ſpacious river, and a harbour large enough to hold all the ſhips in Europe. It is a large town, but their houſes are ſlight, being made with palm trees and bamboe canes, and covered with leaves of trees. They are ſeldom above ſix feet high, but have many windows or air-holes. But the people of the higheſt rank are much better accommodated. They have no kitchens, chimneys, or cellars, which oblige the women to dreſs the victuals out of doors. Some of the ſtreets are on the ridges of rocks, wherein are a great many ſhops.

ſhops. Their orchards and gardens contain all the fruit common to the Indies, and their trees are green all the year. Their common drink is toddy, which is the ſap of a palm tree, and when new will intoxicate like wine, but ſoon grows ſour. They have two ſeaſons, the rainy and the dry; the former of which begins in April, and continues till October; and yet the air is more healthful than in many places in the Indies. Elephants and buffaloes are very numerous here, and are made uſe of inſtead of horſes. They have plenty of proviſions, and but little trade; for when Mr. Channoch was here in 1686, with ſix large ſhips, there was nothing to be had in the way of commerce; and yet the country produces lead, tin, ſtick lack, and elephant's teeth. The Mogul's ſubjects come here to purchaſe theſe commodities, and ſometimes meet with diamonds, rubies, and other precious ſtones. They were formerly governed by a king of their own, called the king of the White Elephant, but this country has been conquered by the king of Pegu. Ovington ſays a great many ſtrange things of this country and people, but as he had them only from hear-ſay, we ſhall paſs them by. However, it is certain that they pay little or no regard to the chaſtity of their women, for the common ſailors take great liberties among them. Their religion is Paganiſm, and the idols, temples, and prieſts are very numerous. The dreſs of the better ſort is very ſlight, for it conſiſts chiefly of a piece of white cotton over their arms, breaſt, and belly, with an apron before. The complexion of the women is tolerable; they wear thin flowered gauze over their breaſt and ſhoulders, and a piece of cotton, which they roll three or four times round their waiſt, and let it hang as low as their feet. They curl their hair, and put glaſs rings in their ears, and ſtretch them of a monſtrous length. On their arms and legs they have hoops of copper, ivory, ſilver, &c. which ſeem to be very clumſy ornaments. We have long accounts of the ſtate and grandeur of their kings, which are not worth repeating, now the government is tranferred to another kingdom. The country produces great quantities of rice, and the water is good. Their flocks of ſheep and herds of cattle are alſo numerous near Aracan; but what they ſay of the towns and villages with which the country is pretended to be overſpread, may be doubted. For Capt. Hamilton affirms, that there are but few places inhabited, on account of the great numbers of wild elephants and buffaloes, which would deſtroy the fruits of the ground; and that the tigers would deſtroy the tame animals. There are a few iſlands near the ſea, inhabited by a few miſerable fiſhermen, who can juſt keep themſelves from ſtarving, tho' they are out of the reach of oppreſſion. The rich burn the dead bodies, but the poor, who are not able to buy wood, throw them into the river. Long 93. 5. E. Lat. 20. 6. N.

ARACHNE, in fabulous hiſtory, was a Lybian princeſs, and the daughter of Idmon. This lady having the preſumption to challenge Minerva in weaving tapeſtry, or, according to others, in ſpinning, the goddeſs, after a trial of ſkill, ſtruck her; when being filled with deſpair, and attempting to hang herſelf, Minerva turned her into a ſpider, in which ſhape ſhe exerciſes the profeſſion ſhe ſo much boaſted of.

The abbé la Pluche gives a very ingenious explication of this fable, and ſays that the Egyptians, to remind the people of the importance of their linen manufacture, expoſed in their feſtivals the figure of a woman, bearing in her right hand the beam round which the weavers rolled the warp of their cloth. This image they called Minerva, from Manevrah, a weaver's loom. Near this figure they placed that of a ſpider, to which they gave the name of Arachne, from Arach, to make linen cloth: and theſe emblems being tranſplanted into Greece, that people, who were fond of the marvelous, converted them into real objects, and afforded room for the imagination of the poets to invent the transformation of Arachne into a ſpider.

ARAFAT, or GIBEL EL ORPHAT, the Mountain of Knowledge, a mountain in Arabia, near Mecca, ſo called. The Mahommedans ſay this was the place where Adam firſt met with and knew his wife Eve. This mountain not being large enough to contain all the devotees that come annually in pilgrimage to Mecca, there are ſtones ſet up round the hill to ſerve for boundaries, and to ſhow how far it reaches. The pilgrims are clad in robes of humility and mortification, with their heads uncovered. They ſeem to be very much affected, for the tears flow down their cheeks, and they ſob and ſigh moſt bitterly, begging earneſtly for remiſſion of ſins, and promiſing to lead a new life. They continue here about four or five hours, and at half an hour after ſun-ſet, they all decamp to perform a religious duty called Aſham Nomas. After this they all receive the honourable title of Hadgees, which is conferred upon them by the imam or prieſt. This being pronounced, the trumpet ſounds, and they all return to Mecca.

ARAGON, a province of Spain, bounded on the north by the Pyrenæan mountains, which ſeparate it from France; on the weſt by Navarre and the two Caſtiles; on the ſouth by Valencia; and on the eaſt by Catalonia. It is in length about one hundred and eighty miles, and in breadth one hundred and forty-nine; but the land is mountainous, dry, ſandy or ſtony, badly cultivated, and worſe peopled. However, it does not want rivers; for beſides the Ebro which croſſes it in the middle, there are the Xalo, the Cinca, the Galego, and the Aragon. The air is pure and wholeſome, and there are mines of iron, and ſome ſay of gold. The moſt fertile parts are about the rivers; for there the land produces corn, wine, oil, flax, hemp, various fruits, and a ſmall quantity of ſaffron, beſides large flocks of ſheep, and plenty of game in the woods.

The Aragoneſe are bold, courageous, courteous, and well-bred, but poſitive in their opinions, and bigotted in their religion. Theſe were the firſt of the Spaniards that threw off the Mooriſh yoke. Saragoſſa is the capital of this province, and the other chief towns are Balbaſtro, Jaca, Sarazona, Haeſca, Calatajud, Albarrazin, Tervel, Daroca, and Boria.

ARAGON (MARY of) wife of the emperor Otho III. and daughter of a king of Aragon, had the addreſs to procure for her waiting-woman a young man, diſguiſed in the habit of a woman; but the emperor ſuſpecting this vile artifice, had him undreſſed, in the preſence of many witneſſes, and upon the diſcovery of his ſex, condemned him to be burnt. This lady afterwards became deſperately in love with a young count, and he paying no regard to her ſolicitations, ſhe accuſed him of making love to her; on which the credulous Otho ordered him to be beheaded; but his widow afterwards demanding vengeance of the emperor, and vindicating her huſband, Mary of Aragon was condemned to the flames. This happened about the end of the tenth century.

ARAL, a great lake, which lies to the eaſtward of the Caſpian Sea, being ſeated between forty-two and forty-eight degrees of north latitude, and is near three hundred and ſixty miles in length, and one thouſand miles in circumference. The ſhore on the weſt ſide is high and rocky, and deſtitute of good water; and yet there are abundance of wild horſes, aſſes, antelopes, and wolves; as alſo a fierce creature called a jolbart, which the Tartars ſay is of ſuch prodigious ſtrength as to carry off a horſe. It is ſurpriſing that this lake ſhould be quite unknown to geographers, till within theſe few years. Several great rivers, which were ſuppoſed to run into the Caſpian Sea, are now known to fall into this lake, particularly the Sihun or Sirr, and the Gihun or Amo, ſo often mentioned by the oriental hiſtorians. There was a communication between this lake and the Caſpian Sea, by means of the Oxus; but now that river is almoſt loſt in the ſands. It lies between fifty-ſix and ſixty-two degrees of eaſt longitude, and between twelve and forty-ſeven of north latitude, in the country of the independant Tartars.

ARAM (EUGENE) a perſon remarkable for being a prodigy of learning, conſidering his education, and poſſeſſing ſuperior abilities that were degraded by an enormous crime, was born at Ramſgill, a little village in Netherdale, Yorkſhire, and went to ſchool near Rippon, till he was capable of reading the New Teſtament, which was all he was ever taught, except a long time after, when he received about a month's inſtructions from a clergyman. At the age of thirteen or fourteen he attended his father, who was a gardener at Newby, where his propenſity to literature firſt diſcovered itſelf. Mathematics firſt engaged his attention, and he ſoon underſtood quadratic equations, and their geometrical conſtructions. At ſixteen years of age he became book-keeper to a tradeſman in London; but after ſtaying here a year or two, went to Bondgate, where he renewed his mathematical ſtudies, but ſoon after turned with avidity, to poetry, hiſtory, and antiquities, the charms of which quite deſtroyed all the heavier beauties of numbers, whoſe application and properties he now purſued no longer, except occaſionally in teaching. After ſome time he was invited into Netherdale, his native air, where he firſt engaged in a ſchool, and there married: after which, prompted by an irreſiſtible thirſt of knowledge, he determined to make himſelf maſter of the learned languages. He got and repeated all Lilly's Grammar by heart. He next undertook Camden's Greek Grammar, which he alſo repeated in the ſame manner. Thus inſtructed, he entered upon the Latin claſſics, and at firſt hung over five lines for a whole day, never in all the painful courſe of his reading leaving any paſſage till he thought he perfectly comprehended it. Having accurately peruſed all the Latin claſſics, both hiſtorians and poets, he went through the Greek Teſtament, and then applied to Heſiod, Homer, Theocritus, Herodotus, Thucydides, and all the Greek tragedians. In the midſt of theſe literary purſuits, he went, in 1734, on the invitation of William Norton, Eſq. to Knareſborough, where he became well eſteemed, and here, with indefatigable diligence, he acquired the knowledge of the Hebrew. In April, 1744, he came again to London, and taught both Latin and Writing, at Mr. Painblac's, in Piccadilly, above two years. He next went to Hays, where he ſtaid in the capacity of writing-maſter, in a boarding-ſchool, and afterwards with a clergyman, between three and four years. He at length ſucceeded to ſeveral other places in the ſouth of England, making uſe of every opportunity for improvement. He was afterwards employed in tranſcribing the acts of parliament to be regiſtered in Chancery, and about the beginning of December, 1757, went down to the free-ſchool at Lynn. From his leaving Knareſborough to this period, which was a long interval, he had filled up with the farther ſtudy of hiſtory and antiquities, and alſo of heraldry and botany. Few plants, either domeſtic or exotic, were unknown to him. Amidſt all this, he ventured upon the Chaldee and Arabic, but had not time to obtain any great knowledge of the latter. The Chaldee he found eaſy enough, on account of its connection with the Hebrew. He then inveſtigated the Celtic, as far as poſſible, in all its dialects; began collections, and made compariſons between that, the Engliſh, the Latin, the Greek, and even the Hebrew: he had made notes, and compared above three thouſand words together, and found ſuch a ſurpriſing affinity, that he was determined to proceed thro' the whole of all theſe languages, and form a comparative lexicon. He was alſo far from being a contemptible poet. With this immenſe ſtock of learning, acquired by his own abilities, without the aſſiſtance of a maſter, and the moſt ſurpriſing talents, which might have made him ſhine in any ſtation of life, it is to be lamented that he was guilty of an action inconſiſtent with every principle of humanity; for in the year 1758, he was taken up at Lynn, in Norfolk, for the murder of Daniel Clark, a ſhoemaker of Knareſborough, who had been miſſing upwards of thirteen years, and removed to York caſtle, where being brought to his trial, on the 3d of Auguſt, 1759, he read a moſt admirable defence, in which he ſhewed equal modeſty, good ſenſe, and learning; but was found guilty, and the next morning confeſſed the juſtice of his ſentence, acknowledging to a clergyman, that his motive for committing the murder was his ſuſpecting Clark of having an unlawful commerce with his wife. When he was called from bed to have his irons taken off, he refuſed to riſe, alledging that he was very weak. On examination it was found that he had attempted to take away his own life, by cutting his arm in two places with a razor. Though weak, he was conducted to the gallows of York, and there executed.

ARAMONT, a town of Languedoc, in France, ſeated on the river Rhone, five miles weſt of Avignon, and fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Uxes. Lon. 4. 52. E. Lat. 43. 54. N.

ARANDE DE DUERO, a town of Spain, which is pretty large and handſome. It is in Old Caſtile, on the river Duero, twenty-five miles weſt of Oſma, and forty two eaſt of Valadolid. Long. 3. 3. W. Lat. 41. 40. N.

ARANJUEZ, a palace of the king of Spain, ſeated upon the Tajo or Tagus, in New Caſtile, about ſeven miles from Madrid, and eighteen from Toledo. It ſtands in a ſmall iſland, formed by the confluence of the rivers Tajo and Xarama, over which there are two large wooden bridges, finely ornamented, which may be ſhut up, ſo that Aranjuez is not only a pleaſure houſe, but a place of ſafety. The gardens, the caſcades, the grottoes, the fine fountains, and the large walks, render it one of the moſt agreeable places in all Spain. Long. 3. 0. W. Lat. 40. 0. N.

ARARAT, a mountain of Armenia, ſuppoſed to be the place where Noah's ark reſted. It is exceeding high, and always covered with ſnow. Several travellers have attempted to get at the top, but could never ſucceed. However, they have been high enough to tremble at the terrible precipices when they looked downwards. Some relate a great many fables concerning it, but ſo groſs, that they muſt be very willing to be impoſed upon who believes them. In clear weather it may be ſeen at the diſtance of five days journey and is about thirty-five miles ſouth of Erivan.

ARAS, a river in Aſia, which ariſes in the mountains of Armenia, about five leagues from the ſource of the Euphrates, and running from weſt to eaſt, traverſes the province of Aran; and being enlarged by the waters of ſeveral rivers, falls into the Kor or Kur, and with it deſcends into the Caſpian Sea. This river has always been celebrated for its rapidity, but more eſpecially when the ſnow of the neighbouring mountains begins to melt. And yet in ſome places it is ſo ſhallow, that camels can ſometimes wade over it.

ARATUS, of Sicyon, the ſon of Clinias and Ariſtodama, was general of the Achæans, and one of the greateſt captains Greece has produced. He reſtored the liberties of his country which had been deſtroyed by Abantides, who had killed his father. He ſurpriſed the fortreſs of Corinth, drove out the king of Macedon, and delivered Argos from its tyrants; but was at laſt poiſoned by Philip II. king of Macedon, about two hundred and fourteen years before the Chriſtian æra. Aratus wrote an hiſtory of the Achæans, of which Polybius has given a great elogium.

ARATUS, of Cilicia, a celebrated poet and aſtronomer, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, two hundred and ſeventy-two years before Chriſt, compoſed in elegant Greek verſes, a poem entitled The Phœnomena, which Cicero tranſlated into Latin verſe. The beſt edition of this poem is that of Grotius, printed in 1600, in quarto.

ARAUCO, a fortreſs and town of Chili, in South America, is ſeated in one of the fineſt vallies, on a river of the ſame name. The natives are ſo brave, that they drove the Spaniards out of their country, though they had no fire-arms. Long. 51. 20. W. Lat. 42. 30. S.

ARAW, a town of the canton of Berne, in Swiſſerland, is ſeated on the top of a little hill, at the foot of which the river Aar runs. It is a handſome town enough, moderately large, and remarkable for its church, fountains, and the fertility of the ſoil. A ſmall rivulet runs through it, in which the inhabitants keep a great quantity of fiſh in trunks. The reformed cantons have made it the place of their aſſemblies. It ſtands twenty eight miles weſt of Zurich. Long. 18. 0. E. Lat. 47. 25. N.

ARAXES, or ARAS, which is its preſent name, a river of Aſia, which riſes in Georgia, and running ſouth-eaſt, falls into the river Kur, formerly Cyrus. It runs quite acroſs Armenia, and part of Perſia.

ARBA, a town of the republic of Venice, in an iſland of the ſame name, near the coaſt of Dalmatia, from which it is only five miles diſtant, and is the ſee of a biſhop. Long. 32. 54. E. Lat. 44. 55. N.

ARBACES, governor of the Medes for Sardanapolis, king of Aſſyria, rebelled againſt his ſovereign, and entered into an alliance with Beleſis, ſeven hundred and fifty years before Chriſt. Three years after, Sardanapolis burnt himſelf in his own palace, when Arbaces being proclaimed king, he began the monarchy of the Medes, which laſted three hundred and ſeventeen years, under nine kings, till Aſtyages was driven from the throne by Cyrus.

ARBOGASTUS (Count) was ſent by Theodoſius, with an army, into Gaul, againſt Victor, the ſon of Maximus: he attacked and ſlew him in the year three hundred and eighty-nine, by which he gained great reputation, both at court, and in the army; but having afterwards involved Valentinian in an unſucceſsful war, that emperor was ſo diſpleaſed, that he gave him a written order to quit his employments; but Arbogaſtus being grown inſolent from the credit he had gained amongſt the ſoldiers, tore the order to pieces before his face, and Valentinian was ſoon after found ſtrangled in his bed at Vienne, in Dauphiny, the year 392. Arbogaſtus being afterwards charged with this murder, and fearing to fall into the hands of Theodoſius, he laid violent hands on himſelf, in the year 394.

ARBASSI, a maritime town of Italy, which drives a good trade, is well peopled, and extremely neat. It is ſeated in the ſtate of Genoa, three miles ſouth-weſt of Albingua, and thirty-eight north-eaſt of Ventimiglia. Long. 8. 15. Lat 44. 3. N.

ARBEL, or HARPEL, the ancient Arbela, ſeated in Curdiſtan, in Aſia, famous for the deciſive battle fought between Alexander the Great, and Darius, king of Perſia, in which the laſt was overthrown. It is now a large town, but the houſes are very mean, and the walls that ſurround it of no manner of ſtrength. It is the place of reſidence of a Turkiſh ſangiack. Long. 44. 5. E. Lat. 35. 15. N.

ARBERG, a town in the canton of Berne, in Swiſſerland, on the banks of the Aar. It is very ſtrongly ſeated on a rock, and defended by a fortreſs, cut almoſt entirely out of the rock. It is thirty miles to the weſt of Zurich. Long. 7. 55. E. Lat. 47. 10. N.

ARBON, an ancient town in Swiſſerland, on the ſouth banks of the lake Conſtance, in Thurgaw. It has a caſtle, built by the Romans, and is under the juriſdiction of the biſhop of Conſtance. In time of war the Swiſs have a right to put in a garriſon. The Popiſh and Proteſtant religions are equally tolerated in this town. It is eight miles north-eaſt of St. Gall. Long. 9. 30. E. Lat. 47. 38. N

ARBOIS, a ſmall, but populous town of France, in the Franche Comté, is famous for its good wine. It is ſeated between Salins and Poligni, five miles from each. Long. 5. 40. E. Lat. 46. 55. N.

ARBRISSEL (ROBERT D') the founder of the religious order of Fontevraud, was born at Arbriſſel, in the dioceſe of Rennes, and after being archdeacon of Rennes, retired to Angers, where he preached with ſuch ſucceſs, that in a ſhort time he was followed by vaſt multitudes of people, of both ſexes:

ſexes: he then built cells in the wood of Fontevraud, and became the founder of that order, about the year 1100. He died in 1117, at the priory of Orſan.

ARBUTHNOT, a noble family in Scotland, which was raiſed to the peerage in the perſon of Sir Robert Arbuthnot, who, on the 16th of November, 1641, was created viſcount Arbuthnot, which honour is ſtill enjoyed by his deſcendants.

ARBUTHNOT (ALEXANDER) was the ſon of the baron Arbuthnot, and was born in the year 1538. He publiſhed Buchanan's Hiſtory of Scotland, in which, though he acted only as editor, it procured him a great deal of ill will, and in all probability gave king James VI. an ill impreſſion of him. His private character was very amiable; he was learned without pedantry, and a great encourager of learning; he had a good taſte in poetry, was an eminent divine, and was well verſed in philoſophy and the mathematics. He died at Aberdeen, on the 20th of October, 1583. He alſo wrote Orations on the Origin and Dignity of the Law.

ARBUTHNOT (Dr. JOHN) an eminent phyſician and celebrated wit, in the reign of queen Anne, was the ſon of an epiſcopal clergyman, in Scotland, and was educated in the univerſity of Aberdeen, where he took the degree of doctor of phyſic. On his coming to London, his extenſive learning, with his facetious and agreeable converſation, introduced him, by degrees, into practice, and he became eminent in his profeſſion; ſo that in 1709, he was appointed phyſician in ordinary to queen Anne. His polite learning, gentle manners, and excellent abilities, procured him the acquaintance and friendſhip of the moſt celebrated wits, Pope, Swift, and Gay. He died of an aſthma, at his houſe in Cork-ſtreet, Burlington-gardens, in February 1735. He has ſhewn by his works that he was equal to any of his cotemporaries, in humour, vivacity, and learning; and was ſuperior to moſt men in the moral duties of life, in acts of humanity and benevolence. He wrote, 1. An Examination of Dr. Woodward's Account of the Deluge. 2. Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Meaſures. 3. An Eſſay concerning the Nature of Aliments. 4. The Effects of Air on Human Bodies. His Miſcellaneous Works are printed in two volumes, octavo, and are ſaid to comprehend, with what is inſerted in Swift's Miſcellanies, all his pieces of wit and humour.

ARC, or DU LYS (JOAN OF) more known under the name of the Maid of Orleans, a celebrated French heroine, cauſed the Engliſh to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, defeated Talbot at the battle of Patai, and cauſed Charles VII. to be crowned at Rheims, on the 17th of July, 1429. But this brave girl, after performing ſuch ſignal ſervices for her native country, being taken by the Engliſh, was unhappily burnt for a witch, at Rouen, on the 30th of May, 1430. An inſtance of barbarity that can only be excuſed by the ignorance and ſuperſtition of that age.

ARC EN BARROIS, a town of Burgundy, in France, ſeated on the ſmall river Anjou, thirty-five miles north of Dijon, and fourteen north-weſt of Langres. Long. 5. 7. E. Lat. 47. 55. N.

ARCADIA, a ſmall town of Greece, in the Morea, near the gulph of the ſame name, in the province of Belvidera. It is twenty-eight miles north of Nevarin, and twenty-three ſouth of Longanico. Long. 22. 5. E. Lat. 37. 20. N.

ARCADIUS, emperor of the Eaſt, was the eldeſt ſon of Theodoſius the Great, by the empreſs Flaccilla, and was born in Spain, about the year 377. He was honoured with the title of Auguſtus in 383, and ſucceeded to the empire on the death of Theodoſius, January 17, 395, while Honorius, his brother, was emperor of the Weſt. Rufinus, prefect of the pretorian band, not being able to prevail on Arcadius to marry his daughter, called in the Barbarians, and threw the empire of the Eaſt into the moſt dreadful confuſion; but he was at laſt killed at Conſtantinople; and Eutropius, the favourite of Arcadius, who had brought about his marriage with Eudoxa, but afterwards occaſioned new confuſions, ſuffered the ſame fate. Arcadius was very much inferior to his father in the qualifications of his mind, as well as body, and having neither ſenſe nor conduct, the whole authority fell into the hands of Eudoxa, who made an ill uſe of her power, and is particularly cenſured for baniſhing St. Chryſoſtom. Arcadius died on the firſt of May, 408, aged thirty-one.

ARCERE (ANTHONY) one of the fathers of the Oratory, celebrated for his attempt to compile a Dictionary of the Turkiſh Language, was born at Marſeilles, in 1664, and died on the 22d of January 1699, when but thirty-nine years of age. He left behind him, in manuſcript, grammars of moſt languages, eſpecially of the Oriental.

ARCESILAUS, a celebrated Greek philoſopher, about three hundred years before the Chriſtian æra, was born at Pitane, in Æolis. He affirmed nothing, but doubted of every thing, and warmly attacked all that the other ſects had advanced; but there are ſome who ſay, that he acted the ſceptic only to try his ſcholars, and that after this proof, he taught them in another manner. This philoſopher was remarkable for his liberality and generoſity.

ARCEUIL, a village of France, three miles ſouth of Paris, remarkable for an aqueduct, which is thought by ſome to equal the works of the ancient Romans. It was built and finiſhed in 1624, by the order of Mary de Medicis; its water is diſtributed into the different parts of Paris.

ARCHANGEL, a city of Ruſſia, and capital of the province of Archangel, ſeated on the eaſtern ſide of the river Dwina, which falls into the White Sea. The houſes are all built with wood, and have ſtoves in every room to mitigate the extreme coldneſs of the weather. There is a citadel ſurrounded with wood walls; likewiſe, a town-houſe or hall, wherein the courts of juſtice are kept; in which there are lodgings for merchants, while their ſhips are in the port. The partridges, which are very cheap, are white in the winter, and of the uſual colour in ſummer. All ſorts of proviſions and other neceſſaries are very cheap. There is a governor to take care of military affairs, and four burgomaſters to manage the civil government. This town was formerly a place of very great trade, but it is much diminiſhed ſince the building of Peterſburg. Long. 40. 12. E. Lat. 64. 26. N.

ARCHELAUS, a celebrated Greek philoſopher, the diſciple of Anaxagoras, flouriſhed about four hundred and forty-four years before Chriſt. He read lectures at Athens, and it is ſaid, was the firſt who tranſferred philoſophy thither. He made natural philoſophy his chief ſtudy, as did his predeceſſors; but engaged in moral philoſophy a little more than they had done. Socrates, the moſt illuſtrious of his diſciples, was his ſucceſſor.

ARCHELAUS I. king of Macedon, the natural ſon of king Perdiccas, aſcended the throne, and maintained himſelf in it, by the murder of his uncle, his couſin, and one of his own brothers, his father's legitimate ſon. Yet this wretch was a lover of letters, and the polite ſciences, and had in his houſe the greateſt poets, the moſt famous painters, and the beſt muſicians. He was killed by one of his favourites, about three hundred and ninety-nine years before Chriſt.

ARCHELAUS, the ſon of Archelaus, high prieſt of Camana and Glaphyra, obtained the crown of Cappadocia by the favour of Mark Antony, thirty-ſix years before Chriſt; in return for which, he aſſiſted him with his troops at the battle of Actium. He was ſo happy as to maintain his authority under Auguſtus. He afterwards aſſiſted Tiberius in reeſtabliſhing Tigranes in Armenia, and obtained of Auguſtus the Leſſer Armenia, and good part of Cilicia: but Tiberius, offended at the ſignal manner in which he paid his court to Caius Cæſar, who had been ſent into the Eaſt by his grandfather Auguſtus, cited him, under other pretences, to appear at Rome, where he died, A. D. 16. and after his death, Cappadocia was reduced into a province.

ARCHELAUS, the ſon of Herod the Great, was declared king of Judea the ſecond year after the birth of Chriſt. He put to death three thouſand perſons before he went to Rome to be confirmed by Auguſtus. However, that emperor gave him half of what had been poſſeſſed by his father; but at length, on freſh complaints exhibited againſt him by the Jews, he baniſhed him to Vienne in Gaul, A. D. 6. where he died.

ARCHELAUS, the ſon of Apollonius, one of the greateſt ſculptors of antiquity, was a native of Ionia, and is thought to have lived in the time of the emperor Claudius. He executed in marble, the apotheoſis of Homer. This maſterpiece in ſculpture was found in 1568, in a place named Fratocchia, belonging to the princes of Colonna, where it is ſaid, the emperor Claudius had a pleaſure-houſe. Father Kircher, Cupert, Spanheim, and ſeveral other learned antiquaries, have given a deſcription and explication of this work.

ARCHELAUS, biſhop of Caſchara, or Carrhæ, in Meſopotamia, rendered himſelf famous by his diſputes with Manes, which he held before a great number of Pagans, in 277, when Manes being confounded, retired to an obſcure village, where challenging the prieſt of that place to a diſputation, the biſhop followed him thither, and again ſilenced him. Socrates has given theſe diſputes in his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory.

ARCHEMORUS, the ſon of Lycurgus, king of Thrace, having been left on the graſs by his nurſe, was killed by a ſerpent. It is ſaid that this accident, cauſed by his nurſe's negligence, occaſioned the inſtitution of the Nemean games, one of the four great games of Greece. They were celebrated every three years, at Nemæa, in Peloponneſus ARCHIAS, a Greek poet, whom Cicero defended with great eloquence, about ſixty years before the birth of Chriſt.

ARCHIDAMIA, See CLEONYMUS

ARCHIDAMUS, king of Sparta, the ſon of Ageſilaus the Great, ſucceeded his father about three hundred and fifty-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra. He defeated the Arcadians, dians, repulſed Epaminondas, and was killed in Italy, where he landed with an army, in order to ſuccour the Tarentines. There were ſeveral other kings of Sparta of the ſame name.

ARCHILOCHUS, a celebrated Greek poet, born in the iſle of Paros, lived ſix hundred and ſixty years before the Chriſtian æra. He was one of the firſt who compoſed iambic verſes. His poetry, ſays Quintilian, is full of ſtrength, his thoughts lively and brilliant, and his ſtyle grand and nervous. He wrote a ſatire againſt Lycambes, which was ſo keen and ſevere, that Lycambes hanged himſelf: his writings were ſo ſtuffed with ſlander, that the Spartans were forbid to read them. He was killed in battle, and but few of his works are preſerved.

ARCHIMEDES, an excellent mathematician, born at Syracuſe, in Sicily, and the firſt who taught hydroſtatics. He is ſaid to have told Hiero, king of Syracuſe, his relation and friend, that if he could find another earth, in which he might place his machines, he would engage to lift this out of its place. It is alſo ſaid, that he made a glaſs ſphere, of ſurpriſing workmanſhip, in which the motions of the heavenly bodies were ſhewn. He diſcovered the exact quantity of the ſilver which a goldſmith had mixed with the gold, in a crown he had made for the king: he had the hint of this diſcovery from his perceiving the water riſe up the ſides of the bath as he went into it, and was filled with ſuch joy, that he ran naked out of the bath, crying "I have found it! "I have found it!" By the invention of machines, he, for a long time, defended Syracuſe, on its being beſieged by Marcellus, and it is ſaid, that he even found out a method of ſetting fire to the ſhips, by means of burning-glaſſes. On the city's being taken, that noble general commanded his ſoldiers to have a particular regard to the ſafety of this truly great man; but his care was ineffectual. What gave Marcellus the greateſt concern, ſays Plutarch, was the unhappy Archimedes, who was at that time in his muſæum, and his mind, as well as his eyes, ſo fixed and intent upon ſome geometrical figures, that he neither heard the noiſe and hurry of the Romans, nor perceived the city was taken. In this depth of ſtudy and contemplation, a ſoldier came ſuddenly upon him, and commanded him to follow him to Marcellus, which he refuſing to do till he had finiſhed his problem, the ſoldier, in a rage, drew his ſword, and ran him through the body. Others have related the circumſtances of his death in a ſomewhat different manner. It however happened two hundred and eight years before the Chriſtian æra. Cicero, when he was quæſtor, in Italy, diſcovered his tomb, on which was carved a cylinder and ſphere. Some of the works of this great mathematician are loſt, but others are preſerved; the beſt edition of which is that printed in London, in 1675, in quarto.

ARCHIMELUS, a Greek poet, who flouriſhed in the time of Archimedes. He made an epigram in praiſe of a ſhip of a prodigious bulk, built by Hiero, king of Syracuſe, for which that prince ſent him a thouſand buſhels of corn.

ARCHIROTA (ALEXANDER) abbot of Olivet, was born at Naples, and flouriſhed in 1636. He lived a hundred and twenty years, and, among other books, compoſed a Collection of the Actions of the Kings mentioned in Scripture, and a Treatiſe upon the Vow of Poverty.

ARCHIPELAGO, a part of the Mediterranean ſea, between Romania on the north; Anatolia on the eaſt; Macedonia, Livadia, and the Morea on the weſt; and the iſle of Candia on the ſouth. Part of it belongs to Europe, and part to Aſia. The iſlands in the Archipelago are very numerous; ſome reckon them to be forty-five, others more. There are other iſlands in Aſia and America, to which they have given this name.

ARCHON, Αρχων, in Grecian antiquity, a name given to each of the chief magiſtrates of Athens, who were nine in number, and had all the common name of archantes or rulers. Theſe had all the power of puniſhing malefactors with death; were all crowned with garlands of myrtle; and had a joint commiſſion of enquiring into the behaviour of other magiſtrates. And as a recompence for their ſervices, they were free from all taxes and contributions exacted of other citizens, for the building of ſhips of war, which was a privilege granted to none beſides themſelves. If any perſon had the inſolence to ſtrike or publicly affront any of the archons adorned with crowns, or any other to whom the citizens had given a crown, or other honour, he was puniſhed with infamy, as a diſreſpect paid to the whole community. But beſides theſe offices and privileges which they enjoyed in common, there were others peculiar to each.

The chief of the nine, who was called Archon by way of eminence, determined all cauſes between men and their wives; and every thing relating to wills, dowries, legacies, and orphans; he heard the complaints of neighbours, &c. made proviſion for the celebration of the feaſts, plays, &c. If he was found guilty of being overcome with drink during the time of his office, he was puniſhed with death.

The ſecond archon, who was called Baſileus, decided all diſputes which happened among the prieſts, aſſiſted at the Eleuſinian and Lenæan feſtivals, and at ſuch races in which the people ran with torches in their hands. He offered public ſacrifices; and diſputes about inanimate things, and accuſations of murder, were brought before him.

The third archon, named Polemarchos, had under his care all the ſtrangers at Athens; he offered ſacrifices to Enyalius (by ſome ſuppoſed to be Mars) and to Diana, and took care that the children of thoſe who loſt their lives in the ſervice of their country, were provided for out of the public treaſury.

The ſix remaining archons were called by one common name, Theſmothetæ. Theſe received complaints againſt perſons guilty either of giving falſe accuſations, or of bribery, or impiety; judged in all cauſes and diſputes between the citizens aud ſtrangers; controverſies about trade and merchandiſe; ratified all public contracts, and appointed the days when the judges were to ſit and hear cauſes.

ARCHYTAS of Tarentum, a philoſopher of the Pythagorean ſect, and a famous aſtronomer and geometrician, lived about four hundred and eight years before Chriſt. He is ſaid to have made a wooden pigeon that could fly, and to be the firſt that brought down the mathematics to common uſes. There are two epiſtles preſerved in Diogenes Laertius, one from Archytas to Plato, and another from Plato to Archytas. He commanded the army ſeven times, and was never defeated; but was at laſt caſt away in the Adriatic Sea, and thrown upon the coaſt of Apulia.

ARCIS SUR AUBE, a town of France, in Champagne, ſeated on the river Aube, fifteen miles north of Troyes, and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Sezanne. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

ARCO, a town of Italy, in the biſhopric of Trent, upon the river Sarca, near the north end of the lake Garda, and ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. It is ſixteen miles ſouth-weſt of Trent, and thirty north-weſt of Verona. Long. 9. 55. E. Lat. 45. 52. N.

ARCOS, a ſtrong city of Andaluſia, in Spain, ſeated on a high craggy rock, at the bottom of which runs the Guadaleto. Its ſtrength lies not only in its ſituation, but in the works erected for its defence, and it is inacceſſible on every ſide but one. The governor reſides in an old caſtle, from whence there is a delightful proſpect, which extends very far into the neighbouring country. Long. 2. 10. W. Lat. 36. 40. N.

ARCUDIUS (PETER) a prieſt of the Greek church, who was born at Corfu, and ſtudied at Rome. He was ſent to Ruſſia by Clement VIII. to terminate ſome affairs relating to religion: he at length attached himſelf to cardinal Borgheſe, and died at Rome about the year 1621. He wrote De Concordia Eccleſia Occidentalis & Orientalis in ſeptem Sacramentorum Adminiſtratione, and ſeveral other works.

ARDEBIL, or ARDEVIL, a town of Perſia, in the province of Adirbei-zan. It is ranked for dignity among the beſt cities of this kingdom, on account of its having been the reſidence and burying-place of ſome of the Perſian kings; particularly, the ſepulchre of ſheik Sefi is at this place, to which the people reſort in pilgrimage. He founded a place, which they call his kitchen, with a revenue ſufficient to maintain a thouſand poor people, and to feed them three times a day. Three or four of the largeſt principal ſtreets have ſhops, and are planted on each ſide with elms and linden trees, to keep off the exceſſive heat of the ſun; but the houſes are poorly built, with bricks dried in the ſun; and yet moſt of them, that are not in the bazars or market-places, have the pleaſure and conveniency of a garden full of trees bearing fruit; and there are large ſpots in the out parts of the town, where the houſes are at a diſtance from each other, and the ſpaces between planted with trees, which render the city of a large extent. The meidan, or great ſquare, is three hundred paces long, and one hundred and fifty broad, having ſhops all round, which, when this place was in a flouriſhing condition, were ſtored with all manner of valuable commodities.

Through the city there paſs two branches of a rivulet, which have been ſometimes ſo inlarged by the melting of the ſnow on the mountains, that they have been forced to make canals to divert the ſtream. In the reign of ſhaw Abbas, it broke down the dikes, and carried away a great number of houſes, with their furniture, and children in their cradles. The city is without walls, and is ſeated in the midſt of a large plain encompaſſed with mountains, the higheſt of which lies weſtward, and is always covered with ſnow. Theſe render the air ſometimes extremely hot, and at others intolerably cold, which occaſion epidemical diſtempers, that carry off great numbers of people. The ſoil produces no fruit near the city but apples, pears, and peaches, and yet is good both for corn and paſture. The ſheep are ſo numerous, numerous, that a hundred thouſand have paſſed over the city-bridge in a day. There are here ſeveral ſorts of mineral waters, which ſerve both for common bathing and for the cure of various diſeaſes; one of theſe is a ſulphureous ſpring, whoſe exhalations render the circumambient air extremely diſagreeable, and yet is good for the itch. There are three ſprings, which produce as hot water as if it was boiling, and from which waters are conveyed to the public baths in the city. About half a league from the city, on the right hand of the public road, there is a pool of ſtanding water, which is covered all over with ſalt like ice. This city is twenty-five miles eaſt of Tauris or Tabris. Long. 47. 30. E. Lat. 37. 55. N.

ARDEN (EDWARD) deſcended of an ancient and honourable family, ſeated at Parkhall, in Warwickſhire, was born in the year 1532. He was bred a Roman Catholic; and being tried for a plot againſt the life of queen Elizabeth, was hanged, drawn, and quartered, in Smithfield, December 20, 1583.

ARDENBURG, a town in Dutch Flanders, which was formerly very conſiderable, till it was diſmantled by the Dutch in 1604, ſince which time it has been fortified again, and was beſieged by the French in 1672, but without ſucceſs. It is divided into the Old and New Town, and has four gates. The foſſes are lined with free ſtone, and are ſurrounded with water. The church of Notre Dame is one of the fineſt in all Flanders. The Proteſtant religion is eſtabliſhed here. It is ten miles north-eaſt of Bruges. Long. 3. 30. E. Lat. 51. 16. N.

ARDENNE, a foreſt in France, formerly of a vaſt extent; but the trees are in many places grubbed up, and where they ſtood are built cities, towns, and abbies. At preſent it extends from Thionville, near the country of Liege, to Donchery and Sedan, on the confines of Champagne. The roads are ſo narrow in ſome places, that two waggons cannot paſs each other, and therefore the waggoners are obliged to provide themſelves with bells or horns to give one another notice to ſtop in time.

ARDES, a town of France, in Lower Auvergne, and the principal place of the duchy of Mercœur. It ſerves as a mart for the commodities and trade between Upper and Lower Auvergne; and is fifteen miles north-weſt of Brioude, and twenty-two ſouth of Clermont. Long. 3. 10. E. Lat. 45. 22. N.

ARDRA, once a kingdom on the coaſt of Guinea, between Whidaw and Benin, of which a town of the ſame name was the capital; but this and Whidaw have been conquered by the king of Dahomy. Their religion is Paganiſm. They all go naked, except wearing a cloth round the waiſt. The air is very unwholeſome to Europeans, and the ſmall-pox has made ſad havock among the natives. The country is fertile in Indian corn, wines, and fruits, which are to be had all the year. We ſhall treat more particularly of their manners and cuſtoms, when we come to mention the kingdom to which it is now ſubject.

ARDRES, a ſmall ſtrong town of France, in Lower Picardy, ſeated in the middle of a moraſs, five miles from Guines, eight ſouth of Calais, ten weſt of Gravelines, and one hundred and forty-eight north of Paris. Long. 2. 0. E. Lat. 50. 35. N.

ARDSCHIR BABEGAN, the firſt king of the dynaſty of Saſſanides, in Perſia, in the beginning of the third century. He mounted the throne of his anceſtors, and defeated Ardavan who had uſurped it. He poſſeſſed all civil and military virtues, and has left a journal of his life, that might ſerve as a model to all princes. He frequently ſaid, that "When "a king applies himſelf to do juſtice, the people from af-"fection pay him their obedience;" and that "the moſt "wicked of all princes is he who is feared by the good "and beloved by the wicked." He would not have the ſame puniſhment given to crimes of a very different nature, and often ſaid to his officers, "Never employ the ſword "when the cane is ſufficient."

AREBO, a town on the ſlave-coaſt, at the mouth of the river Formoſa, in Guinea. The houſes are built with trees and leaves. The Engliſh had once a factory here; but they have abandoned it: the Dutch, however, continue here ſtill. Long. 5 5. E. Lat. 5. 0. N.

ARELLIUS, a celebrated painter, who lived at Rome, about ſeven hundred years before the birth of Chriſt, and was as much admired for his excellent talent in painting, as he was condemned for the ſcandalous uſe he made of it, by taking all his ideas of the Goddeſſes from common ſtrumpets, and in ſeveral of his pieces placing his miſtreſſes in the heavens amongſt the Gods.

AREMBERG, a ſmall town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, defended by a caſtle. It is the capital of a county of the ſame name, and was erected into a principality by the emperor Maximilian II. in favour of John de Ligne, lord of Barbazon, who took the name of Aremberg. It is ſeated on the river Ayr, twenty three miles ſouth of Cologn, and twenty-five weſt of Coblentz. Long. 7. 3. E. Lat. 50. 27. N.

ARENA, or DES ARENS (ANTHONY) a Provencial poet, born at Souliers, in the dioceſe of Toulon, rendered himſelf famous by his macaronic verſes. He died in 1644. His principal work is the Deſcription of the War between Charles VIII. and the king of Naples.

ARENSBERG, a ſmall town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, upon the river Roer. It has a caſtle ſeated on a hill, in the county of the ſame name. It ſtands fifty miles north-eaſt of Cologn. Long. 8 20. E. Lat. 51. 25. N.

ARENSBOURG, an epiſcopal and maritime town of Livonia in Sweden, ſeated in the iſle of Oſel, in the Baltic Sea. Long. 22. 30. E. Lat. 58. 15. N.

AREOPAGUS, Αρειοπαγος, in Grecian antiquity, a ſenate or ſovereign court, held on Mars's Hill near Athens, famous for the juſtice and impartiality of its decrees. The number of perſons of which this ſolemn aſſembly was compoſed is not certainly known: however, their power was very great; they had the diſpoſal and management of the public funds; the care of all the young men in the city particularly belonged to them, and their power extended to all ages and ſexes; they puniſhed thoſe guilty of impiety or immorality, and had power to reward the virtuous. Two things are very remarkable; the firſt, that they ſat in the open air; and the ſecond, that they heard and determined all cauſes in the dark, that, by ſeeing neither the plaintiff nor defendant, their judgment might remain unbiaſſed.

AREQUIPA. See ARIQUIPA.

ARESI (PAUL) biſhop of Tortona, made it his glory to be the Mecænas of the learned. He wrote a Treatiſe Della Sacre Impreze; and ſeveral other works.

ARETA, the mother of Ariſtippus, who inſtructed her ſon in philoſophy and the ſciences, on which account he was called Metrodidacte, i. e. taught by his mother.

ARETÆUS of Cappadocia, a Greek phyſician, of the ſect of the Pneumatiſts, lived in the reign of Trajan. He wrote ſeveral Treatiſes, in the Ionian dialect, on acute diſeaſes, and other medicinal ſubjects, ſome of which are ſtill extant. The beſt edition of his works is that of Boerhaave, in Greek and Latin, with notes, printed in 1731; that of Wigan printed at Oxford in 1723, in folio, is alſo much eſteemed.

ARETAPHILIA, a lady of diſtinguiſhed fortitude, in the time of the Mithridatic war, was daughter of Æglator and wife of Phædimus. Nicocrates having ſeized the government of Cyrene in Libya, among many other acts of cruelty, put Phædimus to death, and obliged Aretaphilia to marry him. Regardleſs of her own intereſt, ſhe now reſolved to revenge the injuries done to her country by diſpatching the tyrant; but being diſcovered, ſhe was put to the torture, when ſhe alledged, that the poiſon ſhe had prepared was only a love-potion, and bore the torture with ſuch fortitude, that ſhe was acquitted of the crime. After this, ſhe prevailed on Leander, Nicocrates's brother, to get him aſſaſſinated; and Leander afterwards following the ſteps of his predeceſſor, ſhe took meaſures to deſtroy him likewiſe. The people of Cyrene being thus reſcued from tyranny, offered to give Aretaphilia a ſhare in their government, in conjunction with their magiſtrates; but ſhe rejected this offer, and retired from all public affairs to the management of her domeſtic employments.

ARETHUSA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Nereus and Coris, and the companion of Diana, who changed her into a fountain to deliver her from the purſuit of her lover Alpheus.

ARETIN (GUIDO) a Benedictine monk, lived in the eleventh century, and became famous for diſcovering a new method of learning muſic by the ſix notes, ut, re, mi, fa, ſol, la. Upon this ſubject he publiſhed a book intiled Micrologus, and a Letter, which has been inſerted by cardinal Baronius in his Annals, under the year 1022. It is ſaid that Aretin borrowed the above ſix notes from the firſt ſyllable of every line in the following hymn:

UT queant laxis REſonare fibris
MIra geſtorum FAmuli tuorum
SOLve pollutis LAbiis reatum.

ARETIN (JOHN) ſurnamed FORTELLIUS, one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth century, was principally ſkilled in the knowledge of grammar, as he ſhewed by his book De Poteſtate Literarum; he alſo wrote a Lexicon, and other works.

ARETIN (LEONARD) one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth century, was ſecretary to the republic of Florence, and tranſlated from the Greek into Latin ſome of the Lives of Plutarch, and Ariſtotle's Ethics: he alſo compoſed three books of the Punic war, that may ſerve as a ſupplement to thoſe wanting in Livy; the hiſtory of the tranſactions in Italy during his time; that of ancient Greece; that of the Goths; that of the republic of Florence; and many other books. He died in 1443, aged ſeventy-four.

ARETIN (FRANCIS) a celebrated profeſſor of law, ſtudied at Sienna about the year 1443, and afterwards taught law there with ſuch reputation, that he was called the Prince of Subtleties. He gave his opinion with ſuch confidence to thoſe who conſulted him, that when he approved their cauſe, he aſſured them they would gain it, which always proved true. He alſo taught in the univerſity of Piſa, and in that of Ferrara; and pope Sixtus IV. declared, that he would have given him a cardinal's hat, had he not thought he ſhould have done a public injury, by depriving the youth of ſuch an excellent profeſſor. He tranſlated into Latin the Commentaries of St. Chryſoſtom upon St. John, and about twenty homilies of the ſame father: he alſo tranſlated the Letters of Phalaris into Latin, and wrote a treatiſe De Balneis Puteolanis.

ARETINE (PETER) a native of Arezzo, famous for his obſcene and ſatyrical writings. He was called the Scourge of Princes, and boaſted that he had put under contribution thoſe to whom other men paid tribute and taxes. Francis I. king of France, the emperor Charles V. moſt of the princes of Italy, ſeveral cardinals, and many noblemen, courted his friendſhip by preſents, either becauſe they liked his compoſitions, or perhaps from an apprehenſion of falling under the laſh of his ſatire; upon which, it is ſaid, he had the vanity to get a medal ſtruck, on one ſide of which he was repreſented with theſe words, IL DIVINO ARETINO; and on the reverſe, ſitting upon a throne, receiving the preſents of princes, with theſe words, I PRINCIPI TRIBUTATI DA POPOLI TRIBUTANO IL SERVIDOR LORO. Some imagine that he gave himſelf the title of Divine from his performing the functions of a God upon earth, by the thunderbolts with which he ſtruck the heads of the higheſt perſonages. He uſed to boaſt, that his lampoons did more ſervice to the world than ſermons; and it was ſaid of him, that he had ſubjected more princes by his pen, than the greateſt had ever done by their arms. He wrote, 1. a work intitled Ragionamenti; 2. ſix volumes of letters; 3. ſeveral comedies; and even ſome devotional pieces. He died at Venice, about the year 1556, being ſixty-five years old. It is reported, that he fell into ſuch a fit of laughing on hearing a ſmutty ſtory, that he overturned the chair upon which he ſat, and that in the fall he hurt his head, and died upon the ſpot.

AREZZO, a city of Italy, in Tuſcany, ſeated in the territory of Florence, on the declivity of a hill that overlooks the neighbouring plain, between the Citta di Caſtelli and Florence. It is an ancient city and a biſhop's ſee, and was famous for a kind of earthen ware much eſteemed by the Romans. It was greatly fallen to decay when Coſmo de Medicis took it under his protection, ſince which it has been recovering gradually. It is famed for being the birth-place of Mecænas; and it is ſixteen miles weſt of Citta di Caſtelli, and twenty-eight north-weſt of Sienna. Long. 12. 2. E. Lat. 43. 27. N.

ARGALL (JOHN) the ſon of Thomas Argall, was born at London, and took the degree of maſter of arts at Oxford, in 1565, after which he obtained the living of Haleſworth, in Suffolk. He was the author of two tracts; the one intitled, De vera Penitentia; the other, Introductio ad Artem dialecticam; but being at a feaſt, at Cheſton, near Haleſworth, he died ſuddenly at the table, and was buried October 8, 1606.

ARGALL (RICHARD) a celebrated poet in the reign of king James I. He wrote Solomon's Songs in Engliſh heroics; the Bride's Ornament; and a Funeral Elegy, on the death of Dr. King, biſhop of London; beſides two books of Meditations that have never been publiſhed.

ARGENCES, a town of Lower Normandy, in France, ten miles eaſt of Caen, and thirteen north of Falaiſe. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 49. 15. N.

ARGENS, a river of France, in Provence, which has its ſource in the marquiſate of Oliares, and falls into the Mediterranean near Frejus

ARGENTAC, a town of France, in Limoſin, on the river Dordogne, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Tulles, and twenty-five north-weſt of Aurillac. Long. 2. 3. E. Lat. 45. 5. N.

ARGENTEUIL, a town of the Iſle of France, ſeated on the river Seine, five miles north-weſt of Paris, and twelve ſouth-eaſt of Pontoiſe It is a very beautiful place, with a fine vineyard. In the priory of the Benedictine monks, they pretend to have a ſeamleſs coat of Jeſus Chriſt; and in the environs they have quarries of the plaiſter of Paris. Long. 2. 28. E. Lat. 48. 52. N.

ARGENTIERE, a ſmall iſland in the Archipelago, near Milo. It is about eighteen miles in compaſs, and is full of barren mountains, producing nothing but barley, cotton, and a few grapes fit only for eating. The barley and cotton are ſown round the only village there is in the iſland. The ladies are handſome enough, and take up with the ſailors who put into the port, and have no other employment but making cotton ſtockings. The men all uſe the ſea, and in time become good pilots. They have very little religion, are very ignorant, and of very bad morals. Juſtice is adminiſtered by an itinerant cadi, who is ſometimes the only muſſulman in the whole iſland. The only article relating to natural hiſtory is the Terra Cimolia ſo highly eſteemed by the ancients; it is a kind of white chalk, which is very heavy without taſte and crumbles eaſily; they uſe it in waſhing linen, it anſwering the purpoſe. Long. 23. 10. E. Lat. 36. 50. N.

ARGENTIERE, a town of France, in Languedoc, and in the Viverais, five miles ſouth-weſt of Aubenas, and ſixteen weſt of Viviers. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 44 30. N.

ARGENTON, a ſmall town of France, in the duchy of Berry, divided into two parts by the river Creuſe, called the High and Low Town. The High Town has its particular encloſure, with four gates, one of which communicates with the Low Town. The markets, the courts of juſtice, the chapel of St. Benedict, the college, and the tower, which ſerves for a priſon, are in the High Town: the convent of Cordeliers and the church of St. Saviour are in the Low Town. It is one hundred and thirty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 38. E Lat. 40. 30. N.

ARGENTAN, a town of France, in Lower Normandy, ſeated in the middle of a fertile plain, and the river Orne paſſes through the middle. It has four gates, and four ſuburbs, the ſtreets of which, as well as thoſe of the town, are large, and the houſes regularly built. There are three pariſhes, and a convent of Benedictines in the city; that of the Capuchins, the Dominicans, and the nunnery of St. Clair, are in the ſuburbs. The town is defended by walls, flanked with towers, and ſurrounded with foſſes, as alſo with an old caſtle, in the court of which ſtands St. John's chapel. The Hotel Dieu and the hoſpital have likewiſe each a chapel. There is a fine walk on the ramparts ſhaded with trees. It is thirty-eight miles north-weſt of Seez, fifteen ſouth-eaſt of Falaiſe, and one hundred and ten from Paris. Long. 0. Lat. 48. 54. N.

ARGENTERIUS (JOHN) a celebrated phyſician, born at Caſtel Nova, in Piedmont, died at Turin, on the 13th in May, 1572, aged fifty-eight. His works are printed in three volumes folio.

ARGENTRE (BERTRAND D') a learned lawyer, and one of the moſt able men of his time, was of a noble family of Brittany. He wrote Commentaries on the Cuſtoms of Brittany, and other works. He died on the 13th of February, 1590, aged ſeventy-one.

ARGENTRE (CHARLES DUPLESSIS) biſhop of Tulles, was born at the caſtle of Dupleſſis, on the 16th of May, 1673. He wrote, in Latin, 1. The Elements of Divinity, in quarto. 2. An Explication of the Sacraments, three volumes, duodecimo. 3. Collectio Judiciorum, S. Fac. Par. three volumes in folio; and many other works. He died on the 27th of October, 1740.

ARGHUN KHAN, the eighth emperor of the Moguls of the race of Jenghiz Khan, was the eldeſt ſon of Abaka Khan, and having diſpoſſeſſed his uncle, who had ſtepped in between him and the crown, he aſcended the throne in the year 1284. In his reign the Jews were advanced to poſts of power and truſt, and equalled in authority the Chriſtians, whoſe intereſt was very conſiderable under the Mogul emperors of this race; while the Mahometans, who had begun to raiſe their heads in the laſt reign, were deprived of all offices, diſcountenanced, and at length forbidden to appear at court; and ſome even pretend, that Arghun had promiſed the Chriſtians, to convert the temple of Mecca into a church. This prince died in the year 1291; and after his death, the Tartars revenged themſelves on the Jews, by maſſacring great numbers of them.

ARGO, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſhip in which Jaſon and the reſt of the Theſſalian and Argive heroes ſailed to Cholchis to fetch the golden fleece. This ſhip, or galley, is ſaid to have had fifty oars, and to have been fifty feet in length.

ARGOLI (ANDREW) a celebrated mathematician, born at Tagliacozzo. Having met with ill treatment in his native country, he retired to Venice, where the ſenate received him in a manner worthy of his merit. He wrote, 1. De Diebus criticis; 2. Ephemerides; and other works; and died in 1653.

His ſon, John Argoli, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his poems.

ARGONNE, (NOEL D') an eminent Carthuſian monk, of the monaſtery of Gallon, in the dioceſe of Roan, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing a celebrated Treatiſe on the Method of reading the Fathers of the Church, and other works.

ARGONAUTS, in fabulous hiſtory, the braveſt and moſt diſtinguiſhed youths of Greece, who accompanied Jaſon in his expedition to obtain the golden fleece. Authors are not agreed as to the names or number of theſe youths, ſome making them forty-nine, and others more; however, the principal were Ancæus, Idmon, Orpheus, Augias, Calais, Zethus, Caſtor, Pollux, Tiphys, and Lynceus; it is alſo ſaid, that Hercules was with them. See the particulars of this expedition under the article JASON.

Mythologiſts have endeavoured by very different methods to explain this fable; but the moſt rational account of its origin is that of an ingenious modern author, who obſerves, that Colchis was one of the moſt ancient colonies of Egypt, whoſe manners and ceremonies reſembled thoſe of their mother-country. As the river Phaſis, which runs through Colchis, was rich in gold duſt, the people, to collect this valuable metal, uſed the ſame method as that ſtill practiſed in America, of laying ſheep-ſkins in the ſtream, by which the particles of gold were entangled in the wool. Now, as the Colchians retained the Egyptian cuſtom of expoſing a public ſign before particular ſeaſons or works, ſo the time for ſeeking the gold duſt after the land-floods was made known by a ſtandard of a golden fleece attended with a ſerpent, to ſignify that the wealth ariſing from thence was the life of the colony. Now, when the time of gathering the gold duſt was over, and it became neceſſary for the inhabitants to return to the linen manufactory, they expoſed a new ſign, which was a figure holding a ſhuttle, and called Argoniath, or the work of the ſhuttles. This image the Greeks who traded to Colchis called Argonaut, or the ſhip Argo. Hence aroſe the notion of an oracular ſhip, and a golden fleece guarded by a ſerpent or dragon.

ARGUIN, an iſland on the weſt coaſt of Africa, with a fort of the ſame name. It belongs to the French, and is thirty miles ſouth-weſt of Cape Blanco. Long. 16. 30. W. Lat. 20. 20. N.

ARGUN, the chief town in the province of Argunſkoi, the laſt the Ruſſians poſſeſs on the frontiers of Chineſe Tartary. It has a fortreſs on the weſt ſide of the river Argun, garriſoned with Ruſſian troops. Near it are mines of ſilver and lead; and in the river Argun is a pearl-fiſhery. Long. 136. 20. E. Lat. 49. 30. N.

ARGUNSKOI, a province of Siberia, ſubject to Muſcovy. The people inhabiting round this place are called Tunguſi Konni, who pay their tribute in ſables, lynxes, and grey ferret ſkins. The Tunguſians are a fierce warlike people, and can upon occaſion bring four thouſand horſemen into the field, armed with bows and arrows; inſomuch that the roving Mongalians dare not appear among them, unleſs by night, and then they ſometimes drive away a few horſes and cattle. Their winter cloathing is ſheep-ſkins, and they have boots like the Chineſe: their ſummer dreſs is blue Chineſe callico, quilted with cotton: their caps have fur borders, which they can turn up or pull down according to the weather; they have a girdle of a hand's breadth about their waiſts, faſtened with thin iron plates, and a ſort of an arrow, which ſerves to play upon like a pipe: in ſummer they go bare-headed, and all their hair is ſhaved off but one lock behind: they wear no ſhirts: they have but little beard, are broad-faced, and very ſtrong. When they want proviſions, a whole clan at a time will go a buck-hunting, and take a great many deer; for they are very good markſmen. The women are cloathed like the men, and are diſtinguiſhed from them by two plaited locks, one on each ſide the head, that hangs down to their breaſts, and are tied with ſilver or tin rings. They have as many wives as they can keep, and buy them of one another; for their having been poſſeſſed by another man gives them no diſguſt. When they are going a-hunting or a-robbing, they apply in the night-time to an idol called Sutkur, by beating of drums and ceremonies that have appearance of conjuring. They drink a liquor like arak, diſtilled from four mare's milk: in drawing it off, they put two pots one upon another and lute them together, in one of which there is a wooden pipe, by which means they draw off good ſpirits: men, women, and children drink ſo freely of this, that they are often intoxicated and lie motionleſs. Their wives and daughters ride on horſeback, with bows and arrows as well as the men. They make their bread of yellow lily-roots, and alſo eat them dried; but know nothing of agriculture. They exchange their furs for blue callico, linen, and tobacco. The vallies are covered with graſs half the height of a man; and between the hills there are the moſt charming herbs and flowers that imagination can ſuggeſt.

They all live in huts, the inſide of which is made with wooden poles joined together in ſuch a manner, that when they have a mind to remove their dwellings, they can take them down, pack them up, and carry them away all together, which they do very frequently. They make their fire in the middle of the hut, and ſit round about it on turfs. They are very expert at ſhooting fiſh in the water, with a ſort of arrows that are round and ſolid, and about three fingers thick at the head, which is capped with iron that terminates in a point; and under is a ball of bone, which makes the arrow whiſtle as it flies: they chiefly kill jacks and trout with theſe weapons, becauſe they are oftenеſt ſeen in clear water. When they take a ſolemn oath, to confirm it they ſtick a dog, and ſuck its blood, which if an accuſed perſon performs in token of his innocence, he is ſet at liberty, and the accuſer puniſhed.

ARGUS, in fabulous hiſtory, was the ſon of Ariſtor, and had an hundred eyes, fifty of which were always open. Juno made choice of him to guard Io, whom Jupiter had transformed into a white heifer; but Jupiter pitying Io, for being ſo cloſely confined, ſent Mercury, who, with his flute, charmed Argus to ſleep, ſealed up his eyes with his caduceus, and then cut off his head; when Juno, to reward his fidelity, turned him into a peacock, and placed his eyes in his tail.

ARGYLE (Dukes of). See the article CAMPBELL.

ARGYLESHIRE, in Scotland, is a mountainous country, whoſe inhabitants live moſtly by grazing of cattle, hunting, and fiſhing; for it has ſeveral loughs, which abound with fiſh. The coaſt is full of high rocks and black mountains, covered with heath. It has a provincial ſynod, containing five Preſbyteries, and forty-nine pariſhes. This ſhire makes part of the Highlands, and has the Iriſh Sea and frith of Clyde on the ſouth, Perthſhire on the eaſt, Lochaber on the north-eaſt, and ſeveral iſlands on the north-weſt. Its chief advantage ariſes from the number of cattle it produces.

ARGYRA, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph beloved by Solemnus, who, unable to ſupport her cruelty, died of grief; on which Venus changed him into a fountain that bore the nymph's name, whoſe waters made thoſe who bathed in it immediately forget their miſtreſſes.

ARGYROPYLUS (JOHN) a celebrated Greek, was born at Conſtantinople, and came into Italy after the taking of that city by the Turks in 1453. He was well received by Coſmo de Medicis, who made him preceptor to his ſon, and Greek profeſſor at Florence. He tranſlated the Morals and Phyſics of Ariſtotle, and wrote other works. He died at Rome about the year 1474, at above ſeventy years of age.

ARHUS, or ARHUSEN, a conſiderable town of Denmark, in North Jutland, capital of the dioceſe of Arhus, with a good port and a biſhop's ſee. It is advantageouſly ſituated on the ſhore of the Baltic Sea, at the mouth of the river Gude, and is ſurrounded with fertile fields, and foreſts full of game. It is a neat and pleaſant town, furniſhed with all manner of neceſſaries, which the country affords in great plenty, and foreign commodities are brought in daily by the ſhipping. Long. 10. 0. E. Lat. 56. 10. N.

ARIA. See ARRIA.

ARIADNE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Minos, king of Crete, who falling deeply in love with Theſeus, ſhe gave him a clue, by which he eſcaped out of the labyrinth, after he had killed the Minotaur, and carried his fair deliverer to the iſle of Naxos, where he ungratefully left her big with child. But Bacchus afterwards coming thither, fell paſſionately in love with her, made her his wife, and as a teſtimony of his affection, placed the crown ſhe wore as a conſtellation among the ſtars.

ARIADNEA, Ἀριάδνεια, in Grecian antiquity, two feſtivals at Naxos, in honour of two women, named Ariadne. One of them being the daughter of king Minos, they had in the ſolemnity dedicated to her a ſhew of ſorrow and mourning; and in memory of her being left by Theſeus near the time of child-birth, it was uſual for a young man to lie down and counterfeit all the agonies of a woman in labour. This feſtival is ſaid to be firſt inſtituted by Theſeus, to atone for his ingratitude to that princeſs.

The other Ariadne was thought to be of a gay and ſprightly temper, and therefore her feſtival was obſerved with muſic and other expreſſions of mirth and joy.

ARIANO, a town of Italy, in the Ferrareſe. It is ſeated on a branch of the river Po, eight miles ſouth of Adria, and twenty-two north-eaſt of Ferrara. Long. 12. 8. E. Lat. 45. 0. N.

ARIANS, a ſect of Chriſtians, who were followers of Arius, who were afterwards ſplit into ſeveral ſub-diviſions, who mutually condemned each other. Arius, who was a preſbyter of Alexandria, delivered his opinion in the beginning of the fourth century, in the time of the patriarch Alexander. That biſhop had aſſerted the inſeparable unity of the divine ſubſtance, which gave him an opportunity of accuſing him with Sabellianiſm, and to deny the eternity of the Son, aſſerting there was a time when the Son was not; that he was created before all worlds, and was ſuperior to the higheſt order of angels. That his union with human fleſh ſupplied the place of a human ſoul; and that conſequently he was liable to ſuffering and pain. He perſevered in his opinions, contrary to the admoniſion of the patriarch, upon which a council was called of a hundred biſhops, from Egypt and Lybia, who degraded him from his orders, and then excommunicated him. This cauſed great diſturbances in the church, occaſioning warm diſputes, pro and con. He was afterwards ſummoned to appear before the council of Nice, where he maintained his opinions with great boldneſs. However, they confirmed the ſentence, and the emperor Conſtantine condemned him and his adherents to baniſhment. But this did not continue long, for the Arian biſhops, in three years time, were recalled and reſtored to their their ſees; and not long after he recalled Arius himſelf. But Athanaſius, now biſhop of Alexandria, would not admit him or his followers to communion; this exaſperated them greatly, inſomuch that, by their intereſt at court, they cauſed him to be depoſed and baniſhed. But the church of Alexandria ſtill refuſing to admit him to communion, he drew up a confeſſion of faith, and preſented it to the emperor at Conſtantinople, upon which the emperor commanded Alexander, the biſhop of that church, to receive him the next day into communion; but Arius died that very evening. But his tenets did not die with him; for though Athanaſius's followers had great credit at court, and tho' he was ſoon recalled from baniſhment, he was ſhortly after depoſed again; and the Arians made and depoſed biſhops as it beſt ſuited their purpoſe. In ſhort, this ſect prevailed for above three hundred years, and was the prevailing religion of Spain for above two centuries, as well as of France, Italy, Pannonia, and Africa, and was not brought under till near the end of the eighth century. The Arians in general denied the Three Perſons in the Trinity to be of the ſame eſſences. Their doxology was Glory to the Father, through the Son, in the Holy Ghoſt. See ARIUS.

ARIARATHES, the name of ten kings of Cappadocia, who reigned before the birth of our Saviour.

ARIAS MONTANUS (BENEDICT) one of the moſt learned divines Spain has produced, acquired great reputation at the council of Trent. He was acquainted with the languages, and was employed by Philip II. in a new edition of the Polyglot Bible, which he executed with great applauſe.

ARICA, a port-town of South America, in the province of Cos Charcas, in Peru. It was formerly a conſiderable place, but the earthquakes, which are frequent here, have almoſt entirely ruined it; for here are no more than one hundred and fifty families, which are moſt of them blacks, mulattoes, and Indians. On the 26th of November there was an earthquake, which ſo agitated the ſea, that it overwhelmed the greateſt part of the town, and the ruins of the ſtreets are to be ſeen to this day; what remains is ſeated on a riſing ground, at the foot of the headland, and is not ſubject to the like inundation. Moſt of the houſes are made with canes or reeds, ſet upright, and bound together with cords or thongs; and as it never rains here, they are covered only with mats, which makes the place look at a diſtance like a heap of ruins. They have built the church, which is dedicated to St. Mark, with bricks dried in the ſun, which looks handſome enough. There is a monaſtery of the order of St. Mercy, which contains but ſeven or eight monks, and another of Franciſcans, as alſo an hoſpital.

The vale of Arica is about a league wide, and ſix leagues long, next the ſea, and is all a barren country, except the ſpot where the old town ſtood, which is divided into little meadows of clover graſs, little plots for ſugar canes, with a few olive and cotton trees intermixt. This vale grows narrower as it runs eaſtward, and a league up there is a village, where they begin to cultivate Pimento or Jamaica pepper, which is planted throughout all the reſt of the vale. And there are ſeveral farms, which produce nothing elſe, that bring in the value of eighty thouſand crowns yearly. The Spaniards of Peru are ſo uſed to this pepper, that they dreſs no proviſions without it. Lon. 70. 15. W. Lat. 18. 26. S.

ARIEH (JACOB JUDAH) a learned Spaniſh Jew of the ſeventeenth century, was a rabbi of the Synagogue of Amſterdam, and wrote a deſcription of the Tabernacle, which is much eſteemed, and has had ſeveral editions, both in Spaniſh, Hebrew, Flemiſh, and Latin.

ARIMANIUS, one of the principal divinities of the Perſians, and the author of all evil. The ancient Perſians maintained that Oromazes, the good deity, having produced the good ſpirits and the ſtars, ſhut them up in an egg, and that Arimanius produced the evil ſpirits, who broke this egg, whence proceeded the mixture of good and evil, that has taken place in the world. They added, that at laſt, after many combats, in which the victory ſhall be ſometimes on one ſide, and ſometimes on the other, Oromazes ſhall entirely overcome Arimanius, and utterly deſtroy him, which will be followed by the happineſs of mankind, and with a very advantageous change, that will cauſe the body of man to become tranſparent, and preſerve itſelf without nouriſhment.

ARIMAZES, the ſovereign of a part of Sogdiana, near Scythia, ſhut himſelf up in a caſtle, built upon an high rock, where he had thirty thouſand ſoldiers, and proviſions for two years; and being ſummoned by Alexander to ſurrender, aſked him whether he could fly, which ſo incenſed that prince, that he reſolved to attack him. The next night three hundred Macedonians gained the top of the rock, which was ſteep on every ſide, and above thirty furlongs high, which ſo terrified Arimazes, that he came down to Alexander's camp, with his kindred and principal nobility, in hopes of pardon; but Alexander was ſo provoked by the boldneſs of his anſwer, that he had the inhumanity to order them all to be firſt whipt with rods, and then hung upon croſſes at the foot of the rock.

ARIMINI (Dr. GREGORY). See RIMINI.

ARION, an excellent muſician and poet, born at Methymna, in the iſland of Leſbos, invented the dithyrambus, and was the author of many excellent hymns. It is ſaid, that having embarked on board a ſhip in order to return to the court of Periander, who had a great affection for him, the avaritious crew, when they were got to ſea, agreed to throw him overboard, in order to ſhare his money. Having, in vain, uſed all his eloquence to ſoften them, he played a farewell air, and crowned with a garland, with his harp in his hand, plunged into the ſea, where, according to the poets, a dolphin, charmed with his harmony, received him on its back, and bore him ſafe to Tænarus.

ARION, in fabulous hiſtory, a celebrated horſe, much more famous in poetic hiſtory than Bucephalus in the hiſtory of Alexander. Authors ſpeak variouſly of his origin, though he is generally allowed to have been produced by Neptune, and nurſed by the Nereids. He was ſometimes yoked with the ſea horſes of Neptune to the chariot of that god, when he drew him with incredible ſwiftneſs thro' the ſea. Hercules mounted him when he took the city of Elis, and he won the prize for racing at the Nemean games.

ARIOSTA (LIPPA) concubine of Opizzon, marquis of Eſte and Ferrara, is ſaid to have done more honour to his family, which was one of the nobleſt in Ferrara, than ſhe took from it. By her faithfulneſs and political ſkill ſhe ſo far confirmed the impreſſions her beauty had made on the marquiſs's heart, that, in 1352, he made her his wife, and dying the ſame year, left to her the adminiſtration of his dominions, in which ſhe acquitted herſelf in a very extraordinary manner, during the minority of her eleven children.

ARIOSTO (LUDOVICO or LEWIS) a celebrated Italian poet, born of a noble family, at the caſtle of Reggio, in Lombardy, in the year 1474. When very young, he formed the ſtory of Pyramus and Thiſbe into a play, which was acted by his brothers and ſiſters, and was ſo highly applauded that every perſon who ſaw it preſaged that he would prove one of the greateſt poets of the age. He tranſlated ſeveral pieces out of French and Spaniſh into Italian, wrote ſeven ſatires and five comedies; but his Orlando Furioſo, which he began when he was about thirty years of age, is the moſt celebrated of all his works. He uſed to read his verſes to his friends, and the ladies of his acquaintance, and his manner of reading them was ſo excellent, that he gave a peculiar grace to every thing he pronounced. Hence he was extremely vexed, if he heard his works repeated in a diſagreeable manner. Paſſing one day by a potter's ſhop, he heard the potter uttering a ſtanza out of the Orlando Furioſo, which he pronounced in ſo bad a manner, that Arioſto being vexed, broke with his ſtick ſeveral of the pots which ſtood expoſed to ſale. The potter expoſtulated with him in very ſevere terms, for injuring a poor man who had never done him the leaſt harm in his whole life. "Yes, you "have, ſaid Arioſto, and I have not yet ſufficiently revenged "myſelf upon you, for the injury you have done me to "my face." He was however of an affable, eaſy, and condeſcending temper, and enjoyed the friendſhip of the moſt learned men of his time. His attachment to poetry did not prevent his engaging in public affairs, for he was employed in embaſſies and negociations in differents parts of Italy; and Alfonſo, duke of Ferrara, who had a great eſteem for him, made him governor of Graffignana. He died at Ferrara on the 8th of July, 1559.

ARIPO, a ſtrong town of Aſia, on the weſtern coaſt of the iſland of Ceylon, at the mouth of the river Sarunda. It belongs to the Dutch, and to the eaſt of it there is a bank, where they fiſh for pearls. Long. 80. 25. E. Lat. 8. 42. N.

ARIQUIPA, a town of South-America, in Peru, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a river twenty-four leagues from the ſea, and has a port called Quilca, but is very ill fortified, though the greateſt part of the ſilver is brought hither from Los Charchas, and the mines of Potoſi and Porco, to be ſent to Callao, and from thence to Panama. It contains about ſix hundred Spaniſh families, who trade in wine and brandy. The ſoil about the town produces corn, of which they make very good bread. The houſes, not only here, but in ſeveral towns on this coaſt, are only ground-floors, and the walls are built with ſplit reeds or canes, which grow to the thickneſs of one's leg; they are faſtened together with the roots of trees, or with cords made of the bark, inſomuch that there is not a bit of iron throughout the whole fabrick. When any one walks briſkly along the floor, it makes the whole edifice tremble and groan; yet ſlight as they are, they are ſufficient for the climate, where rain is looked upon as a prodigy, and is not ſeen for many years; for which rea-

ſon

ſon their houſes are only covered with thatch, or more generally with palm tree leaves. They have a great deal of reaſon to be afraid of fire, but the materials are ſo cheap, that the buildings would be ſoon erected again, if one ſhould happen. It is one hundred and thirty miles north of Arica. Long. 73. 5. W. Lat. 17. 5 S.

ARISTAGORAS, ſon-in-law and couſin to Hiſtæus, tyrant of Miletus, about five hundred and two years before the Chriſtian æra. He revolted from the Perſians, perſuaded the Greeks to take up arms againſt them, burnt Sardis, and was at laſt killed by the Thracians.

ARISTANDER, a famous ſoothſayer, under Alexander the Great, was a native of Telmeſſus, a city of Aſia, where almoſt every body was born with diſpoſitions to prophecy. He followed Alexander in the conqueſt of Perſia, and by his happy gueſſes gained a wonderful influence over that monarch. He flouriſhed three hundred years before the Chriſtian æra.

ARISTARCHUS, a Greek philoſopher, and a native of Samos, was one of the firſt who maintained that the earth turns upon its own centre, and that it every year deſcribes a circle round the ſun. We have none of his works remaining, except a treatiſe on the greatneſs and diſtance of the ſun and moon, which Dr. Wallis publiſhed in Greek, with Commandine's Latin verſion, in 1688, which he has alſo inſerted in his third volume of his mathematical works, printed at Oxford in 1699.

ARISTARCHUS, a celebrated grammarian, born in Samothracia, flouriſhed one hundred and fifty years before the Chriſtian æra, and applied himſelf to criticiſm. He made a reviſal of Homer's poems with incredible exactneſs, and commented upon Pindar, Aratus, and other poets. He died in the iſland of Cyprus, aged ſeventy-two; he was grown dropſical, and found no better remedy againſt that diſtemper than to ſtarve himſelf to death.

ARISTÆUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Apollo and Cyrene, was born in Lybia, and brought up by the Nymphs. He married Autonoe, the daughter of Cadmus, by whom he had Actæon, who was torn in pieces by his own dogs. It is alſo ſaid that he found out the art of extracting honey, and making oil and cheeſe; and that for the ſervices he rendered to mankind, the Gods placed him among the ſtars, where he is the Aquarius of the Zodiac.

ARISTÆUS, an ancient learned geometrician, who lived ſome time before Euclid, but whoſe works are now loſt.

ARISTÆUS, the Proconeſian, lived in the time of Cyrus, and wrote the hiſtory of the Arimaſpians, and a work on the origin of the Gods. Strabo repreſents him as one of the greateſt enchanters that ever lived. It is ſaid that at the inſtant he died in his own country, he was reading a lecture in Sicily, and that this being repeated ſeveral times, and for ſeveral years, it obliged the Sicilians to build him altars, and to offer ſacrifices to him; and Pliny relates, that in the iſle of Proconneſus his ſoul was ſeen to go out of his mouth in the ſhape of a raven. Others ſay, that his ſoul left his body, and returned to it again, as often as he pleaſed. But theſe abſurd ſtories are juſtly ridiculed by Plutarch.

ARISTÆUS, the author of a ſuppoſititious book, concerning the ſeventy interpreters of the Old Teſtament, the impoſture of which has been ſhewn by ſeveral men.

ARISTIDES, ſurnamed THE JUST, flouriſhed at Athens at the ſame time with Themiſtocles, who triumphed over him by his boiſterous eloquence, and got him baniſhed four hundred and eighty-three years before Chriſt: but Ariſtides being recalled a ſhort time after, would never join with the enemies of Themiſtocles, to get him baniſhed; for nothing could make him deviate from the ſtricteſt rules of moderation and juſtice. Ariſtides brought the Greeks to unite againſt the Perſians, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the famous battle of Marathon, that of Salamine and Platea, and eſtabliſhed an annual income of four hundred and ſixty talents, for a fund to ſupply the expences of war. This great man died ſo poor, though he had the management of the revenues of Greece, that the ſtate was obliged to pay his funeral expences, to give fortunes to his daughters in marriage, and a maintenance to his ſon Lyſimachus.

ARISTIDES, of Miletus, a famous Greek author, often cited by the ancients.

ARISTIDES, a very eloquent Athenian orator, who became a convert to the Chriſtian religion, and about the year 124 preſented to the emperor Adrian an apology for the Chriſtians.

ARISTIDES (ÆLIUS) a celebrated orator, born in Myſia, about one hundred and twenty-nine years before the Chriſtian æra. The beſt edition of his work, is that of Oxford, printed in Greek and Latin, in two volumes, quarto.

ARISTIDES, of Thebes, a celebrated painter, cotemporary with Apelles, about three hundred years before Chriſt. It is ſaid that he was the firſt who undertook to paint the emotions of the ſoul, and to repreſent the paſſions. Attalus offered ſix thouſand ſeſterces for one of his pictures.

ARISTIPPUS of Cyrene, called the Ancient, was a famous Greek philoſopher, the diſciple of Socrates, and the founder of the Cyrenaic ſect, about three hundred and ninety-ſix years before Chriſt. He made the happineſs of man conſiſt in pleaſure, and ſpent a good part of his life at the court of Dionyſius the Tyrant, who ſet a great value upon him, becauſe, according to Lucian, he was ſo well acquainted with the manner of making luxurious diſhes, that the prince's cooks came and received their orders from him. And though he had before this taken a voyage from Lybia to Athens, to hear Socrates, he freely indulged himſelf in wine and women, and notwithſtanding his being very rich, was the only one of the diſciples of Socrates who took money for teaching. He wrote a great many books, particularly the Hiſtory of Lybia, ſeveral Dialogues, and four books on the Luxury of the Ancients.

ARISTO, a Stoic philoſopher, the diſciple of Zeno, the chief of the Stoics, flouriſhed about two hundred and ninety years before the Chriſtian æra. He differed but little from his maſter Zeno. He rejected logic as of no uſe, and natural philoſophy as being above the reach of the human underſtanding. It is ſaid, that being bald, the ſun burnt his head, and that this cauſed his death.

ARISTO (TITUS) a Roman lawyer, under the empire of Trajan, was a perfect maſter not only of the public and civil law, but of hiſtory and antiquity. He was an enemy to luxury, was without pride, and looked for the recompence of a good action in the action itſelf, and not in the applauſe of the multitude; and though he did not profeſs being a philoſopher, not any who did profeſs it ſurpaſſed him in the practice of virtue. He wrote ſome books which are now loſt.

ARISTOGITON, a famous Athenian, who, with Armodius, killed Hipparchus, tyrant of Athens, about the five hundred and thirteenth year before the Chriſtian æra. The Athenians erected a ſtatue to him.

ARISTOMENES, a general of the Meſſenians, eminent for his incomparable valour, conduct, and virtue. His generous love for the city of Meſſenia, which had been conquered by the Spartans, and reduced by them to the loweſt ſtate of ſlavery, made him undertake the boldeſt and moſt arduous enterpriſes. Pliny ſays, that he was at laſt taken by the Spartans and put to death, and that his body being opened, his heart was found all over hairy. He flouriſhed ſix hundred and eighty-five years before the birth of Chriſt.

ARISTON, king of Sparta, was famous for his prudence and courage. He was the ſon of Agaſicles, and lived about five hundred and forty years before the birth of Chriſt. He is ſaid to have married a very ordinary woman, who, after her marriage, became one of the moſt beautiful women of her time. Ariſton hearing it, ſaid, that a king ought to do good to his friends, and evil to his enemies; he replied, "That is was greater wiſdom in a king to preſerve his "friends, and to know how to bring over to himſelf his "greateſt enemies."

ARISTOPHANES, the celebrated comic poet, was a citizen of Athens. He expoſed upon the ſtage the deſigns of the magiſtrates and generals of the Athenians, with a great deal of wit and ſeverity; and alſo rendered the theatre a ſchool for the art of war, and all other virtues that could render a city formidable to its enemies. He flouriſhed about four hundred and thirty-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra; was cotemporary with Socrates, Plato, and Euripides, and compoſed above fifty comedies, of which, only eleven are now extant: theſe abound with the moſt refined and delicate wit. Ludolphus Keſter gave a magnificent edition of them in folio, in 1710, and dedicated it to Charles Montagu, earl of Haliſax.

ARISTOPHANES of Byzantium, the diſciple of Eratoſthenes, and a celebrated grammarian, about two hundred and twenty years before the Chriſtian æra.

ARISTOTIMUS, the ſon of Damaretus, and grandſon of Etymon, made himſelf tyrant of Elis, by the aſſiſtance of Antigonus, the ſon of Demetrius, king of Macedonia. But his cruelty and perfidiouſneſs ſoon made him loſe his new ſovereignty, together with his life.

The public council of the Ætolians decreed that a ſtatue ſhould be erected to the honour of Cylon, who had killed the tyrant.

ARISTOTLE, commonly called the Prince of Philoſophers, or The Philoſopher, by way of eminence; was born at Stagyra, a ſmall city of Macedon, three hundred and eighty four years before the Chriſtian æra. He was at firſt a libertine, and took the profeſſion of a ſoldier; but not ſucceeding in it, he ſoon determined to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of philoſophy, and therefore went to Athens, in order to become one of Plato's diſciples, and ſoon ſurpaſſed all the great men in Plato's ſchool. We are told by Diogenes Laertius, that to prevent his being overcome by ſleep, he kept one of his hands out of bed, in which he held a braſs ball, in order that he might be waked by its falling into a baſon of the ſame metal. After the death of Plato, three hundred and forty-eight years before the birth of Chriſt, Ariſtotle retired to Atarnya, a ſmall city of Myſia, where his friend Hermias reigned. That prince gave him his ſiſter, or, according to others, his daughter, or granddaughter, Pythias, in marriage. Some years after, king Philip appointed him preceptor to his ſon Alexander, which office he enjoyed eight years, after which, he retired to Athens, where he ſet up his ſchool, and the magiſtrates giving him the Lycæum, he there taught philoſophy to his diſciples while he was walking with them; from whence his ſect obtained the name of Peripatetics. At that time Alexander deſired him to apply himſelf to the ſtudy of animals, and ſent him, in order to defray the expences of that ſtudy, eight hundred talents, or four hundred and eighty thouſand crowns, and furniſhed him at the ſame time with a great number of expert fiſhers and huntſmen, who were to follow his directions, and bring him whatever creature he wanted: but at length Eurymedon, the prieſt of Ceres, accuſed Ariſtotle of impiety, when being afraid of ſuffering the ſame fate as Socrates, he retired to Chalcis, where he died, in the three hundred and twenty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra; aged ſixty-three. Some have aſſerted that he poiſoned himſelf, others that he died of the colic, and others, in ſhort, that he leapt into the Euripus, becauſe he could not diſcover the cauſe of its ebbing and flowing. He left a daughter by Pythias, who was married to a grandſon of Demaratus, king of Sparta; and he had by a concubine, a ſon, named Nicomachus, to whom he addreſſed his Ethics.

Ariſtotle had a great ſhare in the intrigues of the courts of Philip and Alexander; for philoſophy was far from rendering him of a moroſe and ſavage diſpoſition: on the contrary, he was an honeſt, tender, and generous friend; and being aſked what a true friend was, he replied, "It is one "ſoul in two bodies." Ariſtotle wrote a great number of books, the moſt eſteemed of which, are, his Ethics, his Logic, his Hiſtory of Animals, his Poetics, and his Rhetoric. Ariſtotle, at his death, left his writings to Theophraſtus, his beloved diſciple and ſucceſſor in the Lycæum, and forbad their ever being publiſhed. Theophraſtus, when he died, truſted them to Neleus, his particular friend and diſciple, whoſe heirs buried them in the ground at Scepſis, a town of Troas, to ſecure them from the king of Pergamus, who made great ſearch every where for books to adorn his library. Here they lay concealed a hundred and ſixty years, till being almoſt ſpoiled, they were ſold to one Apellicon, a rich citizen of Athens, at whoſe houſe Sylla found them, and ordered them to be carried to Rome. They were ſoon after purchaſed by Tryannion, a grammarian; and Andronicus of Rhodes having bought them of his heirs, was, in a manner, the firſt reſtorer of the works of this great philoſopher; for he not only repaired what had been decayed by time and ill keeping, but alſo put them into a better order, and got them copied. There were many who followed the doctrine of Ariſtotle in the reigns of the twelve Cæſars, and their numbers greatly encreaſed under Adrian and Antoninus. Alexander Aphrodinus was the firſt profeſſor of the Peripatetic philoſophy at Rome, he being appointed for that purpoſe by the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus; and in the ſucceeding ages, the doctrines of Ariſtotle prevailed amongſt almoſt all the men of letters. The firſt doctors of the church however diſapproved of them; but St. Jerom, St. Auguſtine, and ſeveral others, wrote and ſpoke in favour of them. In the ſixth century, Boetius made Ariſtotle more known in the weſt, and tranſlated ſome of his pieces into Latin. The Greeks in the eleventh and following ages applied much to the works of this philoſopher: but the ſtudying them was frequently prohibited and allowed by the church of Rome. The number of ancient and modern commentators on his works is incredible.

ARISTOXENES, of Tarentum, a celebrated philoſopher, who lived about three hundred and twenty-four years before the Chriſtian æra. The only work of his now extant, is, The Elements of Harmony; which has been printed by Meurſius, with remarks.

ARITAPHILA. See ARETAPHILIA.

ARIUS, preſbyter of Alexandria, from whom the Arians took their name, was born in Lybia, near Egypt, and flouriſhed in the fourth century. Euſebius, biſhop of Nicomedia, took Arius under his protection, and introduced him into the favour of Conſtantia, ſiſter to the emperor Conſtantine, when a conſiderable number of biſhops openly embraced his opinion; but being condemned by the council of Nice in the year 325, Arius was baniſhed by the emperor, and his books ordered to be burnt; but ſome years after he was recalled, received again into the communion of the church, and Athanaſius, patriarch of Alexandria, baniſhed. Arius afterwards ſubſcribed to the council of Nice; after which, Conſtantine ſent him to the biſhops, who were aſſembled at Conſtantinople, in order to have him received into the communion of that imperial city; where he arrived; but, it is ſaid, that being preſſed by a natural neceſſity, he retired in haſte to a public neceſſary-houſe, and died there upon the ſpot, all his entrails burſting out with his liver and ſpleen, in the year 336. There are many particulars in this account diſputed by learned men, particularly the time and manner of Arius's death. Arius put his ſentiments in verſe, in a work entitled Thalia. But it does not appear that this, or any other of his works has been preſerved; almoſt all the account we have of his doctrines is from his enemies, who took care to deſtroy his writings. His followers were however for ſeveral ages very numerous, notwithſtanding the violent perſecutions carried on againſt them. Nor did the Arians, when they had the upper hand, behave with more moderation. They perſecuted thoſe who aſſumed the name of orthodox with great cruelty; and the diſſenſions occaſioned by theſe diviſions were productive of the greateſt calamities.

Though it is not eaſy to give an accurate account of the opinions of the ancient Arians, this is not the caſe with thoſe who are at preſent called by that name, eſpecially in this kingdom. Theſe diſbelieve the Trinity, as explained in the Athenaſian Creed; but maintain, that by Jeſus Chriſt, who was the brightneſs of his Father's glory, all things were made that are made; and that in particular he was commiſſioned by his Father to form this earth. That to redeem mankind, he voluntary conſented to leave the glories of heaven, and to inhabit a human body. That he lead a life of ſorrow, died a moſt painful and ignominious death, and aſcended to the right hand of the Father, whence he ſhall at length deſcend to judge the world. See the article ARIANS.

ARK OF THE COVENANT, ſo called by the Jews; was a ſmall cheſt or coffer, three feet nine inches in length, two feet three inches in height, and as much in breadth. It contained the golden pot that had manna, and the tables of the covenant. Over the ark was the mercy ſeat, which covered it, made of ſolid gold; at the ends of which, were two cherubims, looking inward, towards each other, with expanded wings, which embracing the whole circumference of the mercy ſeat, met in the middle of each ſide. Here the Shecinah or Divine Preſence was ſaid to reſt, and that both in the tabernacle and the temple, the appearance of a cloud hung over it. And that when Jehovah was conſulted in behalf of the people, an anſwer was returned in an audible voice, which ſome called the Divine Oracle. Hence God is ſaid in Scripture to dwell between the cherubims, on the mercy ſeat; becauſe that was the throne of his viſible appearance among the Jews. Before the building of the temple, this was the centre of the Jewiſh worſhip, for in whatever country any of the Jews were diſperſed; when they prayed, they turned their faces towards the place where the ark ſtood, and this, not only before it was in the temple, but afterwards. Before the ſecond temple was built, the ark was loſt, for which reaſon they made another like it, and put it in the ſame place; but it wanted the tables of the law, Aaron's rod, and the pot of manna; the divine glory returned no more, and the oracles ceaſed. But they made uſe of it on the great day of the expiation, and to be a repoſitory of the copy of the Scriptures, recovered by Ezra, after the captivity: in imitation of which, the Jews in all their ſynagogues have a little ark or coffer, in which they keep the Holy Scriptures.

The Mahomedans affirm, that beſides the tables of ſtone, the ark contained Moſes's ſhoes, which he put off before the burning buſh, the pontifical tiara of Aaron, and the piece of wood wherewith Moſes ſweetened the waters of Marah. They alſo affirm, it was given to Adam ready made, and conveyed to Moſes from hand to hand, with all the portraitures of the patriarchs and prophets about it: that in times of war, an impetuous wind ruſhed out of it, which blew ſo fiercely on the enemies of Iſrael, that it entirely defeated them. This was the reaſon that they carried the ark of the covenant at the head of their armies.

ARLES, a city of Provence, in France, ſeated on the eaſt ſide of the Rhone, on a hill, whoſe declivity is towards the north, and is an archbiſhop's ſee. It is celebrated for its antiquities, both within and without the city. Some are yet remaining; as the amphitheatre, the obeliſk, the Elyſian Fields, the ſepulchres, columns with their capitals, buſts, pedeſtals, aqueducts, with ſome remains of the capitol, and the temples of their Gods. The other ancient monuments are entirely deſtroyed. Under the amphitheatre, in 1651, they found the ſtatue of Venus, which was worſhipped by this city; and has been ſince carried to the caſtle of Verſailles. It is a maſter-piece which will always be admired by connoiſeurs.

The metropolitan church of Arles is dedicated to St. Trophimus. The front is very ancient, and adorned with a great number of figures, and the great altar is decorated with with a tabernacle, richly wrought, repreſenting the martyrdom of St. Stephen. The Hotel de Ville or town-houſe is a regular ſtructure, ſeated between two ſquares: It is built with white ſtone, and has the three orders of architecture, one above another. On the ground floor are ſix ruſtic pillars, which are very thick. The portico is handſome, and is adorned with the city arms. In the middle of the ſecond ſtory is a balcony, with four columns, above twenty-five feet high. The porch is large, and contains ſeveral buſts of the counts of Provence. The roof is ſupported by twenty two double columns.

The amphitheatre is one of the moſt remarkable pieces of antiquity; it was built by the Romans, but the time is unknown, though ſome ſay by Julius Cæſar. It is of an oval form, and about four hundred yards in circumference, and the front is thirty-four yards in height. The middle, called the arena, is a hundred and forty-two yards wide, and a hundred and four broad. The porticos or piazzas are three ſtories, built with ſtone of a prodigious ſize, each of which conſiſts of ſixty arches, which ſtill remain, and the walls are of a ſurpriſing thickneſs, but gone to decay.

The obeliſk is the only one of this kind to be ſeen in France; for it ſeems to be one of the forty brought from Egypt to Rome, becauſe it is of the ſame oriental granite with them. They are generally full of hieroglyphic characters, but this is quite ſmooth. In 1675, it was found in a private garden near the walls of the city, not far from the Rhone. It required a particular kind of a machine to raiſe it, but was executed in a ſhort time. It conſiſts of one piece, and is fifty two feet high, and ſeven in diameter at the baſe. It is now ſupported with four lions, made of bronze, and on the top a blue ball is placed, with the arms of France, and over that a ſun.

The Pagan's burying place, called the Elyſian Fields, is without the city, upon an agreeable hill, divided into two parts. The firſt, called Moulaires, has very few tombs, they having been broken to build the walls of gardens, which are made in that place. The ſecond, called Eliſcamp, contains a great number. Thoſe of the Pagans have the Letters, D M. which ſignifies Diis Manibus. Thoſe of the Chriſtians have a croſs. Pieces of coin of gold, ſilver, and bronze, are found here; as alſo urns, lamps, and cups, without number.

Here is a royal academy of ſciences, conſiſting of thirty members, who muſt be natives, gentlemen, and inhabitants of the city. It enjoys the ſame privileges as that at Paris. Arles is ſurrounded with marſh land, which renders the air full of vapours, and makes it not very wholeſome. It is thirty-eight miles weſt of Aix, thirteen ſouth-eaſt of Nimes, and three hundred and eighty-two ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 48. E. Lat. 43. 40.

ARLEUX, a ſmall and ancient town of the Low Countries, upon the borders of Flanders, defended by a caſtle. It is ſeven miles north-weſt of Cambray, and five miles from Doway. Long. 3. 16. E. Lat. 50. 17. N.

ARLINGTON (HENRY BENNET) earl of. See BENNET, HENRY, earl of Arlington.

ARLON, a town of the duchy of Luxemburg, in the Auſtrian Netherlands. It has been a conſiderable place, but is now diſmantled. It is ſeated on a hill, four miles ſouth-weſt of Luxemburg. Long. 5. 30. E. Lat. 49. 45. N.

ARMAGH, a county in the north of Ireland, having Monaghan and Tyrone on the weſt, Loughneagh on the north, Louth on the ſouth, and Down on the eaſt. It is thirty-two miles long, and ſeventeen broad, and is ſaid to have a richer and more fruitful ſoil than moſt parts of Ireland, except a ridge of coarſe mountains, called the Fews. It ſends ſix members to parliament, two for the county, two for Armagh, and two for Charlemont.

ARMAGH, once a conſiderable town, is reduced to a ſmall village, but its archbiſhop is the primate of all Ireland. It is ſeated near the river Halin, about thirty miles ſouth of Londonderry. Long. 6. 38. W. Lat. 54. 50. N.

ARMAGNAC, a province of France, fifty-five miles long, and forty broad. It is in the government of Guienne, and is bounded on the eaſt by the Garonne, on the ſouth by Bizore and Bearne, on the weſt by Gaſcony, and on the north by Condomois and Agenois. It is fruitful in corn and wine, and drives a trade with brandy, wine, wool, and pears, called the Bon Chretien. It is divided into the Lower and Higher Armagnac. Its principal town is Auch.

ARMAND DE BOURBON, prince of Conti, count of Pezenas; governor of Guienne, then of Languedoc, &c. and a prince diſtinguiſhed by his virtue and piety, was the ſon of Henry II. prince of Condé, and was born at Paris, on the 11th of October, 1629. Being deſigned by his father for the church, he was educated in the knowledge of the ſciences, and obtained the abbies of St. Denis, Clugny, Lerius, and Moleme; but he at length reſigned theſe abbies, and in 1654 was made governor of Guienne, then general of the king's armies in Catalonia, where he took Villa Franca, Puycerda, and Chatillon. He at length became grand-maſter of the king's houſhold, and, in 1662, governor of Languedoc. He died at Pezenas, on the 21ſt of February, 1666. We have, under his name, ſome works filled with ſentiments of the moſt extraordinary piety.

ARMENIA, a country of Aſia, partly ſubject to the Turks, and partly to the Perſians. It is generally divided into the Great and Small. Great Armenia comprehends what is now called Turcomania, which has been much more famous in former times than it is at preſent. It has Georgia on the north, from which it is ſeparated by high mountains. The river Euphrates on the weſt; Diarbeker, Curdiſtan, and Aderbijan, on the ſouth; and Shirvan on the eaſt. The chief towns in that part of Armenia belonging to Turky, are, Arzum the capital, near the ſprings of the Euphrates, a large city, and a great thoroughfare for the caravans between Turky and Perſia; Kars, a ſtrong city, head of the government of the ſame name; Bayazid, a republic of Hurds, near Mount Ararat; Baha, another republic of the ſame; and Van or Wan, on the lake Van, the head of a government of the ſame name, with other towns of leſs note. That part of Armenia ſubject to Perſia, is chiefly contained in the province of Aran, in which are ſeveral fine towns, as Erivan or Rivan, the capital of the whole. Ganjals, one of the fineſt cities in Perſia, in the north of the province, near the Kur. Kapan on the ſouth ſide, near the Aras; beſides Nakchivan, Aſtabad, Julfa, Ordabad, Baylakan or Piikan, on the Aras; Berdah and Shilkah on the Kur.

The country in general is full of mountains and vallies, lakes and rivers, particularly the country about the Three Churches, near Erivan, is admirably fine, being full of rivulets, which render it extremely fruitful. Beſides great quantities of all ſorts of grain, here are fields of a prodigious extent covered with tobacco; but it is not a native of the place, though ſuppoſed by ſome to be the terreſtrial paradiſe; for it all came originally from America: the reſt of the country produces rice, cotton, flax, melons, and grapes; in ſhort, there is nothing wanting but olives, which ſhews that the ark could not reſt on mount Ararat, becauſe the dove brought an olive-branch in her mouth, and this tree never leaves a place where it once grew. They get oil to burn from the Ricinus, and uſe linſeed-oil in the kitchen. The water-melons are as cool as ice in the hotteſt day, and melt in the mouth; the beſt are produced in the ſalt-lands, near the Three Churches and the river Aras. After rain the ſea-ſalt lies in chryſtals upon the fields, and even crackles under the feet. About ten miles from the Three Churches, in the road to Teflis, there are pits or quarries of foſſile ſalt, which yield enough to ſupply all Perſia, without being exhauſted; they cut it into large pieces like ſtone, and each buffalo carries two of them; the mountain from whence it is dug is nothing but a maſs of ſalt, which appears like a rock of ſilver, when the ſun ſhines on the places not covered with earth.

The Armenians are an honeſt, civil, polite people; but not at all fond of fighting; for they ſcarce trouble themſelves about any thing elſe but trade, which they carry on in moſt parts of the world.

The religion of the Armenians is the Chriſtian, of the Eutychian ſect, that is, they own but one nature in Jeſus Chriſt; and when they ſpeak of the hypoſtatical union, they ſay, that he is perfect God and perfect man without mixture. They have a high eſteem for a book they call the Little Goſpel, which treats of the infancy of Jeſus, and ſays, that the Virgin Mary being pregnant, her ſiſter Salome accuſed her of having proſtituted herſelf; to which the Virgin anſwered, that ſhe needed only to lay her hand on her belly, and ſhe would know how ſhe came to be with child; which Salome accordingly did, and fire came out of her belly, which conſumed half her arm; upon which ſhe acknowledged her fault, and drew it back; after which it was healed by putting it to the ſame place.

The Armenian clergy conſiſt of patriarchs, archbiſhops, doctors, ſecular prieſts, and monks. The ſecular prieſts marry once, but not a ſecond time, and therefore they take care to chooſe young healthy wives; they maintain themſelves and families by following ſome occupation, inſomuch that they have hardly time to perform their eccleſiaſtical functions; they lie in the churches on the vigils of thoſe days they are obliged to officiate.

The Armenian monks are of the order of St. Baſil, and every Wedneſday and Friday they eat neither fiſh, nor eggs, nor oil, nor any thing made of milk, and during Lent they live upon nothing but roots; they are allowed wine only on the Saturday in the Holy Week, and meat on the Eaſter Sunday. Beſides the great Lent, they have four others of eight days each, which are inſtituted to prepare for the four great feſtivals of the Nativity, the Aſcenſion, the Annunciation, and of St George, in which times they muſt not ſo much as ſpeak of eggs, fiſh, oil, or butter.

The Armenians have ſeven ſacraments, baptiſm, confirmation, penance, the euchariſt, extreme unction, orders, and matrimony. In baptiſm, the child is plunged three times into the water, and the ſame form of words that is uſed with us is repeated every time; the prieſt then puts a ſmall cord made with ſilk and cotton on the neck of the infant, and anoints his forehead, chin, ſtomach, arm-pits, hands, and feet, making the ſign of the croſs on each part. When the child is baptiſed, he is carried home by the godfather with the ſound of drums and trumpets. The women do not go to church till forty days after their delivery; and they obſerve many Jewiſh cuſtoms

At the communion, to which infants of two or three months old are admitted, the prieſts give a piece of the conſecrated hoſt, ſoaked in the conſecrated wine. The elements are covered with a great veil, and placed in a cupboard near the altar, on the ſide of the goſpels. When he takes the chalice and patin, he is followed by his deacons and ſub-deacons, with flambeaux and plates of copper furniſhed with bells; in this manner, with a cenſer before him, he goes in proceſſion round the ſanctuary; the prieſt then ſets them on the altar, and pronounces the words of conſecration, and then turns himſelf to the people, who fall down, kiſs the earth, beat their breaſts; then, after taking it himſelf, he diſtributes the hoſt ſoaked in wine to the people.

The Armenians ſeem to place the chief part of their religion in faſtings and abſtinences; and among the clergy, the higher the degree, the lower they muſt live; inſomuch that it is ſaid the archbiſhops live on nothing but pulſe. They conſecrate holy water but once a year, at which time every one fills a pot and carries it home, which brings in a conſiderable revenue to the church.

ARMENTIERES, a town of French Flanders, in the territory of Ypres, ſeated on the river Lys, which runs through it. It had walls and a caſtle; but they are now demoliſhed. It was taken by Lewis XIV. in 1667, and now belongs to the French. It is nine miles from Ypres, Liſle, and Balleuil. Long. 3. 3. E. Lat. 50. 40. N.

ARMINIANS, a ſect of Chriſtians, which aroſe in Holland by a ſeparation from the Calviniſts. They are great aſſertors of free-will; and maintain, that as Chriſt died for all mankind, all are capable of obtaining ſalvation, by fulfilling the conditions preſcribed in the Goſpel; and that the doctrines of predeſtination and reprobation are inconſiſtent with the goodneſs of God, and highly blaſphemous. See the next article.

ARMINIUS (JAMES) whoſe real name, in Low Dutch, was James Harmanni, a famous Proteſtant divine, from whom the modern ſect of Arminians take their name, was born at Oude-Water, in Holland, in 1560. He was ordained miniſter at Amſterdam, on the 11th of Auguſt, 1588, when he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſermons, which were remarkable for their ſolidity and learning, and gained him univerſal applauſe; but Martin Lydius, profeſſor of divinity at Franker, judging him a fit perſon to refute a writing in which Beza's doctrine of predeſtination had been attacked by ſome miniſters of Delft, Arminius, at his entreaties, undertook the taſk; but upon thoroughly examining the reaſons on both ſides, he came into the opinions he propoſed to deſtroy, and afterwards went ſtill farther than the miniſters of Delft had done. In 1600, he oppoſed thoſe who maintained that miniſters ſhould ſubſcribe the confeſſion and catechiſm every year. In 1602, a peſtilential diſeaſe raged at Amſterdam, during which he acted with the greateſt reſolution and courage, in aſſiſting the poor and comforting the ſick; and Lucas Trelcatius and Francis Junius dying of that diſeaſe at Leyden, the curators of that univerſity choſe Arminius profeſſor of divinity at that univerſity, and he was afterwards made doctor of divinity. Diſputes upon grace were ſoon after kindled in that univerſity; and he was at length engaged in a new conteſt, occaſioned by a diſputation of his concerning the divinity of the Son. Theſe conteſts, his continual labour, and the concern of ſeeing his reputation blaſted by a multitude of ſlanders in relation to his opinions, impaired his health, and threw him into a fit of ſickneſs, of which he died on the 19th of October, 1609. His morals were unexceptionable, his humanity and benevolence were conſpicuous in his whole conduct; he always expreſſed the greateſt reverence for the Deity; is ſaid, by thoſe who knew him beſt, to have preferred the approbation of his own mind to the opinion of the world, and to have died with the ſtrongeſt ſentiments of piety and devotion.

ARMIRO, a town of Macedonia, in Turky in Europe, ſeated at the bottom of the Golpho del Armiro, which ſome call the Gulph di Volo. Long. 23. 40. E. Lat. 38. 34 N.

ARMSTRONG (Sir THOMAS) a very active royaliſt during the exile of king Charles II. was born at Nimeguen, in Holland. His zeal in the ſervice of his prince occaſioned his being ſeveral times thrown into priſon; and the king, as a reward for his ſervices, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and, after his return, employed him in many important ſervices. However, he ſoon loſt the king's favour; and being charged with having ſome concern in the Rye-houſe plot, withdrew to Holland; but tho' he was brought back within the year, he was condemned as an outlaw, without being ſuffered to take his trial, and on the 20th of June, 1684, was hanged, drawn, and quartered.

ARMUYDEN, a town of the Netherlands, in the iſle of Walcheren, formerly of great trade, but it is now fallen to decay, its port being filled with mud. It is about two miles from Middleburgh. Long. 3. 40. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

ARNAUD DE VILLENEUVE, a celebrated phyſician, learned the Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic languages, and omitted nothing capable of improving him in the ſciences. However his fondneſs for aſtrology made him publiſh that the end of the world would happen in about the middle of the thirteen century; but he himſelf lived to ſee the folly of his prediction. Some time after, he taught that works of mercy were preferable to the ſacrifice of the maſs, and that it was highly blameable to eſtabliſh religious orders. Theſe opinions were condemned by the univerſity of Paris. Arnaud then retired into Sicily, where he met with a favourable reception from the king, who ſent him into France to treat with pope Clement V. but he was ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Genoa, about the year 1313. His works were printed at Lyons in 1520, and at Baſil in 1585, in folio. There has been falſely attributed to him a work intitled De tribus Impoſtoribus.

ARNAUD DE MEYRVEILTH, a poet of Provence, in the beginning of the thirteenth century, who wrote a book intitled Las recaſteras de ſa Comteſſa, and a Collection of Poems and Sonnets. He died in 1220.

ARNAUD DE COUTIGNAC, a gentleman of Provence, who was diſtinguiſhed for his excellent talent in poetry, which introduced him to the acquaintance of perſons of the greateſt quality. He wrote many ſonnets, and a Treatiſe on the Sufferings of Love. He died in 1354.

ARNAUD (JOHN DE LA MOTTE) a French gentleman, diſtinguiſhed by his uncommon bravery. Being at the head of a company of horſe, of which he was captain, he ſhut himſelf up in the city of Yſſore, which declared on the king's ſide againſt the League, and maintained the ſiege a long time with the lords De Chabanes and De Chazeron, after which he made a vigorous ſally at the head of thirty troopers, and with his own hand killed the count of Randam, chief of the League in Auvergne, whoſe death cauſed the ſiege to be raiſed, and was the occaſion of gaining the battle which was afterwards fought, and which confirmed all Auvergne to Henry IV.

ARNAUD D'ANDILLE (ROBERT) was born at Paris, in 1588, and appeared very young at court, where he acquired great reputation by his behaviour in very important employments. Never was any man more beloved by the great, or made a better uſe of his credit. At the age of fifty-five, he retired to Port Royal des Champs, where he performed his excellent tranſlations, &c. which are printed in eight volumes in folio. He died September 27, 1674, aged eighty-ſix.

ARNAUD (ANTHONY) doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Paris, February 6, 1612. He ſtudied philoſophy in the college of Calvi, and began to ſtudy the law; but, at the requeſt of his mother and the abbot of St. Cyran, he reſolved to apply to divinity, and went to the Sorbonne, where, reading St. Auguſtin's works, he embraced his opinions on grace. In 1643, he publiſhed his Treatiſe on frequent Communion, which highly diſpleaſed the Jeſuits, who preached and wrote againſt it. The diſputes upon grace, which broke out about this time in the univerſity of Paris, helped to increaſe the animoſity between the Jeſuits and Mr. Arnaud, who took part with the Janſeniſts, and ſupported their tenets with great zeal; but nothing raiſed ſo violent a clamour againſt him as two letters, which he wrote upon a prieſt's refuſing abſolution to the duke of Liancour. In the ſecond of theſe letters the faculty of divinity found two propoſitions which they condemned, and Mr. Arnaud was excluded from the ſociety. Upon this he retired; and it was during this retreat, which laſted near twenty-five years, that he compoſed that variety of works which are extant of his, on grammar, geometry, logic, metaphyſics, and theology. In 1668, the controverſy of the Janſeniſts being ended, he came from his retreat, and was preſented to the king, and kindly received by the pope's nuncio; but, in 1679, he withdrew from France, and ſettled in the Netherlands. He not only wrote many volumes againſt the Jeſuits, but a great number againſt the Calviniſts. He died in Auguſt, 1694, aged eighty-two.

ARNAY LE DUC, a town of France, in the duchy of Burgundy, ſeated in a valley near the river Arroux, almoſt in the middle of the province. It had formerly a caſtle, of which there is only a tower remaining, that ſerves for the town-houſe. It has but one pariſh church, which is built within the encloſure of the caſtle, three gates, and a little ſubſuburb. It is four hundred and fifty paces in length, three hundred and fifty in breadth, and one thouſand four hundred in circumference. There is one priory in the ſuburb, with a very old church. There is alſo an hoſpital, and a Jeſuit's college, with two maſters to teach the lower forms. It has a pretty good trade, and is ſixteen miles north-weſt of Baune. Long. 4. 26. E. Lat. 47. 7. N.

ARDNT (JOHN) a famous divine, born at Ballenſtadt, in the duchy of Anhalt, in the year 1555. He wrote in High Dutch a Treatiſe on true Chriſtianity, which has been tranſlated into ſeveral languages, and maintained ſome doctrines which engaged him in a diſpute with thoſe of his own communion. He died in 1621.

ARNGRIMUS, a learned man, a native of Iceland. See JONAS.

ARNHEIM, a town of the Low Countries, in the province of Guelderland, capital of Veluive. It is adorned with ſeveral fine churches, particularly that of St. Walburg and of St. Euſebius; this laſt has a very high tower. The town has five gates, and ſeveral fine ramparts, part of which are waſhed by the Rhine, and the other parts have wide and deep ditches before them. It ſtands on the frontiers of Germany and of the duchy of Cleves, ten miles north of Nimeguen, and twenty-five from Utrecht. There is a canal made between this place and Nimeguen, at the expence of both towns, on which boats paſs backwards and forwards to carry on a trade between them. The air is very healthful, on which account it is inhabited by perſons of diſtinction. Long. 5. 55. E. Lat. 52. 0. N.

ARNISÆUS (HENNINGUS) a native of Halberſtadt, and profeſſor of phyſic in the univerſity of Helmſtadt, was a philoſopher and phyſician of great reputation about the beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He travelled into France and England, and wrote a book De Subjectione & Exemptione Clericorum; another De Poteſtate temporali Pontificis in Principes; another De Tranſlatione Imperii Romani; and alſo ſeveral philoſophical, medicinal, and political treatiſes. He died in November, 1635.

ARNO, a river of Tuſcany, which riſes in the Apennine mountains, runs through Florence and Piſa, and falls into the Mediterranean a few leagues below Piſa. The valley through which it runs is exceeding pleaſant, and abounds with all manner of fruits.

ARNOBIUS, profeſſor of rhetoric at Sicca, in Numidia, towards the end of the third century. He embraced Chriſtianity; but on his applying to the biſhops to be admitted into the church, they remembering the vehemence with which he had oppoſed the truth, inſiſted on his giving ſome proofs of his good intentions; when, to ſatisfy them, he wrote a book againſt the Gentiles, in which he very ſtrongly refuted the abſurdities of their religion, and ridiculed their falſe Gods. There are ſeveral editions of this work; as, one publiſhed at Rome in 1542, at Baſil in 1546 and 1560, at Paris in 1570, at Antwerp in 1582, at Hamburgh in 1610, with notes by Elmenhorſtius, beſides many others. He alſo wrote a work intitled De Rhetoricæ Inſtitutione; but this is not extant.

ARNOLD, of Breſcia in Italy, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by being the founder of a ſect which oppoſed the wealth and power of the Romiſh clergy. He went into France, where he ſtudied under the famous Peter Abelard; but upon his return to Italy, took the habit of a monk, and aſſerted in his ſermons, that the pope and the reſt of the clergy ought not to enjoy any temporal eſtate, and that thoſe eccleſiaſtics who had any eſtates of their own, the biſhops who poſſeſſed any revenues, and the monks who held any lands, were entirely cut off from the leaſt hope of ſalvation. His doctrines were condemned, in 1139, in a council of near a thouſand biſhops; yet great numbers flocked to him, who now followed him into the mountains of Swiſſerland; but returning to Rome, he raiſed an inſurrection againſt pope Eugenius III. and afterwards againſt Adrian IV. he even drove out the pope and eccleſiaſtics, and reſolved to reſtore the ſenate; but Adrian IV. laying the people of Rome under an interdict till they had baniſhed Arnold and his followers, he again obtained the poſſeſſion of the city; and Arnold being ſome time after ſeized, he was hanged and burnt by Adrian's order, in 1155.

ARNOLD (GODFREY, or GOTHOFREDUS) in Latin Arnoldus, a famous miniſter and writer among the Pietiſts, was born at Annaberg, in the mountains of Miſnia, in Upper Saxony, on the 4th of September, 1666, and publiſhed ſeveral works; as, 1. an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory; 2. a work intitled Sophia; 3. a Diſſertation on waſhing of Hands; 4. another on the Hermunduri, an ancient people of Germany; 5. another on the Speaking of Angels; and ſeveral others. He differed widely from the body of the Romiſh church, his opinions nearly reſembling thoſe of Quakeriſm; yet he wrote againſt the Lutherans, and was himſelf treated with great ſeverity by almoſt all parties. He died May 30, 1714.

ARNULPH, the ſon of Carloman, king of Bavaria, was elected emperor at Tribur, in 887. He drove the Normans out of Lorrain, took Bergamo, and then Rome, where he was crowned by pope Formoſus, in the year 896. He was poiſoned by order of the ducheſs of Spoletto, and died of the pedicular diſeaſe, on the 24th of November, 899.

ARNULPH (St.) biſhop of Metz, in 614, after his having been intruſted with very great employments in the kingdom of Auſtria, he quitted the court and his biſhopric, to lead a ſolitary life in the deſarts of Voſge. From this biſhop the kings of France of the ſecond race were deſcended, for, by his wife Dode, he had Anchiſes, the father of Pepin Heriſtel, who was the father of the famous Charles Martel.

ARNULPH, biſhop of Liſieux, in the twelfth century, openly defended pope Alexander III. favoured St. Thomas of Canterbury, and died at the abbey of St. Victor, at Paris, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1182. His letters are wrote with great ſpirit and elegance; they contain remarkable circumſtances relating to the church hiſtory and diſcipline of his time.

ARNULPHUS, or ERNULPHUS, biſhop of Rocheſter, in the reign of Henry I. was a Frenchman by birth, and for ſome time a monk of St. Lucian de Beauvais, but obſerving ſome irregularities in the lives of thoſe monks, he reſolved to quit the monaſtery, and was invited to England by Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He wrote, 1. An Hiſtory of the Church of Rocheſter; 2. An Epiſtle in Anſwer to ſome Queſtions of Lambert, abbot of Munſter; and, 3. An Epiſtle on inceſtuous Marriages. He died in March, 1124, aged eighty-four.

ARNWAY (JOHN) a clergyman diſtinguiſhed by his benevolence and loyalty to king Charles I. was deſcended from a very good family in the county of Salop, from which he inherited a conſiderable eſtate. He was born in 1601, and educated at Oxford, and having received holy orders, obtained the rectories of Hodnet and Ightfield, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his piety and exemplary charity; for it was his cuſtom to cloath annually twelve poor people, and every Sunday to entertain as many at his table, not only plentifully, but with intimacy and reſpect; and the civil war breaking out, he preached againſt rebellion, and raiſed and clothed eight troopers for the ſervice of king Charles I. upon which his houſe was plundered by the parliament's army. He then went to Oxford to ſerve the king in perſon, which ſubjected him to a new train of misfortunes; for his eſtate was ſoon after ſequeſtered, and himſelf impriſoned till the king's death, after which he went to the Hague, where he publiſhed, 1. The Tablet, or the Moderation of Charles I the Martyr; and, 2. An Alarm to the Subjects of England. He at laſt went to Virginia, where he died in 1653.

ARONA, a town of Italy, with a good caſtle, in the territory of Anghiera, in the duchy of Milan. It is ſeated on the lake Major, about a mile and a half from Anghiera, which ſtands on the other ſide of the lake, and twenty-eight miles north-weſt of Milan. Long. 8. 15. E. Lat. 45. 40. N.

ARONCHES, a ſmall town in Portugal, on the confines of Spain. It is well fortified, and has about five hundred inhabitants. Long. 7. 30. W. Lat. 39, 5. N.

ARONTIUS, or ARUNTIUS, brother to Tarquin the Proud, married Tullia, the daughter of Servius Tullius; but that cruel and ambitious princeſs poiſoned him, and then married his brother Tarquin, about five hundred and thirty-ſix years before Chriſt.

There was another Aruntius, the ſon of Tarquin the Proud and the cruel Tullia, who was killed by Brutus, about five hundred years before the Chriſtian æra.

AROOL, a town of the empire of Ruſſia, in the Ukrain, ſeated on the river Occa, two hundred miles north of Moſcow. Long. 38. 15. E. Lat. 51. 48. N.

ARPAJON (LEWIS duke of) marquis of Severac, count of Rhodes, general of the French king's armies, and miniſter of ſtate, ſignalized himſelf by his valour on many occaſions. In 1645, he went voluntarily to the aſſiſtance of the iſland of Malta, when the Turks were preparing to attack it; on which he was made chief of the grand maſter's council, and generaliſſimo of the armies of religion. He took ſuch effectual meaſures for the ſafety of the iſland, that the grand maſter and order, out of gratitude, granted the ſingular privilege to him and his deſcendants in a right line, of having one of their ſons, at the choice of the father, a knight at his birth, and of wearing the croſs of the order at ſixteen years of age. Lewis de Arpajon was made duke in 1651, and died in 1679. The above privilege, at the extinction of the males, was continued to the daughter of the laſt of that houſe who married the count de Noailles.

ARPINAS, or ARPINOS, a celebrated painter, born at Rome, in 1570, was the favourite of pope Clement VIII who conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and gave him many other marks of his friendſhip. In 1600 he went to Paris, and received many conſiderable preſents from king

Henry, who alſo created him a knight of St. Michael. The touches of this painter's pencil are free and bold, and his compoſitions have much ſpirit and elevation; but they are generally incorrect, and his colouring is cold and inanimate. He died at Rome, in 1640. What he painted of the Roman hiſtory is the moſt famous of his works.

ARPINO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, eight miles north of Aquino, and fifty-five ſouth-eaſt of Rome. Long. 12. 50. E. Lat. 41. 45. N.

ARQUA, a town of Italy, in the Paduan, and in the ſtate of Venice. It is ten miles ſouth-weſt of Padua, and five miles ſouth-eaſt of Eſte. Long. 11. 43. E. Lat. 44. 43. N.

ARQUES, a town of France, in Normandy, ſeated on the little river Arques, four miles ſouth-eaſt of Dieppe. Long. 1. 30. E. Lat. 49. 54. N.

ARRAN, an iſland of Scotland, in the Firth of Clyde, between Cantire and Cunningham. It is ſeventeen miles in length, eleven in breadth, and forty-two in circumference. The middle of it is mountainous; and the higheſt part, called Capra, abounds with deer. On the more level parts, near the coaſt, the ſoil is fit to bear corn. There are ſeveral ſmall rivers, in which there are ſalmon; and in the ſea near it there are herrings, cod, ling, and whitings. On the coaſt there are ſeveral caves, one of which is large enough to hold a hundred men, and at the farther end is a pillar with a deer and a double hilted ſword engraved upon it. The miniſter preaches to the people here that are at a diſtance from the church. On this iſland are fed horſes, black cattle, ſheep, and goats.

ARRAS, the capital city of Artois, a province in the French Netherlands. It is ſeated on a mountain, and the parts about it are full of quarries, where they get ſtone for building. It is divided into two parts, the Town and the City. The abbé of St. Vaaſt is lord of the Town, and the biſhop of Arras of the City, which is the leaſt. They are parted in two by a ſtrong wall, a large foſſe, and the little river Chrinchron, which a hundred paces below falls into the Scarp. They are both well fortified, incloſed by high ramparts, and by double deep foſſes, which in ſeveral places are cut out of the rock. It has four gates; and ſince the French are become maſters of it, has a ſtrong citadel with five baſtions. The moſt remarkable places are, the great ſquare where the principal market is kept; this is full of fine buildings, with piazzas all round it like thoſe of Covent-garden. Not far from this is the leſſer market, which contains the town-houſe, a very noble ſtructure, with a high tower, covered with a crown, on the top of which is a brazen lion, which ſerves for a vane. In the midſt of this market is the chapel of the Holy Candle, which the Papiſts pretend was brought by the Virgin Mary herſelf, above ſix hundred years ago, when the city was afflicted with divers diſeaſes, and every one that touched the candle was cured; it is kept in a ſilver ſhrine. This chapel has a ſpire-ſteeple, adorned with ſeveral ſtatues.

The cathedral church of Notre-Dame ſtands in the city; it is a very large Gothic building, extremely well adorned; the tower is very high, and has a fine clock embelliſhed with little figures in bronze, which repreſent the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt; they paſs before the bell to ſtrike the hours and half hours. In this church there is a ſilver ſhrine, enriched with pearls and diamonds, which contains a ſort of wool, which they call manna, that they ſay fell from heaven in the time of a great drought, almoſt one thouſand four hundred years ago; they carry it very ſolemnly in proceſſion when they want rain. The abbey church of St. Vedaſt is the greateſt ornament of Arras, it being adorned with a fine ſteeple, and ſeats for the monks of admirable workmanſhip; the pulpit is of braſs, faſhioned like a tree, ſupported by two bears of the ſame metal, ſitting on their hind legs; there are little bears, in different poſtures, coming to climb up the tree. The chimes are remarkable for the different tunes which they play. There are eleven pariſh churches, and a great many convents of men and women. It is eighty eight miles north of Paris. Long. 2. 56. E. Lat. 50. 17. N.

ARRIA, a Roman lady of diſtinguiſhed fortitude, was the wife of Cæcina Rætus, a man of conſular dignity. Her huſband being engaged in the party of Camillus Scribonianus, who had taken up arms in Illyrium againſt the emperor Claudius, in the forty-ſecond year of the Chriſtian æra, was ſeized and put on board a ſhip in order to be conveyed to Rome. She followed him thither; when her relations finding that ſhe had thoughts of putting an end to her life, watched her with the utmoſt care; this ſhe perceived, but told them that their care was vain, ſince they could not hinder her from killing herſelf, and then riſing from her chair, ran her head with they utmoſt violence againſt the wall, and fell down as it were dead. When ſhe had recovered her ſenſes, ſhe ſaid to them, "Did I not "tell you, that I could find a painful way of killing myſelf, "if you denied me an eaſier method of doing it?" But when Arria found there was no hope of ſaving her huſband's life, and that he had not reſolution ſufficient to put an end to it himſelf, ſhe took a dagger and ſtruck it into her breaſt, and having drawn it out again, preſented it to him with theſe words, "Pætus, this gives me no pain;" on which Pætus followed the example ſhe had ſet him.

ARRIAGA (RODERIC D') a Spaniſh Jeſuit, born at Lucrona, January 17, 1592. He publiſhed ſeveral books, wherein he diſplayed a very ſubtile wit, viz. A Courſe of Divinity, in one volume folio; and a Courſe of Philoſophy, in eight volumes folio. He died at Prague, on the 17th of June, 1667.

ARRIAN, a celebrated hiſtorian and philoſopher, was born at Nicomedia, in Bythinia, and flouriſhed in the ſecond century, under the emperor Adrian and the two Antoninus's. His great learning and eloquence procured him the character of a ſecond Xenophon, and raiſed him to the moſt conſiderable dignities in Rome, and even to the conſulſhip itſelf. We have four books of his Diatribæ, or Diſſertations upon Epictetus, whoſe ſcholar he had been; and there is ſtill extant his Hiſtory of Alexander the Great, in ſeven books, which is greatly admired by the beſt judges, he alſo wrote many other works that are now loſt.

ARRIAN, a poet under the emperors Auguſtus and Tiberius. People have aſcribed to him two pieces; the one a Geographical Deſcription of Pontus Euxinus, and the other of the Red Sea; but theſe were written ſince his time.

ARROE, a ſmall iſland of Denmark, in the Baltic Sea, a little ſouth of the iſland of Funen. It is eight miles in length, and about two in breadth, and produces corn, anniſeed, black cattle, and horſes. It has three pariſhes, the moſt conſiderable of which is Koping. It ſtands at the ſouth ſide of the iſland, in the bottom of a bay, and has a port with ſome trade. Long. 9. 40. E. Lat. 55. 20. N.

ARROJO DE ST. SERVAN, a town of Spain, in Eſtramadura, eight miles ſouth of Merida, and twenty-five eaſt of Badojoz. Long. 5. 20. W. Lat 38. 40. N.

ARSACES I. king of the Parthians, about two hundred and fifty years before the Chriſtian æra. His ſucceſſors were called Arſacides.

ARSACES, or ARSACIUS, king of Armenia, in the fourth century. He was ſolicited by the Romans to grant them his aſſiſtance againſt the Perſians; and on the other hand, the Perſians employed promiſes, threatenings, and all kinds of artifice, to draw him over to their intereſt, not omitting the moſt valuable preſents. The emperor Conſtantius, fearing they would at laſt prevail upon him, gave him Olympia, the daughter of Ablavius, in marriage, treated him with the utmoſt kindneſs, and intreated him to be conſtant in his friendſhip and fidelity to the Romans; and Arſaces promiſed upon oath, that he would loſe his life rather than act contrary to their intereſt. After the death of Conſtantius, the emperor Julian wrote to Arſaces, and deſired him to meet him with an army upon the borders of Perſia; the king complied with this requeſt, and ravaged Chilocomum, a fruitful part of Media; but this coſt him dear, for Julian being killed in that war, Jovian his ſucceſſor, made peace with Sapores, king of Perſia, on this condition amongſt others, that the Romans ſhould never aſſiſt Arſaces, who had always been true and faithful to them, againſt the Perſians. Sapores, upon the concluſion of this peace, which was ſo diſhonourable to the Romans, infeſted Armenia with his armies; and having by fair words and treacherous promiſes engaged Arſaces to come to him, invited him to a great entertainment, took him priſoner, commanded his eyes to be put out, and having bound him with ſilver chains, cauſed him to be put to death in the moſt cruel manner. Thus was he rewarded for his unſhaken fidelity to the Romans.

ARSENIUS, a deacon of the Roman church, famous for the nobility of his family, but more ſo for his learning and piety, was ſent by pope Damaſus to the emperor Theodoſius, who wanted a tutor for his ſon Arcadius. Arſenius arrived at Conſtantinople in 383, where he was well received by the emperor, who was one day angry at ſeeing the maſter ſtanding and the ſcholar ſitting during the lecture, and ordered his ſon, though he had already been declared Auguſtus, to ſtand uncovered when Arſenius inſtructed him. Arſenius having uſed all his induſtry to educate his ſcholar, thought himſelf obliged at laſt to add correction to his reproofs; on which the young Arcadius was ſo enraged, that he deſired one of his officers to rid him of his tutor. The officer told Arſenius of it, who inſtantly fled to the deſarts of Egypt, where he paſſed many years with the hermits of Seté, and died there at ninety-five years of age. Theodoſius, who was grieved at the retreat of Arſenius, ordered him to be ſought for every where, without being able to find him.

ARSENIUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople, in the thirteenth century, was a native of that city, and was raiſed to the patriarchate by the emperor Theodore Laſcaris, who, on his death-bed declared him one of the two tutors of his ſon John;

John; but the other tutor ſhewing very pernicious deſigns with regard to the young prince, he reſigned his employment, and retired to a convent. But when Conſtantinople was retaken by the Greeks, in 1261, under the conduct of Michael Palæologus, Arſenius was called thither to reſume the patriarchate; but the year after, that emperor cauſed the eyes of John Laſcaris to be put out, when Arſenius, filled with indignation at ſo barbarous a treatment of his pupil, excommunicated him. The emperor, to repel his eccleſiaſtical thunder, called a council, and under falſe accuſations, cauſed Arſenius to be depoſed, and baniſhed into the iſle of Proconneſus. He wrote a Collection of Canons; there is alſo a Teſtament of Arſenius.

ARSENIUS, archbiſhop of Monembaſia, or Malvaſia, in the Morea, ſubmitted himſelf to the Roman church, which made him ſo odious to the Greeks, that Pachomus, patriarch of Conſtantinople, excommunicated him. He wrote very elegant letters to pope Paul III. which are ſtill remaining, as are alſo his Scholia on Euripides, and his Collection of Apophthegms. He lived in the ſixteenth century.

ARSES, the ſon of Artaxerxes Ochus, was raiſed to the throne of Perſia, by the power of the eunuch Bagoas, who had murdered his father; but four years after, that eunuch finding that Arſes was diſpoſed to call him to an account, he cauſed him and his whole family to be aſſaſſinated, and advanced Darius, ſurnamed Codomanus, to the throne.

ARSINOE, the daughter of Ptolemy Lagus, king of Egypt, was married to her own brother Ptolemy Philadelphus, who had an extraordinary affection for her. She, however, died without iſſue; when her huſband, to ſhew his love for her, not only gave her name to a diſtrict of Egypt, which he called Arſinois, but conſecrated a temple to her, and erected a fine ſtatue of that princeſs ſtanding upon a braſs oſtrich, upon mount Helicon, in Bœotia.

ARSINOE, ſiſter to the preceding, married Lyſimachus, king of Thrace and Macedon, when he had ſeveral grandchildren, the children of Agathocles and Lyſandra. Arſinoe having at length two ſons, the apprehenſion of her falling with them into Agathocles's hands induced her, with her huſband's conſent, to get him murthered; upon which Lyſandra fled with her ſons to Seleucus, general of the horſe, and being followed by ſeveral of Lyſimachus's officers, a war enſued, in which Lyſimachus was ſlain, and Seleucus made himſelf maſter of almoſt the whole kingdom; but he being ſoon after killed by Ptolemy Ceraunus, who by that means made himſelf maſter of the kingdom, the latter pretended to be in love with his ſiſter Arſinoe, who at laſt accepted of his offers, and went from Caſſandra to meet him. Their marriage was ſolemnized in the moſt ſolemn manner, and Ptolemy himſelf put the crown on his ſiſter's head in the preſence of the whole army. Arſinoe, overjoyed that ſhe had now recovered the crown ſhe had loſt by the death of her former huſband, invited Ptolemy to come to Caſſandra, the only place in which ſhe could be ſafe; this was what Ptolemy wanted; for he no ſooner arrived at the gate than he ordered the ſoldiers to ſeize it, and to kill Arſinoe's two ſons, who came out to meet him, and though they took ſhelter in their mother's arms, they were cruelly murdered; the unhappy mother left the city, tearing her garments and her hair, and retired to Samothracia, where ſhe died of grief.

ARSINOE, the wife of Magas, king of Cyrene, who a little before his death betrothed their only daughter Berenice to the ſon of Ptolemy, king of Egypt; but Arſinoe, immediately after his deceaſe, offered her, with the kingdom of Cyrene, to Demetrius, brother to king Antigonus, who accepted her offers, and ſoon arrived. He was very handſome, and perceiving that his perſon had made an impreſſion on the heart of Arſinoe, he neglected the daughter to make himſelf more agreeable to the mother, and being puffed up with pride, treated the troops with contempt, by which means rendering himſelf odious to them, they reſolved to get rid of him, and having concerted the means with Berenice, ſent aſſaſſins, whom ſhe let into the room at the time he had choſen to lie with her mother; when Arſinoe having heard her daughter give orders at the door to ſpare her mother, ſhe covered her gallant with her body as well as ſhe could; but her endeavours were to no purpoſe; they killed him; and in ſpite of Arſinoe, Berenice was married to the ſon of Ptolemy.

ARSLAN (ABU'L MODHAFFER ZEINO'DDIN) the thirteenth ſoltan of the family of Seljuk, that reigned in the Perſian and Arabian Iracks, ſucceeded his uncle, Soleiman Shah, in 1160. He is highly commended, not only for his valour, but for his humanity, generoſity, and goodneſs of temper, and for never ſuffering any perſon to ſpeak ill of another in his preſence. He died in 1175.

ARSLAN SHAH, the ſon of Kirman Shah, the fifth ſoltan of that branch of the family of Seljuk, which reigned in Kirman, ſucceeded his nephew Iran Shah, for fear of falling into whoſe hands, he had been obliged to conceal himſelf in a ſhoemaker's ſhop; but that cruel prince being ſlain by his own ſubjects, A. D. 1100, Arſlan Shah appeared, and was, by public conſent, made ſoltan in his room. He enjoyed a peaceable reign of forty-two lunar years, and died in 1141.

ARTA, by ſome called LARTA, a town of Lower Albania, in Turky in Europe, with a Greek archbiſhop's ſee. It is a pretty large town, and contains about ſeven or eight thouſand inhabitants, Greeks and Turks; but the former are the moſt numerous. The cathedral has as many windows and doors as there are days in the year. It is ſupported by above two thouſand marble pillars, and was built by Michael Ducas Commeno, emperor of Conſtantinople, as appears by an inſcription over the great door. It carries on a conſiderable trade, particularly in tobacco and furs. It is ſeventy miles north-by-weſt of Lepanto. Lon. 31. 30. E. Lat 39. 28 N.

ARTABANUS, the brother of Darius I. king of Perſia, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his wiſdom and prudence. He was averſe to the war his brother engaged in againſt the Scythians, and to the famous expedition of Xerxes, which proved ſo fatal to Perſia.

He ought not to be confounded with Artabanus, captain of the guards, and the aſſaſſin of Xerxes.

ARTABANUS I. king of the Parthians, the ſeventh from Arſaces, the founder of that monarchy, about two hundred and forty years before Chriſt. He ſucceeded Phrohates, his nephew, and died ſoon after, having been wounded in the arm in the war he had with the Thogarians.

ARTABANUS II. when he was only king of the Medes, was invited by the Parthians, upon the excluſion of Vonones, to reign over them, about the ſixteenth year of the firſt century; but he was at laſt dethroned, and obliged to ſeek a retreat at the court of Izates, king of Adiabene, who obliged the Parthians to reſtore him to the throne.

ARTABANUS III. king of the Parthians, the ſucceſſor and perhaps ſon of Volageſes, lived in the firſt century, in the time of the emperor Titus.

ARTABANUS IV. the laſt king of the Parthians, was diſtinguiſhed by his valour, and the ill treatment he received from the Romans. He aſcended the throne in the latter end of the ſecond century, and was ſleeping in quiet under the protection of a peace with the Romans, while the emperor Severus was ravaging the neighbouring countries, after which he ſuddenly fell upon his dominions, when this prince was unprepared, and obliged him, in the year 200, to ſave himſelf, with a few of his guards, by flight; the city of Cteſiphon, where he made his reſidence, was ſacked, and all his treaſures fell into the hands of the Romans. But this treachery was nothing in compariſon of that of Caracalla, who ſent ambaſſadors to Artabanus, laden with rich preſents, to deſire his daughter in marriage, and to repreſent the many advantages that would reſult from this alliance. Artabanus immediately rejected this propoſal; but at laſt being overcome by Caracalla's oaths, intreaties, and profeſſions of friendſhip, he conſented, and Caracalla entered his dominions, and was every where received as the ſon-in-law of the king. As ſoon as Artabanus heard that he drew near his capital, he went to meet him, accompanied by a prodigious number of people, who thought of nothing but teſtifying their joy by drinking, ſinging, and dancing; when Caracalla giving the ſignal to his troops, put all this multitude to the ſword; and as nobody was in a condition to reſiſt them, they murdered in cold blood as many as they pleaſed. Artabanus ſaved himſelf with great difficulty. From that day Caracalla plundered and burnt all before him, till being weary of this dreadful employment, he returned to Meſopotamia, where he was ſlain. Artabanus, eager to revenge the injuries he had ſuffered, marched as ſoon as he was able againſt the Roman army, who had choſen Macrinus in the room of Caracalla, and the fight having laſted two days ſucceſſively, from morning till night, began again on the third, and would probably have laſted till both armies were entirely ruined, if Macrinus had not let Artabanus know the unhappy end of Caracalla, declaring, at the ſame time, that he diſapproved what had paſſed, and would reſtore all the priſoners, and all the ſpoils, and live at peace with him. Theſe offers were accepted by Artabanus, and a peace was concluded with the new emperor in 217. In ſhort, this brave prince, who was the firſt that was called The Great King, was at length, in 226, oppoſed by Artaxerxes, a Perſian, who maintained his rebellion with ſuch ſucceſs, that in three years time he deprived Artabanus of his crown and life; and, in 229, put an end to the monarchy of the Parthians, and aſſumed the title of king of the Perſians.

ARTABAZUS, the ſon of Pharnaces, commanded the Parthians and Choraſmians in the famous expedition of Xerxes: after the battle of Salamis, he eſcorted the king his maſter to the Helleſpont, with ſixty thouſand choſen men; and after the battle of Platea, in which Mardonius engaged contrary to his advice, he made a noble retreat, and returned to Aſia with forty thouſand men under his command.

ARTABAZUS, the ſon of Pharnabazes, and the ſon-in-law of Artaxerxes Mnemon, made war on Ochus, his ſovereign, about three hundred and fifty-ſix years before Chriſt, and defeated an army of ſeventy thouſand men. He at length was reſtored to favour, and returned to Perſia, where he ſerved Darius againſt Alexander the Great. After the death of Darius, when he was ninety-five years of age, he preſented himſelf before Alexander, with his nine ſons, and met with a moſt favourable reception.

ARTAVASDES I. king of Armenia, and the ſon and ſucceſſor of that Tigranes who was conquered by Lucullus and Pompey, during the war of Mithridates. He deceived the Romans in the expedition of Craſſus, and perſuaded Mark Antony to turn his arms againſt the king of the Medes, and then evaded lending him aſſiſtance. Mark Antony at firſt diſſembled his reſentment; but two years after, A. D. 31, uſed ſo many artifices, that he drew him to an interview, and then took him priſoner, together with his wife and children, who were made the ornaments of his triumph; they were led to Cleopatra, laden with golden chains; and ſome time after Artavaſdes was put to death, and his head ſent to the king of the Medes.

ARTAVASDES, king of Media, was attacked by Mark Antony, at the ſollicitation of the king of Armenia, of the ſame name. This attempt proved fatal to Mark Antony, who imagining that the king, who had engaged him in it, had betrayed him, he turned all his indignation againſt the latter, and entered into an alliance with the king of Media, giving him part of Armenia, which he had taken from the other Artavaſdes; but this prince was ſoon after taken priſoner by Artaxias, the eldeſt ſon of Artavaſdes, king of Armenia, who had made his eſcape when his father was put in chains.

ARTAXERXES (LONGIMANUS) king of Perſia, ſucceeded his father Xerxes about four hundred and ſixty-four years before the Chriſtian æra. In the beginning of his reign, Cimon the ſon of Miltiades, and general of the Athenians, took ſeveral cities in Thrace, recovered and reſtored to their liberties moſt of the Grecian cities in the Leſſer Aſia, obtained a ſignal victory over the Perſian fleet, defeated an army of thirty thouſand Perſians, and carried the plunder of it, which was extremely valuable, in triumph to Athens.

Artaxerxes, in order to make head againſt Cimon, made Themiſtocles, who had been baniſhed by the Athenians, general of his armies on that ſide; but Themiſtocles choſe rather to die by a doſe of poiſon, than fight againſt his country.

About this time the Egyptians revolted, and choſe Inarus, the prince of Libya, their king; the Athenians entered into an alliance with him againſt the Perſians, and ſent to his aſſiſtance a fleet of two hundred ſail, which, in conjunction with the Egyptian navy, ruined that of Perſia. At land they defeated an army of three hundred thouſand Perſians; but the next year Artaxerxes gained a deciſive victory over the confederates, reduced the whole kingdom of Egypt, made Inarus priſoner, and put him to death. This being contrary to the articles of capitulation made with the Perſian general Megabuſus, he retired to his government in in Syria, raiſed a rebellion there, and defeated the forces that were ſent againſt him, ſo that Artaxerxes found it neceſſary to come to an agreement with him.

This was that Artaxerxes, who, by an expreſs decree, permitted the Jews to rebuild the walls of Jeruſalem; and the ſeventy weeks mentioned by the prophet Daniel, after which the Meſſiah was to appear upon the earth, are ſaid to commence from the date of this decree.

Cimon afterwards defeated the Perſians both by ſea and land, compelled them to accept of a peace on theſe terms, That the Grecian cities in Aſia ſhould enjoy their liberties, be governed by their own laws, and that the Perſian fleet ſhould not enter the Grecian ſeas. Artaxerxes died in the forty-fourth year of his age, and was ſucceeded by his only lawful ſon, Xerxes II.

ARTAXERXES II. or ARTAXERXES MNEMON, the eldeſt ſon of Darius Nothus, king of Perſia, ſucceeded his father four hundred and four years before the Chriſtian æra. His name was Arſaces, but on aſcending the throne he took the name of Artaxerxes, and from his extraordinary memory was called by the Greeks Mnemon, or Rememberer. Cyrus his brother took up arms againſt him, but was killed in battle; and under this prince happened the famous retreat of Xenophon, through moſt of the provinces of the empire, with only ten thouſand Greeks. He reigned thirty-ſix years, in which he carried on a war with the Greeks by his generals, and dying at ninety-four years of age, worn out with the diſtractions of his family, and the revolts of his ſubjects in the latter part of his reign. He was ſucceeded by Artaxerxes Ochus.

ARTAXERXES OCHUS, king of Perſia, concealed the death of his father Artaxerxes Mnemon, and adminiſtered the government in his name near ten months, during which he made a decree in the name of his father, for declaring himſelf king. When he found he was ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, he took upon him the government in his own name, and being of a cruel diſpoſition, ſecured himſelf on the throne by the murder of his brothers. He defeated Artabazus, reconquered Egypt, and laid waſte Sidon, Syria, and Paleſtine. But rendering himſelf odious by his cruelty, was poiſoned by the eunuch Bagoas, whom he had intruſted with his authority, three hundred and thirty eight years before Chriſt. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Arſes.

ARTAXIAS II. king of Media, the eldeſt ſon of Artavaſdes, was proclaimed king by his father's army, after the latter was taken priſoner, with his wife and other children; but diſpleaſing his ſubjects, they ſent to Rome to deſire that Tigranes, his younger brother, might be king; on which Auguſtus, who had Tigranes with him at court, ſent him to them; but before his arrival, Artaxias was killed by his own relations.

ARTAXIAS I. king of Armenia, ſeized that kingdom while he was only one of Antiochus the Great's generals, and divided it with another of the generals of that king. Antiochus, however, gave them both leave to enjoy a ſovereign command there, which they did not fail of taking advantage of, for on his being defeated by the Romans, they ſubmitted to the conquerors, who gave them the title of king, after which they enlarged their dominions at the expence of the adjacent countries.

ARTEMIDORUS, of Epheſus, ſurnamed Daldianus, in honour of his mother, who was of Daldis, a city of Lydia, lived under Antoninus Pius. He rendered himſelf famous by his book on dreams, which, though filled with frivolous obſervations, contain ſome things that are intereſting. M. Rigaud publiſhed a good edition of this work in Greek and Latin, with notes, which was printed at Paris in 1603. Artemidorus alſo wrote a treatiſe upon auguries, and another upon chiromancy.

ARTEMIS, in Pagan mythology, one of the names given to the goddeſs Diana.

ARTEMISIA, in antiquity, a feſtival celebrated in ſeveral places of Greece, particularly at Delphi, in honour of Artemis, or Diana. Another ſolemnity of this name was obſerved at Syracuſe for three days together, with banquets and ſports.

ARTEMISIA, queen of Caria, and the daughter of Ligdamis, marched in perſon in the expedition of Xerxes againſt the Greeks, and performed wonders in the ſea-fight near Salamis, four hundred and eighty years before the Chriſtian æra. Being purſued by an Athenian veſſel, ſhe attacked one of the Perſian ſhips, commanded by Demaſithymus, king of Calyndus, her enemy, and ſunk it, on which the Athenians, thinking that her ſhip was on the ſide of the Greeks, ceaſed their purſuit; but Xerxes was the principal perſon impoſed upon in this affair; for believing ſhe had ſunk an Athenian veſſel, he declared, that "the men had "behaved like women, and the women like men." She afterwards ſeized the city of Latmus, and Xerxes intruſted to her the care of his ſons. However, her valour and other excellent qualities could not ſecure her from love; for it is ſaid ſhe was paſſionately fond of a young man named Dardanus, and was ſo enraged at his neglect, that ſhe had the cruelty to put out his eyes while he lay aſleep, but afterwards being afflicted at what ſhe had done, threw herſelf from the top of the rock Leucas into the ſea.

ARTEMISIA, queen of Caria, the daughter of Hecatomnus, and the ſiſter and wife of Mauſoleus, immortalized herſelf by the honours ſhe paid to the memory of her huſband, by building for him, at Halicarnaſſus, a tomb called the Mauſoleum, that was one of the ſeven wonders of the world, from which the title of Mauſoleum was afterwards given to all tombs remarkable for their grandeur and magnificence. Artemiſia did not ſurvive her huſband above two years, but died of grief about the end of the one hundred and ſixth Olympiad, three hundred and fifty one years before the Chriſtian æra. It is ſaid that ſhe ſteeped the bones and aſhes of her huſband in water, and ſwallowed them, that her body might ſerve as a living tomb for his.

Artemiſia's grief did not, however, prevent her attending to the ſafety of her dominions. The Rhodians had formed the deſign of dethroning her, upon which ſhe carried on a war againſt them, and having at length beſieged and taken their city, erected within the walls two brazen ſtatues, one repreſenting Rhodes dreſſed in the habit of a ſlave, and the other of Artemiſia branding her with a hot iron. This monument of the ſhame of the conquered city laſted a long time, it being conſidered by them as a point of religion never to pull down the trophies even of their enemies: but at length, to conceal from the view theſe marks of their diſhonour, they encompaſſed them with a wall, and prohibited all perſons from entering it on pain of death.

ARTEMON, of Clazemenium, invented the battering ram, tortoiſe, and other warlike machines, when he followed Pericles to the ſiege of Samos.

ARTEVELDT (James) a famous brewer, born at Ghent, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his political knowledge, and enterprizing genius. He raiſed himſelf to an almoſt abſolute power in Flanders, but was at length killed by the inhabitants of Ghent in 1345.

Philip Arteveldt, his ſon, put himſelf at the head of thoſe who had revolted from the count of Flanders, and was killed at the battle of Roſebeck, in 1382.

ARTHINGTON (Henry) a gentleman of a good family in Yorkſhire, who, towards the latter end of the reign of queen Elizabeth, was ſeized with a ſtrange kind of enthuſiaſtic frenzy, which prompted him, together with one Coppinger and Hacket, to run about the ſtreets of London, calling the people to repent; to prophecy judgments againſt England; to declare that Hacket was king of the whole earth, and that God had deprived queen Elizabeth of her dignity, &c. For which Hacket was hanged, drawn, and quartered; Arthington was recovered from his deluſion, and pardoned; but Coppinger run abſolutely diſtracted, and refuſing all nouriſhment, died of hunger.

ARTHUR, king of the Britons, of whom ſcarcely any thing can be certainly affirmed. He is ſaid to have been the ſon of Uther Pendragon, king of Britain, and to have been born in 501. His life is a continued ſcene of wonders. It is ſaid that he killed four hundred and ſeventy Saxons with his own hand in one battle; and after having ſubdued many mighty nations, and inſtituted the order of the Knights of the Round Table, died A. D. 542.

Arthur, duke of Brittany, the ſon of Geoffrey Plantagenet, the fourth ſon of Henry II king of England, and of Conſtantia, daughter and heireſs of Conon, duke of Brittany, and earl of Richmond, was born after his father's death, on the 31ſt of March, 1187. In right of his mother he was heir apparent to the dukedom of Brittany, and to many lordſhips; and king Richard had ſo great a reſpect to the right of ſucceſſion, that, in the year 1190, in a letter directed to the pope, he declared his nephew Arthur his heir, in caſe he died without iſſue by his queen. Yet, in 1199, when that prince received a mortal wound before the caſtle of Chalus, he deviſed to his brother John the kingdom of England, and all his other dominions; on which the laſt mentioned prince was declared king, while Arthur was ſolemnly received by the French king, who took him under his protection. After many acts of hoſtility committed on both ſides, prince Arthur was taken priſoner by king John in 1202, and confined in the caſtle of Falaiſe, under the cuſtody of Hubert, where the king went to him, treated him very gently, and exhorted him to lay aſide all thoughts of adhering to the French king, and to depend on him, his uncle and ſovereign; but the young prince, who was then ſcarcely fifteen, inſiſting that he was heir not only to his uncle's French dominions, but to the crown of England, the king was ſo enraged, that he cauſed him to be removed to the caſtle of Rouen, under the cuſtody of Robert Vypont, where he was confined more cloſely than ever, and reſolved to have his eyes put out, and farther, deprived of the power of getting children: however, he was diſſuaded from this barbarous deſign, either by his chamberlain Hubert, or by his mother queen Eleanor; but it has been always ſtrongly ſuſpected that he cauſed him to be murdered, ſince in the ſpring of the next year, duke Arthur diſappeared, and was never more heard of.

Arthur III. duke of Brittany and Touraine, and conſtable of France, was born at the caſtle of Suſſinio, in 1393. He gave proofs of his valour at the glorious battle of Agincourt, in 1415, when he was taken priſoner, and brought into England, where he was kept till 1420. He afterwards defeated the Engliſh in Normandy and Poitou, gained the battle of Patai in Beauſſe, in 1429, and that of Formigni, in 1450. He ſucceeded the Duke of Brittany in 1457, and died without iſſue in 1458.

ARTOIS, a province of the French Netherlands, bounded on the north and part of the eaſt by Flanders, on the ſouth and weſt by Hainault, Cambreſis, and Picardy. It is about twenty-three miles in length, from St. Omer's to the Scheld, and about half as much broad. It is one of the beſt provinces of France, and the inhabitants carry on a conſiderable trade in corn, flax, hops, oil, and linen cloth. They are ſaid to be ſincere, faithful, laborious, and careful in performing their duty, and are particularly attached to their ancient cuſtoms and privileges. It is divided into ſeveral diſtricts, and Arras is the capital city.

ARTORIUS, a Roman knight, being engaged on a portico of the temple, during the ſiege of Jeruſalem, in order to avoid being conſumed by the flames, propoſed to Lucius, his friend, to receive him in his arms, on his leaping down, on which condition he promiſed to make him his heir: Lucius did ſo, and ſaved his life, but received ſo violent a ſhock from his weight, that he died on the ſpot.

ARVALES Fratres, in Roman antiquity, a college of twelve prieſts, inſtituted by Romulus, and choſen out of the moſt noble families, himſelf being one of that body; they aſſiſted in the ſacrifices of the ambervalia, annually offered to Ceres and Bacchus, for the proſperity of the fruits of the earth, when they wore on their heads crowns made of ears of corn.

The original of this inſtitution was as follows: Acca Laurentia, Romulus's nurſe, was accuſtomed once a year to make a ſolemn ſacrifice for a bleſſing on the fields, her twelve ſons always aſſiſting her in the ſolemnity; but at laſt loſing one of her ſons, Romulus offered himſelf to ſupply his place, and gave this ſmall ſociety the name of Arvales Fratres. This order was in great repute at Rome, they held the dignity for life, and never loſt it upon account of impriſonment, baniſhment, or any other accident.

ARVIRAGUS, an ancient Britiſh king, who flouriſhed in the time of the emperor Domitian. He gained a complete victory over Claudius, but being ſoon after beſieged by that prince in the city of Wincheſter, he made his ſubmiſſion to the Romans, and in conſequence of the treaty, married the emperor's daughter Genuiſſa. This monarch lived to a good old age: he confirmed the ancient laws, enacted new ones, and liberally rewarded perſons of merit.

ARUNDEL (Thomas) archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reigns of Richard II. Henry IV. and Henry V. was the ſecond ſon of Robert Fitz-Alan, earl of Arundel and Warren. In 1375 he was conſecrated biſhop of Ely, and was a conſiderable benefactor to the church and palace of that ſee. In 1388 he was made archbiſhop of York, when he built a palace for the archbiſhops; and in 1393, being then chancellor, removed the courts of juſtice from London to York. In 1396 he was tranſlated to the ſee of Canterbury; but in 1398 was impeached by the commons, together with the earl of Arundel, his brother, and the duke of Glouceſter, of high treaſon, for compelling king Richard to grant them a commiſſion to govern the kingdom, and was baniſhed; but returned to England with the duke of Lancaſter, afterwards king Henry IV. and was reſtored to his ſee. He exerted himſelf with great zeal againſt the followers of Wickliff, and died at Canterbury, on the 20th of February, 1413.

Arundel, a borough and market town in Suſſex, ſeated on the north-weſt ſide of the river Arun, over which there is a bridge. It had a harbour, wherein a ſhip of one hundred tun burthen might ride, but the ſea had ruined it ſo far, that, in 1733, an act paſſed for repairing it, and for erecting new piers, locks, &c. It is governed by a mayor, twelve burgeſſes, a ſteward, &c. and has a market on Wedneſday and Saturday. The caſtle, which gives the title of earl to its poſſeſſors, is ſeated on the eaſt of the Tame, and is reputed to be a mile in compaſs. Its fairs are on May 14, for cattle and hogs; Auguſt 21, for hogs, cattle, and ſheep; September 25, for cattle and ſheep; December 17, for cattle and pedlar's ware. It ſends two members to parliament, and is fifty-five miles ſouth-weſt-by-ſouth of London, and ten miles eaſt of Chicheſter. Long. 0. 25. W. Lat. 50. 45. N.

ARUNTIUS. See Arontius.

ARUSPICES, or Haruspices, in Roman antiquity, an order of prieſts, who pretended to foretel future events from the ſacrifices offered to the Gods, either before or after they were killed, but more particularly from the examination of of the entrails of beaſts after they were cut up. They alſo made their obſervations from the flame which aroſe while they were burning; from the flour or bran, and from the frankincenſe, wine, and water, uſed in the ſacrifice. Indeed the buſineſs of the aruſpices was not confined to the altars and ſacrifices, for they had an equal right to explain all other portents, and the ſenate frequently conſulted them on the moſt extraordinary prodigies.

The aruſpices were always choſen from the beſt families, and as their employment was of the ſame nature as that of the augurs, they were as much honoured. Their college, as well as thoſe of the other religious orders, had its particular regiſters and records.

ARZILLA, a very ancient maritime town of Africa, in the kingdom of Fez. Alphonſo, king of Portugal, took it by aſſault, and brought away the preſumptive heir of the crown. After that prince came to the throne, he beſieged it, in 1508, with one hundred thouſand men, but was obliged to abandon the undertaking. However, at length the Portugueſe forſook it of their own accord. It is ſituated ſixty miles ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Tangier. Long. 5. 30. W. Lat. 35. 30. N.

ASA, king of Judah, ſucceeded his father Abijam nine hundred and fifty-five years before Chriſt. He pulled down the altars erected to idols, reſtored the worſhip of the true God, and with the aſſiſtance of Benhadad, king of Syria, took ſeveral towns from the king of Iſrael: but the prophet Hanani reproaching him for having recourſe to foreign aſſiſtance, he threw him into priſon. He died nine hundred and ſeventeen years before the Chriſtian æra, and was ſucceeded by Jehoſhaphat.

ASAPH (St.) a city in Flintſhire, with a biſhop's ſee, on which account only it is taken notice of, for it is ſo poor a place it would not otherwiſe be worth mentioning. It has a market on Saturdays; and four fairs, on Eaſter Tueſday, July 15, October, and December 26, for cattle. It is two hundred and twelve miles north-weſt of London, and twenty-four weſt-north-weſt of Cheſter. Long. 3 25. W. Lat. 53. 18. N.

ASAR-ADDON, or ESAR-HADDON, the ſon of Sennacherib, ſucceeded his father about ſeven hundred and twelve years before the Chriſtian æra, and united the kingdoms of Nineveh and Babylon. He rendered himſelf maſter of Syria, ſent a colony to Samaria, and his generals took king Manaſſes, and carried him loaded with chains to Babylon. Aſar-Addon died after a reign of twelve years.

ASCANIUS, the ſon of Æneas and Creuſa, ſucceeded his father, who was king of the Latins, and defeated Mezentius, king of the Tuſcans, who had refuſed to conclude a peace with him. At length he founded Alba Longa, and died about one thouſand one hundred and thirty-nine years before the Chriſtian æra.

ASCENSION (Isle of) in the midway between Africa and Braſil. It has no water, which prevents there being any ſettlement. Eaſt-India ſhips ſometimes touch here in their return home. It ſupplies them with turtle or tortoiſes of a prodigious ſize. Long. 17. 20. W. Lat. 7. 5. S.

ASCHAFFENBURG, a town of Germany, ſeated on the river Maine, in the circle of the Lower Rhine, and territory of the elector of Mentz, who has a palace there. It is memorable for being the place where the king of Great-Britain took up his quarters the night before the battle of Dettingen. It is twenty miles eaſt of Franckfort, and forty eaſt of Mentz. Long. 9. 35. E. Lat. 50. 14. N.

ASCHAM (Roger) Latin ſecretary to queen Mary and Elizabeth, was born at Kirby Wiſke, near North-Allerton, in Yorkſhire, about the year 1515, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge, where he took his degree of bachelor of arts, on the 28th of February, 1534, when he was but eighteen years of age; and on the 23d of March following was elected fellow of his college. At twenty-one years of age he was made maſter of arts, and was ſoon after appointed by the univerſity to teach the Greek language publicly in the ſchools. He did not at firſt go into the new pronunciation of the Greek, which his intimate friend, Sir John Cheek, endeavoured to introduce into the univerſity; but upon a thorough examination, he adopted this pronunciation, and defended it with great zeal and ſtrength of argument. He was ſoon after choſen public orator. Among other accompliſhments, he was remarkable for writing a fine hand, on which account he was choſen to teach that art to prince Edward, the lady Elizabeth, and the two brothers Henry and Charles, dukes of Suffolk: and in 1548 was again ſent for to court, to inſtruct the lady Elizabeth in the knowledge of the learned languages; and having enjoyed this employment two years, returned to Cambridge, where he reſumed his office of public orator. In the ſummer of the year 1550, being upon a viſit to his relations in Yorkſhire, he received a letter of invitation to attend Sir Richard Moryſine, in his embaſſy to the emperor Charles V. In his journey to London, he viſited the lady Jane Grey, at her father's houſe at Broadgate, in Leiceſterſhire, when he ſurpriſed her reading Plato's Phœdo in Greek, in the abſence of her tutor. In September following he embarked with that ambaſſador for Germany, where he remained three years, and was not only of great ſervice to the ambaſſador in the public concerns, but alſo aſſiſted him in his private ſtudies, reading with him Herodotus, Sophocles, Euripides, and Demoſthenes, three days in the week, and employing the reſt of his time in writing the letters Sir Richard ſent to England. Soon after the king's death, he was made Latin ſecretary to queen Mary, and on queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the crown, was not only continued in his poſt of Latin ſecretary, but reſumed his former employment of tutor to her majeſty. He publiſhed a work on the innocence and uſefulneſs of ſhooting with the long-bow, intitled, Toxophilus; a Diſcourſe on the Affairs of Germany; and left in manuſcript a work, intitled, The Schoolmaſter. He died December 30, 1568, greatly lamented, the queen herſelf ſaying that ſhe had rather have loſt ten thouſand pounds than her tutor Aſcham.

ASCHARI, one of the moſt celebrated muſſulman doctors, died at Bagdat about the year 940. He maintained that God always acted by general, and not particular laws. His diſciples are called Aſcharians.

ASCLEPIADES, one of the moſt celebrated phyſicians among the ancients, was a native of Pruſa, in Bithynia, and practiſed phyſic at Rome, under Pompey, ninety-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra. He was the head of a new ſect, and by making uſe of wine and cold water in the cure of the ſick, acquired a very great reputation. He wrote ſeveral books, which are frequently mentioned by Galen and Celſus, but they are now loſt.

There have been ſeveral other perſons of the ſame name.

ASCLEPIODORUS the Athenian, an excellent painter and ſtatuary, lived in the time of Apelles, three hundred and thirty years before the Chriſtian æra, and in painting was chiefly applauded for the truth of his proportions, and the beauties of a correct ſtyle, in which Apelles declared himſelf as much inferior to this artiſt as he was to Amphion in the ordering and excellent diſpoſition of his figures. The moſt famous pictures of Aſclepiodorous were thoſe of the twelve Gods, for which Mnaſon, the tyrant of Elatea, gave him the value of about three hundred pounds ſterling apiece.

ASCLETARION, a famous aſtrologer, who having publiſhed predictions in relation to the deſtiny of Domitian, that prince aſked him what death he himſelf was to die; when the aſtrologer replied, that he ſhould ſoon be devoured by dogs. Domitian, to convince him that he was a falſe prophet, ordered him to be immediately put to death, and his body burnt; but it is added, that a violent tempeſt ariſing, the body of the unhappy wretch was abandoned, and the dogs tore it in pieces, about ninety years before the Chriſtian æra.

ASCOLI, a city of Italy, in the marquiſate of Ancona, and territory of the church, with a biſhop's ſee. It is divided into four parts, has two old caſtles, one hundred old towers, ſix bridges, and nine gates, beſides modern fortifications. It is well inhabited, and ſtands twenty miles eaſt of the Adriatic, nine ſouth of Montalto, fifty miles almoſt ſouth of Ancona, and ſeventy-ſix north-eaſt of Rome. Long. 15. 20. E. Lat. 42. 47. N.

Ascoli de Satriano, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a hill, at the foot of the Appennines. In 1399 the old town was deſtroyed by an earthquake, and this new one was built at a ſmall diſtance from the ruins. It is twenty-eight miles north-weſt of Acerenza, and ſeventy eaſt of Naples. Long. 15. 5. E. Lat 42. 8. N.

ASCOLIA, Ασκολια, a feſtival celebrated by the Athenian huſbandmen, in honour of Bacchus, to whom they ſacrificed a he-goat, and out of the victim's ſkin it was cuſtomary to make a bottle, or bag, which being filled with oil and wine, they endeavoured to hop upon it, and he that firſt fixed himſelf upon it was declared victor, and received the bottle for his reward.

ASCONIUS Pedianus, an able grammarian of Padua, the intimate friend of Virgil and Titus Livy. The excellent remarks on ſome of Cicero's orations are attributed to him. Servius, explaining this paſſage of Virgil,

Dic quibus in terris——
Tres pateat cæli ſpatium non amplius ulnas, obſerves, that Aſconius Pedianus ſays, that he heard a perſon tell Virgil that theſe words puzzled all the grammarians.

ASCOUGH (William) doctor of laws, and biſhop of Saliſbury in the reign of king Henry VI. was deſcended from a very ancient family, ſeated at Kelſey, in Lincolnſhire. The moſt remarkable particular concerning this prelate was the tragical manner of his death. While the biſhop was officiating at the altar at Edington, in Lincolnſhire, Jack Cade and his followers, who had the day before plundered his carriages, and taken no leſs than ten thouſand marks in money, aſſaulted him in a moſt furious manner, and dragging him away to a neighbouring hill, daſhed out his brains, then tearing his bloody ſhirt in pieces, to be preſerved in memory of this horrid action, they left his naked body on the place. This happened on the 29th of June, 1450.

ASDRUBAL, general of the Carthaginians, the ſon-in-law of Amilcar, and the brother-in-law of Hannibal, was defeated by Regulus and Metellus, and killed by a Gauliſh ſlave, whoſe maſter he had cauſed to be put to death, about the two hundred and twenty-fourth year before the Chriſtian æra. It was he who built Carthagena, in Spain.

Asdrubal Barca, the ſon of Amilcar, and the brother of Hannibal, general of the Carthaginians; being ſent from Spain with ſuccours to Hannibal in Italy, he ſuffered himſelf to be ſurpriſed by the conſul Claudius Nero, and was killed with fifty-five thouſand of his troops; after which his head was thrown into Hannibal's camp, in the two hundred and ſeventh year before the birth of Chriſt.

Asdrubal, general of the Carthaginians, the ſon of Giſco, and one of the greateſt captains of his time, drew to his party Syphax, king of Numidia, who was in love with Sophaniſba, his daughter. He was defeated by Scipio, about two hundred and four years before the Chriſtian æra, and died two years after.

Asdrubal, another Carthaginian general, having broke a peace made with the Romans, harraſſed them, and killed a great a great number of them. Scipio the Younger beſieged him in Nephera, and at length in Carthage, which he took, one hundred and forty-ſix years before the Chriſtian æra. Aſdrubal then retired into the temple of Æſculapius, which he defended for ſome time, but at length was obliged to ſurrender to Scipio, for want of proviſions; but his lady choſe rather to kill her children, and to burn herſelf in the temple, than to fall into the hands of the enemy.

ASELLIUS (Gaspard) a learned phyſician of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Cremona, and was the firſt who communicated to the world the knowledge of the lacteal veins, by his diſſertation de Lacteis Venis, printed in 1627.

ASSENDIAR, one of the Perſian heroes, was killed by Roſtam, who ſhot him with an arrow. He is ſaid to have uſed this military maxim, "If you would be obeyed by your ſoldiers, command nothing but what is poſſible."

ASGILL (John) a late humourous writer, was bred to the law, and practiſed in Ireland with great ſucceſs. He was there elected a member of the houſe of commons, but was expelled for writing a Treatiſe on the Poſſibility of avoiding Death; and being afterwards choſen a member for the borough of Bramber, in Suſſex, he was alſo on the ſame account expelled the parliament of England. After this he continued thirty years a priſoner in the Mint, Fleet, and King's-Bench, during which time he publiſhed a multitude of ſmall political pamphlets, ſeveral of which were in defence of the ſucceſſion of the houſe of Hanover, and againſt the pretender. He died in the Rules of the King's-Bench, in the year 1738, when he was upwards of fourſcore.

He died at Hanwell, February 8, 1693.

ASIA, is one of the three general parts of our continent, and one of the four of the whole earth. It is ſeparated from Europe by the Mediterranean Sea, the Archipelago, the Black Sea, the Palus Meotis, the Don, and the Dwina, which fall into the White Sea; and from Africa by the Arabic Gulph or Red Sea, and the Iſthmus of Suez. All the other parts are ſurrounded by the ocean. The late diſcoveries ſhew that it does not join to America, though it extends very near it. It is ſituated between forty-four and a hundred and ninety-ſix degrees of longitude, and one and ſeventy-four degrees of latitude. From the Dardanelles to the moſt eaſtern ſhore of Tartary, it is four thouſand ſeven hundred and forty miles in length, and from the moſt ſouthern point of Malacca to the moſt northern point of Nova Zembla, is four thouſand three hundred and eighty miles in breadth. It may be divided into ten great parts; Turky in Aſia, Arabia, Perſia, the Mogul's Empire, with the Two Peninſulas of the Indies; Tibet, China, and Korea; Great and Little Bukaria, with Koraſin; Tartary, Siberia, and the iſlands. The principal governments are generally monarchical. Turky, Perſia, the Mogul's Empire, and China, are ſubject to ſingle monarchs; the reſt are divided among ſeveral ſovereigns. Siberia is ſubject to the Ruſſians, Little Tartary to the Tartars of the Crim; Great Tartary, partly to the Ruſſians, partly to its own monarch, and partly to China. Great Bukaria is ſubject to the Perſians; and Little

Bukaria

Bukaria, partly to the Tartars, and partly to the emperor of China. As to the number of the potentates, there are ſeven emperors, thirty kings, beſides petty princes, and the rajahs of India. The emperors are, the grand ſignior, the great mogul, the emperor of Japan, the khan of the Eluth Tartars, the emperor of Ruſſia, the emperor of China, and the ſhah of Perſia. The principal kings, are, the ſheriffs of Mecca and Medina; the ſollars of Yemen, or Arabia the Happy; the grand lama of Tibet, the kings of Viſipone, Ava, Siam, Tonquin, Cochinchina, Korea, Ceylon, Borneo, &c.

The principal religions of Aſia, are, the Chriſtian, the Mahomedan, the Pagan, and that of Confucius. The Chriſtian religion is profeſſed in ſome parts of Aſiatic Turky; part of Little Tartary, the north-weſt part of Perſia, and by the Ruſſians in Siberia. The Mahomedan is eſtabliſhed in Arabia, Perſia, Little Tartary, Bukaria, and the Mogul's empire. It likewiſe begins to ſpread along the coaſt of India, and in the iſlands. The Pagan religion, by which we underſtand, that wherein images are uſed, or wherein the worſhip of the Deity is mixt with that of idols, is profeſſed by the bulk of the inhabitants of the Mogul's empire; in both the Peninſulas of India; in China and Siberia; in the iſlands of Aſia; in all Weſtern Tartary, in Tibet, and in all the countries between India and China. The religion of Confucius is eſtabliſhed in China.

The languages of Aſia are ſo many we cannot pretend to enumerate them all, and therefore we ſhall only mention the chief. The principal of Turky in Europe, are the Grecian and Turkiſh; the Armenian is ſpoken in part of Turky in Aſia, and Perſia; the Arabic is the only tongue in Arabia, and is ſpread over part of Turky in Aſia, as a learned language. The Perſian is uſed in Perſia, and the court of the great mogul. The Indian is ſpoken in India, by the ancient inhabitants of that country. The Malayan language is common on the coaſt of India, and in ſome of the iſlands. The Siameſe in Siam, the Tibetran in Tibet; the Manchew in China and Eaſtern Tartary; and the Tartarian in Great Tartary. Beſides theſe, there are ſeveral diſtinct languages in Siberia and the iſlands of Aſia. The characters they make uſe of in writing are almoſt as different as the languages, having each characters of their own, except the Chineſe, which are uſed in Japan as well as China; as alſo in Tonking and Cochinchina.

The chief rivers of Aſia are, the Euphrates and Tigris, in Turky; the Indus and Ganges, in India; the Kiang and Hoang-ho, in China; the Sir Amu and Wolga, in Weſtern Tartary; the Saghalia Ula or Amur, in Eaſtern Tartary; the Irtiſh, Oby, Jeniſea, and Lena, in Siberia. The lakes are, that prodigious one called the Caſpian Sea, and near that another very large one, but lately known to us, called the lake Aval. The Baykal is in Siberia, the Kokonor near Tibet, and the Tong Ping in China. The chief mountains are, the Taurus in Turky and Perſia; the Imaus, between India and Tibet, and the Altay in Tartary.

The Aſian iſlands are very numerous, inſomuch that ſome reckon one hundred and fifty thouſand; but of this there is no certainty. However, they may be divided into thoſe of the eaſt, weſt, ſouth, and ſouth-eaſt. Thoſe that lie on the eaſt of Aſia are, the iſlands of Jeſſo or Yedſo, and Japan, with ſeveral ſmall ones on the coaſt of Korea, the iſland of Formoſa, and the Philippines. Thoſe on the weſt, are the iſland of Cyprus, in the Mediterranean; Scanderoon, off Natolia, and the iſle of Rhodes, off Phiſchio, on the ſame coaſt. Thoſe on the ſouth are, the iſles of the Maldives, in the Indian Sea, the iſle of Ceylon, off cape Komorin, with a great many ſmall ones in the gulph of Bengal. Thoſe on the ſouth-eaſt are, the iſles of Sandi, as Sumatra, the iſles of Java, Borneo, &c. the Moluccas, the iſles of Kumbava, Timor, &c. See all theſe articles in their proper places.

ASIA MINOR. See NATOLIA.

ASINIUS POLLIO, conſul and Roman orator, diſtinguiſhed himſelf under Auguſtus by his exploits and his literary works. He is frequently mentioned with praiſes by Horace and Virgil, and is ſaid to have collected the firſt library at Rome. He died at Freſcati, at eighty years of age.

His ſon Aſinius Gallus was conſul, and married Agrippina, who had been repudiated by Tiberius.

ASKRIG, a town in Yorkſhire, ſix miles ſouth-by-eaſt of York. ASNA, or ESNA, a town in Upper Egypt, ſeated upon the Nile, believed by ſome authors to be the ancient Syena, though others ſay the ruins of it are ſtill to be ſeen near Aſſuan. It is ſo near the cataracts of the Nile, that they may juſt be heard from thence. It contains ſeveral monuments of antiquity, and among the reſt, an ancient Egyptian temple, pretty entire, all painted throughout, except in ſome places that are effaced by time. The columns are full of hieroglyphic figures. This ſuperb ſtructure is now made uſe of for a ſtable, wherein they put oxen, camels, and goats. And a little way from thence, are the ruins of an ancient nunnery, ſaid to be built by St. Helena, ſurrounded with tombs. It is the principal town in theſe parts, and the inhabitants are rich in corn and cattle. They drive a conſiderable trade into Lower Egypt and Nubia, by means of the Nile, and alſo by the caravans that paſs over the Deſert. The inhabitants are all Arabs, except about two hundred Cophts, the ancient inhabitants, and a ſort of Chriſtians. They are under the government of the Turks, who have a cadi, and the Arabs have two ſheriffs of their own nation. Long. 31. 40. E. Lat. 38. 15. N.

ASOPH, or AZOPH, a city of Kuban Tartary, in Aſia, ſituated on the ſouth ſhore of the river Don, near its mouth, a little to the eaſt of the Palus Meotis. It has been ſeveral times taken and retaken by the Turks and Ruſſians, it ſtanding on their frontiers. But when the laſt peace was concluded between theſe two powers, it was agreed that the fortifications ſhould be demoliſhed, and the town remain under the dominion of Ruſſia. Long. 41. 30. E. Lat. 47. 18. N.

ASPASIA, of Miletus, a lady who became celebrated at Athens for her wit and beauty. She was ſo eloquent, and had ſuch ſkill in politics, that Socrates himſelf went to receive leſſons from her. Pericles, the Athenian general, loved her to diſtraction, and quitted his wife to marry her. It is ſaid, that ſhe then governed the republic, by the advice ſhe gave her huſband, and that ſhe made him undertake the war of Samos, and that of Megara; whence aroſe that of Peloponneſus. After the death of Pericles, which happened four hundred and twenty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra, ſhe attached herſelf to a man of low birth, whom ſhe raiſed by her intrigues to the moſt conſiderable poſts in the republic; but diſhonoured herſelf by entertaining courtezans in her houſe.

She ought not to be confounded with another Aſpaſia, who was beloved by Cyrus, the ſon of Darius Nothus, king of Perſia.

ASPILCUETA (MARTIN DE) commonly called Dr. Navarrus, or the doctor of Navarre, was born of a noble family, at Varaſayn, in Navarre, December 13, 1491, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in the canon law, he being celebrated by his cotemporaries, and his authority quoted by the caſuiſts and writers on canon law. ASSELYN (JOHN) a famous Dutch painter, was born in Holland, and became the diſciple of Iſaiah Vandevelde, the battle painter. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in hiſtory paintings, battles, landſcapes, animals, and particularly horſes. He travelled into France and Italy, and was ſo pleaſed with the manner of Bambochio, that he always followed it. He painted many pictures at Lyons, where he married the daughter of a merchant of Antwerp, and returned with her to Holland, where he firſt diſcovered to his countrymen a freſh and clear manner of painting landſcapes, like Claude Lorraine, upon which all the painters imitated his ſtyle, and reformed the dark brown they had hitherto followed. Aſſelyn's pictures were ſo much admired at Amſterdam, that they ſold there at a high price. He died in that city in 1660. Twenty-four pieces of landſcapes and ruins, which he painted in Italy, have been engraved by Perelle.

ASSEN, a place to which the inhabitants of Gombroon, in Perſia, retire in the ſummer months, to avoid the violent heats heats and unwholeſome air. It is about fifteen miles diſtant, has the advantage of good water, and the factory belonging to the Engliſh Eaſt-India company have fine gardens there, that produce plenty of oranges, and the trees are always green, producing bloſſoms, green and ripe fruit. The factory at Gombroon is ſupplied from hence with roots and herbage, in their proper ſeaſon. Long. 57. 25. E. Lat. 27. 25. N.

ASSENS, a maritime town of Denmark, in the iſland of Fiunen, with a good port. It is ſixteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Odenſey. Long. 10. 30. E. Lat. 55. 15. N.

ASSER, a celebrated rabbi, in the fourth century, the author of the Babyloniſh Talmud.

ASSERIUS MENEVENSIS, biſhop of Sherbourne, in the ninth century, was born at St. David's, in Wales. It was he who perſuaded Alfred to found the univerſity of Oxford, and ſettle annual ſtipends upon the profeſſors of the ſeveral ſciences. He wrote, 1. Annales Rerum geſtarum Ælfredi Magni, of which we have three editions. 2. Several Homilies. 3. Aureorum Sententiarum Enchiridion, i. e. A Manual of Golden Sentences. 4. Comment. in Boethium de Conſolatione, i. e. A Commentary upon Boethius de Conſolatione; and died, according to Dr. Cave, in the year 909.

ASSHETON (WILLIAM) doctor of divinity, and rector of Beckenham, in Kent, was born in the year 1641, and educated at Brazen-noſe college, Oxford. After entering into orders, he became chaplain to the duke of Ormond, and was admitted doctor of divinity in 1673. Soon after, he was nominated to a prebend in the church of York, preſented to the living of St. Antholin, London, and to the rectory of Beckenham in Kent. He was the firſt projector of the ſcheme for providing a maintenance for clergymen's widows, and others, by a jointure payable out of the mercers company. He wrote ſeveral pieces againſt the Papiſts and Diſſenters, and ſome devotional tracts. He died at Beckenham, in September, 1711, in the ſeventieth year of his age.

ASSISIO, an epiſcopal city of Italy, moderately large, in the ſtate of the church. It is built on the ſide of a hill, and has a magnificent church, or rather three churches one upon another. It is ſeventy miles north of Rome. Long. 13. 35. E. Lat. 43. 4. N.

ASSUAN, a town in Upper Egypt, inhabited by a few poor people; and near it are the ruins of the ancient Syena. There are ſome lodging rooms in a fortreſs for a few Janizaries, who guard the country under an aga. Towards the weſt there is a rock of granate, covered with unburnt bricks, which ſeems to have been the Aſſuan of the middle ages. Between the rock and the river there is a building, which ſeems to have been conſtructed for the obſervation of the ſtars, as mentioned by Strabo. All the neighbouring country eaſtward, and the very bed and iſlands of the Nile are red granate. And there are ſcattered about abundance of columns, and other ancient pieces of the ſame ſtone. Long. 31. 35. E. Lat. 23. 50. N.

ASSUMPTION, an iſland of North America, in the gulph of St. Laurence, at the mouth of the great river of the ſame name. It is covered with trees. Long. 60. 40. W. Lat. 49. 30. N.

ASSUMPTION, a large and handſome town, of Proper Paraguay, on the river of the ſame name in South America. It is a biſhop's ſee, is well peopled, and ſeated in a country fruitful in corn and fruits, whoſe trees are always green. There is likewiſe a great quantity of paſture, and the air is temperate and ſalutary. Long. 60. 40. W. Lat. 34. 10. S.

ASSYRIA, a country of Aſia, which formerly comprehended thoſe provinces of Turky and Perſia, now called Diarbeck, Curdiſtan, and Irac-Arabi.

ASTABAT, a town of Armenia, in Aſia, ſituated near the river Aras, twelve miles ſouth of Nakſhivan. The land about it is excellent, and produces very good wine. It is the only country that produces the root called ronas; it runs in the ground like liquorice, and ſerves for dying red. It is very much uſed all over the Indies, and for it they have a great trade. Long. 46. 30. E. Lat. 39. 0. N.

ASTARTE, in Pagan mythology, a Phœnician goddeſs, called the queen of heaven. Some imagine that the moon was adored under this name; others ſuppoſe her to be the goddeſs Juno; Cicero calls her the fourth Venus of the Aſſyrians; and Lucian, Europa, the daughter of Agenor. She was ſometimes repreſented with a long, and at others with a ſhort habit. Sometimes holding a long wand with a croſs upon the top of it. Some medals repreſent her crowned with battlements, and others with a crown of rays. Sanchoniathon repreſents her with a cow's head; and in a medal ſtruck at Cæſarea, in Paleſtine, ſhe is crowned with battlements, with a man's head in her right hand, and a ſtaff in her left.

This goddeſs, it is evident, was originally no more than one of the Egyptian ſymbols, ſet up and joined with the ſeveral ſigns of the zodiac, to make known the different ſeaſons; and it is plain, that from the different manner in which the Egyptian Iſis was repreſented, a number of different goddeſſes were formed by other nations, and worſhipped under different names. See the article ISIS.

Solomon introduced the worſhip of Aſtarte in Iſrael; and in the reign of Ahab, Jezebel had this worſhip performed with much pomp and ceremony; ſhe had four hundred prieſts; the women were employed in weaving hangings or tabernacles for her; and Jeremiah obſerves, that "the "children gathered the wood, the fathers kindled the fire, "and the women kneaded the dough to make cakes for the "queen of heaven."

ASTELL (MARY) one of the greateſt ornaments of her ſex and country, was the daughter of Mr. Aſtell, an opulent merchant at Newcaſtle upon Tyne, where ſhe was born, about the year 1668. Among other accompliſhments, ſhe was miſtreſs of the French, and had ſome knowledge of the Latin tongue; and was well verſed in the mathematics and philoſophy: ſhe had a complete knowledge of many claſſic authors. She came to London at about twenty years of age, and ſpent the remaining part of her life in that city, and at Chelſea, ſpending her time in writing for the advancement of religion, virtue, and learning; and in the practice of the duties ſhe pathetically recommended to others. Her ſentiments of piety, charity, humility, friendſhip, and other Chriſtian graces, were refined and ſublime. Religion ſat very gracefully upon her, unattended with the forbidding airs of ſourneſs or moroſeneſs. She was remarkably abſtenious; but a few years before her death, was obliged to have one of her breaſts cut off, and underwent the painful operation, without diſcovering the leaſt timidity or impatience, and even without a groan: But this impaired her conſtitution. When the time of her diſſolution drew near, ſhe ordered her coffin and ſhroud to be made, and brought to her bed-ſide, to keep her mind fixed on proper contemplations. She died in the year 1731, in the ſixty-third year of her age, and was buried at Chelſea. She wrote, 1. A ſerious Propoſal to the Ladies. 2. An Eſſay in Defence of the Female Sex. 3. Letters concerning the Love of God. 4. Reflections upon Marriage. 5. Moderation truly ſtated. 6. The Chriſtian Religion, as profeſſed by a Daughter of the Church of England, and ſome other works.

ASTERABAD, a province in the north eaſt part of Perſia, having Tabriſtan on the weſt, part of the Caſpian Sea, and part of Jorjan on the north, Korarſan on the weſt, and Koumas on the ſouth. It is a mountainous country, except near the banks of the rivers that almoſt ſurround it, and there the country is champain, pleaſant, and fruitful, producing grapes of a prodigious ſize. In other parts the ſoil is ſandy and barren. Aſterabad is the chief town which gives name to a gulph of the Perſian Sea, at the bottom of which it ſtands. Long. 54. 35. E. Lat. 36. 50. N.

ASTERIA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Cœa, Latona's ſiſter. Jupiter ſurpriſed her in the ſhape of an eagle, and carried away in his talons.

ASTERIUS, a famous rhetorician, born in Cappadocia, was one of the moſt zealous defenders of Arianiſm; but having ſacrificed to idols under Maximianus Hercules, about the year 304, the Arians did not chooſe to ſuffer him to become an eccleſiaſtic. He compoſed ſeveral works.

ASTERIUS, or ASTURIUS, a learned biſhop of Amaſia, in the fourth century. He left ſeveral homilies.

ASTERIUS, or ASTURIUS, a Roman conſul, in 449. We have, under his name, a Conference on the Old and New Teſtament, in Latin verſe; in which each ſtrophe contains, in the firſt verſe, an hiſtorical fact in the Old Teſtament; and in the ſecond, an application of that fact to ſome point in the New.

ASTI, a city of Monferrat, in Italy, with a citadel, and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the Tanaro, and is the capital of the county of the ſame name. It is well fortified with ſtrong walls and deep ditches; and is divided into the city, borough, citadel, and caſtle. There are a great many churches and convents, as well as other handſome buildings; and its territory is well watered, abounding with groves, pleaſant hills, and ſpacious fields. It was taken by the French in 1745, and retaken by the king of Sardinia, in 1746. It is twenty-three miles eaſt of Turin. Long. 8. 15. E. Lat. 54. 50. N.

ASTIOCHUS, admiral of the Lacedæmonians, took Phocea and Cuma, and conquered the Athenians near Cnidus, four hundred and eleven years before the Chriſtian æra; but was at length repulſed by the artifices of Alcibiades.

ASTLEY (JOHN) a famous champion, in the reigns of king Henry V. and king Henry VI. was deſcended of the ancient and noble family of Aſtley, in Warwickſhire, and born about the beginning of the fifteenth century. In 1438 he fought on horſeback, in the ſtreet of St. Antoine, in Paris, one Peter de Maſſe, a Frenchman, who had challenged all comers, in honour of his miſtreſs; and this antagoniſt he eaſily overthrew. In 1442 he performed the like exploit, and with the like ſucceſs, before king Henry VI. and his court, in Smithfield. This ſecond combat was with one Sir Philip Boyle, an Arragonian knight, whom he encountered on foot, and whom he preſently diſarmed; upon which they were parted. As a reward of his bravery, he was dubbed a knight, and obtained an annuity of one hundred marks per annum. He died at Pateſhall in Staffordſhire, and lies buried there under a handſome monument.

ASTON (Sir ARTHUR) an officer in king Charles the Firſt's army, was the ſon of ſir Arthur Aſton, of Fulham, in Middleſex. After having made ſeveral campaigns in foreign countries, he returned into England, about the beginning of the grand rebellion, with as many veteran ſoldiers as he could bring with him, and joined the king againſt the parliament. He commanded the dragoons at the battle of Edgehill, where he did his majeſty conſiderable ſervice. The king made him governor of the garriſon of Reading, in Berkſhire, and commiſſary-general of the horſe; in which poſt he three times repulſed the earl of Eſſex, who, at the head of the parliament army, laid ſiege to that place; but Sir Arthur being dangerouſly wounded, the command devolved on colonel Richard Fielding. Some time after he was appointed governor of the garriſon of Oxford. But having the misfortune to break his leg by a fall from his horſe, he was obliged to have it cut off. After the king's death he was employed in the ſervice of king Charles II. and appointed governor of Drogheda in Ireland, but Cromwell having taken the town about the 10th of Auguſt, 1649, and put the inhabitants to the ſword, Sir Arthur had his brains beaten out with his own wooden leg.

ASTON (Sir THOMAS) a brave and loyal gentleman, in the reign of king Charles I. was the ſon of John Aſton, of Aſton, in Cheſhire, eſq. He wrote ſome pieces againſt the Preſbyterians, and raiſed a party of horſe for the king's ſervice; but being at length taken in a ſkirmiſh in Staffordſhire, and carried priſoner to Stafford, he there endeavoured to make his eſcape, when a ſoldier ſeeing him, gave him a blow on the head, which, with other wounds he had a little before received, threw him into a fever, of which he died, March 24, 1645.

ASTORGA, a very ancient city of Spain, in the kingdom of Leon, with a biſhop's ſee, is ſeated on the river Tuerta, and well fortified both by art and nature. It ſtands in a moſt agreeable plain, about a hundred and fifty miles north-weſt of Madrid. There are excellent trouts in the river. Long. 6. 20. W. Lat. 42. 20. N.

ASTRACAN, an archiepiſcopal city of Tartary, in Aſia, ſubject to the Ruſſians, and the capital of a territory of the ſame name. It is ſeated in an iſland called Dolgoi, about ſixty miles from the Caſpian Sea, and is encompaſſed with a double wall, half a muſket ſhot from each other. It is about two miles and a half in circumference, but including the ſuburbs near five miles. At a diſtance it affords a very handſome proſpect, on account of the ſtone ſteeples and turrets; but the buildings within are not anſwerable, and the ſtreets are narrow and dirty; beſides, the houſes are of wood, and very mean. A cathedral church was begun to be built here, but the foundation being bad, part of it fell down, and it has never ſince been finiſhed. It contains about ſeventy thouſand inhabitants, the bulk of whom are Moſcovites; however, there are ſeveral nations mixt among them, who are drawn thither for the convenience of trade. The Armenians poſſeſs one of the ſuburbs entirely, and the Tartars another, which reſembles a city; and yet the houſes are poor and miſerable, they being built in a round form, with a ſort of canes or reeds, and bulruſhes; and are about twelve feet in diameter. In that part of the top which ſerves for a roof, there is a pole in the middle, with a piece of cloth faſtened to it, which they turn to the wind to facilitate the exit of the ſmoke; and when the turf or cow-dung, which they burn, is turned to a coal, they draw it in. When the weather is cold, they put a coarſe cloth over the hut, which keeps in the heat, and renders the whole family warm.

The kingdom of Aſtracan was conquered from the Tartars, and conſiſts chiefly of vaſt deſert, but not barren, plains; for it has very few towns, except by the ſides of rivers, and theſe are in the hands of the Ruſſians.

ASTREA, in the Pagan mythology, the Goddeſs of Juſtice, the daughter of Aſtreus, one of the Titans, or, according to Ovid, of Jupiter and Themis. She deſeended from heaven in the golden age to dwell upon earth; but at length the crimes of mortals made her re-aſcend to heaven, when ſhe became that conſtellation in the Zodiac which is called Virgo.

ASTURIAS, a province of Spain, which gives a title to the king of Spain's eldeſt ſon, who is called prince of Aſturias. It is about one hundred and twenty-four miles in length, and forty-ſix in breadth; bounded on the north by the bay of Biſcay, on the ſouth by Old Caſtile and the kingdom of Leon, on the weſt by Gallicia, and on the eaſt by Biſcay. It is divided into two parts; the firſt is called Aſturia d'Oviedo, of which Oviedo is the capital; and the other is named Aſturia de Santillana, becauſe Santillana is the principal town. This province is full of mountains and foreſts, and yet produces excellent wine and horſes. There are here mines of gold, lapis lazuli, and native cinnabar; and the people are ſincere, brave, generous, induſtrious, and laborious. Some of the beſt families in all Spain proceed from hence. It was never conquered by the Moors.

ASTYAGES, the ſon of Cyaxares, and the laſt king of the Medes. According to Herodotus, he began his reign five hundred and ninety-five years before the Chriſtan æra. During the pregnancy of his daughter Mandana, who had married Cambyſes, king of Perſia, he dreamt that he ſaw a vine ſpring out of her boſom, and extend its branches over all Aſia, which, according to the interpretation of the magi, ſignified the child ſhe ſhould bring forth would ſubdue many kings. Mandana was delivered of Cyrus, when the king gave the infant to Harpagus his confident, with orders to put it to death; but Harpagus ſparing its life, Aſtyages was ſo enraged when he came to know it, that he made him eat the fleſh of his own ſon. Harpagus, in order to be revenged, called in Cyrus, who was now grown up, and who dethroned his grandfather, about five hundred and fifty-nine years before Chriſt. This is the account given by Herodotus; but Xenophon repreſents it in a different manner.

ASTYANAX, in fabulous hiſtory, the only ſon of Hector and Andromache. Calchas having foretold that Aſtyanax, when he grew up, would revenge the death of his father, Ulyſſes diſcovered where he was, notwithſtanding the care his mother took to conceal him, and to prevent the completion of the prophecy, threw him down from the walls of Troy.

ATABALIPA, a celebrated king of Peru, of the family of the Yncas, was defeated and taken priſoner by Francis Piſaro, the Spaniſh general, who afterwards, contrary to his promiſe and the law of nations, cauſed him to be ſtrangled, in 1533; but ſome time after Piſaro himſelf was killed by Diego d'Almagro.

ATACAMA, a town of South America, in Los Charcas, a province of Peru, near the tropic of Capricorn. Atacama is chiefly remarkable for its great deſart, which extends from the mountains of the Andes to the South Sea, and from Arica to the river Capiapo, which is three hundred miles in length. It is divided from Chili by dreadful mountains, where the cold is ſo exceſſive, that people are ſometimes frozen to death. The longitude of the port of Atacama is 68. 20. W. Lat. 0. 22. S.

ATALANTA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Schnœus, king of Scyros, was ſought for in marriage by ſeveral young princes, to whom her father had promiſed her, on condition they could conquer her in a race. Hippomenes alone had the happineſs to obtain her; for, by the advice of Venus, he threw, as they were running, three golden apples out of the courſe, and Atalanta running to take them up, Hippomenes gained the prize; but afterwards they neglecting to pay their offerings to Venus, ſhe ſhewed her reſentment by infatuating them to ſuch a degree, that they lay together in the temple of Cybele, who, for that profanation, turned them into lions.

ATALAVA, a town of Portugal, in Eſtramadura, ſeated on an eminence, with a good fortreſs, five miles ſouth of Tomer. Long. 7. 20. W. Lat. 39. 25. N.

ATE, in Pagan mythology, a miſchievous Goddeſs, who perverted men's underſtanding, dulled their reaſon, and took delight in involving them in misfortunes and engaging them in quarrels. There was no way to be ſecured from her, but by having recourſe to the Lites, the daughters of Jupiter.

Some mythologiſts ſay, that Ate is the evil actions committed by mankind, which are the real ſources of all our troubles and misfortunes; while the Lites are the prayers which we ought to make uſe of in our calamities.

ATENA, a ſmall town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with the title of a principality, twenty-three miles north of Policaſtro, and thirteen miles from Marſico. Long. 15. 38. E. Lat. 40. 28. N.

ATH, a ſmall town of the Netherlands, in the country of Hainault. It is a ſtrong place, and was taken by the French in 1745, but was reſtored to the Auſtrians by the treaty of Aix la Chapelle. It is ſeated on the river Dender, thirteen miles north weſt of Mons, and thirteen ſouth of Ghent. Long. 3. 40. E. Lat. 50. 35. N.

ATHALARIC, king of the Oſtrogoths, ſucceeded Theodoric in 526, and died of a debauch in 534.

ATHALIAH, the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and the grand-daughter of Amri, married Jehoram, king of Judah, and cauſed the ruin of that prince's family. After the death of Jehoram and his ſon Ahaziah, ſhe put to death all the royal family, in order to ſeize the government, except Joaſh the ſon of Ahaziah, who was ſtill in his cradle, and eſcaped the ſlaughter by being ſaved by Jehoſhabeath, the daughter of king Jehoram and the wife of Jehoiada the prieſt, who cauſed Joaſh to be ſet upon the throne, and Athaliah to be put put to death, about the eight hundred and ſeventy-eighth year before Chriſt.

ATHANASIUS (St.) biſhop of Alexandria, and one of the greateſt defenders of the faith againſt the Arians, was born in Egypt. He followed St. Alexander to the council of Nice, in 325, where he diſputed againſt Arius, and the following year was made biſhop of Alexandria, but, in 335, was depoſed by the council of Tyr, when having recourſe to the emperor Conſtantine, the Arian deputies accuſed him of having hindred the exportation of corn from Alexandria to Conſtantinople, on which the emperor, without ſuffering him to make his defence, baniſhed him to Treves. The emperor, two years after, gave orders that he ſhould be reſtored to his biſhopric; but on his return to Alexandria, his enemies brought freſh accuſations againſt him, and choſe Gregory of Cappadocia to his ſee, which obliged Athanaſius to go to Rome to reclaim it of pope Julius. He was there declared innocent, in a council held in 342, and in that of Sardica in 347, and two years after was reſtored to his ſee by order of the emperor Conſtans; but after the death of that prince, he was again baniſhed by the emperor Conſtantius, which obliged him to retire into the deſarts. The Arians then elected one George in his room, who being killed in a popular ſedition under Julian, in 360, St. Athanaſius returned to Alexandria, but was again baniſhed under Julian, and reſtored to his ſee under Jovian. He addreſſed to that emperor a letter, in which he propoſed that the Nicene creed ſhould be the ſtandard of the othodox faith, and condemned thoſe who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt. He was alſo baniſhed by Valens, in 367, and afterwards recalled. St. Athanaſius died on the 2d of May, 373.

His works principally contain a defence of the myſtery of the Trinity, and of the incarnation and divinity of the Word and Holy Spirit. There are there editions of his works which are eſteemed; that of Commelin, printed in 1600; that of Peter Nannius, in 1627; and that of father Montfaucon. It is now generally allowed by the learned, that St. Athanaſius was not the author of the creed, which bears his name it not being mentioned, by any of the fathers, or any author, for ſeveral hundred years after his death.

ATHEAS, king of Scythia, was a warlike, haughty, and politic prince. He made war on the Triballians and Iſtrians, and was killed in a battle againſt Philip when ninety years of age, about three hundred and forty years before the Chriſtian æra.

ATHELING (Edgar) the ſon of Edward, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, king of England. His father dying when he was young, he was educated by Edward the Confeſſor, after whoſe death he was deprived of his right to the crown by Harold, the ſon of earl Godwin, who, by the intrigues of the clergy, was raiſed to the throne before him; but Harold being defeated and killed in the famous battle of Haſtings, in 1066, the nobles and people acknowledged Atheling for their king; but William, duke of Normandy, awing them by his victorious arms, was crowned at Weſtminſter. In 1067; Edgar, attended by many of the nobility, retired firſt into Northumberland, and afterwards into Scotland. Thoſe who adhered to him had ſuch intereſt both at home and abroad, that they ſoon aſſembled a numerous army, and bid fair to raiſe him to the throne. In 1068 king William ſent Robert Comyn into the North to expel Edgar; but he was ſlain by his own forces. The next year Edgar receiving aſſiſtance from Denmark, and being joined by more Engliſh lords, he made head againſt the Normans, and after ſeveral ſucceſsful engagements, made himſelf maſter of York, and wintered between the Ouſe and the Trent; but in 1070 William found means, by his money and promiſes, to prevail on the Danes, and ſome of the Engliſh lords, to deſert Edgar, on which he was obliged to retire again into Scotland, where his ſiſter was ſoon after married to king Malcolm, who in return promiſed to aſſiſt him openly, though king William had demanded his being delivered up, and threatened to invade Scotland in caſe of his refuſal. In 1072 king William entered Scotland with an army, but meeting with little ſucceſs, he readily concluded a peace with Malcolm, in which Edgar Atheling was included, and upon his ſubmiſſion was received into king William's favour. In 1074 Edgar left Scotland, and went into Normandy, where the king gave him a noble revenue. About the year 1100 he went into the Holy Land, and in 1102 was with Baldwin II. king of Jeruſalem, when beſieged in Rama. He afterwards returned into Normandy to duke Robert, for whom he had a great friendſhip. But king Henry I. being now on the throne of England, and invading Normandy, both he and Robert were taken priſoners at the battle of Trenchebray, in 1106, when the whole force of Normandy was routed. King Henry, however, freely diſmiſſed Edgar, who returning to England, ſpent the remainder of his days in the country. He was living in 1120, when he muſt have been about ſeventy years of age.

ATHELSTAN, or Æthestan, the ſon of Edward ſurnamed the Elder, the twenty-fourth king of the Weſt Saxons, and of Edgina, a ſhepherd's daughter, ſucceeded his father in 924, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery in a battle, in which he defeated Anlaff, king of Northumberland, whoſe army conſiſted of Scots, Picts, Danes, and Norwegians, and obtained ſuch reputation, that the emperor Henry, ſurnamed the Fowler, ſent to demand one of his ſiſters in marriage for his ſon Otho: Hugo, king of the Franks, alſo deſired another for his ſon, and Lewis, prince of Aquitain, ſent an embaſſy to deſire a third for himſelf. On this occaſion greater preſents were ſent into England than had ever been ſeen before, and the glory of Athelſtan's court exceeded that of any of his predeceſſors. He was no leſs ſucceſsful againſt the Welſh, for having beaten them in the field, he cauſed Ludwal, king of Wales, with all his petty princes, to meet him at Hereford, where they did him homage, and promiſed to pay him a yearly tribute of twenty pounds weight of gold, three hundred of ſilver, and twenty-five thouſand black cattle.

The greateſt blemiſh in his reign is ſuppoſed to be his treatment of his brother Edwin, whom he ſuſpected of having a deſign to deprive him of his crown; for notwithſtanding his proteſtations of innocence, he cauſed him to be put on board a leaky ſhip, with his armour bearer and page, when the young prince, unable to bear the ſeverity of the weather and want of food, drowned himſelf. Some time after the king's cup-bearer, who had been the chief promoter of this act of cruelty, happened, as he was ſerving at the king's table, to trip with one foot, but recovering himſelf with the other, ſaid pleaſantly, "See how brothers "afford each other aſſiſtance;" which ſtriking the king, he conſidered the ſervice Edwin might have been of to him in his wars, and cauſed that affair to be thoroughly examined into, when finding that the unhappy prince had been falſely accuſed, he cauſed the cup-bearer to be put to a cruel death; and to atone for his crime, ſuffered ſeven years penance, and built the monaſteries of Middleton and Michelneſs. However, ſome authors treat the above ſtory as unworthy of credit. Athelſtan, however, formed many wiſe laws, and rendered himſelf much admired on account of his wiſdom, wealth, and the extent of his dominions. He reigned about ſixteen years, and died at Glouceſter in 940 or 942.

ATHEMENES, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Catreus, king of Crete, who being informed by an oracle that he ſhould kill his father, left him, and retired to Rhodes, where he built the temple of Atamyrius, upon a mountain of the ſame name; when his father coming thither in ſearch of him, he killed him without knowing him.

ATHENÆUM, in antiquity, a public place in which the profeſſors of the liberal arts held their aſſemblies, the poets rehearſed their verſes, and the rhetoricians declaimed. Theſe places were built in the manner of amphitheatres, and encompaſſed with ſeats. The three moſt celebrated Athenæa were, one, at Rome, built by the emperor Adrian, one at Lyons, and one at Athens, where there were a great number of them.

ATHENÆUS, a phyſician, born at Attalia, a city of Cicilia, was the founder of the Pneumatic ſect, and maintained that fire, air, water, and earth, are not elements, but that their qualities are ſo, namely, heat, cold, moiſture, and dryneſs, to which he added a fifth, called πνεῦμα, or ſpirit, whence his followers received the name of the Pneumatic ſect. He lived in the firſt century, and is frequently quoted by Galen.

Athenæus, a celebrated grammarian, born at Naucratis in Egypt, flouriſhed in the third century, and was one of the moſt learned men of his time. The only work we have of his now extant is entitled The Deipnoſophiſts, i. e. The Sophiſts at Table, in fifteen books, of which the two firſt are wanting, a part of the third, and the greateſt part of the laſt. We there find a ſurpriſing variety of facts and citations, which renders this work highly entertaining to the lovers of antiquity.

There has alſo been a mathematician of this name, who wrote a treatiſe on Mechanics, which is inſerted in the works of the ancient mathematicians, printed at Paris in 1693, in folio, in Greek and Latin.

ATHENAGORAS, an Athenian philoſopher, who flouriſhed about the middle of the ſecond century, and was remarkable for his great learning, and his zeal for Chriſtianity. He wrote an Apology for the Chriſtians, addreſſed to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, and to Commodus; and alſo a treatiſe on the Reſurrection.

ATHENION, a celebrated painter of Maronea, a city of Thrace, flouriſhed about three hundred and twenty years before the Chriſtian æra. He was greatly admired for his works, and would have riſen to the higheſt pitch of perfection, had the length of his life been but anſwerable to the great extent of his genius.

ATHE-

ATHENODORUS, furnamed CORDYLIO, a very eminent Stoic philoſopher, of Pergamus, conſtantly refuſed the favours which kings and great generals were deſirous of beſtowing upon him: but Cato the Younger being in Aſia at the head of an army, and wiſhing to have this philoſopher always with him, went himſelf to Pergamus, and by his entreaties prevailed upon Athenodorus to follow him to the camp, when they contracted ſo ſtrict a friendſhip, that the philoſopher continued with him as long as he lived.

ATHENODORUS, the ſon of Sandon, was a famous Stoic philoſopher, of Tarſus, whence he was ſurnamed Cananita. He went to the court of the emperor Auguſtus, who admired him for his virtue and probity, beſtowed great honours upon him, and made him tutor to Tiberius. He uſed to ſpeak very freely to the emperor, and to give his advice in a very extraordinary manner; of which the following is a remarkable inſtance. It is well known that Auguſtus was extremely fond of women, and that even the Roman ſenators often ſent him their wives in a covered chair or litter, that they might not be ſeen. It happened one day, that Athenodorus met a ſenator, who was extremely concerned at the emperor's ſending for his wife, who was a great beauty. When the philoſopher, to make the emperor ſenſible of the danger to which he expoſed himſelf by theſe infamous practices, went into the chair inſtead of the lady, and taking a naked ſword, ordered the chairmen to carry him to Auguſtus. On his coming into the emperor's preſence, he ruſhed out with his ſword in his hand, as though he had intended to murder him. The emperor was greatly terrified; but when Athenodorus acquainted him with his intention, he was well pleaſed, and promiſed upon oath never to expoſe himſelf thus any more. He continued at court till he was very old, when he deſired leave to return into his own country, which the emperor granted: but before he went, he warned the emperor not to give himſelf up to anger, but whenever he ſhould be in a paſſion, to rehearſe the four and twenty letters of the alphabet, before he reſolved to ſay or do any thing; upon which, Auguſtus taking him by the hand, "I want," ſaid he, "your aſſiſt-"ance ſtill longer," and kept him for a year more.

ATHERSTON, a market town in Warwickſhire, ſeated near the river Anker. The town is indifferent large, and well built; it has a chapel of eaſe, a free-ſchool, and a market on Tueſdays. The living is a rectory, rated at 13l. 1s. 8d. in the king's books. Its fairs are on April 7, for horſes, cows, and ſheep. July 18, for toys. September 19, for cheeſe, horſes, and cows. December 4, for horſes and fat horned cattle. The cheeſe fair is thought to be the greateſt of any in England. It is twelve miles ſouth-by-weſt from Coventry, and a hundred and four from London. Long. 1. 30. W. Lat. 52. 40. N.

ATHERTON (JOHN) biſhop of Waterford, in Ireland, was born at Bawdrip, near Bridgwater, in Somerſetſhire, in the year 1598, of which pariſh his father, the Rev. Mr. John Atherton, was then rector. He finiſhed his ſtudies at Oxford, where he took the degree of maſter of arts, and entering into holy orders, obtained the rectory of Huiſh Combflower, in Somerſetſhire. He married, while young, a moſt agreeable woman; yet it is affirmed that he committed inceſt with her ſiſter; for this he was forced to ſue for his pardon, which being procured, he went to Ireland, where he obtained the parſonage of St. John's church, Dublin, and became chaplain to Adam Loftus, viſcount Liſle, and lord chancellor, by whoſe favour he was likewiſe made a dignitary of Chriſt church cathedral; but there happening a contention between his patron and the earl of Strafford, lord deputy of Ireland, he ungratefully betrayed his patron, and inſinuating himſelf into the lord deputy's favour, that nobleman, in conſideration of his knowledge in the canon and eccleſiaſtical law, made him a prebendary of Chriſtchurch, and afterwards, in 1636, procured his advancement to the biſhopric of Waterford and Liſmore, he being then doctor in divinity. His epiſcopal government was a ſcene of oppreſſion and extortion; for, inſtigated by pride, covetouſneſs, and cruelty, he harraſſed both the Proteſtants and Papiſts in the eccleſiaſtical courts, and ſtripped many families of poſſeſſions they had long quietly enjoyed; by which means he not only added ſeveral conſiderable eſtates to his own fee, but obtained a plentiful one for himſelf. Soon after his advancement to the biſhopric, he had a long and dangerous ſickneſs, in which he made a ſolemn vow, that if God would reſtore him, he would conſtantly preach and catechiſe every Sunday; but the firſt time he went to church after his recovery, the judges of aſſize being at Waterford, he thought if he ſhould do it then, it would be imagined that he did it for fear of them, and deferring it for that day, never after performed it. He gave himſelf up to the vileſt abominations, making both ſexes a prey to his luſt, and the number of his concubines is ſaid to have amounted to no leſs than ſixty-four. It is poſitively affirmed, that he was admoniſhed to leave this profligate courſe of life by his ſiſter, the wife of Mr. Lekie, whoſe mother being dead, appeared to her, charging her to go and warn him, that if he did not immediately reform his wicked life, it would be cut off at the gallows. Whether this was a dream, or only deſigned to give weight to her arguments, ſhe actually went to Ireland, and enforced her earneſt perſuaſions, by relating what ſhe ſaid had been revealed to her: but he only anſwered, "What "muſt be, ſhall be; marriage and hanging go by de-"ſtiny." He now not only continued the ſame ſhameful courſe, but fell into the commiſſion of beaſtiality. At length, in the midſt of his foul career, the wretch who, when he was young, had been his corrupter, and whom he had not ſeen during twenty years, coming caſually to Ireland, the ſight of him ſtruck him with horror, and his conſcience made him dread that he was a preſage of a ſpeedy vengeance. In fact, about three weeks after, a bill of complaint was preferred againſt the biſhop in the houſe of lords of Ireland, upon which he was ſuddenly ſeized and impriſoned, and afterwards, being tried for beaſtiality, was found guilty, and received ſentence of death for committing that crime with a mare and a cow. Dr. Bernard attended Atherton in Dublin caſtle, who became exceeding penitent, and with abundance of tears and groans bewailed the ſins of his paſt life. He was hanged on Gallows-green, at Dublin, on the 5th of December, 1640. Dr. Bernard, by archbiſhop Uſher's command, publiſhed two pieces on this occaſion, one entitled, The penitent Death of a woeful Sinner; or, the penitent Death of John Atherton, &c. the other, a Caveat to the Miniſtry and People; or, a Sermon preached at the Funeral of the ſaid Prelate. Theſe contain a very particular account of his behaviour, from the time of his receiving ſentence till his execution.

ATHIAS (JOSEPH) a Jew, and celebrated printer of Amſterdam, publiſhed in 1661 and in 1667, two excellent editions of the Hebrew Bible, in two volumes octavo; on which account the ſtate's general made him a preſent of a gold chain and a medal, as a teſtimony of their approbation. He died in 1700.

ATHLONE, a town in Ireland, in the county of Weſtmeath, ſeated on the river Shannon. It is moderately large and divided into two parts, which ſtand on each ſide of the river, and communicate by means of a ſtone bridge. The Engliſh inhabit that on the eaſt ſide, and the Iriſh that on the weſt. They are both well fortified; but were taken by king William, in 1691. Below Athlone, the country is low, flat, and marſhy; and on the bank of the Shannon, there is a great bog, which begins near the town, and runs fifty miles in length; in ſome places it is two or three broad; The ſoil of this bog is good for nothing but to make turf. Long. 8. 0. W. Lat. 53. 20. N.

ATHOL, a territory in Scotland, part of the ſhire of Perth, and gives title to a duke. Some make it a ſhire of itſelf; and then it has the ſhires of Badenoch and Mar on the north, that of Angus on the eaſt, Perthſhire and Breadalbin on the ſouth, and that of Lochaber on the weſt. This ſhire, or rather territory, is wholly in the mountains of Granſben; and in ſome places there are woods, which are the remains of the ancient Caledonian foreſt. We cannot affirm, whether there are any bears or buffaloes there now, as they ſay there were formerly; but as for the witches, which Camden talks of, we can venture to aſſert, that they are all vaniſhed, or rather never exiſted, but in the brains of credulous people. There are three great vallies which are tolerably fertile, the moſt conſiderable of which is Blair. The river Tay paſſes through the ſouth part, and there are four remarkable lochs, Loch Timmel, Loch Gervy, Loch Ranach, and Loch Erachty. Part of this is in Badenoch. Blair is the principal town.

ATHOS, or MONTE SANCTO, a mountain of Macedonia, a province of Turky in Europe. This mountain advances into the Archipelago, in the form of a peninſula, between the gulph of Conteſſa and that of Monte Sancto. It is joined to Terra Firma by an iſthmus, half a league in length, and is about thirty miles in circumference. Its ſummit reaches above the clouds. It is now inhabited by caloyers, a ſort of Greek monks, of the order of St. Baſil, who never marry, though others of that church do. They abſtain from fleſh, and fare very hardly; their ordinary meal being made of olives, pickled when they are ripe. They are about ſix thouſand in all, and inhabit ſeveral parts of the mountain, on which are twenty-four large old monaſteries, ſurrounded with high walls for a defence againſt pirates and robbers. They are ſo reſpected, that the Turks themſelves will often ſend them alms. Theſe monks are not idle like others, but labour with the axe, ſpade, and ſickle. They dreſs vineyards, cut trees, build fiſhing veſſels, ſpin and weave, and act the part of taylors, bricklayers, and carpenters. Their dreſs is like that of hermits.

This mountain may be travelled over in about three days, and may be ſeen ninety miles off. The top is exceſſive cold, but there is a fine proſpect from thence, with a view of the adjacent provinces and iſlands. It abounds with pitch and fir trees, and many rare plants and trees. In the vallies there grows a plant called elegia, whoſe branches ſerve to make pens to write with. In the rivulets there is a ſort of cray-fiſh, which the monks eat raw, beſides other cruſtaceous and teſtaceous animals. They often go a-fiſhing in boats made of the trunks of trees, like the Indian canoes. Their nets are ſupported with gourds inſtead of corks. Four-footed animals and tame fowls they have none, for they eat no fleſh. But they have grapes, olives, figs, onions, garlic, beans, and peas; theſe they ſometimes exchange with the mariners for corn, which they grind in mills, placed on ſtreams, on the ſides of the hill. They likewiſe ſell an oil which they expreſs out of bay-berries, and which is exported to diſtant parts. The monks had fine Greek manuſcripts, but now they can ſcarce either read or write; and yet they uſe wax candles, lamps, images, pictures, and bells; and retain a very good cuſtom of being very kind to ſtrangers. In ſhort, this mountain is ſo adorned with variety of herbage and ever-greens, a multitude of ſprings and ſtreams, and with woods growing near the ſhore, that it is one of the moſt charming places in the world. Long. 26. 20. E. Lat. 40. 10. N.

ATHY, a town of Ireland, in the county of Kildare, and province of Leinſter, ſeated on the river Barrow, twelve miles ſouth of Kildare, not far from the borders of Queen's County. Long. 7. 0. W. Lat. 53. 0. N.

ATKINS (Sir ROBERT) lord chief baron of the exchequer, was born in 1621, and educated at the univerſity of Oxford, from whence he removed to the inns of court, and became eminent in the law. He was made knight of the bath, with many other perſons of the firſt diſtinction, at the coronation of king Charles II. In 1672, he was appointed one of the judges of the court of common-pleas, in which honourable ſtation he continued till 1679, when, foreſeeing the troubles that ſoon after enſued, he thought fit to reſign, and retire into the country. In 1689, he was made by king William lord chief baron of the exchequer; and about the ſame time executed the office of ſpeaker to the houſe of lords, which had been previouſly refuſed by the marquis of Hallifax. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by an unſhaken zeal for the laws and liberties of his country. He wrote, 1. A Tract on the Power, Juriſdiction, and Privilege of Parliament. 2. An Enquiry into the Power of diſpenſing with penal Statutes: and 3. A Diſcourſe on the Eccleſiaſtical Juriſdiction in the Realm of England; which were afterwards collected and publiſhed in one volume. He died in 1709, aged eighty-eight.

ATKINS (Sir ROBERT) ſon of the preceding, was born in 1646, and was eminent for all the virtues that could adorn an Engliſh gentleman. He wrote The ancient and preſent State of Glouceſterſhire, in one large volume in folio, and died October 29, 1711.

ATKYNS (RICHARD) was deſcended from a good family, and was born at Tuffleigh, in Glouceſterſhire, in the year 1615. He was educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to Lincoln's Inn, and afterwards diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his loyalty to king Charles I. for whom he raiſed a troop of horſe, at his own expence. At the reſtoration he was made one of the deputy lieutenants of Glouceſterſhire, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his attachment to the government. He wrote ſeveral pieces, particularly a Treatiſe on the Original and Growth of Printing. But at length being committed priſoner to the Marſhalſea, in Southwark, for debt, he died there, on the 14th of September, 1677.

ATLANTIC OCEAN, the great ocean which divides Europe and Africa from America, it having the two former quarters of the globe on the eaſt, and America on the weſt.

ATLAS, in fabulous hiſtory, is by ſome repreſented as the ſon of Jupiter and Clymene, and the brother of Prometheus. On the diviſion of his father's dominions, Mauritania fell to his ſhare, on which he gave his own name to the mountain which is ſtill called Atlas. He was ſkilled in aſtronomy, and by his inventing the ſphere, gave riſe to the fable of his ſupporting the heavens on his ſhoulders.

This fable is repreſented in a different light by Ovid, who ſays, that Atlas was the ſon of Japetus and Aſia; that he was a powerful monarch, and the proprietor of the garden which bore golden fruit; but being warned by the oracle of Themis, that he ſhould ſuffer ſome dreadful misfortune from one of Jupiter's ſons, he forbad all foreigners having acceſs to his court or preſence. Perſeus however boldly appeared before him, but was ordered to retire with menaces in caſe of diſobedience. When the hero preſenting his ſhield, with the dreadful head of Meduſa, turned him into the mountain, which is ſtill called by his name.

ATLAS, a great chain of mountains which run along the north-weſt part of Africa, parallel to the Mediterranean Sea. They are ſaid to be ſo called from Atlas, king of Mauritania, who was a great aſtronomer. From theſe mountains the Atlantic Ocean takes its name. They advance from the weſt to the eaſt, between Barbary and Biledulgerid, from the cape De Geer, in the kingdom of Morocco, to the confines of the kingdom of Tripoli, where they decline towards the ſouth, croſs Biledulgerid, run along the ſide of Zaara, and terminate in the deſert of Barca. The higheſt parts are almoſt always covered with clouds, and are very cold and barren; but the ſides are full of thick woods, and almoſt all the rivers in the northern parts of Africa proceed from theſe mountains. In ſome places, where the air is temperate, and the ſoil good, they ſwarm with inhabitants, and in many parts not quite ſo fruitful, they feed a great number of cattle in the ſummer. Some rivers which run ſouthward from hence are loſt in the ſands of Lybia, and others form great lakes. The inhabitants of theſe mountains are a rude unpoliſhed ſort of people, moſt of whom are free, and under no other government but their own. Thoſe to the ſouth of Algiers pay a tribute to the Turks, and when they are backward, the Turkiſh ſoldiers go and live at free quarters among them, making uſe of their wives and daughters at their own pleaſure. That part of mount Atlas towards Morocco, is a country full of towns and people, who live upon goat's fleſh, barley, and honey. Their garments are a ſort of mantle tied in a knot over their ſhoulders, for taylors they have none. Neither men nor women wear any ſhirts or ſhifts. The better ſort of theſe laſt faſten their garment on their ſhoulders with a ſilver button, which ſometimes weighs an ounce, and have ſilver rings upon their legs and fingers; but thoſe that cannot afford it, wear copper or iron rings. Their horſes are extremely ſmall, but ſwift; and they have plenty of deer, hares, and wild goats. They wander from place to place like the Arabians, and for weapons make uſe of a crooked ſhort ſword or ſcymetar, as thick as a ſcythe. They have no prieſts, judges, lawyers, or places of worſhip; but, as the Scripture expreſſes it, do whatever is right in their own eyes.

ATOCK, is the capital city of a province of the ſame name, in the dominions of the Mogul. It is ſeated on a point of land where two large rivers meet, and is one of the beſt fortreſſes the Great Mogul has; but no one was formerly admitted into it without a paſſport from the emperor himſelf. Long. 72. 10. E. Lat. 32. 20. N.

ATOSSA, the daughter of Cyrus, king of Perſia, and the ſiſter of Cambyſes, married Darius, five hundred and twenty-one years before the Chriſtian æra, and was the mother of Artabazanes and Xerxes.

ATREUS, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Pelops and Hippodamia, and the father of Agamemnon and Menelaus, is ſuppoſed to have been king of Mycenæ and Argos, about one thouſand two hundred and twenty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra. He drove his brother Thyeſtes from court, for having a criminal commerce with Ærope his wife; but underſtanding that he had had two children by her, ſent for him again, and made him eat them; at which horrid action, the ſun, it is ſaid, withdrew his light.

ATRI, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Farther Abruzzo, with the title of a duchy; is the ſee of a biſhop, and is ſeated on a craggy mountain, four miles from the Adriatic Sea, and ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Teramo. Long. 13. 8. E. Lat. 42. 45. N.

ATROPOS, in fabulous hiſtory, the name of the third of the Parcæ, or Fates, whoſe buſineſs was to cut the thread of life. See PARCÆ.

ATTALUS I. king of Pergamus, a brave and generous prince, ſucceeded Eumenes. He humbled the Galatians; extended his conqueſts into Aſia, as far as mount Taurus, and died a hundred and ninety-eight years before the Chriſtian æra.

ATTALUS II. ſurnamed PHILADELPHUS, king of Pergamus, was the friend and ally of the Romans. He repulſed Antiochus, performed many glorious actions, and founded two cities in Lydia, Attalia and Philadelphia. He died about a hundred and thirty eight years before the Chriſtian æra.

ATTALUS III. ſurnamed Philometer, king of Pergamus, the ſon of Attalus I. and Stratonice, abandoned the care of his kingdom to apply himſelf to gardening and the caſting of metals. He died of a fever, contracted by ſtaying too long expoſed to the ſun, one hundred and thirty-three years before the Chriſtian æra. This was the laſt king of Pergamus. He left great riches, and appointed the Roman people his heirs in thoſe terms: Populus Romanus meorum hæres eſto: by theſe words he intended only to give them the wealth in his palace, but the Romans interpreted them of the whole kingdom, and accordingly ſeized it.

ATTERBURY (Dr. LEWIS) rector of Middleton-Malſor, or Milton, in Northamptonſhire, was born in 1647, and educated in Chriſt-Church college, Oxford. He ſubmitted to the authority of the viſitors appointed by parliament, and became became a preacher during the uſurpation; but after the Reſtoration was made chaplain to Henry, duke of Glouceſter, and in 1660 took the degree of doctor of divinity. He publiſhed ſeveral ſermons, but had the misfortune to be drowned near his own houſe, in December, 1693.

ATTERBURY (LEWIS) ſon of the former, and eldeſt brother of Dr. Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter, was born at Caldecot, in the pariſh of Newport-Pagnel, Buckinghamſhire, on the 2d of May, 1656, and was educated at Weſtminſter ſchool, under Dr. Buſby, from whence he was removed to Chriſt-Church college, Oxford. He ſucceſſively enjoyed ſeveral livings, and had at laſt the rectory of Hornſey, in Middleſex. He wrote an Anſwer to a popiſh book, intitled, A brief and modeſt Account of the chief Points in Controverſy between the Roman Catholics and Proteſtants; tranſlated from the French The Penitent Lady, by Madam la Villiere; publiſhed ſeveral volumes of ſermons, and died on the 20th of October, 1731.

ATTERBURY (FRANCIS) biſhop of Rocheſter in the reigns of queen Anne and king George I. was the ſon of Dr. Lewis Atterbury, and was born at Middleton, or Milton-Kynes, near Newport-Pagnel, in Buckinghamſhire. He was educated in grammar learning at Weſtminſter ſchool, and, in 1680, elected a ſtudent of Chriſt-Church college, Oxford, where he ſoon diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the elegance and vivacity of his wit, and his fondneſs for polite learning. He gave early proofs of his poetical talents, in a Latin verſion of Dryden's Abſalom and Achitophel, in an Engliſh epigram on a lady's fan, and a tranſlation of two of Horace's Odes On his taking holy orders, he ſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the elegance of his ſermons, that he was appointed one of the chaplains in ordinary to king William and queen Mary, and was elected preacher at Bridewell, and lecturer of St. Bride's. He exerted himſelf in the controverſy with the papiſts, by writing an excellent Defence of Luther; and engaged in ſeveral controverſies, particularly with Dr. Wake, and others, on the rights, powers, and privileges of Convocations, in which he diſplayed ſo much learning, ingenuity, and zeal, for the intereſt of his order, that the lower houſe of convocation returned him thanks, and the univerſity of Oxford complimented him with the degree of doctor of divinity. Upon the acceſſion of queen Anne in 1702, he was appointed one of her majeſty's chaplains in ordinary; in 1704 he was advanced to the deanry of Carliſle; in 1707 he was appointed one of the canons reſidentiary of Exeter; in 1712 he was made dean of Chriſt-Church, and the next year biſhop of Rocheſter. He had before this time engaged in ſeveral warm controverſies with Mr. Hoadley, and other eminent divines, on very different ſubjects.

During the rebellion in Scotland, in the firſt year of king George the Firſt's reign, he refuſed to ſign the declaration of the biſhops, teſtifying their abhorrence of that rebellion, and an exhortation to the clergy and people under their care, to be zealous in the diſcharge of their duties to his majeſty king George. When the Dutch troops, which came over to quell this rebellion, were quartered at Graveſend, in Kent, the officers requeſted of Mr. Gibbin, the curate of that place, the uſe of his church one Sunday morning, for their chaplain to preach to their ſoldiers, alledging, that the ſame favour had been granted them in every pariſh in England, where they had been quartered on Sundays, and promiſing that their chaplain ſhould begin at ſix in the morning, that their ſervice might not interfere with that of the town. The requeſt was granted, the chaplain preached, and his congregation was diſmiſſed before nine o'clock. But Dr. Atterbury was ſo incenſed at this profanation (as he ſtyled it) of the church, by the Dutch Preſbyterian worſhip, that he immediately ſuſpended Mr. Gibbin, which was deemed ſo injurious by the town of Graveſend, that they ſubſcribed a ſum to Mr. Gibbin, more than double the income of his church. Dr. Atterbury conſtantly oppoſed the meaſures of the court in the houſe of lords, and drew up ſome of the moſt violent proteſts with his own hand. On the 24th of Auguſt, 1722, he was apprehended, at his houſe in Weſtminſter, on ſuſpicion of being concerned in a plot in favour of the Pretender, and carried before a committee of the privy council, who committed him priſoner to the Tower. On the 23d of March, 1722-3, a bill was was brought into the houſe of commons for inflicting certain pains and penalties on him, "for being principally "concerned in forming, directing, and carrying on a "wicked and deteſtable conſpiracy, for invading theſe "kingdoms with a foreign force, and for raiſing inſurrec-"tions and a rebellion at home, in order to ſubvert our "preſent happy eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate, by pla-"cing a popiſh pretender on the throne." This bill being paſſed by the commons, was, on the 9th of April, ſent up to the houſe of lords, for their concurrence, and at the firſt reading of it biſhop Atterbury was brought to Weſtminſter, to make his defence, when he had two counſel, and pleaded for himſelf in a long ſpeech, which was afterwards anſwered by the king's counſel. In ſhort, the bill was paſſed by the lords, by a very great majority, and was ſigned by the king, who expreſſed great concern at there being juſt cauſe of dooming to perpetual baniſhment a biſhop of the church of England, of ſuch eminent parts and learning. On the 18th of June, 1723, he embarked and landed at Calais, from whence he went to Bruſſels, and afterwards to Paris. He there wrote a vindication of himſelf, biſhop Smalridge. and Dr. Aldrich, from a charge brought againſt them by Mr. Oldmixon, of altering and interpolating the lord Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion. He died at Paris, Feb. 15, 1731, and his body was brought to England, and interred in Weſtminſter abbey. His Sermons are printed in four volumes, octavo. Though his character is differently repreſented by different parties, it is univerſally allowed that he had uncommon abilities, was a fine writer, and a moſt excellent preacher.

ATTICUS (TITUS POMPONIUS) a Roman knight, and one of the moſt honourable, as well as learned, men of ancient Rome. The conteſts between Cinna's party and that of Marius induced him, when young, to retire to Athens, where he learnt to ſpeak Greek with as much fluency and elegance as his native language. At his return to Rome he contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with Cicero, Hortenſius, and other learned men. He behaved with ſuch addreſs during the civil wars of Pompey and Cæſar, Mark Anthony and Brutus, that without leaving a ſtate of neutrality, he preſerved the eſteem and affection of both parties. Being fond of ſtudy and a private life, he conſtantly refuſed all public employments. He compoſed annals, and ſeveral other works, both in Greek and Latin. He reached the age of ſeventy-ſeven, almoſt without knowing what ſickneſs was; but being at laſt ill of a fever, he ſent for Agrippa, his ſon-in-law, and two other perſons, and declared to them, that he was reſolved to put an end to his life, by abſtaining from food, and deſired them to approve, and not oppoſe his reſolution. Agrippa, however, with tears and entreaties, endeavoured to perſuade him to ſubmit to life, but it was all in vain. After two days abſtinence the fever left him; but notwithſtanding this, Atticus perſiſted in his deſign, and died three days after, thirty years before the Chriſtian æra.

ATTICUS, prefect of all Aſia, under the emperor Nerva, in the year 97. His ſon, Herodes Atticus, was preceptor to Verus, and conſul in 143. From this conſul ſprung that Atticus who was ſo ſtupid as not to be able to learn the twenty-four letters of the alphabet, which obliged his father to give him twenty-four ſervants, each of which was called by the name of one of the letters, which was painted on his breaſt, and thus by the practice of ſeeing and calling them he learnt to read.

ATTICUS, patriarch of Conſtantinople, was a perſon of a moſt amiable character, and was eminent for his piety, humanity, and prudence: he abhorred ſuperſtition and perſecution, and diſpenſed his liberality to thoſe who differed widely from him in their ſentiments of religion. He died Oct. 10, 425.

ATTIGNI, a town of France, in Champagne. It is an ancient place, where ſeveral of the kings of France had their reſidence. It is ſeated on the river Aiſne, eight miles ſouth eaſt of Rhetel, and twenty north-eaſt of Rheims. Long. 4. 47. E. Lat. 49. 30. N.

ATTILA, king of the Huns, ſurnamed the Scourge of God, lived in the fifth century, and may be ranked among the greateſt conquerors, ſince there was ſcarce any province in Europe which did not feel the weight of his victorious arms. He extended his empire (ſays Dr. Robertſon, in his Hiſtory of the Reign of Charles V.) over all the vaſt countries comprehended in the ancient diviſion of the world, under the general names of Scythia and Germany. While he was carrying on his wars againſt the barbarous nations, he kept the Roman empire under perpetual apprehenſions, and extorted vaſt ſubſidies from the timid and effeminate monarchs who governed it. In the year 451 he entered Gaul, at the head of an army compoſed of all the various nations which he had ſubdued, and it was more numerous than any with which the barbarians had hitherto invaded the empire. The devaſtations which he committed were horrible, not only the open country, but the moſt flouriſhing cities were deſolated. Aetius put a ſtop to his progreſs in that country, by the famous battle of Chalons, in which (if we may believe the hiſtorians of that age) three hundred thouſand perſons periſhed. But the next year he reſolved to attack the centre of the empire, and marching into Italy, waſted it with rage, inflamed by the ſenſe of his late diſgrace. What Italy ſuffered by the Huns exceeded all the calamities which the preceding incurſions of the barbarians had brought upon it The general opinion concerning the death of Attila is, that he was ſuffocated on the night of his marriage, by the bleeding of his noſe.

ATTIUS (LUCIUS) a tragic poet. See ACCIUS.

ATTLEBURY, a town in the county of Norfolk, with a good market on Tueſdays, for fat bullocks; and three fairs, on April 11, Holy Thurſday, and Auguſt 15, for cattle and toys. The church is a rectory, rated at 18l. 8s. 9d. in the king's books, and the certified value is 120l. a year. It is fourteen miles north-eaſt of Thetford, fifteen ſouth-weſt of Norwich, and ninety-four north-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 40 E. Lat. 52. 33. N.

ATYS, in fabulous hiſtory, a youth beloved by Cybele, the mother of the Gods, who made him her prieſt, on condition of his preſerving his chaſtity; but he breaking his vow by lying with the nymph Sangaritis, the goddeſs puniſhed him, by throwing him into a phrenzy, in which he caſtrated himſelf, when Cybele being filled with compaſſion, turned him into a pine tree.

AVA, a kingdom of Aſia, in the Peninſula, beyond the Ganges. The king of this country is extremely powerful, he having conquered Azem, Tipra, Arracan, and Pegu. Laos, the peninſula of Malacca, and Camboja, are tributary thereto; and therefore his dominions are bounded by Mogolſtan on the weſt, by Siam on the ſouth, by Tonquin and Cochin-China on the eaſt, and by Tibet and China on the ſouth. There are ſeveral large rivers which traverſe theſe dominions, and overflow their banks like the Nile, which render them very fertile in rice, millet, fruits, and excellent grapes. They have many tame and wild animals, ſuch as elephants, camels, horſes, ſheep, &c. with mines of lead, copper, and, as ſome ſay, gold and ſilver, beſides a large quantity of the fineſt oriental rubies, ſaphires, emeralds, and other precious ſtones; as alſo muſk, bezoar, benjamin, lack, eagle, and aloes wood.

AVA, the metropolis of the kingdom of the ſame name, is moderately large, the houſes are built with timber, or rather with bamboe canes, and the floors of teak plank, or ſplit bamboes, with thatched roofs. The ſtreets are very ſtrait, with rows of trees planted on each ſide. The king's palace is an exact quadrangle, each ſide of which is eight hundred paces, and is ſurrounded with a brick wall. But the palace itſelf is built with ſtone, and has four gates; the Golden Gate, through which all ambaſſadors enter, with their preſents; the Gate of Juſtice, through which the people bring petitions, accuſations, or complaints; the Gate of Grace, through which thoſe that have received favours paſs out, as alſo thoſe that have been acquitted of crimes laid to their charge; the Gate of State, through which his majeſty paſſes when he ſhews himſelf to the people. All his proviſions and water are carried in at this gate. Long. 96. 30. E. Lat. 21. 0. N.

AVALON, a ſmall but ancient city of Burgundy, in the Auxerrois, is about five hundred paces long, and three hundred broad. It has three gates, and the river Couſin fills its foſſes with water, and turns ſeveral corn-mills. In the town there is a collegiate church, a pariſh church, and a chapel of eaſe; as alſo another church in the ſuburb. There is alſo a college, wherein the ſtudents are taught as far as philoſophy. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Auxerre, and fifty from Dijon. Long. 3. 5. E. Lat. 47. 38. N.

AVALOS (FERDINAND FRANCIS D') marquis of Peſcara, one of the moſt celebrated generals of the emperor Charles V. and grand chamberlain of the kingdom of Naples. He was taken priſoner at the battle of Ravenna, in 1512, and while he was deprived of his liberty, compoſed an ingenious dialogue on Love, which he dedicated to the marchioneſs, his ſpouſe. He afterwards took arms againſt the French, and was of ſignal ſervice to the emperor. He contributed greatly to the gaining the battle of Bicoque, the recovery of the Milaneſe, and to the victory obtained at Pavia under Francis I. in 1525, and died the ſame year, aged thirty-two.

AVALOS (CONSTANCE D') ducheſs of Amalfi, was of the ſame family as the above marquis of Peſcara, and flouriſhed about the year 1550. She was ſo diſtinguiſhed by her great abilities, that it was doubted whether ſhe received more honour from being of ſuch an illuſtrious family, than ſhe conferred upon it. Italian lyric poetry was one of her amuſements; there remain, however, but few of theſe works; but theſe are placed among thoſe of the Italian poets of the firſt rank, and are printed at the end of thoſe of Victoria Colonna, marchioneſs of Peſcara.

AUBAGNE, a town of Provence, in France, on the road from Marſeilles to Toulon. The ſtates ſometimes hold their ſeſſions at this place. It is ſeated on the river Veaune, eighteen miles north-weſt of Toulon, and ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Marſeilles. Long. 5. 52. E. Lat. 43. 17. N.

AUBERTIN (EDMUND) in Latin Edmundus Albertinus, a Proteſtant miniſter of the church of Paris, was born at Chalons upon the Marne, in the year 1595. He was admitted a miniſter at the ſynod of Charenton in 1618, and was choſen paſtor of the church of Chartres, from whence he removed to Paris, in 1631. He printed, in fo io, a work on the Euchariſt of the Ancient Church, by which he gained great reputation, and died at Paris, on the 5th of April, 1652, at fifty-ſeven years of age.

AUBERY (ANTHONY) a learned hiſtorian of the ſeventh century, was well verſed in the Latin, Greek, and modern learning. He conſtantly roſe at five in the morning, and ſtudied till ſix at night, and preferring the tranquil converſe with his books to the tumultuous affairs of the world, paid hardly any viſits, and received very few. He died in 1695, aged ſeventy-eight. He wrote, among other works, 1. A Hiſtory of the Cardinals. 2. An hiſtorical Treatiſe on the Pre-eminence of the Kings of France. 3. A Hiſtory of Cardinal de Richlieu. 4. That of Cardinal Mazarin; and, 5. A Treatiſe on the juſt Pretenſions of the king of France to the Empire; which giving the alarm to the German princes, the author was for ſome time confined in the Baſtile.

AUBESPINE (CLAUDIUS DE L') Baron of Chateauneuf, and ſecretary of ſtate, ſignalized himſelf by his ſervices under the French kings Francis I. Henry II. Francis II. and Charles IX. Queen Catherine de Medicis aſked his advice in all important affairs, and even went to his bed-ſide to conſult him on the day of the battle of St. Denys. He died the day after, on the 11th of November, 1567.

AUBESPINE (MAGDALEN DE L') the wife of Nicholas de Neuville, lord of Villeroy, was celebrated for her wit and beauty: ſhe compoſed ſeveral works in proſe and verſe, and died in 1596.

AUBETERRE, a town of France, in the Angoumois, upon the river Dronne, twenty-three miles ſouth of Angouleſme, and twenty-five weſt of Perigueux. Long. 0. 10. E. Lat. 45. 15. N.

AUBIGNE (THEODORE AGRIPPA) marſhal of France, and the favourite of Henry IV. diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings and his valour. He wrote an Univerſal Hiſtory, and two ingenious ſatires are attributed to him, intitled The Confeſſion of Sancy, and The Baron de Feneſle. He embraced the Proteſtant religion, and died at Geneva, in 1630, aged eighty.

AUBIGNI, a town of Berry, in France, ſeated on the river Verre, in a flat agreeable country. It ſurrounded with high ſtrong walls, wide deep ditches, and high counterſcarps. There are four gates, as many ſuburbs, and but one pariſh-church for the town, ſuburbs, and hamlets that depend thereon. The caſtle is within the town, and is very handſome. Long. 2. 20. E. Lat. 47. 29. N.

AUBIN DU COMIER, a town of France, in Brittany, ten miles eaſt of Rennes, thirteen ſouth of Antrain, and two hundred weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 48. 15. N.

AUBIN, a town of the iſle of Jerſey, on the coaſt of Normandy, belonging to England, which has the beſt harbour in the whole iſland, and is defended by a fort.

AUBONNE, a town of Switzerland, in the canton of Bern, ſeated near a river of the ſame name, ſeven miles north of the lake of Geneva, upon an eminence which has a gentle declivity, at the foot of which runs the river with an impetuous torrent. Its ſituation was very advantageous before the invention of artillery, it having a deep valley on two ſides which might ſerve inſtead of a foſſe, being traverſed by a river and a rivulet. Its church is at the eaſtern extremity on the ſide of a hill; from which there is a deep deſcent. The town itſelf is built in the form of an amphitheatre, on the upper part of which ſtands a very handſome caſtle, with a fine court, and a portico ſupported by pillars of a ſingle ſtone each; above there is a covered gallery, which runs round the court; and as the caſtle ſtands high, there is a moſt delightful proſpect, not only of the whole town and the neighbouring fields, but of the lake of Geneva and of the land that ſurrounds it from one end to the other. At Thonen in Savoy, acroſs the lake, there is a tower covered with tin, which makes a glittering appearance when the ſun is in a certain poſition. The caſtle of Aubonne has likewiſe a tower of the ſame kind, which, at certain hours, makes the ſame appearance to the Savoyards. Long. 5. 54. E. Lat. 48. 30. N.

The bailliage of Aubonne contains ſeveral villages, which are moſtly at the foot of the mountain Jura. In one part of this mountain there is a very deep cave, wherein thoſe that go down will find a natural and eternal ice-houſe. At the bottom of this cave may be heard a great noiſe, like that of a ſubterranean river, which is ſuppoſed to be the origin of that which runs by Aubonne, becauſe it firſt appears, with ſeveral ſources, about an hundred paces from the foot of that mountain.

AUBREY (JOHN) in Latin Albericus, a perſon of great learning and indefatigable diligence, a careful ſearcher into antiquities, a good Latin poet, and an excellent naturaliſt, but ſomewhat credulous. He was born at Eaſton-Piers, in Wiltſhire, on the 3d of November, in the year 1626 or 1627, and educated at Trinity-college, Oxford, after which he entered a ſtudent in the Middle Temple; but his father's death involved him in many law-ſuits, which obliged him to ſell ſeveral eſtates, and at laſt entirely ruined him, when he was generouſly ſupported by his friends. He wrote, 1. Miſcellanies. 2. A Perambulation of the County of Surry, in five volumes, octavo. 3. The Life of Mr. Hobbes of Malmſbury. 4. Monumenta Britannica, or a Diſcourſe concerning Stonehenge, and Roll-Rich Stones in Oxfordſhire. 5. Architectonica Sacra; and ſeveral other works ſtill in manuſcript. He died in 1700.

AUBURN, a town in Wiltſhire, eighty-one miles weſt of London. Long. 1. 20. W. Lat. 51. 30, N.

AUBUSSON (PETER D') the thirty-ninth grand maſter of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem, whoſe reſidence was then in the iſle of Rhodes. He ſignalized himſelf in Hungary, obtained the friendſhip of the emperor Sigiſmund, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour at the ſiege of Montereau Faut Yonne. Charles VII. ſaid of him, that it was very extraordinary to find ſuch valour and wiſdom united in one perſon. He was elected grand maſter of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem in 1476, on which he immediately built ſeveral forts for the ſecurity of the iſland. In 1480, he defended Rhodes, when beſieged by the Turks, who came with a fleet of an hundred and ſixty ſail, and in two months time drove them from the iſland. The ſame year Mahomet II. dying, Zizim, one of his ſons, ſent to beg an aſylum in Rhodes, when the grand maſter conſented, and gave him a magnificent reception. This great man died at Rhodes, on the 3d of July, 1503, at above eighty years of age.

AUBUSSON (FRANCIS viſcount D') duke de la Feuillade, and marſhal of France diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery at the battle of Rhetel, in 1650, at the ſieges of Mouzon, Valenciennes, Landrecies, and at the famous battle of St. Gothard, againſt the Turks. In 1674, he attacked St. Stephen's fort by a paſſage to it that was almoſt impaſſable, and took it ſword in hand. He died ſuddenly in 1691.

AUBUSSON, a ſmall town of France, in La Marche, on the borders of Limoſin. Its ſituation is very irregular, on the ſide of the river Creuſe, in a bottom, ſurrounded with rocks, and mountains. It carries on the manufacture of tapeſtry, which renders it very populous and a place of trade. It is thirty-ſeven miles north-eaſt of Limoges. Long. 2. 15. E. Lat. 45. 58. N.

AUCH, a city of France, the capital of the county of Armagnac, and the metropolitan of all Gaſcony. The archbiſhop aſſumes the title of primate of Aquitain, and the cathedral is one of the fineſt in all France. The chapter conſiſts of fifteen dignitaries and twenty canons, of whom five are ſeculars. It is ſeated on the declivity of a mountain, near the river Gors, three hundred and eighty miles ſouth of Paris. Long. 0. 40. E. Lat. 43. 40. N.

AUDE, a river of France, in Lower Languedoc, whoſe ſource is in the Pyrenean mountains. It runs by Carcaſſone, and paſſing through Languedoc, falls into the Mediterranean Sea.

AUDEBERT (GERMAIN) preſident of the court of aſſeſſors at Orleans, was a perſon of great merit, and an excellent Latin poet. He wrote ſeveral poems, particularly a deſcription of Rome, of Venice, and of Naples, and two volumes of Miſcellanies. He died in 1598, at above eighty years of age.

AUDEUS, the chief of the Audeans, obtained the name of an heretic, and the puniſhment of baniſhment, for celebrating Eaſter in the manner of the Jews, and attributing an human form to the Deity. He died in the country of the Goths, about the year 370.

AUDIGUER (N. D') a French author, born about the year 1565. He publiſhed at Paris a work on The ancient Cuſtom of Duels; the Loves of Lyſander and Caliſta; thoſe of Ariſtander and Cleonice, Flavia, Minerva, &c. Theſe novels were well received. He alſo tranſlated into French the novels of Miguel de Cervantes.

AUDLEY (JAMES) lord Audley, of Heighleigh, in Staffordſhire, was born about the year 1314. In 1343, he was made governor of Berwick upon Tweed, and the two next years ſerved in France. In 1348, he was elected into the noble order of the garter, then firſt founded; and in 1353, he reduced great part of the country of Valois. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf on ſeveral occaſions by his bravery, particularly at the glorious battle of Poictiers, in which, by the permiſſion of Edward the Black Prince, he, with four eſquires who attended him, charged the enemy in front, and performed wonders; at length, however, he was ſo grievouſly wounded, that his eſquires carried him out of the field of battle, laid him under a hedge, and there took off his armour and bound up his wounds. In 1360, he attended king Edward III. and his three ſons in their wars in France; and in the year following ſwore to the peace then concluded in the name of king Edward. For theſe ſervices he was appointed conſtable of Glouceſter caſtle for life, and was alſo governor of Aquitain and ſenechal of Poictou. He died on the 1ſt of April, 1386, leaving his eſtate to his only ſon Nicholas, who died July 22, 1390, without iſſue.

UD LEY (EDMUND) biſhop of Saliſbury, and chancellor of the moſt noble order of the garter, was the ſon of James lord Audley. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, to which he afterwards gave four hundred pounds to purchaſe lands, and beſtowed upon the ſame houſe the patronage of a chantry, which he had founded in the cathedral church of Saliſbury. He was alſo a benefactor to St. Mary's church in Oxford. He died in 1524.

AUDLEY, or rather AWDELY, (THOMAS) lord chancellor of England, in the reign of king Henry VIII. was deſcended of an ancient and honourable family, and was born in 1488. He acquired great reputation as an able, learned, and eloquent lawyer. By the king's influence, he was choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, and afterwards made lord keeper and lord chancellor, created a baron, and inſtalled knight of the garter. He was too much a courtier to inſiſt upon what he judged reaſonable, if it was diſapproved by the king. Lloyd ſays, that he was always in favour with the queens, and that he knew king Henry the Eighth's temper better than he did himſelf, whom he always ſurpriſed to his own bent, never moving any of his ſuits to him but when in haſte, and moſt commonly amuſing him with other matters till he paſt his requeſt. He ſat in judgment and pronounced ſentence of death on ſir Thomas More, indicted for high-treaſon in refuſing to acknowledge the king's ſupremacy; he had been very active in the divorce of queen Catharine, and in the diſſolution of religious houſes. A little before his death, he obtained a licence from the king to change the name of Buckingham college, in Cambridge, into that of Magdelen or Maudlin: to this college he was a great benefactor, and is generally reputed its founder. He died on the laſt day of April, 1544.

AUDRAN (GERARD) a celebrated engraver, who was born at Lyons, and died at Paris, in 1703, aged ſixty-three.

AVAUX (COUNT D'). See MESMES.

AVEIRO, a city of Portugal, near the head of a ſmall gulph of the ſea, formed by the tide at the mouth of the river Vouga, twenty-one miles from Porto, and twenty-ſeven from Coimbro. It is a conſiderable town. The Vouga forms a ſmall haven, with a bar, over which veſſels may paſs, that do not draw above eight or nine feet water, at the time of high tide, by the help of the pilots of the place. Aveiro ſtands in a long plain, well watered with ſprings, and fruitful in all things. It is but nine miles in breadth, from Porto to Coimbro, being bounded on the eaſt by a chain of high mountains, which reach from one town to the other. They are called Sera d' Alcoba, and have abundance of ſprings, which form divers rivers, ſome of which fall into the Dovero, others into the Vouga, and others into the Mandego. The inhabitants of Aveiro have this ſingular privilege, that no perſon whatever, who is a ſtranger, can paſs a night there without leave of the magiſtrate. It has no fortification but a wall flanked with a few towers. However, its port may ſerve inſtead of a rampart, inſomuch that there can be nothing to fear on the ſide of the ſea. There is a very remarkable nunnery in this place, wherein none are received but the daughters of the ancient nobility, deſcended from the old Chriſtians. Near this place is ſalt enough made to ſerve two or three provinces. Long. 9 8. W. Lat. 40. 30. N.

AVELLINO, a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with a biſhop's ſee. It was almoſt ruined by an earthquake, in 1694. It is thirteen miles ſouth of Benevento, and thirty-ſix north-eaſt of Naples. Long. 15. 3. E. Lat. 40. 53. N.

AVENCHE, a bailliage of Swiſſerland, in the canton of Bern. It takes up part of the banks of the lake Morat, and ſome parts of the banks of Neufchatel in the vallies. This laſt is a peninſula between the two lakes, and is covered with vineyards, fields, and meadows. Avenche is an ancient city, which retains nothing of its former ſplendor but its name and ruins. Its circumference may be known by the remainder of the walls, which have a tower half demoliſhed. It is almoſt round, and is two thouſand four hundred paces in compaſs. It was formerly the capital of all Swiſſerland, under the Roman emperors, but the preſent town ſtands in one of its corners. Several monuments have been dug up with inſcriptions, which ſhow it was a Roman colony. The town is ſixteen miles weſt of Bern. Long. 7. 7. E. Lat. 46. 50. N.

AVENES, a little but ſtrong town in French Flanders, in the county of Hainalt, ſeated upon the river Theſpes. It contains about two thouſand five hundred inhabitants, and has three gates. The houſes are wretchedly built, the ſtreets are irregular, and the ſquares ſmall. It was fortified by Mr. Vauban, in a ſtrong regular manner. Beſides the convents of Recollects, Recollectines, and Beguines, there is a collegiate church, with twelve canons, a provoſt, and a dean. About this place there are a prodigious number of white ſtones, proper for building, which ſculptors uſe for ſtatues; they are known by the name of the Stones of Avenes, It is twenty-ſix miles eaſt of Cambray, and one hundred north of Paris. Long. 3. 40. E. Lat. 50. 10. N.

AVENPACE (Abu Becr Mohammed Ebn Bajah) commonly known among the Arabian writers by the ſurname of Ebn al Sayegh, the moſt ſubtile of all the Mohammedan philoſophers, was born in Spain, and was well ſkilled in phyſic, the mathematics, and poetry; but his ſuperior merit raiſed him enemies, and he was poiſoned at Fez, in the year of the Hegira 525, A. D. 1129.

AVENTINE (John) the ſon of an innkeeper at Abenſperg, in Bavaria, acquired great reputation by his learning, and his writing the Annals of Bavaria. He died January 9, 1534.

AVENZOAR (Abu Merwan Abdalmalec Ebn Zohr) an eminent Arabian phyſician, flouriſhed about the end of the eleventh or the beginning of the twelfth century. He wrote a book on the method of preparing medicines and diet; and another in which he treats of the qualities of medicines and food.

AVERANI (Benedict) a learned Italian, was born a Florence, in 1645, and in 1676 was made profeſſor of the Greek tongue at Piſa. He was a man of prodigious erudition, and had ſuch univerſal knowledge, that he was capable of teaching all the ſciences. His memory was ſo excellent, that though he never made any collections from the authors he read, he was able to cite their authorities in his diſcourſes. He is ſaid to have never had any commerce with women, and that he carefully avoided entering into any familiarities with them. He wrote an excellent poem on the Contempt of Love, which has been compared to the beſt pieces of the ancients. He died in 1707. His principal works were printed at Florence, 1717, in 3 vols. folio.

AVERNO, a lake of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, lying in a narrow valley, which is two miles long, and about one broad. Authors have formerly ſaid, that the water was ſo bad that birds dropped down dead when flying over it; and for this reaſon poets called it the lake of hell; but it is now found to have no poiſonous quality, for birds not only fly over it, but ſwim upon it. A little to the weſt of the lake is a cave, where ſome pretend they went formerly to conſult the Cumean ſybil. There is alſo ſome old walls ſtanding, that ſome ſuppoſe to be the ruins of a temple of Apollo, and others of Pluto.

AVERROES (Abu Merwan Abdalmalek Ebn Zohr) one of the moſt ſubtle philoſophers that ever appeared among the Arabians, flouriſhed at the end of the eleventh and beginning of the twelfth century. He was the ſon of the high-prieſt and chief judge of Corduba in Spain; he was educated in the univerſity of Morocco, and ſtudied natural philoſophy, medicine, mathematics, law, and divinity. After the death of his father, he enjoyed his poſts; but notwithſtanding his being exceeding rich, his liberality to men of letters in neceſſity, whether they were his friends or his enemies, made him always in debt. Being once blamed for his liberality to the latter, "How unhappy are "you, ſaid he, not to know, that to ſerve one's relations "and friends is not an act of liberality, ſince we are led to "it by natural affection. To be liberal is to ſerve one's "enemies; and ſince my riches did not ariſe from myſelf, "or from the induſtry or bravery of my anceſtors, but only "from the profeſſion of virtue, is it not fit, that I ſhould "diſpoſe of them in acts of virtue? and I find that I have "not miſapplied them, as they have ſerved to make thoſe "my friends who were before my enemies." He was afterwards ſtripped of all his poſts, and thrown into priſon for hereſy; but the oppreſſions of the judge who ſucceeded him, cauſed him to be reſtored to his former employments. This worthy and learned Mahometan was alſo remarkable for his humility and his patience. He was extremely attached to Ariſtotle, and wrote commentaries upon his works in ſo admirable a manner, that, by way of eminence he was ſtiled the Commentator. He likewiſe wrote a work on the whole art of phyſic, and many amorous verſes, but when he grew old, he threw theſe laſt into the fire; his other poems are loſt, except a ſmall piece, in which he ſays, that when he was young, he acted againſt his reaſon; but that when he was in years, he followed its dictates; and adds, "Would "to God I had been born old, and that in my youth I had "been in a ſtate of perfection." He died in 1206.

AVERRUNCI, in Pagan mythology, certain Gods, whoſe buſineſs it was to avert misfortunes. Caſtor and Pollux were of this number among the Romans, and Apollo and Hercules among the Greeks.

AVES, an iſland ſo called from the quantity of birds that have been found there. It is in South America, in about eleven degrees forty-five minutes of latitude, to the ſouth of Porto Rico, and to the ſouth-eaſt of the iſle of Bonair. It has a good haven, where veſſels may be conveniently careened.

AVESBURY (Robert) an ancient Engliſh hiſtorian, who was regiſter of the archbiſhop of Canterbury's court. He wrote part of the Hiſtory of the Reign of that glorious Prince Edward III. of which there are ſtill ſeveral manuſcripts in public libraries. Mr. Hearne printed an edition of this author, which is now very ſcarce. This hiſtorian died in the latter end of the year 1356.

AUGE, a territory of France, in Normandy, which gives title to a viſcount. It extends from Falaiſe and Argenton as far as the ſea, between the rivers Dives, Vie, and Touques. The inhabitants fatten the oxen which come from Poitou and Brittany; they alſo feed a great number of cows, whoſe milk ſerves for the ſubſiſtence of the inhabitants, and to make excellent cheeſe and butter. The arable land is ſtiff, and produces but little good corn; but they ſow ſainfoin, which ſucceeds ſo well, that they have five good crops ſucceſſively; they likewiſe bring up a great number of horſes; they ſow flax and hemp, and have vaſt plenty of apples, of which they make cyder, which they ſend up the rivers Dives and Touques.

AUGEA, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Alæus, who being deflowered by Hercules, became pregnant, and brought forth Telephus; but ſhe was no ſooner delivered, than Alæus put both Augea and her ſon into a cheſt, and ordered them to be thrown into the river Caycus, when Venus ſteering the cheſt, brought it to the mouth of the river, where it was taken up by Teuthras, who falling in love with Augea, married her, and at length left his kingdom to Telephus.

AUGEAS, in fabulous hiſtory, was king of Elis, and particularly famed for his ſtable, which contained three thouſand oxen, and had not been cleaned for thirty years. Hercules was deſired to clear away the filth from this ſtable in one day; and Augeas promiſed, if he performed it, to give him a tenth part of the cattle. This taſk Hercules is ſaid to have performed by turning the courſe of the river Alpheus through the ſtable; when Augeas refuſing to ſtand by his engagement, Hercules ſlew him with his arrows, and gave his kingdom to Phyleus his ſon, who had ſhewn an abhorrence of his father's inſincerity.

AUGSBURG, a city of Germany, capital of the circle of Suabia, ſeated near the confluence of the Ardech and Lech, in one of the moſt beautiful plains that can be imagined. It is one of the largeſt and handſomeſt cities of the empire; but the fortifications are after the old manner and very irregular; the ſtreets are broad and ſtrait; the houſes moſtly of timber, plaiſtered and whitened without, or adorned with paintings; the reſt are of free-ſtone; the churches and fountains are generally ornamented with fine figures of braſs. Many of the churches are ſtately, and adorned within with curious workmanſhip and paintings. That part of the city erected by the noble family of the Fuggers, who are lords of the adjacent country, conſiſts of ſeveral ſtreets croſs-wiſe, containing one hundred and ſix houſes: the poor people that inhabit them are maintained by an annual penſion. Its magnificent town-houſe is little inferior to that of Amſterdam, it being a vaſt ſquare ſtone building, with a marble portico; at the top of the front, within the pediment, is a large ſpread eagle, holding a ſceptre and globe in its talons, of braſs gilt, ſaid to weigh twenty-two hundred weight; the great portal is of a very beautiful reddiſh marble, over which is a balcony of the ſame colour, ſupported by two pillars of white marble; over the gate there are two large griffins of braſs; moſt of the rooms are wainſcotted and cieled with very fine timber; the great hall is very magnificent, and paved with marble; it is one hundred and ten feet long, fifty-eight broad, and fifty-two high, and its roof is ſupported by eight columns of red marble; the cieling of the upper wall is of very curious workmanſhip of poliſhed aſh, conſiſting of compartments, the ſquares and pannels of which are enriched with gilded ſculptures, and filled with pictures and other ornaments; this is likewiſe ſupported by eight pillars with baſes and chapiters of braſs; the other rooms are handſomely adorned with very fine paintings.

In the ſquare, near the town-houſe, is the fountain of Auguſtus, which is a marble baſon, ſurrounded with iron balluſtrades finely wrought; at the four corners are four braſs ſtatues as big as the life, two of which are women and two men; in the middle of the baſon is a pedeſtal, at the foot of which are four large ſphinxes ſquirting water out of their breaſts; a little above theſe are four infants holding four dolphins in their arms, which pour water out of their mouths; and over theſe infants are feſtoons and pine-apples all of braſs; upon the pedeſtal is the ſtatue of Auguſtus as large as the life. The fountain moſt remarkable next to this is that of Hercules, which is a hexagon baſon with ſeveral braſs figures, particularly Hercules engaging the hydra. Another curioſity is the ſecret gate, which was contrived to let in perſons ſafely in time of war; it has ſo many engines and diviſions with gates and keys, and apartments for guards at ſome diſtance from each other, where paſſengers are examined, that it is impoſſible for the town to be ſurpriſed this way; the gates are bolted and unbolted, opened and ſhut, by unſeen operators, inſomuch that it looks like enchantment. The water-towers are alſo very curious, of which there are three ſeated on a branch of the river Lech, which runs through the city in ſuch a torrent as to drive many mills, which work a number of pumps that raiſe the water in large leaden pipes to the top of the towers; one of theſe ſends water to the public fountains, and the reſt to near a thouſand houſes in the city.

The Lutherans have a college here, which is a vaſt ſquare building, with a fine clock on the top of the front. In this there are ſeven different claſſes, a hall for public diſputations, and a theatre for dramatic repreſentations. The cathedral is a large, gloomy, Gothic building, with two ſpire-ſteeples; it is adorned with paintings upon whimſical ſubjects, and has a great gate all of braſs, over which are ſeveral ſcripture paſſages well repreſented in baſſo relievo. The Jeſuits have a ſplendid college here, which, with their church, is full of gilding, painting, and carving; they have likewiſe a pleaſant library. Though half the inhabitants are Lutherans, there are a great many Popiſh proceſſions. There are no Jews in the town, nor are they ſuffered to lie there; but they inhabit a village at about a league diſtance, and pay ſo much an hour for the liberty of trading in the day-time. The Benedictine abbey is a vaſt Gothic building, the cieling of which is ſaid to be the higheſt in Germany, and overlooks all the reſt of the churches; it is adorned with ſeveral ſtatues, and has one very grand altar. The church of St. Croix is one of the handſomeſt in Augſburg for architecture, painting, ſculpture, gilding, and a fine ſpire.

The inhabitants look upon Auguſtus Cæſar as the founder of the town: it is true, that that emperor ſent a colony there, but the town was already founded, though he gave it the name of Auguſta Vindelicorum; but that which will eterniſe the memory of this town is the confeſſion of faith which the Proteſtant princes preſented to Charles V. in 1530. Tho' the Proteſtants were very powerful at Augſburg, they could not keep their ground; for the Bavarians drove them from thence; but Guſtavus Adolphus reſtored them again in 1632, ſince which time they have continued there and ſhare the government with the Papiſts. In 1703 the elector of Bavaria took it, after a ſiege of ſeven days, and demoliſhed the fortifications; however, the battle of Hochſted reſtored their liberty, which they yet enjoy under the government of their own magiſtrates, the biſhop having no temporal dominion in the city. The chapter is compoſed of perſons of quality, who are to bring proofs of their nobility. The canons have a right of electing their own biſhop, who is a ſovereign, in the ſame manner as ſeveral other of the German biſhops.

This city is thirty miles north-weſt of Munich, ſixty-three ſouth of Nuremberg, one hundred and twenty-five eaſt of Straſburg, and two hundred miles weſt of Vienna. Long. 10. 58. E. Lat. 48. 24. N.

AUGUR, in antiquity, an officer of high dignity appointed at Rome to foretell future events, from the flight and chattering of birds, from the appetite and actions of the ſacred chickens, from quadrupeds and portentous omens, as thunder, lightning, &c.

The college of Augurs, at firſt inſtituted by Romulus at Rome, was originally compoſed of no more than three perſons, taken from the three tribes, into which the inhabitants of the city were divided; but ſeveral being afterwards added, they at length amounted to fifteen, all of whom were perſons of the higheſt diſtinction, and none were admitted but thoſe of a blameleſs life and free from all perſonal defects. This was a prieſthood for life; and when they were once entered into this office, no crime could deprive them of it.

AUGUSTALES, in Roman antiquity, an epithet given to the flamins or prieſts who ſacrificed to Auguſtus Cæſar after his deification; and alſo to the games celebrated to his honour on the 4th of the ides of October.

AUGUSTALIA, in antiquity, a feſtival inſtituted by the Romans in honour of Auguſtus Cæſar, on his return to Rome, after having ſettled peace in Sicily, Greece, Syria, Aſia, and Parthia, on which occaſion they alſo built an altar to him, inſcribed Fortunæ reduci.

AUGUSTINE (St.) one of the moſt illuſtrious fathers of the church, was born at Tagaſte in Africa, November 13, 354. He was the ſon of Patricius, a mean citizen of Tagaſte, and Monica, a woman of exemplary virtue. His father intending that he ſhould raiſe himſelf by his learning, ſent him to Madaura, to be inſtructed in the claſſics; but diſcovering a great diſlike to ſtudy, he loved nothing but gaming and public ſhews, and, it is ſaid, invented a thouſand lies to eſcape the rod, with which he was often ſeverely chaſtiſed. He afterwards ſtudied at Carthage, where he embraced the opinions of the Manicheans, and at length returning to Tagaſte, gained great reputation by teaching rhetoric, but lived in debauchery. In 380 he went back to Carthage, and taught rhetoric in that city with extraordinary applauſe. Here he took a woman into keeping, to whom he was very conſtant, and by her he had a ſon.

He afterwards went to Rome, where he taught rhetoric with the ſame ſucceſs; and, in 383, Symmachus, prefect of that city, appointed him public profeſſor of rhetoric at Milan, where he went out of curioſity to hear St. Ambroſe preach, to know whether his eloquence deſerved the reputation it had gained; and his ſermons made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that he embraced the doctrines of Chriſtianity. His mother, who had travelled to Milan to ſee him, affectionately adviſed him to marry, and to lay aſide his lewd practices, to which he at length conſented, and, with the utmoſt reluctance, ſent back his miſtreſs to Africa; but as the young lady intended for his wife would not be fit for marriage 'till two years after, he could not refrain ſo long, and therefore took, in the mean while, another woman; but at laſt the reading of St. Paul's Epiſtles, together with the tears and ſolicitations of his mother, and the converſation of ſome of his friends, completed his converſion. He was baptized by St. Ambroſe in 387; the following year he returned to Africa, and in 391 was ordained prieſt. The warmth of conſtitution, which before led him to the gratifications of luſt, now flamed out in zeal for Chriſtianity. He advanced ſeveral new opinions on grace and predeſtination, and approved of penal laws in matters of conſcience. However, he was of important ſervice to the church by his pen and exemplary piety. He died on the 28th of Auguſt, 430, aged ſeventy-ſix. The beſt edition of his works is that of the Benedictines, in eleven volumes, folio.

AUGUSTIN (St.) or, by contraction, AUSTIN (St.) uſually ſtyled the Apoſtle of the Engliſh, and the firſt archbiſhop of Canterbury, was originally a monk of the convent of St. Andrew at Rome, and in the year 596 was diſpatched into Britain by pope Gregory I. together with forty other monks of the ſame order, for the converſion of the Engliſh Saxons to the Chriſtian religion, in which employment he had ſurpriſing ſucceſs; for he not only converted Ethelbert, king of Kent, but ſeveral thouſands of the people. The popiſh writers have aſcribed ſeveral very ridiculous miracles to him, of which we ſhall give one as a ſpecimen. This ſaint coming one day to preach at a village called Cumpton, in Oxfordſhire, the prieſt of the place complained to him, that a certain officer in the army refuſed to pay him his tythes. Upon which Auguſtin ſent for the officer, and gently reprimanded him for his obſtinacy, in with-holding the church's dues; but the ſoldier ſtill refuſing to comply, Auguſtin threatened him with excommunication; and then going up to the altar, ſaid aloud, in the hearing of all the people, "Let no excommunicated perſon be preſent at the maſs." This being ſaid, a corpſe, which had been buried in the church porch, came immediately out of his grave, and going into the church yard, ſtood there erect and motionleſs, during the celebration of maſs. The people who ſaw it came in a fright to tell Auguſtin, upon which the archbiſhop, preceded by the croſs and holy water, and accompanied by all the people, went to the place, and demanded of the body, who he was? To whom the corpſe replied, "When you commanded, on God's part, that no excommunicated perſon ſhould be preſent at maſs, the angels of God, who conſtantly attend your ſteps, caſt me out of the place where I was buried, telling me, that Auguſtin, the friend of God, commanded all ſtinking carcaſſes to be thrown out of the church of God; for, in the time of the Britons, before the fury of the Anglo-Saxons had laid waſte this country, I was lord of this village, and though often admoniſhed by the prieſt of this church, refuſed paying tythes, till being excommunicated by him, I died, and was caſt down into hell." Upon this, Auguſtin and all the company wept bitterly. Then Auguſtin bid the dead body ſhew him where the prieſt lay buried, which being done, and a few dry bones found, the ſaint addreſt himſelf to prayer, and then ſaid, "In the name of God, I command thee to ariſe, for I have buſineſs with thee." Immediately the bones began to unite, and in a ſhort time the prieſt ſtood before them, who, at the ſaint's command, pronounced abſolution on the excommunicated corpſe; after which both the dead bodies returned to their graves, and fell into duſt. Auguſtin then calling the officer, aſked him if he yet perſiſted in refuſing to pay his tythes; but he, trembling and aſtoniſhed, fell at the ſaint's feet, confeſſed his crime, and, beſtowing all his goods on the church, became a conſtant follower of Auguſtin, till the day of his death. But to return. Auguſtin principally reſided at Canterbury, which thus became the metropolitan metropolitan church of England, and having eſtabliſhed biſhops in ſeveral of the cities, died on the 26th of May, 607.

AUGUSTIN (ANTHONY) archbiſhop of Terragon, and one of the moſt learned men in his time, was born at Sarragoſſa, and obtained great ſkill in the languages, and in civil and canon law, the belles lettres, eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, and ſacred and prophane antiquities. He wrote a great number of works, the moſt conſiderable of which is the Correction of Gratian, an excellent edition of which was publiſhed by Baluze, with notes, in 1672. This learned prelate died in 1586, in the 69th year of his age.

AUGUSTINE (ST.) a town on the eaſt coaſt of Florida, belonging to the Engliſh. It is ſeated on the extremity of a narrow neck of land, which advances into the ſea, on the north ſide of which is a bay, and before it an iſland. Long. 81. 10. W. Lat. 8. 30. N.

There is a cape of the ſame name on the coaſt of Brazil, in South-America. Long. 35. 4. W. Lat. 8. 30. S.

AUGUSTOW, a ſmall but ſtrong town of Poland, in the duchy and palatinate of Polakia, ſeated on the river Narieu, forty-four miles north of Bieliſk, one hundred north-by-eaſt of Warſaw, and one hundred and ſeventy-five eaſt of Dantzick. Long. 24. 2. E. Lat. 53. 25. N.

AUGUSTULUS. See AUGUSTUS ROMULUS.

AUGUSTUS (CAIUS JULIUS CÆSAR OCTAVIANUS) the ſecond of the Roman emperors, was born at Rome ſixty-three years before the Chriſtian æra. Having heard of the death of Cæſar, by whom he had been adopted, he repaired to Italy, where he was joined by all his uncle's party. Mark Anthony, who was then jealous of Auguſtus's authority, took up arms againſt him; but Auguſtus, in conjunction with Hirtius and Panſa, freed Decimus Brutus, who was beſieged in Modena, and drove Anthony out of Italy. Hirtius was killed at the battle of Modena, Panſa died of his wounds; but before his death he diſcovered to Auguſtus, that the ſenate's ſecret deſign was to weaken both him and Anthony, by means of each other, and at laſt to place the government in the hands of Pompey's party. This, added to the progreſs made by Caſſius, induced Auguſtus to become reconciled to Mark Anthony, who threatened, in caſe he refuſed to come to terms with him, to join with Brutus and Caſſius. Hence aroſe the league between Auguſtus, Mark Anthony, and Lepidus, which was called the Triumvirate. Auguſtus married Clodia, and marched towards Rome, when the ſenate, which had been on the point of condemning him, raiſed him above the laws themſelves, and permitted him to exalt himſelf above the conſuls. Auguſtus cauſed his adoption to be authoriſed by a public edict, and Brutus, Caſſius, and the reſt of Cæſar's aſſaſſins, to be condemned. At length he had an interview with Mark Anthony and Lepidus, near Bologna; when it was reſolved that they ſhould take upon them the government of the people for five years, under the name of Triumvirs, and that they ſhould nominate the magiſtrates. They at the ſame time divided the government amongſt themſelves, Anthony had the eaſt, Auguſtus the weſt, and Lepidus Africa; after which agreement, Mark Anthony and Auguſtus marched againſt Brutus and Caſſius. Auguſtus at length returning to Italy, found that Fulvia was plotting againſt him in favour of Mark Anthony, her huſband, which again made a breach between them; but after Fulvia's death, Auguſtus again came to an agreement with Anthony, who married Octavia, the ſiſter of Auguſtus, and the widow of Marcellus; after which Auguſtus conquered young Pompey in Sicily, and drove him out of that iſland, when Lepidus, who had a ſhare in this victory, would have taken poſſeſſion of Sicily, but his army forſaking him, Auguſtus ſent him into exile. In ſhort, the war being at length rekindled between Auguſtus and Anthony, the famous battle of Actium decided the fate of theſe two princes, Anthony being conquered thirty-one years before the Chriſtian æra; by his death, and that of Cleopatra, Auguſtus obtained the empire of the world. At his return to Rome, he, by the advice of Mecænas, preſerved his authority, and took the title of emperor, tho' Agrippa would have perſuaded him to reſtore the Roman commonwealth. To ſecure his power, he ſtrove to gain the army by his liberality, the people by introducing plenty, and the learned by gratuities. The ſenate conferred upon him the title of Auguſtus in the twenty-ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra. He afterwards viſited Gaul, Spain, Sicily, Greece, and Aſia, aſſumed the office of high prieſt, and eight years before the birth of Chriſt reformed the calendar, and reduced it to the ſtate in which it continued till the time of pope Gregory XIII. He then gave his own name to the month of Auguſt, which was before called Sextilis. In ſhort, he adopted Tiberius, and died at Nola, in the ſeventy-ſixth year of his age.

This prince was of an advantageous and well proportioned ſtature, with an agreeable air, and a modeſt look. While he aſpired to the empire, his mind appeared agitated, fluctuating, and artful; but as ſoon as he became the peaceable poſſeſſor of the ſovereign authority, his vices ſeemed changed into virtues. He appeared juſt, affable, and liberal. He preſerved peace, advanced men of merit, and made the arts and ſciences flouriſh; he even cultivated them himſelf, and they were raiſed throughout his empire to the higheſt degree of perfection. He is reproached, however, for being too fond of pleaſure, and for being governed by the caprices of his wife Livia, who ruled him as ſhe pleaſed.

AUGUSTUS ROMULUS, ſurnamed AGUSTULUS, either from deriſion, or on account of his youth. This was the laſt of the Roman emperors. He was the ſon of Oreſtes, general of the Roman army in Gaul, who having revolted, and driven Julius Nepos from Ravenna, rendered himſelf maſter of the empire, and cauſed his ſon to be proclaimed emperor at Ravenna, on the 29th of October, 475. Auguſtulus did not long enjoy his new dignity; for Odoacer having raiſed an army, cauſed Oreſtes to be put to death, rendered himſelf maſter of Rome, and obliged Auguſtulus to abdicate the empire, after his having reigned nine months and twenty-four days, on which he had a revenue allowed him for the remainder of his life. Odoacer, however, refuſed the purple, the other imperial ornaments, and the title of emperor, contenting himſelf with being proclaimed king of Italy on the 23d of Auguſt, 476. Thus ended the Roman empire in the Weſt, five hundred and ſeven years and a few days after the battle of Actium, which eſtabliſhed the empire under Auguſtus, and one thouſand two hundred and twenty-nine years after the foundation of Rome. It is remarkable that the laſt Roman emperor bore the name of Auguſtus, as well as the firſt, and alſo the name of Romulus, the founder of the power of the Romans.

AUGUSTUS (PHILIP). See PHILIP AUGUSTUS.

AUGUSTUS, duke of Brunſwick and Lunenburgh, was one of the wiſeſt and moſt learned princes of the ſeventeenth century. He wrote ſeveral works, and, particularly, An Harmony of the Goſpels, which has been much eſteemed.

AVICENNA (ABU ALI AL HOSAIN EBN ABDALLAH EBN SINA) a moſt celebrated philoſopher and phyſician among the Mahommetans, was born in the year of the Hegira, 370, A. D. 980, at Affhana, a ſmall town near Bokhâra. By the time he was ten years of age he had learned the Koran. He was then ſent to a man who dealt in herbs, and was ſkilled in the Indian method of accounts, to learn arithmetic. After this, he learnt the rudiments of logic, and the firſt five or ſix propoſitions of Euclid, from a private tutor, and then went through the reſt of Euclid by himſelf, only conſulting the commentators. He next applied himſelf to the ſtudy of phyſic, and being then about ſixteen, he viſited patients to gain experience. Having attained great ſkill in logic, natural philoſophy, and mathematics, he proceeded to divinity, and as a preparation for this ſtudy, was deſirous of making himſelf maſter of Ariſtotle's metaphyſics; but it is ſaid, that he read the book over forty times, and even got it by heart, without underſtanding it: but was one day in a bookſeller's ſhop, when a broker offered to ſell him a book of metaphyſics, which he rejected with ſcorn, the broker however telling him that he might have it cheap, he purchaſed it, and had no ſooner run it over at home, than he plainly perceived the ſenſe of Ariſtotle, and out of joy gave a conſiderable alms to the poor. Avicenna having recovered the king of Khoraſan, who, during a fit of illneſs, had ſent for him, though he was a very young man, that prince kept him near his perſon, and allowed him free acceſs to his numerous and valuable library, which happening to be burnt ſoon after, Avicenna's enemies accuſed him of having ſet it on fire, that nobody elſe might enjoy the ſame advantage. He wrote near a hundred books, among which are, 1. His Canon, or Syſtem of Phyſic. 2. Al Shefâ, i. e. Healing: and 3. A Treatiſe on the Eaſtern Philoſophy. He died in the year of the Hegira, 428, A. D. 1036, being fifty-eight lunar years old.

AVIENUS, a Latin author, in the fourth century, who put Phædrus's Fables into elegiac verſes, but his poetry having neither the beauty nor the graces of the original, it ought not to be put into the hands of youth.

AVIGNON, a city of Provence, in France, the capital of the county of Venaiſſin, and ſeated on the banks of the Rhone. It is an archbiſhop's ſee, and the reſidence of ſeveral popes at this place for ſeventy years have rendered it conſiderable. Its walls are built with free-ſtone, with ſeveral ſquare towers, adorned with pinnacles. The ditches are not large, but are in proportion to the height of the walls, and are in ſome places full of water. This city belongs to the pope, who ſends a vice-legate every three years, who, in ſome ſenſe, is the governor. Near the Rhone there is a large rock, within the circumference of the walls, upon which is a platform, from whence we may have a proſpect of the whole city, and the places about it. This city is embelliſhed with magnificent churches, a large ſquare, beautiful buildings, and very agreeable gardens. The palace of the vice-legate is compoſed of ſeveral large ſquare towers, and he gives audience in a great hall which is full of fine paintings, as is alſo the chapel and the apartments. The Arſenal is near the palace.

The church of Notre Dame is ancient, but not large, and is one of the beſt adorned in the city. After having aſcended about fifty ſteps, you come to a very ancient portico, which ſuſtains a great tower; as you enter the church on the left hand, you ſee paintings which equal the fineſt in Italy. The great altar is very magnificent, and is adorned with a ſhrine that contains the relics of we know not how many ſaints. The treaſure of the ſacriſty is worthy of the curioſity of the traveller. The little palace where the archbiſhop reſides is formed of three bodies of lodgings, accompanied with courts and ſmall pavilions. It overlooks the Rhone, the city, and the fields. Theſe buildings and the mint adorn a large ſquare, which is the common walk of the inhabitants.

In Avignon they reckon ſeven gates, ſeven palaces, ſeven colleges, ſeven hoſpitals, ſeven monaſteries, ſeven nunneries, and ſeven popes, who have lived there in ſeventy years. The church of the Celeſtines is very magnificent, and full of fine monuments, and the reſt are not without their curioſities. The univerſity has four colleges, and the place where the Jews live is a diſtinct quarter, from whence the Jews, who pay tribute, dare not ſtir out without yellow hats, and the women muſt have ſomething yellow about their heads, to diſtinguiſh them from the Chriſtians. Their number is very conſiderable in a very confined place, where the only way of enlarging their abodes is by building their houſes higher. Their ſynagogue is ſo dark, that they are obliged to light lamps. However, they are forced to hear a monk preach a ſermon every week. There was a ſtone bridge over the Rhone, which is very rapid, but the greateſt part of it is carried away, and the vacancy ſupplied with wood. It had twenty arches, but it was narrow, tho' above a quarter of a mile long. The curious that travel this way go to ſee the fountain of Vaucloſe, where the river Sorgues, which paſſes through this city, has its ſource. Below the bridge there is an iſland, where the Sorgue joins the Rhone, in which are ſeveral houſes of pleaſure. It is forty miles north-weſt of Aix, and two hundred and ſeventy-two ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 59. E. Lat. 43. 57. N.

AVILA (Lewis d') a Spaniſh gentleman, born at Piazença, and general of horſe to Charles V. at the ſiege of Metz, wrote hiſtorical Memoirs of the War of Charles V. and other works.

Avila (John d') ſurnamed the Apoſtle of Andaluſia, was born at Almodoar del Campo, in Old Caſtile. By his ſermons he converted St. Francis de Borgia, St. John de Dieu, &c. He wrote ſeveral pious works, and died at Montilla, in 1569.

Avila, a celebrated hiſtorian. See Davila.

There have been many other perſons of this name.

Avila, a city of Old Caſtile, in Spain, ſeated on an eminence on the banks of the river Adaja, and in ſight of the mountains of Pico. It is fortified both by nature and art, having a wall nine thouſand and ſeventy-five feet in circumference, adorned with twenty-ſix lofty towers, and ten handſome gates. There are ſeventeen principal ſtreets, the houſes in which are generally good, and ſome of them ſtately, with nine ſquares, two thouſand houſes, nine pariſhes, as many monaſteries, ſeven nunneries, two colleges, nine hoſpitals, eighteen chapels, and an allowance of ten thouſand ducats yearly, for the maintainance of orphans and other poor people. It has an univerſity, and a conſiderable biſhoprick, beſides a noble cathedral, which has eight dignitaries, twenty canons, and the ſame number of minor canons. It ſtands in the middle of a fine large plain, ſurrounded with mountains, and covered with fruit-trees and vineyards. There is likewiſe a manufacture of cloth. It is forty miles ſouth-eaſt of Salamanca, and forty-two from Madrid. Long. 4. 13. W. Lat. 40. 35. N.

Avila, or Aviles, a town of Spain, in the kingdom of Leon, on the Bay of Biſcay. Long. 5. 59. W. Lat. 43. 47. N.

AVITUS, was elected emperor after the death of Maximus, in 455, but was obliged by Ricimer's faction to abdicate the throne. At the time of his death he was biſhop of Placentia, in Lombardy.

Avitus (Sextus Alcimus) nephew to the emperor Avitus, and archbiſhop of Vienne, in Dauphiné, rendered himſelf illuſtrious by his learning and piety. He had a ſhare in the converſion of Clovis, and in 517 preſided in the council of Epaune, and afterwards in that of Lyons. His works were printed at Paris, in octavo, in 1643, with the notes of father Sirmond.

AUKLAND, a town in the biſhoprick of Durham, ſeated on the river Were, has a market on Thurſdays, and is thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Durham, and two hundred and fifty from London. Long. 0. 57. W. Lat. 54. 44. N.

Aukland has four fairs, held on Aſcenſion-day for horned cattle, ſwine, and all ſorts of wares; the day following for ſheep and horſes; Corpus Chriſti day, for ditto; and Thurſday before October 10, for ditto.

AULCESTER, a town in Warwickſhire, with a market on Tueſday. It is fourteen miles ſouth-weſt of Warwick, and a hundred and two north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 47. W. Lat. 52. 15. N.

AULNAI (Mary Catharine le Jumel de Berneville, Counteſs d') was the wife of Francis de la Motte, count d'Aulnai, who died in January, 1705, and left her a widow. She diſtinguiſhed herſelf by her writings, which were, 1. The Fairy Tales. 2. A Voyage to Spain. 3. Memoirs of the Court of Spain; and ſeveral other works.

AULUS Gellius, a celebrated Latin grammarian, who lived at Athens, in the reign of the emperor Adrian, about the year 130. He wrote in Latin twenty books of the Attic Nights, which principally turn on criticiſms. This author is particularly valued on account of the great number of ancient fragments found in his works, that are no where elſe to be met with.

AUMARLE, a town in France. See Albemarle.

AUMONT (John d') marſhal of France, and one of the greateſt captains of his time, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery. Henry III. made him marſhal of France in the year 1579. He ſignalized himſelf at the battle of Ivry, and died on the 19th of Auguſt, 1595, aged ſeventy-three.

Aumont (Anthony d') a peer and marſhal of France, diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral ſieges and battles. He had the command of the right wing at the battle of Rhetel, in 1650; was made marſhal of France in 1651; governor of Paris in 1662, and a duke and peer in 1667. He died at Paris in 1669, in the ſixty-ninth year of his age.

AUNGERVYLE (Richard) commonly known by the name of Richard de Bury, was born in 1281, at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk, and educated at the univerſity of Oxford. After which he entered into the order of Benedictine monks, and became tutor to Edward, prince of Wales, afterwards king Edward III. Upon the acceſſion of his royal pupil to the throne, he was appointed cofferer, then treaſurer of the wardrobe, archdeacon of Northampton, prebendary of Lincoln, Sarum, and Litchfield, keeper of the privy-ſeal, dean of Wells, and laſt of all was promoted to the biſhoprick of Durham. He likewiſe enjoyed the offices of lord high chancellor, and treaſurer of England, and diſcharged two important embaſſies at the court of France. Learned himſelf, and a patron of the learned, he maintained a correſpondence with ſome of the greateſt geniuſes of the age, particularly with the celebrated Italian poet Petrarch. He was naturally of a humane and benevolent temper, and performed many ſignal acts of charity; but the nobleſt inſtance of his generoſity and munificence, was the public library which he founded at Oxford, and which he built upon the ſpot where Trinity college now ſtands. It continued till the diſſolution of monaſteries, in the reign of king Henry VIII. when the books were diſperſed into different repoſitories. He likewiſe wrote a book, intitled Philobiblos, for the regulation of his library; and a copy of this performance, in manuſcript, is ſtill to be ſeen in the Cotton library. He died at his manor of Aukland, April the 24th, 1345, and was interred in the cathedral of Durham.

AUNIS, the ſmalleſt province of France, is bounded on the north by Poitou, on the weſt by the ocean, on the eaſt and ſouth by Saintonge, of which it formerly was a part. It is watered by the rivers Seure and Sarente; the former of which has its ſource at Seure, in Poitou. The coaſt of this ſmall diſtrict has the advantage of ſeveral ports, the moſt remarkable of which are, Rochfort, Rochelle, Brouge, St. Martin de Re, Tremblade, and Tonnai-Charente. The land of this country is dry, and yet produces good corn, and plenty of wine. The marſhes feed a great number of cattle, and the ſalt marſhes yield the beſt ſalt in Europe.

AVON, a river that riſes in Wiltſhire, which runs to Bath, where it becomes navigable, and continuing its courſe to Briſtol, ſoon after falls into the Severn.

Avon, a river that riſes in Leiceſterſhire, runs to Warwick, then to Eveſham, and falls into the Severn a little below Tewkſbury, in Gloceſterſhire.

AURACH, a town of Germany, with a good caſtle, in the ſouth part of Suabia, and duchy of Wirtemberg. It is the uſual reſidence of the youngeſt ſons of the houſe of Wirtemberg, and is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, on the rivulet Ermſt, ſixteen miles eaſt of Tubingen, and twenty-ſix eaſt of Ulm. Long. 9. 20. E. Lat. 48. 25. N.

AVRANCHES, a town of France, in Lower Normandy, and a territory called Avranchin, which is about thirty miles in length. The air is mild and temperate, the inhabitants civil, active, and lovers of war. The cyder is in the the higheſt eſteem of any in that part of Normandy. Avranches is ſeated on a hill, near which the river See runs; and is about a mile and a half from the ſea, eight from Mount Michael, which may be ſeen from thence, and a hundred and ſeventy-ſix from Paris. Long. 1. 20. W. Lat. 48. 41. N.

AURAT, or D' AURAT (JOHN) in Latin, Auratus. See D' AURAT.

AURAY, is a ſmall ſea-port town, of France, in Lower Brittany, and in the gulph called Morbian. It is nothing properly ſpeaking but a large key, and a handſome ſtreet; and is chiefly known for its trade. It is fifty-eight miles ſouth-weſt of Rennes, and two hundred and ſixty-ſix from Paris. Long. 2. 25. W. Lat. 47. 48. N.

AURELIANUS (LUCIUS DOMITIUS) emperor of Rome, was one of the greateſt generals of antiquity, and commanded the armies of the emperor Claudius with ſuch glory, that after the death of that emperor, all the legions agreed to place him on the throne: this happened in the year 270. He carried the war from the eaſt to the weſt, with as much facility, ſays a modern writer, as a body of troops marches from Alſace into Flanders. He defeated the Goths, Sarmatians, Marcomini, the Perſians, Egyptians, and Vandals; conquered Zenobia, queen of the Palmyrenians, and Tetricus, general of the Gauls; both of whom were made to grace his triumph, in the year 274. He puniſhed with extreme cruelty; on which it was ſaid, that "he was a "good phyſician, but drew a little too much blood." He raiſed a cruel perſecution againſt the Chriſtians in 272; but it was of very ſhort duration. At length, Mneſtheus, one of his freedmen, cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated in Thrace, in the year 275, when he was preparing to enter Perſia with a great army.

AURELIUS (MARCUS). See the article MARCUS AURELIUS.

AURELIUS VICTOR (SEXTUS) a Latin hiſtorian, who, from being in moderate circumſtances, raiſed himſelf by his merit to the moſt conſiderable poſts in the empire. Julian made him governor of Pannonia, in the year 361, and in 369 he was conſul with Valentinian. We have his abridgment of the Roman Hiſtory.

AURELLI, or ARELLI (JOHN MURIO) in Latin, Aurelius, a Latin poet, born at Mantua, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He endeavoured to imitate Catullus, but nothing looſe, or contrary to modeſty is to be found in his writings. He died about the year 1520.

AURENGABAD, a city in the Eaſt Indies, capital of the province of Balagate, in the dominions of the great mogul, and the ſeat of the governor. It is furniſhed with handſome moſques and caravanſeras. The buildings are chiefly of free-ſtone and pretty high, and the ſtreets are planted on each ſide with trees. They have large gardens well ſtocked with fruit-trees and vines. It is a trading town, and the ſheep about it are remarkably large and ſtrong. The land is alſo obſerved to be very fertile. Long. 75. 30. E. Lat. 19. 10. N.

AURENGE-ZEB, great mogul, poiſoned his father, and took poſſeſſion of his throne, in 1660; he alſo murdered two of his brothers, baniſhed a third, and a little time after was in the peaceable poſſeſſion of that empire. He was of a meagre aſpect, but his eyes were quick and ſparkling, and ſeemed to penetrate every breaſt on which they were turned; he appeared to be inſenſible both of joy and grief, and was ſo great a maſter of diſſimulation, that he could hide, under what external appearance he pleaſed, all that paſſed in his heart; he conſtantly attended public worſhip, abſtained from wine, ſhewed a contempt for even innocent pleaſures, and in the whole of his appearance there was an auſterity and ſimplicity that diſcovered rather the philoſopher than the prince; yet ambition was the firſt motive of all his actions, and urged him to commit the moſt flagitious crimes; he was totally deſtitute of clemency, generoſity, and gratitude, and wholly poſſeſſed by avarice, ſuſpicion, and cruelty; bribery, treachery, and poiſon, he ſaid, were the moſt ſpeedy and effectual means to deliver him from his enemies; and his ability to practiſe this deteſtable maxim was ſo aſtoniſhing, that it was almoſt impoſſible to elude his cunning, or render his ſtratagems ineffectual.

His avarice prompted him to the moſt extraordinary methods of obtaining money, a diverting inſtance of which we ſhall here give our readers. He publiſhed an edict that on a certain day all the faquirs in his kingdom ſhould aſſemble in a large plain, that he might enjoy the pleaſure of dining with them; he then ordered a great number of new robes to be made, and the aſſembly being met, he, after dinner, made a preſent of one to every faquir, ordering them to ſtrip off the old ones, and throw them in a heap. The faquirs made ſome difficulty of complying; but he let them know, their modeſt and humble excuſes ſhould not diſappoint his generous intentions, and they were obliged to obey; when their cloaths being burnt to aſhes, there was found among them a very large ſum, which was depoſited in his coffers. He knew that thoſe begging monks, under the falſe appearance of poverty, amaſſed great wealth, which they, for ſafety, quilted in the folds of their garments; and this was the motive of his ſeeming generoſity.

To finiſh his portrait, he was an unnatural ſon, a cruel parent, a perfidious friend, and a formidable enemy; treacherous, perjured, unmerciful, deceitful, and univerſally hated; yet was a warlike prince, and conquered the kingdoms of Decan, Viſapour, Golconda, and Carnata; but fearing that his ſons would treat him in the ſame manner as he had done his father Cha-gehan, he almoſt always encamped in the midſt of his army. He died in 1707, when almoſt an hundred years old.

AUREOLUS (PETER) a Franciſcan friar, and afterwards archbiſhop of Aix, whoſe real name was Oriel, was born at Verberie upon the Oiſe, in Picardy, and flouriſhed about the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth century. He obtained the title of the Eloquent Doctor. He wrote ſeveral books, among which are Commentaries on the four Books of Sentences, and a Treatiſe on the Conception of the immaculate Virgin. He died on the 27th of April, 1322.

AURIA (VINCENT) a learned Italian, was born at Palermo, in the year 1625, and wrote many books in Italian, and ſome in Latin. He died at Palermo, in 1710.

AURICK, a city of Germany, in Eaſt Frieſland, and in the circle of Weſtphalia, is ſeated in a plain ſurrounded with foreſts full of game. It is twelve miles north-eaſt of Embden, and twenty weſt of Oldenburgh. The king of Pruſſia claims a property in it. Long. 6. 50. E. Lat. 53. 28. N.

AURILLAC, a town of France, in the Lower Auvergne, ſeated in a valley, on a ſmall river called Jordane. It is one of the moſt conſiderable towns in the province, has ſix gates, and is very populous, and yet has but one pariſh. The collegiate church was in part demoliſhed by the Calviniſts. The Jeſuits had a college, but they were very poor. Through the gate Farques they paſs to an iſland, called Gravier, which is full of walks of lime-trees, where the inhabitants divert themſelves. The ſuburb of the Friars, ſo called from two monaſteries therein, is very conſiderable, though it conſiſts but of one long ſtreet, yet it is very agreeable to the eye, on account of four convents wherewith it is adorned. The refectory of the Carmelites is one of the wonders of the country for its largeneſs. The caſtle, in the ſuburb of St. Stephen, is very high, and commands the town. The abbot is lord of Aurillac, and has epiſcopal juriſdiction; he is alſo chief juſtice in the town. Aurillac has produced ſeveral great men, and is one hundred and fifty miles ſouth of Paris. Long. 2. 33. E. Lat. 44. 55. N.

AURISPA (JOHN) born at Noto, in Sicily, was ſecretary to pope Nicholas V. and was one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth century. The following books are aſcribed to him, viz. 1. A Tranſlation of Archimedes. 2. A Verſion of Hierocles. 3. A Commentary upon the Golden Verſes of Pythagoras; and, 4. another of Philiſcus's Treatiſe of Conſolation to Cicero.

AUROGALLUS (MATTHEW) a learned man of the ſixteenth century, and profeſſor of three languages in the univerſity of Wittemberg. He wrote, 1. Compendium Hebrææ Chaldææque Grammatices; and, 2. De Hebræis Urbium, Regionum, Populorum, Fluminum, Montium, & aliorum Locorum Nominibus Liber è veteri Inſtrumento congeſtus; and was of great ſervice to Luther in the tranſlation of his Bible. He died in 1543.

AURORA, in the Pagan mythology, the Goddeſs of the Morning, the youngeſt daughter of Hyperion and Theia, or, according to others, the daughter of Titan and the Earth. Under this name the ancients deified the light that fore-runs the riſing of the ſun; which, by the poets, has been repreſented in the moſt beautiful manner, particularly by Homer and Virgil, who repreſent Aurora as riſing out of the ocean, in a ſaffron-coloured robe, and ſeated in a flame-coloured chariot, drawn by two or by four horſes, with her roſy fingers opening the gates of light, and ſcattering the pearly dew.

This Goddeſs is ſaid to have fallen in love with a beautiful youth named Cephalus, who is ſuppoſed to be the ſame with the Sun, and by whom ſhe had Phaëton; but her greateſt favourite was Tithonus, to whom ſhe bore Æmathion and Memnon; ſhe had alſo an amour with Orion, tho' ſhe had an huſband named Aſtreas, who was one of the Titans, and by whom ſhe had the ſtars, and the four winds, Zephyrus, Argeſtes, Boreas, and Notus. For a more particular account of her amours, and the fate of her lovers, ſee CEPHALUS, TITHONUS, &c.

AUSONIUS, in Latin Decius, or rather Decimus Magnus Auſonius, was born at Bourdeaux; he was one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed poets of the fourth century, and obtained ſuch reputation by being profeſſor of rhethoric at Bourdeaux, that the emperor Gratian, after he had filled other important poſts, raiſed him to the dignity of conſul. He wrote an epiſtle in verſe to St. Paulinus, in 392, and died ſome time after. There is ſome harſhneſs both in his manner and ſtyle; but this, it has been obſerved, is rather the defect of the age than of his genius.

AUSTREGILDE, the wife of Gontran, king of Orleans and Burgundy. She was at firſt one of the attendants on queen Marcatrude; but Gontran, being in love with her, divorced his queen, in the year 556, and married Auſtregilde. The violence of his paſſion proved fatal to ſeveral perſons; for two of the brothers of Marcatrude ſpeaking diſreſpectfully of Auſtregilde and her children, the king ſtabbed them with his own hand.

In 580, when Auſtregilde was thirty-two years of age, ſhe was ſeized with a dangerous diſeaſe, and finding that ſhe drew near her end, ſhe was ſo afflicted at the thought of loſing the riches, pleaſures and honours that were painted in her diſordered imagination with all their charms, that ſhe ſent for the king her huſband, and, according to Gregory de Tours, thus addreſſed him: "I might have enjoyed a much longer "life, if the phyſicians had not conſpired to deprive me of "it. Yes, my lord, it is they, who, with their abomin- "able doſes have killed me. Pray then, let not my death "go unpuniſhed; but, ſince I muſt die, let them, as ſoon "as I have breathed my laſt, die too. Swear to me, that "you will not let them enjoy the glory of having made me "periſh, that the regret of thoſe who are attached to us may "be accompanied with the tears of thoſe who love them." The too complaiſant Gontran promiſed to do what ſhe required, and kept his word by cauſing Nicolas and Donat, the two phyſicians who had attended Auſtregilde, to be put to death.

AUSTRIA (Don JUAN of) natural ſon to the emperor Charles V. was born at Ratiſbon, on the 24th of February, 1545, and ſignalized himſelf by ſeveral victories over the Turks, and particularly in the famous battle of Lepanto, in 1571. He died on the 1ſt of October, 1578, when it was ſuſpected that he was poiſoned.

AUSTRIA (Don JUAN of) the natural ſon of Philip IV. king of Spain, by an actreſs, was born in the year 1629, and was legitimated in 1642. He reduced the revolted Catalans to their duty, and afterwards commanded an army in the Low Countries; but with ill ſucceſs. He died September 17, 1679.

AUSTRIA, is the moſt eaſterly part of Germany, having Hungary on the eaſt, Moravia and Bohemia on the north; Bavaria and the archbiſhopric of Saltſburg on the weſt, and Stiria on the ſouth. It is traverſed by the Danube throughout its whole length: it has likewiſe the Traun, the Ens, the Leyta, and ſeveral other leſs conſiderable rivers, that facilitate commerce, and render the land fruitful; which brings forth plenty of corn, ſaffron, fruits, and wine. Auſtria is divided into two parts, the Higher and the Lower, each of which has a governor, officers, a regency, and a capital city, of which, Lintz belongs to the Upper, and Vienna to the Lower. It is an archduchy, and the only one in the world.

Higher Auſtria is the weſtern part, and contains four ſmall territories, called Quarters. There are two on the ſouth of the Danube. That of Hauſs, which extends along the ſide of the Danube; and in which are the cities of Lintz and Ens: and that of Traun, which is to the ſouth of the former, where we find the towns of Steyr and Gemund. The other two Quarters are to the north of the Danube; that of Muhl contains the town of Freiſtadt, and borders upon Bavaria; that of Schwartz is towards Lower Auſtria, and has the cities Mathauſen and Greyn.

Lower Auſtria is the eaſtern part, and is twice as large as the former; and yet is divided only into four quarters; High Manhartſberg, and the Lower, both on the north of the Danube; High Wienner-Wald and the Lower; theſe are both to the ſouth of that river. The towns are Stain and Krembs; Retz, St. Polten, Tuln, and Trauſmar; Haimburg, Neuſtat, Newburg, Bruck, and Vienna, the capital of the whole country.

AUSTRIA (Circle of) is one of the nine great provinces that compoſe the German empire. It is the moſt eaſtern and ſouthern of all the reſt, and is bounded on the north by the kingdom of Bohemia, the circle of Bavaria, and a ſmall part of that of Swabia; on the weſt by the Swiſs and Griſons; on the ſouth by the State of Venice, and on the eaſt by Hungary. It is divided into Interior Auſtria, which comprehends the Auſtrian archduchy, and the duchies of Carinthia, Styria, and Carniola, and their dependencies; exterior Auſtria, which is the Tirol, taken in its whole extent: ſome geographers add to this circle all that the Houſe of Auſtria poſſeſſes in Swabia. All that that houſe poſſeſſes in the empire by right of ſucceſſion is called the Hereditary countries of the Houſe of Auſtria. Hungary and Bohemia are not in the empire, and are kingdoms that pretend to be elective; but that claim is not allowed.

AUTHIER DE SISGAU (CHRISTOPHER D') a native of Marſeilles, who, in 1632, inſtituted the Congregation of the Prieſts of the Sacrament, for the regulation of ſeminaries and miſſions. He was made biſhop of Bethlehem in 1651, and died in 1667.

AUTOLYCUS, a Greek philoſopher, about three hundred and forty years before the Chriſtian æra. There are ſtill extant ſome of his treatiſes on aſtronomy.

AUTON (JOHN D') abbot of Angle, of the order of St. Auguſtin, lived in the reign of Lewis XII. was retained in the ſervice of the court, and ordered to write the hiſtory of that king, which he executed. This hiſtory extends only from the year 1506 to 1508.

AUTONOE, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Cadmus, king of Thebes, and Hermione. She was married to Ariſteus, and was the mother of Actæon.

AUTUN, an ancient city of France, in the duchy of Burgundy, the capital of Autenois, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the foot of three great mountains, one of which being full of ſprings, ſupplies the city with water, which is diſtributed among the inhabitants by the means of ſix fountains. That before the cathedral is remarkable for its magnificent ſtructure. The river Aroux waſhes the ancient walls of this city, the ruins of which are ſo ſolid, ſo even, and the ſtones ſo cloſely united, that they almoſt ſeem to be cut out of ſolid rock. The length of the city from the gate Metrou to that called Marchand, is about three quarters of a mile, and the breadth from the gate St. Branchet to that of Carouge is nearly equal. In the middle of Autun there is a place commonly called Champ St. Ladre, or otherwiſe the Field of Mars. There are eight pariſhes in the city and ſuburbs, and ſeveral convents for men and women, as alſo a general hoſpital: that of St. Anthony is for the poor ſick. There are ſtill to be ſeen in this city the ruins of three temples, one of which was conſecrated to Janus, and another to Diana. There are likewiſe a theatre or circus, and a pyramid, which is probably a tomb: it ſtands in the Field of Urns, ſo called, becauſe ſeveral have been found there. Beſides theſe, there are two antique gates, of very great beauty. It is one hundred and ſixty-three miles ſouth of Paris. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 45. 57. N.

AUVERGNE, a province of France, one hundred miles in length, from north to ſouth, and ſeventy-five in breadth, from eaſt to weſt. It is bounded on the eaſt by Forez and Velay, on the north by Bourbonois; on the weſt by the Upper Limoſin, Quercy, and La Marche; on the ſouth by Rouergue and the Cevennes. Lower Auvergne is the fineſt and moſt fruitful part of France, yielding plenty of wine, corn, hemp, and fruits. They mow the meadows three times a year, and the ſoil is ſo fertile, that it never lies fallow above once in twenty years. The fruits are very delicious, and there is ſo great a quantity of nut trees, that they burn no other wood. The mountains of Higher Auvergne render it leſs fruitful than the Lower, but it yields good paſture, that feeds great numbers of cattle, which are the riches of the country. They ſend the fat oxen and cows to Paris and Lyons, and furniſh Nivernois and part of Guienne with oxen for labour. They likewiſe ſend large quantities of cheeſe to Paris, Brittany, Guienne, Languedoc, and out of the kingdom.

The climate of this province is various: that of Lower Auvergne is hotter and more agreeable than that of the mountains, which is extremely cold, being covered with ſnow ſix or eight months in the year. This province is very much expoſed to winds, which never blow from one corner, but from oppoſite points; for which reaſon there is not one wind-mill in all the pariſh, though they have ſeveral times attempted to build them.

The rivers of this province are the Allier, the Dordogne, the Alagnon, and ſome others, not worth mentioning.

AUXERRE, a city of France, in the duchy of Burgundy, and the capital of Auxerrois, with a biſhop's ſee, is ſeated on the ſide of a hill near the river Yonne, which waſhes a part of its walls. There are but two ſquares in this city, one of which is before the cathedral, and the other called the Place of the Fountains. The cathedral has nothing extraordinary, but the epiſcopal palace is one of the fineſt in France. The abbey of St. Germain has a great number of relicks. There are eight pariſhes, ſeveral convents for men and women, an hoſpital for the ſick of both ſexes, and for foundlings, beſides a general hoſpital. This city is ſeated well for trade, on account of the river Yonne, and its eaſy communication with Paris. Without the city there is the convent of Capuchins, the abbey of St. Marian, and that of St. Julian. It is ninety-two miles ſouth weſt of Paris. Long. 3. 35. E. Lat. 47. 54. N.

AUXONNE, a well fortified town of France, ſeated on the river Saone, in the duchy of Burgundy. There is a bridge over the river, at the end of which is a cauſeway of two thouſand thouſand three hundred and fifty paces in length, which has twenty-three arches to facilitate the running off of the water, in the time of an inundation. There were formerly two pariſhes, but at preſent there is only that of Notre Dame. There are one monaſtery, two nunneries, an ill-built hoſpital, and a caſtle. It is one hundred and eighteen miles ſouth eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 22. E. Lat. 47. 11. N.

AWLAN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Swabia, ſeated on the river Cochen, thirteen miles north of Heideſheim. Long. 11. 15. E. Lat. 48. 52. N.

AXARETO (Blasius) commander of the Geoneſe gallies, gained a ſignal victory at ſea, near the iſle of Ponce, in 1435, in which he took priſoners Alphonſus V. king of Aragon, John, king of Navarre, and ſeveral other princes.

AXBRIDGE, a neat little town in Somerſetſhire, ſeventeen miles ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Wells. It conſiſts principally of one ſtreet, and is governed by a mayor, &c. It is ſeated under Mendip hills, near the Chedder rocks, and has a good market on Thurſdays. The fairs are March 25, and June 11, for cattle, ſheep, cheeſe, and toys. It is a rectory, valued at 38l. 8s. 11d. in the king's books. Long. 2. 20. W. Lat. 51. 30. N.

AXEL, a ſmall fortified town in Dutch Flanders, fourteen miles north of Ghent, and twenty weſt of Antwerp. Long. 3. 40. E. Lat. 51. 17. N.

AXIM, a ſmall diſtrict on the gold coaſt of Guinea, where the Dutch have a fort and factory called St. Anthony.

AXIOTHEA, a woman of great abilities, who diſguiſed herſelf in man's cloaths, in order to attend Plato's lectures, and thus became one of his diſciples.

St. Clement of Alexandria mentions other women who took the ſame ſtep.

AXHOLM, an iſland on the north-weſt part of Lincolnſhire, made by the rivers Trent, Idel, and Dan, ; it is about ten miles in length, but not above half ſo broad. The lower part is marſhy, but produces an odoriferous ſhrub, called Gall ; the middle is rich and fruitful, yielding flax in great plenty, as alſo alabaſter, which is very uſeful to make lime of. The chief town is Axey, now very thinly inhabited.

AXIS of the Earth, is an imaginary line, ſuppoſed to paſs through the centre of the terreſtial globe, and on which it turns. The two extremities are called Poles.

AXMINSTER, an healthy, clean, and conſiderable town of Devonſhire, derives its name from its ſituation on the river Axe, and a minſter eſtabliſhed there by king Athelſtan. It is ſeated on the borders of Somerſetſhire and Dorſetſhire, in the road to Exeter, and carries on a ſmall trade in druggets, kerſeys, and other articles of the woollen manufacture. Its market is on Saturdays, and it has three fairs, held on St. Mark's day, the Wedneſday after June 24, and the firſt Wedneſday after September 29, for cattle. Long. 3. 15. W. Lat. 50. 40. N.

AXTEL (Daniel) a colonel in the ſervice of the Long Parliament, was put apprentice by his relations to a grocer in Watling-ſtreet, but afterwards quitting that buſineſs, he entered into the army, where, by degrees, he roſe to the ſeveral commands of captain, major, and lieutenant-colonel of a regiment of foot. At the Reſtoration he was one of the twenty excepted out of the bill of indemnity, and being tried and found guilty of high treaſon, was hanged, drawn, and quartered, October 9, 1660.

AXUMA, formerly a handſome city of Abyſſinia, and the capital of the whole empire, but is now no more than a village. The ruins now remaining are ſufficient to ſhow it has been a great city. It is ſeated in a fruitful and agreeable country, one hundred and twenty-five miles from the Arabic Gulph, improperly called the Red Sea. Long. 36. 4. E. Lat. 14. 13. N.

AYAMONTE, a maritime town of Spain, in Adaluſia, ſeated on the eaſt ſide of the mouth of the river Guadiana, over-againſt Caſtro Marino, with a caſtle built on a rock. It has a commodious harbour, fruitful vineyards, and excellent wine. It is ninety miles weſt of Seville, and eighty-north-weſt of Cadiz. Long. 8. 5. W. Lat. 37. 9. N.

AYLESBURY (Sir Thomas, Bart.) a gentleman who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning, and the generous aſſiſtance he granted to learned men, was born at London, in the year 1576. He had his education in Weſtminſter ſchool, and at Chriſt-church, in Oxford, where he applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of the mathematics. Upon his leaving the univerſity, he entered into the ſervice of Charles, earl of Nottingham, then lord high-admiral of England, to whom he became ſecretary ; and he continued in the ſame poſt under his ſucceſſor, George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, who likewiſe procured for him the dignity of a baronet. During the civil war he adhered to the royal party, and on that account ſuffered greatly, being plundered of his effects, on which he retired to Breda, in Flanders, where he reſided till his death, which happened in 1657, when he was eighty one years of age.

AYLESBURY (William) ſon of the former, was governor to George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and, by king Charles the Firſt's deſire, had a hand in tranſlating the Hiſtory of the civil Wars of France, written in Italian by Henry Canterino d' Avila. After that king's death, being reduced to great neceſſity, he accepted of the poſt of ſecretary to the governor of Jamaica, in which iſland he ſoon after died.

AYLMER, or, as he himſelf wrote it, Ælmer (John) biſhop of London in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at Aylmer-Hall, in the pariſh of Tilney, in Norfolk, in the year 1521. He had the honour of being preceptor to the lady Jane Grey. It was uſual with him, when he ſaw occaſion to rouſe the attention of his audience to his ſermons, to take a Hebrew Bible out of his pocket, and read them a few verſes, and then reſume his diſcourſe. In the firſt year of queen Mary, being archdeacon of Stow, in Lincolnſhire, and having accordingly a ſeat in the convocation, he boldly oppoſed that return to popery, to which the body of the clergy ſeemed generally inclined, and was one of the ſix, who, in the midſt of all the violences committed in that aſſembly, offered to diſpute all the controverted points in religion, againſt the moſt learned champions of the Romaniſts. Afterwards being obliged to fly, the ſhip in which Mr. Aylmer embarked was ſo unlucky as to be ſearched, and yet, partly through the friendſhip of the captain, and partly through his own lowneſs of ſtature, he eſcaped. For there being in the hold a very large wine veſſel, with a partition in the middle, he ſat in the one end of it, while the ſearchers drank wine drawn out of the other. On his obtaining a biſhoprick, he treated the Puritans with great ſeverity, though, in other reſpects, he had the character of a good-natured man, and a perſon of reſolution and courage : as an inſtance of the latter, queen Elizabeth being tormented with the tooth-ach, and yet afraid to have it drawn, biſhop Aylmer being by, to encourage her majeſty, ſat down in a chair, and addreſſing himſelf to the tooth-drawer, ſaid. "Come, though I am an old man, "and have but few teeth to ſpare, draw me this ;" which being done, the queen ſeeing him make ſo ſlight a matter of it, ſat down, and had her's drawn too.

AYMOUTH, a town of Scotland, in the county of Mers, which was formerly fortified to curb the garriſon of Berwick, from which it is diſtant ſix miles. Long. 1. 50. W. Lat. 55. 50. N.

AYSCUE, or Ayscough, (Sir George) a brave Engliſh admiral in the ſixteenth century. In the reign of king Charles I. he was raiſed to the rank of captain of a man of war ; and in 1648, when the fleet revolted to prince Rupert, he declared for the parliament, and brought the Lion, which he then commanded, into the river Thames. He was the next year appointed admiral of the Iriſh ſeas : in that ſervice he furniſhed Dublin with proviſions, and had a great hand in reducing the whole iſland to the obedience of the republic. In 1651, being ſent againſt Barbadoes, he forced that, and ſeveral other of the Weſt-Indian iſlands, to ſubmit to the commonwealth. In 1652 he attacked a Dutch fleet of forty ſail, under the convoy of four men of war ; of theſe he burnt ſome, took others, and drove the reſt on ſhore. He proteſted againſt Blake's retreat in that deſperate action of the 29th of November, 1652, thinking it much more honourable to die by the ſhot of the enemy. This, and his great influence over the ſeamen, are ſuppoſed to have been the reaſons for his being afterwards diſmiſſed from the command, on which occaſion the parliament voted him a reward of three hundred pounds a year in Ireland, and three hundred pounds in money. He was afterwards a ſhort time admiral in Sweden, under Charles Guſtavus, but returned to England ſoon after the Reſtoration : and when the Dutch war broke out in 1664, he went to ſea as rear-admiral of the blue ſquadron, and behaved with great honour in the battle of the 3d of June, 1665. On the earl of Sandwich's hoiſting the royal flag, Sir George ſerved as vice-admiral of the red ; and, in 1666, when prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle commanded, Sir George in the Royal Prince, the largeſt ſhip in the fleet, bore the white flag, as admiral of the ſquadron, when he engaged the Dutch with his uſual intrepidity and ſucceſs, in that memorable battle which laſted four days ; but towards the evening of the third, his ſhip unfortunately ran upon the Galloper ſand, and he was compelled by his own ſeamen to ſtrike ; upon which the Dutch took them on board, and finding it impoſſible to bring off the Royal Prince, ſet her on fire. He was for ſome months detained a priſoner in Holland, and, during that time, was carried from one town to another, and expoſed to the people by way of triumph. On his return to England he ſpent his days in quiet, and never after went to ſea.

AYSSERIUS, or Asserius (Menevensis) by ſome called Aſſer, and by others Aſker, a learned monk of St. David's, who, who, about the year 880, was invited to the court of Alfred, or Ælfred the Great, who ſhewed him the greateſt favour and affection, and ſome years after made him biſhop of Sherbourn. He wrote the Annals of Ælfred.

AZAI, a town of Touraine, in France, ſeated on the river Indre, fifteen miles from Tours. Long. 0. 35. E. Lat. 47. 18. N.

AZARIAH, or UZZIAH, king of Judah, ſucceeded his father Amaziah, eight hundred and ten years before Chriſt. He aſſembled an army of above three hundred thouſand men, with which he conquered the Philiſtines, and demoliſhed the walls of Gath, Jabnie, and Aſhdod; built up the walls of Jeruſalem; furniſhed the city with conduits; and planted gardens and vineyards: but at laſt, being elated with his proſperity, and reſolving to uſurp the office of high prieſt, he was ſtruck with a leproſy, which obliged him to remain ſhut up in his palace for the reſt of his days. He died about ſeven hundred and fifty-nine years before the Chriſtian æra, and was ſucceeded by Jonathan his ſon.

There are ſeveral other perſons of this name mentioned in the ſacred Scriptures.

AZARIAS, a celebrated Italian rabbin, the author of a Hebrew book, intitled the Light of the Eyes, printed at Mantua, in 1574. He frequently cites the Chriſtian authors, and treats of many hiſtorical and critical facts.

AZEM, or ACHAM, a kingdom in India, beyond the Ganges, having Tibet on the north, Tipra on the ſouth, Oſul on the eaſt, and Jeſuat and Bengal on the weſt. It is a ſmall, but fine country, producing all the neceſſaries of life. They have plenty of proviſions, and yet dog's fleſh is eſteemed a great dainty, as it is in China. They have mines of gold, ſilver, iron, and lead. They have the beſt gum lac, plenty of a coarſe ſort of ſilk, and very good grapes, of which they make nothing but brandy. Their complexion is not very ſwarthy; their ears have very large holes to put rings and pendants in. Both ſexes wear their hair very long, and go naked, hardly covering what decency obliges them to hide. Their head dreſſes are a cap like a can, adorned with boars teeth, and bits of tortoiſeſhell. They likewiſe wear necklaces, and bracelets on their arms, which they bury with them when dead. Kemmeroof is the capital town, and the ſeat of their king, if they now have one of their own, for ſome ſay is is now ſubject to Ava. It is in latitude 25. 33. N.

AZONI, Αζωνοι, in ancient mythology, a name given by the Greeks to ſuch of their gods as were generally acknowledged in all countries, and whoſe worſhip was not confined to particular towns or countries. Theſe the Romans called Dii Communes. Of this ſort were Apollo, Mars, Luna, &c.

AZO (PORTIUS) a celebrated lawyer, of the twelfth century, taught civil law at Bologna and Montpellier, with ſuch reputation, that he was called the maſter of right, and the ſource of law. It is ſaid that he had ten thouſand auditors, and that in the heat of a debate he killed his adverſary, by throwing a candleſtick at his head.

AZORES, iſlands that lie to the weſt of Portugal, in the Atlantic ocean; by ſome called the Weſtern Iſles. They were firſt diſcovered in the middle of the fifteenth century, by the Flemmings; but are now in the poſſeſſion of the Portugueſe. They are ſeven in number, and Angra in Tercera is the capital of them all, being the reſidence of the governor, and an archbiſhop's ſee. The air of theſe iſlands is generally good, and they are well ſtocked with fleſh, fiſh, and fruits; but the vines are but indifferent. The names of the reſt are, St. Michael's, St. Mary's, Graciоſa, St. George's iſland, Pico, and Fayal, all which will be treated of in their proper places. Long. from 25. to 33. W. Lat. 36. to 40. N.

AZORIUS (JOHN) a Jeſuit, born at Louca, in Spain, taught at Alcala, at Rome, and other places. He wrote in Latin a work, intitled Moral Inſtitutions; and other pieces, and died at Rome, in 1603.

AZPILCUETA (MARTIN) ſurnamed of Navarre, from his being born at Veraſoain, in the kingdom of Navarre, was one of the moſt learned civilians in the ſixteenth century, and obtained ſuch reputation at Toulouſe, Salamanca, and Coimbra, that he was conſulted as an oracle. Going to Rome to defend Barthelemi Caranza, biſhop of Toledo, who was accuſed of hereſy, the pope made him penitentiary. Azpilcueta was ſo charitable, that it is ſaid, his mule generally ſtopped of his own accord at the ſight of a poor perſon. He died at Rome, in 1586, aged ninety-two. His works are printed in ſix volumes, folio.

B.

BAAL, or BEL, in Hebrew, Lord, a name given to ſeveral of the Pagan deities. The Babylonians and Chaldeans adored their idol under the name of Bel, and the Phœnicians, with the neighbouring nations, under the name of Baal; for theſe two names differ only in the pronunciation. Some maintain that Baal or Bel is the ſame as Belus. Others ſay that it is Jupiter, and found this ſuppoſition upon the Phœnicians calling Jupiter, or the ſun, Baal-ſamen, the lord of heaven. The learned abbé La Pluche has endeavoured to prove, that this is the ſame as the Egyptian god Oſiris, worſhipped under the figure of the ſun, and that ſome of the eaſtern nations called him Baal, Adonai, or Adonis, all which ſignifies Lord; while others called him Moloch, or Melchom, which ſignifies the King; and others again gave him the name of Achad, or Adad, the Only One.

The prieſts of this god made inciſions in their fleſh with knives.

BAAL, a king of Tyre, who lived five hundred and ninety-two years before the Chriſtian æra.

BAAN (JOHN DE) a celebrated painter, born at Haerlem, in the year 1633. He excelled in portrait painting.

BAART (PETER) a Latin and Flemiſh poet, of whom we have a poem, intitled The Practice of the Huſbandmen of Frieſland, which the Germans compare to the Georgics of Virgil; a poem, intitled The Triton of Frieſland; and other poems which are eſteemed.

BAASHA, king of Iſrael, made war upon Aſa, king of Judah; put all the princes of the houſe of Jeroboam to death, and abandoned himſelf to all manner of impieties. He alſo ſlew the prophet Jehu, who had informed him that the divine vengeance was ready to fall on all his poſterity. He died nine hundred and thirty years before the Chriſtian æra, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Elah, who was ſoon after murdered, and the whole family of Baaſha deſtroyed.

BAB EL-MANDEL, the Gate of Mourning. A famous ſtreight of the Indian Ocean, between the coaſt of Arabia Fœlix and that of Adel and Zeila, at the entrance into the Red Sea. Some call it the Streights of Moka. It is narrow, and difficult to ſail through, on account of the ſand banks, and a ſmall iſland at the mouth of it, called alſo Bab-el-Mandel, which is little more than a barren rock. Long. 44. 30. E. Lat. 12. 40. N.

BABELOT, almoner to the duke of Mompenſier, during the civil wars of France, under Charles IX. He was originally a Franciſcan friar; but from his implacable hatred to the Calviniſts, quitted the monaſtery to follow the army, where he importuned Mompenſier to put to death all who by the fortune of arms fell into his power. But the Proteſtants, with the prince of Condé at their head, having taken Champigni, in which Babelot had ſhut himſelf up, they pardoned the inhabitants, and diſcharged all their reſentment on Babelot, whom they hanged on a gallows of extraordinary height.

BABIN (FRANCIS) canon, grand vicar, and doctor of Angiers, in France, the place of his birth. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by publiſhing a Collection of the Conferences in the Dioceſe of Angers, in eighteen volumes, duodecimo.

BABINGTON (GERVASE) biſhop of Worceſter, was born in Nottinghamſhire, in the year 1551, and was a pattern of piety to the people, of learning to the clergy, and of wiſdom to all governors. He was educated at Trinity college, Cambridge. In 1578 he was incorporated maſter of arts, at Oxford, afterwards made doctor of divinity, and appointed domeſtic chaplain to Henry, earl of Pembroke; by whoſe intereſt he became treaſurer of the church of Landaff, a prebendary of Hereford, and, in 1591, biſhop of Landaff, from whence he was ſucceſſively removed to the ſees of Exeter and Worceſter. He was a great benefactor to the library of his cathedral at Worceſter. His works, which conſiſt of Notes on the Pentateuch, Expoſitions of the Creed and Ten Commandments, and ſeveral Sermons, have been printed both in quarto and folio. He died May 17, 1610, and left his books to the library of Worceſter cathedral.

BABYLAS, one of the moſt celebrated martyrs of the primitive church, was made biſhop of Antioch in the third century, under the emperor Gordian. He governed his church like a good and holy prelate, and after he had worthily diſcharged his function for about thirteen years, obtained the crown of martyrdom, about the year 251, during the perſecution of Decius.

BABYLON, once a celebrated city of Chaldea, or Meſopotamia, ſeated on the river Euphrates, long ſince ſo entirely deſtroyed, that the ſpot whereon it ſtood is not certainly known. Some have miſtaken the ruins of ſome Arabian buildings, between the Euphrates and Tigris, for thoſe of Babylon and the tower of Babel; but as the Euphrates divided this city into two equal parts, the remains of Babylon muſt be ſought for on the banks of that river. In the book of Geneſis it is ſaid, that the beginning of the kingdom of Nimrod was Babel, which, in the Septuagint tranſlation, is called Babylon, wherefore Babel and Babylon have been thought to have been the ſame place. But all the ancient profane writers, with one conſent, attribute the building of this city to Semiramis.

Babylon is imagined to have been the ſeat of Paradiſe, and is ſuppoſed to have ſtood in latitude 32. deg. N. Long. 44. E. or thereabouts.

Semiramis, ſays Diodorus Siculus, procured architects and workmen, to come from all parts of the kingdom, to the number of two millions. She cauſed Babylon to be built on each ſide of the Euphrates, and ſurrounded it with a wall of three hundred and ſixty ſtadia in circumference, which was fortified by two hundred and fifty large ſtrong towers. It was ſo thick, that two chariots might paſs on it together in front. It was made of brick, united with bitumen inſtead of mortar, and was fifty cubits high. However, this wall was not continued quite round, on account of ſome marſhy places, which would not admit of laying a foundation. Beſides, ſhe built a bridge over the Euphrates, which was five ſtadia in length, and thirty feet in breadth. The ſtones were all faſtened together with iron cramps, and the joints filled with melted lead. The quays on each ſide of the bridge were a hundred and ſixty ſtadia in length. She built two palaces, one at each end of the bridge, from whence ſhe had a view of the whole city. That at the weſt end was ſixty ſtadia in circumference, and was ſurrounded with high walls, on which were imprinted, while the bricks were ſoft, animals of all kinds, which were afterwards coloured after the life. But theſe were on an inner wall, whoſe circumference was perfectly round. There was likewiſe a third wall, adorned with figures, in relievo, in the ſame manner. Beſides this, ſhe turned the river to build a large ſtrong vault, at the bottom of its bed, through which ſhe could paſs from one palace to the other, when the river had reaſſumed its courſe. This vault was cloſed at each end with gates, which were ſubſiſting in the time of the Perſian monarchs.

In the middle of the city was the temple of Jupiter, called Belus by the Babylonians, which was of a prodigious height, and conſtructed with bricks and bitumen. From the top of this the Chaldeans made their diſcoveries in aſtronomy. The ſtatues of Jupiter, Juno, and Rhea, were of maſſy gold. That of Jupiter was forty feet high; it weighed one thouſand Babylonian talents, and that of Rhea, who was ſitting in a golden chariot, was of the ſame weight. Beſides theſe, there were many figures in maſſy ſilver, which were all taken away and deſtroyed by the Perſians.

In the citadel there were hanging gardens, ſaid to be built by a Syrian king. They were ſupported by pillars and arches, and the ſoil on the top was deep enough for the roots of large trees, of which it contained a great variety.

BACA, or BAZA, a city of Spain, in the kingdom of Granada, eighteen miles from Guadix, ſeated in a valley, called Hoya de Baza. It is encompaſſed with old walls, and has an old caſtle, half ruined. It may contain about four thouſand houſes, but has nothing remarkable, except the church, dedicated to the Virgin Mary. The land about it is well cultivated for half a league round, and is watered by the little river Guadalantin. It is fertile in wheat, wine, honey, hemp, and flax. Long. 3. 6. W. Lat. 37. 18. N.

BACAIM, or BAZAIM, a handſome ſea-port town of Aſia, in the kingdom of Viſapour, on the coaſt of Malabar, in the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, ſubject to the Portugueſe. It is fifty miles ſouth of Daman, twenty north of Bombay, and two hundred north of Goa. Long. 73. 10. E. Lat. 19. 0. N.

BACAR, a rich and fertile province, in the dominions of the great mogul, bounded on the north by Jamba, on the weſt by Agra, on the eaſt by the Ganges, and on the ſouth by Sandbal. Its chief town is Becaner, which ſtands on the Ganges.

BACASSERAY, a city in the peninſula of the Crimea, in Little Tartary, and the ſeat of the Khan of the Crim Tartars. It contains upwards of two thouſand inhabitants, and is adorned with pleaſant gardens, orchards, and baths. Long. 35. 10. E. Lat. 45. 30. N.

BACCARACH, a town of Germany, in the Lower Palatinate, formerly imperial and free; but it afterwards ſubmitted to the elector Palatine. It is famous for excellent wine, and is ſeated on the Rhine, eighteen miles weſt of Mentz. Long. 7. 5. E. Lat. 49. 57. N.

BACCARELLES (GILES) a famous painter at Antwerp, who excelled in landſcapes.

William Baccarelles, his brother, and ſeveral others of the ſame family, were alſo celebrated painters.

BACCHÆ, in antiquity, the prieſteſſes of Bacchus, who were alſo called Thyades, which ſignifies Furious, and Mænades, from their frantic behaviour at the feſtivals of this god, whoſe orgies they celebrated, covered with the ſkins of panthers and tygers, running all night, ſome with their hair looſe, and torches in their hands; others crowned with vine and ivy leaves, carrying a thyrſus or rod, incircled with ivy; making hideous lamentations, and attended by drummers and players on cymbals.

BACCHANALIA, in antiquity, feſtivals celebrated by the Greeks and Romans, in honour of Bacchus. The two moſt famous of which, were the Lenæus, from ληνὸς, which ſignifies a wine-preſs; this was a preparation for the other, and was held in the open fields, about autumn; the other feaſt was called Dionyſia, from one of the names of Bacchus; both theſe feaſts were accompanied with games, ſhews, and theatrical repreſentations, and at theſe times, particularly at the Lenæus, poets contended for the prize of poetry. Of thoſe who celebrated theſe feſtivals, ſome repreſented old Silenus riding on an aſs, others Pan, and others the ſatyrs, and in this manner publicly appeared night and day, counterfeiting drunkenneſs, dancing with the moſt laſcivious poſtures, and committing all kinds of licentiouſneſs and debauchery, running over the foreſts and mountains, with dreadful ſhrieks and howlings, crying Evoe Bacche or Io Bacche. Theſe rites were attended at Rome with ſuch abominable exceſſes and wickedneſs, that the ſenate was obliged to aboliſh them by a public decree.

BACCHINI (BENEDICT) a Benedictine monk, and one of the moſt learned men in his time, was born at Borgo San Domino, on the 31ſt of Auguſt, 1651, and wrote a great number of books, in Latin and Italian, the moſt conſiderable of which, is a Literary Journal, and a work, intitled, De Siſtrorum Figuris ac Differentia, &c. He died at Bologna, on the firſt of September, 1721, aged ſeventy.

BACCHUS, in Pagan mythology, the god of wine. He was the ſon of Jupiter and Semele. To prevent his being deſtroyed by fire, Jupiter took him, half formed, out of his mother's womb, and incloſing him in his thigh, kept him there till the full time of his birth. Some ſay, that the nymphs took care of his education; others ſay, that he was educated by the Hours; and others, by the Naiades. After this, Mercury carried him to Macris, the daughter of Ariſteus, who anointed his lips with honey; but Juno incenſed at his finding protection in Eubœa, a place ſacred to her, baniſhed him thence; when Macris fled with him into the country of the Phœnicians, and nouriſhed him in a cave. Others ſay, that Cadmus, Semele's father, diſcovering her crime, put her and the child into a wooden ark, which was carried by the tide to Oreata, a town of Laconia, where Semele being found dead, was buried with great pomp, and the infant nurſed by Ino, in a cave. During this perſecution, Bacchus being tired, fell aſleep, when an amphiſbena, or two headed ſerpent, bit his leg, but awaking, he killed it by ſtriking it with a vine twig. In his infancy, ſome Tyrrhenian pirates found him aſleep on the ſhore, and would have carried him away, when on a ſudden their maſts were encompaſſed with vines, and their oars with ivy; and the mariners themſelves, being ſeized with a ſudden diſtraction, leapt into the ſea, and were changed into dolphins. Bacchus, during the wars of the giants, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour in the form of a lion, at which time Jupiter, to encourage him, cried Euhoe, or Bravely done. Others ſay, that in this rebellion, the Titans cut the god to pieces; but that Pallas, taking his heart, while it was yet panting, carried it to Jupiter, who collected the limbs, and reanimated the body, after his ſoul had ſlept three nights with Proſerpine. In ſhort, Bacchus is ſaid to have gained great victories in the Indies, and to have taught men the art of planting the vine. As to the other adventures of this deity, ſee the articles ALCITHOE, PENTHEUS, &c.

Bacchus was repreſented by the ancients as a youth, naked, or only covered with a tyger's ſkin, with a ruddy face, wanton look, and effeminate air; he was crowned with ivy and vine-leaves, and bore in his hand a thyrſus, or javelin, incircled with the ſame leaves. He was painted ſitting in a a triumphal chariot, drawn ſometimes by lions, at others by leopards or tygers, accompanied by a troop of ſatyrs and wood-nymphs in frantic poſtures, and the proceſſion cloſed with old Silenus riding on an aſs.

The victims ſacrificed to Bacchus were the goat and ſwine, on account of thoſe animals being deſtructive to the vines, and the pye, from its chattering. The trees and plants uſed in his garlands were the vine, the fir, the ivy, and the oak, the herb rape-weed, and the flower narciſſus or daffodil.

Diodorus and Plutarch inform us, that Bacchus received his his origin from the Egyptians; and the abbé La Pluche obſerves, that thoſe people repreſented the antient ſtate of mankind, and the weakneſs and imperfection of agriculture, by an horus, or image of a child, with a ſerpent by its ſide, which was called by the name of Ben Semele, or the Child of the Repreſentation, which the Greeks, who had no idea of the true meaning of the figure, called the Son of Semele, and to heighten its honour, made Jupiter his father, or, according to the eaſtern ſtyle, produced him out of his thigh. In fine, if we read Horace's inimitable Ode to Bacchus with the leaſt attention, we cannot avoid perceiving, that, according to the ſentiments of that great poet, Bacchus meant no more than the improvement of the world by agriculture and planting the vine.

BACCHYLIDES, a famous Greek poet, a native of Julis in the iſle of Cea, and the laſt of the nine celebrated lyric poets of ancient Greece, lived about four hundred and fifty years before the Chriſtian æra. Hiero, king of Syracuſe, and the emperor Julian, had a particular eſteem for the writings of this poet, on account of the excellence of his maxims, and in particular of the following: "That chaſtity is the great-"eſt ornament of a virtuous life." Bacchylides compoſed hymns, odes, and epigrams, of which there are only a few fragments now remaining.

BACCIO, more known under the name of Brother Barthelemi de St. Marc, or Savigniano the Dominican Monk, was a monk of the order of St. Dominic, and one of the moſt celebrated painters of his time, and particularly excelled in colouring. He died on the eighth of October, 1517, aged forty-eight.

BACCIO, or BACCIUS, (ANDREW) a celebrated phyſician of the ſixteenth century, born at St. Elpidio, He practiſed phyſic at Rome with great reputation, and was firſt phyſician to pope Sixtus V. The moſt ſcarce and valuable of his works are, 1. De Thermis. 2. De naturali Vinorum Hiſtoria. 3. De Venenis & Antidotis. 4. De Gemmis ac Lapidibus pretioſis.

BACCIO See BALDINI.

BACHAUMONT. See CHAPELLE.

BACHIAM, a ſmall iſland in the Eaſt Indies, and one of the Moluccos, where the Dutch have a fort. It is ſeated a little to the ſouth of the line, produces cloves, and is ſaid to be very fruitful. Long. 125. 5. E.

BACHMUT, a fortified town of Ruſſia in Europe, in the diſtrict of Warnoneſh. It is ſeated on a river of the ſame name, in a plain on its eaſtern bank, and is defended by a citadel.

BACHOVIUS (REINER) an able civilian, born at Cologne, in 1544. He enjoyed ſeveral conſiderable poſts at Leipſic; but being perſecuted for being a Calviniſt, was at laſt obliged to leave that city, when he found a kind protector in the elector Palatine, and executed ſeveral offices of profit and honour at Heidelberg, till his death, which happened on the 27th of February, 1614. He publiſhed a Commentary upon the Cathechiſm of the Palatinate.

BACHU, or BAKU, a city of the province of Shirvan, in Perſia, and the beſt haven in the Caſpian Sea. It is defended by a double wall, as alſo a ditch and redoubts, made by the Ruſſians, when they were maſters of the city. It had a ſumptuous caſtle; but it is reduced to a ruinous ſtate by the Ruſſians. There are ſtill the remains of many ſtately buildings; and one moſque in particular, which is very large, and has a ſtone cupola. Formerly many merchants reſided here, eſpecially Indians and Armenians, and uſed to export a great many bales of raw ſilk; but now that commerce is over. All the country is impregnated with ſalt and ſulphur, which render the water very unpleaſant, tho' wholeſome. The neighbourhood of this city ſupplies the contiguous countries with rock ſalt, brimſtone, and naptha; it it is the only place thereabouts which produces saffron. The country abounds with hares, deer, and antelopes. Round Bachu are several lofty and craggy mountains, on which there are very strong watch-towers. Long. 49. 5. E. Lat. 40. 0. N.

BACHUISEN, an excellent painter, born at Embden, in 1631. His designs and pictures are highly esteemed, particularly his sea-pieces, in which he excelled; for one of these the burgomasters of Amsterdam, in 1665, paid him one thousand three hundred florins, and made a present of it to Lewis XIV. He died in 1709, aged seventy-eight.

BACKER (James) an excellent painter, born at Harlingen, in Friesland, chiefly succeeded in drawing portraits.

BACON (Roger) an English Franciscan friar, and a justly celebrated astronomer, chemist, and mathematician, was distinguished by the title of Doctor Mirabilis, on account of the penetration of his genius, and the extent of his learning. He was born at Ilchester, in Somersetshire, in the year 1214, and studied at Oxford, and afterwards in the university of Paris. In order to open the way to his improvement in the sciences, he endeavoured to make himself master of the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and Arabic languages; he then turned his thoughts to the mathematics, and was at great expence in procuring copies of the works of the ancients from different parts of the world; but at last laid them aside to penetrate into the recesses of nature by experiments, and by this means made many noble discoveries in astronomy, perspective, chemistry, physic, and the mechanical arts. He took notice of an error in the calendar, with regard to the quantity of the solar year, and, in 1267, proposed a plan for correcting it; he discovered and described the camera obscura, and all sorts of glasses that magnify or diminish objects, by bringing them nearer to the eye or removing them to a greater distance; the telescope also was known to him before it was discovered by Gallileo; and he himself made use of a telescope of his own invention in his astronomical observations. The honour of introducing chemistry into Europe was chiefly owing to him; and it is evident from his writings that he was acquainted with the composition and effects of gunpowder, tho' that discovery is supposed to have been of a much later date; for he tells us, "that thunder and "lightning may be produced by art; for sulphur, nitre, and "charcoal, which, when separate, have no sensible effect, "yet when mixed together in a due proportion, and closely "confined and fired, they yield a loud report." The improvements made by this great man were so far from being rewarded, that they exposed him to the most dreadful persecutions; he was suspected of magic, and, on that account, was many years confined in prison, where he was treated with great severity; and the childish tradition still subsists. that he formed a brazen head, which answered all the questions he proposed to it: however, by the interest of several noble persons, he was at last set at liberty, and returned to England. He died at Oxford, on the 11th of June, 1294, at eighty years of age, and was buried in the church of the Franciscans. He wrote a prodigious number of books, among which his Opus Majus, or Great Work, is still extant, an elegant edition of it being printed at London, in folio, in the year 1733. This work is, in some measure, a complete system of science, built upon free enquiry and useful experiments. It may not be improper to add, that the foibles of this great man were a fondness for judicial astrology, and his maintaining the possibility of transmuting the baser metals into gold.

Bacon (Robert) a learned English divine, and celebrated professor at the university of Oxford, distinguished himself by his preaching and writings: he composed a Glossary on the holy Scriptures, and several other works; and died in 1248.

Bacon (Sir Nicholas) lord keeper of the great seal in the reign of queen Elizabeth, was born at Chiselhurst, in Kent, in 1510, and educated at the university of Cambridge, after which he travelled into France, and on his return settled at Gray's Inn, where he soon distinguished himself by his proficiency in the study of the law. He was knighted on queen Elizabeth's coming to the throne; and on the 22d of December, 1558, the great seal of England, being taken from Nicholas Heath, archbishop of York, was delivered to him, with the title of lord keeper, and he was also made one of the queen's privy council. He had a considerable share in the settling of religion: as a statesman, he was remarkable for a clear head and deep counsels; but his great parts and high preferment were far from raising him in his own opinion, as appears from the modest answer he gave queen Elizabeth, when she told him his house at Redgrave was too little for him; "Not so, madam, returned he, "but your majesty has made me too great for my house." Towards the latter end of his life he grew very corpulent, which made queen Elizabeth say merrily, that "Sir Ni-"cholas's soul lodged well." To himself, however, this bulk was very cumbersome; for, after walking from Westminster-hall to the star-chamber, which was but a very little way, he was usually so much out of breath, that the lawyers forbore speaking at the bar till he recovered himself, and gave them notice of it by knocking with his staff. At length, after having held the great seal more than twenty years, this able statesman and faithful counsellor was suddenly removed from this life, as Mr. Mallet informs us, by the following accident: he was under the hands of the barber, and thinking the weather warm, had ordered a window before him to be thrown open, but fell asleep as the current of fresh air was blowing in upon him, and awaked some time after distempered all over: "Why, said he to the servant, did you suffer me to sleep thus exposed?" the fellow replied, that he durst not presume to disturb him: "Then, said the "lord keeper, by your civility I lose my life;" and so removed into his bed-chamber, where he died a few days after, on the 20th of February, 1578-9, equally lamented by the queen and her subjects.

Mr. Granger observes, that he was the first lord keeper that ranked as lord chancellor; and that he had much of that penetrating genius, solidity, and judgment, persuasive eloquence, and comprehensive knowledge of law and equity, which afterwards shone forth with so great a lustre in his son, who was as much inferior to his father in point of prudence and integrity, as his father was to him in literary accomplishments.

He was buried in St. Paul's church, on the 9th of March following, under a sumptuous monument erected by himself, on which was afterwards placed the following remarkable inscription.

Hic Nicolaum nè Baconum conditum,
Existima illum, tam diu Britannici
Regni secundum columen, exitium malis,
Bonis asylum; cæca quem non extulit
Ad hunc honorem sors, sed æquitas, fides,
Doctrina, pietas, unica et prudentia,
Neu morte raptum crede, quia unica brevi
Vita perennes emeruit duas: agit
Vitam secundam cœlites inter animus,
Fama implet orbem, vita quæ illi tertia est.
Hac positum in ara est corpus olim animi domus.
Ara dicata sempiternæ memoriæ.

Bacon (Anne) a lady distinguished by her piety, virtue, and learning, was the second daughter of sir Anthony Cooke, and was born about the year 1528. She had a very liberal education; she became eminent for her skill in the Greek, Latin, and Italian languages, and was appointed governess to king Edward VI. She was married to the above sir Nicholas Bacon, by whom she had two sons, Anthony and Francis, whose distinguished abilities were greatly improved by the tender care of so accomplished a mother. She translated, from the Italian into English, twenty-five sermons wrote by Bernardine Ochine, on predestination and election, and afterwards translated from the Latin, bishop Jewel's Apology for the Church of England. She survived her husband sir Nicholas, and is supposed to have died about the beginning of the reign of king James I. at Gorhambury, near St. Alban's.

Bacon (Francis) viscount St. Alban's, and high chancellor of England in the reign of king James I. the glory and ornament of his age and nation, was the son of the former, and was born at York-house, in the Strand, on the 22d of January, 1561. In his tender years his abilities were so remarkably conspicuous, that queen Elizabeth, whose peculiar felicity it was to make a right judgment of merit, was so charmed with his solidity and the gravity of his behaviour, that she would often call him her young lord keeper. He was educated at Trinity-college, Cambridge, and made such incredible progress in his studies, that before he was sixteen he had not only run through the whole circle of the liberal arts as they were then taught, but began to perceive those imperfections in the reigning philosophy, which he afterwards so effectually exposed, and thereby not only overturned that tyranny which prevented the progress of true knowledge, but laid the foundation of that free and useful philosophy, which has since opened a way to so many great and glorious discoveries. On his leaving the university, his father sent him to France, where, before he was nineteen years of age, he wrote a general view of the state of Europe; but sir Nicholas dying, he was obliged suddenly to return to England, when he applied himself to the study of the common law, at Gray's-inn, and, in 1588, was made one of the queen's counsel; but notwithstanding her majesty's early prepossession in his favour, he met with many obstacles to his preferment during her reign; for his enemies represented him as a man, who, by applying too much of his time in pursuit of other branches of knowledge, could not but neglect that of his profession; but his Maxims of Law and History of the Alienation Office, both of which works were written written in this reign, though they were not publiſhed till after his deceaſe, ſufficiently ſhew the injuſtice of theſe repreſentations; he alſo diſtinguiſhed himſelf, during the latter part of the queen's reign, in the houſe of commons, where he ſpoke often, and yet with ſuch wiſdom and eloquence, that his ſentiments were generally approved by that auguſt aſſembly. But notwithſtanding the little regard paid by the court to his merit, he ſerved the queen, as long as ſhe lived, with zeal and fidelity, and after her deceaſe compoſed a memorial on the happineſs of her reign, which did equal honour to her adminiſtrasion and the capacity of its author. Upon the acceſſion of king James, he was ſoon raiſed to conſiderable honours; for on the 23d of July, 1603, he was introduced to the king at Whitehall, and received the honour of knighthood. In 1611, he was conſtituted judge of the marſhal's court; in 1613, he was made attorney-general; in 1617, he was choſen lord keeper; and, in 1618, lord high chancellor of England; the ſame year he was was created baron of Verulam in the county of Hertford; and in January, 1621, was advanced to the dignity of viſ- St. Alban's; but he was ſoon after ſurpriſed by a dreadful reverſe of fortune; for that very year complaints being made to the houſe of commons of his lordſhip's having received ſeveral bribes, thoſe complaints were ſent up to the houſe of lords, and new ones being daily made of a like nature, things ſoon grew too high to be got over. The king was extremely affected, and even ſhed tears at the firſt news of this affair; and the lord chancellor had all the friendſhip and protection afforded him that was either in the power of the marquis of Buckingham, or even in the king his maſter, who actually in hopes of ſoftening things a little, procured a receſs of parliament; but this method having a quite contrary effect, his lordſhip, inſtead of entering into a long and formal defence, threw himſelf upon the mercy of the houſe, by an humble ſubmiſſion, which he drew up in writing, and prevailed upon the prince of Wales, afterwards king Charles I. to preſent to the houſe; and this confeſſion and ſubmiſſion he afterwards explained and confirmed, on which he was ſentenced to pay forty thouſand pounds, to be impriſoned in the Tower during the king's pleaſure, to be for ever incapable of any office or employment in the ſtate, and never to ſit in parliament, or come within the verge of the court. However, after a ſhort confinement in the Tower, he was diſcharged, and afterwards received a full pardon from the king; yet the fault which thus tarniſhed the glory of this great man, is ſaid to have principally proceeded from his indulgence to his ſervants, who made a corrupt uſe of it: however his failings hurt only his cotempararies, and were expiated by his ſufferings; but his other virtues, his knowledge, and, above all, his zeal for mankind, will be felt while there are men, and while they have gratitude; the name of ſir Francis Bacon, or lord Verulam, can never be mentioned but with admiration!

The honourable Mr. Walpole, ſpeaking of this great man, calls him the Prophet of Arts, which Newton was afterwards to reveal; and adds, that his genius and his works will be univerſally admired as long as ſcience exiſts.—"As "long as ingratitude and adulation are deſpicable, ſo long "ſhall we lament the depravity of this great man's heart.—"Alas! that he who could command immortal fame, "ſhould have ſtooped to the little ambition of power!"

His works, which are the glory of our nation, are collected together, and printed in four volumes folio; of theſe his Novum Organum is eſteemed the capital. In ſhort, the lord Verulam died at the earl of Arundel's houſe, at Highgate, on the 9th of April, 1626, and was privately buried in the chapel of St. Mary's church, within the precincts of Old Verulam, in the chancel of which church ſir Thomas Meautys, once his ſecretary, and afterwards clerk of the council, cauſed a neat monument of white marble to be erected, with his lordſhip's effigies ſitting in a contemplative poſture, under which is the following inſcription:

FRANCISCUS BACON,
Baro de Verulam, Sancti Albani vicecomes,
Seu notioribus titulis,
Scientiarum Lumen, Facundiæ Lex,
Sic ſedebat.
Qui poſtquam omnia naturalis ſapientiæ,
Et civilis arcana evolviſſet,
Naturæ decretum explevit,

In Engliſh thus:

FRANCIS BACON,
Baron of Verulam, Viſcount St. Alban's,
Or by more conſpicuous titles,
Of Sciences the Light, of Eloquence the Law,
Sat thus.
Who after all natural wiſdom
And ſecrets of civil life he had unfolded,
Nature's law fulfilled,
Let compounds be diſſolved;
In the year of our Lord, M.DC.XXVI.
Of his age, LXVI.
Of ſuch a man
That the memory might remain,
THOMAS MEAUTYS,
Living, his attendant,
Dead, his admirer,
Placed this monument.

BACON (ANTHONY) elder brother to the former, and eldeſt ſon of the lord keeper Bacon, was educated at home, and then ſent abroad for improvement. At his return, he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his extraordinary abilities; but though he was deeply ſkilled in politics, and the beſt verſed in foreign affairs of any man in his time, yet he was reſerved in converſation, and remained contented with the reputation he acquired among the circle of his private acquaintance, and the intereſt he had with ſome perſons of the firſt quality, who valued and made uſe of his abilities. He had the misfortune to be ſo very lame, that he was unable to move about his room, on which account the earl of Eſſex, who relied much upon his advice, and conſulted him in affairs that required the greateſt ſecrecy, took him into his houſe, and made him a handſome allowance for his ſervices. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his endeavours to ſerve that unfortunate nobleman, when he moſt needed his aſſiſtance, and by a ſincere friendſhip to his brother, the lord Verulam, to whom he left his eſtate.

BACON (ſir NATHANIEL) knight of the bath, and an excellent painter, was a younger ſon of the lord keeper, and half-brother to the great ſir Francis. He travelled into Italy, and ſtudied painting there; but his manner and colouring approaches nearer to the ſtyle of the Flemiſh ſchool. Mr. Walpole obſerves, that at Culford, where he lived, are preſerved ſome of his works, and at Gorhambury, his father's ſeat, is a large picture by him in oil, of a cook-maid with dead fowl, admirably painted, with great nature, neatneſs, and luſtre of colouring. In the ſame houſe is a whole length of him, by himſelf, drawing on a paper; his ſword and pallet hung up, and a half-length of his mother by him.

BACONTHORP, BACONDORP, or BACON, (JOHN) ſurnamed the Reſolute Doctor, was one of the moſt learned men of his time. He was born at Baconthorp, a village in Norfolk, about the latter end of the ſeventeenth century, and became doctor of the Sorbonne, at Paris, and provincial of the Carmelites. He wrote many books, the moſt remarkable of which are Commentaries on all the Books of the Bible, and on St. Auſtin De Civitate Dei; and alſo Commentaries on the four books of Sentences. He died about the year 1346.

BACTRIA, a country formerly ſo called, which is now part of Uſbeck Tartary, and the Perſian province of Chorazan.

BACURIUS, or BATHURIUS, king of the Iberians. It is ſaid, that being ſurpriſed in hunting by a dreadful ſtorm, and a horrible darkneſs, which ſeparated him from all his followers, he had recourſe to the God of the Chriſtians, and promiſed to adore him alone, if he would deliver him from that danger; when immediately the ſtorm ceaſed, and the light returned. It is added, that Bacurius kept his promiſe, and about the year 327, was, in a manner, the apoſtle of his dominions.

BADAJOZ, a city of Spain, the capital of Eſtramadura, with a biſhop's ſee, is ſeated upon an eminence, on the ſouth bank of the river Guadiana. The houſes are well built, and the ſtreets are pretty large. The cathedral church is at the end of the great ſquare, which ſerves for a place of arms, where likewiſe the governor's palace is ſeated. This city is adorned with ſeveral handſome buildings, churches, convents, and a Jeſuits college. It is divided into two parts. It has a caſtle built and fortified after the modern manner, which covers it on the ſide of Portugal and Andaluſia. On the other ſide of the river it is defended by another caſtle, built on an eminence by the water ſide, near the corner where the river Chevera falls into the Guadiana, and ſerves particularly to defend the entrance of the bridge, which leads to the city. This bridge makes a fine appearance, for it is built with free ſtone, and conſiſts of thirty arches; it is ſeven hnndred paces long, fourteen broad, and perfectly ſtrait. Badajoz is ſurrounded with fine gardens, fertile fields, vineyards, fig-trees, citron, orange, and olive-trees. The paſture land, beſides cattle, feeds a great number of ſheep, which yield exceeding fine wool. It is twelve miles ſouth-eaſt of Elvas, one hundred north-by-weſt of Seville, and one hundred and ſeventy-five ſouth-by-weſt of Madrid. Long. 7. 3. W. Lat. 38. 35. N.

BADÆLONA, a town of Spain, in the province of Catalonia, on the ſhore of the Mediterranean, ten miles eaſt of Barcelona. This is the place where the lord Peterborough landed in 1704, when with Charles, then king of Spain, he laid ſiege to Barcelona. Long. 2. 20. E. Lat. 41. 12. N.

BADASHKAN. See BOKIARIA.

BADEN (the County of) in Swiſſerland, has three cities, Baden, Keiſers-Stoul, and Klingnaw, beſides a town that paſſes for a city, namely, Zurzach. It is one of the fineſt countries in Swiſſerland, and is watered with three navigable rivers, the Limmet, Ruſs, and Are. The land is fruitful in corn and fruit, and there are places on the ſide of the Limmet which produce wine. It maintains a communication between the cantons of Zurick and Bern, being ſeated between their north extremities. It extends on the one ſide to the Are, as far as the place where it falls into the Rhine, and on the other ſide beyond the Rhine, where there are ſome villages which depend thereon.

BADEN, the capital of the above county, is an agreeable city, moderately large, ſeated on the ſide of the Limmet, in a plain between two high hills, the one on this ſide the river, the other beyond it. This city owes its riſe to its baths, which were famous before the Chriſtian æra. Several monuments of antiquity have been found here from time to time, particularly in 1420, when they were opening the large ſpring of the baths, they found ſtatues of the Heathen Gods, made of alabaſter; Roman coins, made of bronze, of Auguſtus, Veſpaſian, Decius, &c. and ſeveral medals of the Roman emperors, of gold, ſilver, copper, and bronze. There are two churches in Baden, one in the plain, which is collegiate, and makes a good appearance; the other is a monaſtery of the Capuchins, near the town-houſe. This laſt building ſerves not only for the aſſemblies of their own council, but alſo for thoſe of the cantons. The diet aſſembles there in a handſome room made for that purpoſe; the deputies of Zurick ſit at the bottom behind a table, as the moſt honourable place; the ambaſſadors of foreign powers are ſeated on one ſide to the right, and the deputies of the other cantons are ranged on each ſide the room.

The bailiff of Baden reſides in a caſtle, on the other ſide of the river, at the end of a handſome wooden bridge, which is covered in. Before this caſtle there is a ſtone pillar, erected in honour of the emperor Trajan, who paved a road in this country eighty-five Italian miles in length. The inhabitants are rigid Roman Catholics, and formerly behaved in a moſt inſolent manner to the Proteſtants, but they are now obliged by their maſters to be more ſubmiſſive.

The baths which are on each ſide the river are a quarter of a league from the city. Joining to the ſmall baths there is a village, and to the large a town, which may paſs for a ſecond Baden. It is ſeated on a hill, whoſe aſcent is ſteep. There the baths are brought into inns and private houſes, by means of pipes, which are about ſixty in all. There are alſo public baths in the middle of the town, from a ſpring which riſes in the ſtreet, where the poor bathe gratis; but they are expoſed quite naked to all that paſs by. All the baths are hot, and one to ſo great a degree as to ſcald the hand; and they are impregnated with a great deal of ſulphur, with ſome allum and nitre. They are uſeful for drinking as well as bathing, and are ſaid to cure all diſeaſes from a cold cauſe, head-achs, vertigoes, &c. They ſtrengthen the ſenſes, cure diſeaſes of the breaſt and bowels, aſthmas, and obſtructions. They are peculiarly excellent for womens diſeaſes. Long. 8. 25. E. Lat. 47. 27. N.

BADEN (the Margravate of) in the circle of Swabia, in Germany, is bounded by the palatinate of the Rhine on the north, by the Black Foreſt on the eaſt, by Swiſſerland on the ſouth, and by the Rhine, which divides it from Alſace on the eaſt, and is about ninety miles in length, from north to ſouth, but not above twenty in breadth, where it is wideſt. It is a very populous and fruitful country, abounding in corn and wine. Veniſon and wild fowl are ſo plentiful, that they are the common diet of the peaſants. The rivers that water this territory are the Rhine, Ens, Wirmbs, and Phints, which yield plenty of fiſh. They feed their hogs with cheſnuts, which make the bacon excellent. They have free-ſtone for building, and marble of all colours. They have ſome agate, and great quantities of hemp and flax for exportation. The chief towns are Baden, Durlach, Stolhafen, Raſtadt, Gerſbach, Pforſheim, and Hochberg.

BADEN, the chief city of the above margravate, has a caſtle that ſtands on the top of a hill, which is the reſidence of a prince. The town is ſeated among hills, on rocky uneven ground, which renders the ſtreets inconvenient and crooked. It is famous for its baths, the ſprings of which are ſaid to be above three hundred. Some of them are hot, and accounted to be very good in nervous caſes. They partake of ſalt, allum, and ſulphur. It is but a ſmall diſtance from the Rhine, three miles ſouth-eaſt of Raſtadt, twenty north-eaſt of Straſburgh, thirty ſouth of Spire, and forty north-weſt of Tubingen. Long. 9. 24. E. Lat 48. 50. N.

BADEN, a town of Germany, in the arch-duchy of Auſtria, ſeated on the Little Suechat, is a neat little walled town, ſtanding in a plain not far from a ridge of hills, which run out from the mountain Cetius. It is much frequented by the people of Vienna, and the neighbouring parts, on account of its baths. The ſprings ſupply two convenient baths within the town, five without the walls, and one beyond the river. They are good for diſtempers of the head, the gout, dropſy, and moſt chronic diſtempers. It is obſervable that all theſe Badens take their name from the baths. It is ſixteen miles ſouth-weſt of Vienna. Long. 17. 10. E. Lat. 48. 0. N.

BADENNOCH, a ſhire in Scotland, having Inverneſs on the north, Murray on the eaſt, Athol on the ſouth, and Lochaber on the weſt. It is divided in two by the river Spey, and has no conſiderable town. It is a cold mountainous country, and has little to boaſt of with regard to its fruitfulneſs or natural productions.

BADEW (RICHARD DE) the original founder of Clare-Hall, in Cambridge, was deſcended from an honourable family, ſeated at Great Badew, or Badow, near Chelmsford, in Eſſex, where he was probably born, and was chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge in 1326.

BADIUS (JODOCUS, or JOSSE) ſurnamed ASCENSIUS, from his being born in the borough of Aſſche, near Bruſſels, in the year 1462, raiſed himſelf a conſiderable character by the number of books which he printed and commented upon. He ſet up a printing-houſe at Paris, and publiſhed a conſiderable number of claſſic authors, with his own explications and notes, and took the ſame pains with ſeveral modern authors, as Petrarch, Politian, Laurentius Valla, &c. and alſo publiſhed ſeveral books of his own compoſition, both in verſe and proſe.

BADIUS (CONRADE) the ſon of the former, was born at Paris, and ſettled at Geneva. He became a hearty Proteſtant, which he gave a proof of in his Alcoran of the Franciſcan Monks. He tranſlated the firſt book, and compiled the ſecond, and illuſtrated both of them with marginal notes, which were extremely ſatyrical. He was both a printer and author, and ſometimes amuſed himſelf with writing verſes.

BADUEL (CLAUDE) in Latin Baduellus, lived in the ſixteenth century. He wrote well in Latin, and was a good orator, a good father, and a good Chriſtian. He publiſhed at Geneva a Latin Tranſlation of ſeveral of John Calvin's ſermons, and the Acts of the Martyrs. He alſo wrote Epiſtola Paræneticaad Paulum filium de vero Patrimonio & Hæreditate quam Chriſtiani Parentes ſuis Liberis debent relinquere, and ſeveral other works.

BAEZA, a city of Andaluſia, in Spain, ſeated on a high hill, three miles from the river Guadalquivir. It has a kind of a univerſity, founded by John d' Avila. This city was taken from the Moors about the end of the fifteenth century. It is ſixteen miles north-eaſt of Jaen, ſeven ſouth-weſt of Ubeda, and three hundred and thirty ſouth of Madrid. Long. 3. 15. W. Lat. 37. 45. N.

There is another conſiderable town of the ſame name in the province of Los Quixos, in Peru, built in 1559. It is between the town of Quito and Sevilla del Oro.

BAFFIN's-BAY, a gulph in North-America, diſcovered by one Baffin, an Engliſhman, in attempting to find out a north-weſt paſſage into the ſouth ſea. It runs from ſixty-five to eighty degrees of north latitude.

BAFFO, a town in the iſland of Cyprus, with a fort built near ancient Paphos, of which there remain conſiderable ruins near the port, particularly ſome broken columns, which probably belonged to the temple of Venus. It is a large and agreeable place, and there are tranſparent ſtones to the weſtward of it, which ſome have taken to be diamonds, but falſely. Long. 32. 30. E. Lat. 34. 50. N.

BAGDAD, a city of Aſia, in Irack Arabi, ſeated on the eaſtern banks of the river Tigris, by moſt authors very improperly called Babylon. This ſtood on the banks of the Euphrates, at a conſiderable diſtance, and is now ſo intirely ruined, that the remains are not to be found; thoſe taken by travellers to be ſuch, and the place of the Tower of Babel, are nothing but Arabian buildings demoliſhed in time of war.

The Arabians ſay that Bagdat was built by one of their caliphs, in the year 762, and the one hundred and twenty-fifth of the Hegira. It is two miles long, one broad, and five in circumference. The walls are built with brick, covered with earth, and ſtrengthened with large towers like baſtions. The ditches are broad, and five or six fathom deep. There are four gates, three on the land ſide, and one towards the river, which is paſſed over by a bridge of boats, that are placed at the diſtance of a boat's length from each other; the number of them is about forty. The caſtle is within the city, near one of the gates, on the north ſide of the town, and is built with fine white free-ſtone, but now looks as if it were covered with earth. It is ſeated partly upon the river, and is ſurrounded by a ſingle wall. It has likewiſe ſmall towers, on which cannon are placed. The ditch is narrow, and about two or three fathom deep. On the weſt ſide of the river is an open town, which may be entered at any time of the night as well as in the day. This is called by ſome the Suburb of Bagdad, the houſes of which are miſerably built, as are alſo thoſe in the city itſelf, for they are but one ſtory high, and generally raiſed with earth. All the buildings that are good are owing to the Perſians. Some of the moſques are tolerably handſome, with large domes, covered with painted tiles, and there are bazars in ſtreets, covered over on the top, which are full of ſhops, where the merchants carry on their trade. There are ten caravanſeras, or public inns, only two of which are commodious.

The Turks have a garriſon here of ten thouſand men, which are doubled in time of war, with about two hundred pieces of cannon. There are likewiſe twelve thouſand militia, and yet Bagdad would be but thinly peopled, if great numbers did not reſort thither on account of trade, for which reaſon the Armenians and Jews take up near half the city. Some part of the year the air is here intolerably hot, and then the inhabitants lie on the tops of their houſes, which are terraſſed, in the night. The winter is ſo mild that the peaſants plough the land in December, at which time there are narciſſus, hyacinths, violets, &c. in full flower. There are very few trees or ſhrubs hereabouts, except liquorice, which is in great plenty. Nor is there cultivated land about Bagdad ſufficient to maintain it with proviſions; not but that part of Irack Arabi, that lies between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, formerly called Meſopotamia, is fruitful enough, but it wants a ſufficient number of inhabitants; and if it were not for the rivers, by which all ſorts of neceſſaries are brought to their doors, they would often be in a ſtarving condition.

The Mahommedan women are very richly dreſſed, and wear bracelets on their arms, and jewels in their ears. The Arabian women have the partition between their noſtrils bored, wherein they wear rings. Not far from this city there are ſprings of naptha, which they burn there inſtead of candles. There are three ſorts of Chriſtians among the inhabitants; Neſtorians, who have a church, Armenians, and Jacobites. The two laſt perform their devotion at a chapel, about a mile from Bagdad. Beſides the Jews that live in the city, there are many that come out of devotion, every year, to viſit the tomb of the prophet Ezechiel, which they believe to be about thirty miles from this place. This likewiſe is in the road for the caravans that come out of Perſia in pilgrimage to Mecca. Bagdad was brought under the dominion of the Turks in the year 1638, but not without the loſs of forty thouſand men. It is two hundred and fifty miles north of Baſra, one hundred and fifty ſouth of Moſul, and one hundred and twenty-five eaſt of Annah. Long. 43. 40. E. Lat. 33. 15. N.

BAGNAGAR, a town of Aſia, in the dominions of the great mogul, and capital of the kingdom of Golconda, in the peninſula on this ſide of the Ganges. The inhabitants within the town are the better ſort; and the merchants, and meaner people, inhabit the ſuburbs, which are three miles long. It was the reſidence of the kings of Golconda, before it was taken by Aurengzebe. It was chiefly taken notice of for a magnificent reſervoir of water, round which a colonade was built, ſupported by arches. It is ſeated near the river Newa, ſeventy-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Solopore, and one hundred and fifty weſt of Maſulitapan. Long. 96. 0. E. Lat. 15. 30. N.

BAGNARA, a maritime town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in the Farther Calabria, with the title of a duchy. It is ſeated eight miles ſouth of Palma. Long. 16. 18. E. Lat. 38. 15. N.

BAGNAREA, a town of Italy, in St. Peter's Patrimony, and in the territory of Orvieto, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a rivulet, five miles ſouth of Orvieto, and thirteen north of Viterbo. Long. 12. 10. E. Lat. 42. 36. N.

BAGNI (John Francis) lived in the ſeventeenth century, and was made cardinal by pope Urban VIII. in the year 1629. He was twice nuncio in France, and particularly interpoſed, in order to pacify the differences between the queen-mother and cardinal Richlieu. He died in the year 1641.

BAGNIERES, a town of France, in the county of Bigorre, in Gaſcony, ſo called from its mineral waters, which are very ſalutary. It is ſeated on the river Adour, ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Tarbe. Long. 0. 12. E. Lat. 43. 3. N.

BAGNILUCK, a city of Turky, in Europe, in Upper Boſnia, near a lake of the ſame name. It is ſixty miles ſouth-eaſt of Spoletto. Long. 18. 20. E. Lat. 44. N.

BAGNOLAS, a town of France, in Lower Languedoc, near the river Ceſe, on the declivity of a hill. It is ſurrounded with new walls, and contains about nine hundred houſes, the greateſt part of which are ill built. There are three principal gates, and two ſmall ones. The ſtreets are narrow, but the great ſquare is one of the fineſt in Languedoc, it having piazzas all round. The pariſh church is an ordinary building. There are two ſprings that riſe in the middle of the town, the waters of which being received into a large baſon, are conveyed by a canal out of the town, and from thence to the lands about it. It is two hundred and forty-four miles ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris, and eight ſouth-weſt of Pont-Eſprit. Long. 4. 43. E. Lat. 44. 10. N.

BAGNOLI, or Bagnioli, (Julius Cæsar) a celebrated Italian poet, born at Bagna Caballo, attached himſelf to Michael Peretti, who loaded him with wealth and honour. The moſt eſteemed of his works are, The Tragedy of the Aragonians, and The Judgment of Paris. He is cenſured for having weakened his writings, by taking too much pains in poliſhing them.

BAGOAS, an Egyptian eunuch, poiſoned Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſes, kings of Perſia, but was at length put to death by order of Darius Codomanus, about three hundred and thirty-ſix years before Chriſt.

He ought not to be confounded with Bagoas, the Perſian eunuch, for whom Alexander the Great had a criminal paſſion, and who occaſioned the death of Arſines, a Perſian lord.

BAGOT (John) a French Jeſuit, a native of Rennes, wrote a work intitled Apologeticus Fidei, that made ſome noiſe. He died at Paris, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1664.

BAHAMA, one of the iſlands ſo called, by ſome termed the Luccaya Iſlands, is about fifty miles weſt of Florida, in North-America, and twenty-ſix weſt from Luccaya, between which there is a very dangerous channel, full of rocks and ſands. This iſland is about fifty miles in length, and ſixteen in breadth, but in many places much leſs. The air is good, and the ſoil rich, there being a great number of ſprings and brooks. The productions at preſent are Indian wheat, fowls, and a particular ſort of a rabbit; what they want beſides is brought from Carolina. It is of great ſervice to aſſiſt the ſhips that are forced that way by the wind and currents. The ſtreight lying between Florida and Luccaya, has a prodigious rapid current. The Spaniſh fleets paſs through it to go to the Havanna. This and ſome of the other iſles had formerly a great number of inhabitants, who were barbarouſly murdered by the Spaniards. They were afterwards a neſt of pirates, who have been ſince routed out, or reclaimed, and king George I. ſent a governor to take care of and improve them, particularly the iſland of Providence. Lat. 26. 45. N.

BAHREIN, or Baharein, a province in Arabia the Happy, on the weſtern ſide of the gulph of Perſia. It is fruitful in dates and wine. El Catif is the capital, and is ſubject to Perſia. On the coaſt lies the iſland Baharen, which is famous for a pearl fiſhery.

BAHUS, a ſtrong town of Sweden, and capital of a government of the ſame name, with a caſtle. It is ſeated on a rock in a ſmall iſland, ten miles north of Gottenburg, and one hundred and fifty north of Copenhagen. Long. 11. 10. E. Lat. 57. 52. N.

BAJA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and Terra de Lavoro. It was famous for its hot baths and elegant palaces in the time of the Romans, of which there are ſome ruins remaining; but it is now an inconſiderable place. It is ſeated on the ſea-coaſt, twelve miles weſt of Naples. Long. 14. 45. E. Lat. 41. 6. N.

BAJAZET I. the fifth emperor of the Turks, ſucceeded his father Amurat I. in 1389, and was ſurnamed the Lightning, on account of the rapidity of his conqueſts. He cauſed Jacob, his eldeſt brother, to be ſtrangled, and was the firſt who introduced that barbarous cuſtom of the Ottoman princes putting their brothers to death on their acceſſion to the throne. In 1391, 1392, and 1393, he took from the Chriſtians Bulgaria, Macedonia, and Theſſaly, and deprived almoſt all the Aſiatic princes of their dominions. At length Sigiſmund, king of Hungary, propoſed a league againſt him, when France ſent a conſiderable number of forces, with two thouſand gentleman who went volunteers, with the Count de Nevers at their head. Theſe at firſt gained great advantages, but at length they were all either killed or taken priſoners, at the battle of Nicopolis, in 1395. After this ſucceſs, Bajazet went and laid ſiege to Conſtantinople, which was relieved by the marſhal De Boucicaut. The Aſiatic princes then implored the aſſiſtance of Tamerlain, king of the Tartars, who, after having ſubdued the Parthians, made all the Eaſt tremble. This prince gave Bajazet battle near Angoria, in 1402, took him priſoner, and ſhut him up in an iron cage; but but this misfortune did not abate his pride. However, being at length weary of life, it is said that he dashed out his brains against the bars of his cage, in 1403, after a reign of fifteen years, and his being eight months in confinement. Others maintain, that Bajazet died of an apoplexy, on the 23d of March, 1413.

BAJAZET II. emperor of the Turks, succeeded his father Mahomet II. in 1481. Zezim, his younger brother, disputed the crown with him, but died in Italy in 1495. Bajazet took several places from the Venetians, but his armies were defeated in Egypt. At length, after a reign of thirteen years, he was obliged to yield up his crown to his son Selim, who afterwards caused him to be poisoned, in the year 1512.

BAIF (LAZARUS) abbot of Charroux and Grenetiere, master of requests, and counsellor of the parliament of Paris, was descended of an illustrious family, and was one of the most learned men of the sixteenth century. Francis I. who took a pleasure in advancing men of merit, sent him ambassador to Venice, in 1530, and intrusted him with several important commissions. He died in 1545. His principal works are, a Treatise, in Latin, on the Dresses of the Ancients; and another on the Art of Navigation, printed at Basil, in 1541.

BAIF (JOHN ANTHONY) a French poet, the son of the preceding, was born at Venice, in 1532, while his father was ambassador to that republic. After having studied the Greek and Latin languages, he applied himself to poetry, and wrote a great number of books, both in verse and prose. He attempted to write French verses, in imitation of those of the Greeks and Romans, but without success. His whole estate consisted in a house at Paris, where he formed a kind of musical academy, and had concerts, which all the people of quality, and even king Henry III. himself, frequently honoured with their presence. He died in 1592.

BAIKAL, a great lake of Siberia, in the Russian empire, three hundred miles long, but not above thirty broad, where widest. When frozen over, people travel upon it in the road to China; but they must be very sharp shod, otherwise they cannot stand upon the ice. This is sometimes two ells thick, and yet there are open places, which tempestuous winds will sometimes drive the horses and sledges to where they are swallowed up. The camels that travel over have a particular kind of shoes, sharp at the bottom, and the oxen have sharp irons struck through their hoofs, without which it would be impossible to pass along. The water is green, but fresh. This lake contains a great number of dog-fish, and multitudes of large sturgeons and jacks, some of which weigh two hundred pounds. The river Angara proceeds from this lake, and runs north-west. The most southerly part of the lake lies in fifty-two degrees of latitude, and the most northerly is fifty-five.

BAILE. See BALE and BAYLE.

BAILEUL, a town of France, in the earldom of Flanders, formerly very strong, but now an open town, without defence. It has been burnt five or six times by accident, and there are now only about five hundred and twenty houses. It is seven miles south-west of Ypres. Long. 2. 55. E. Lat. 50. 45. N.

BAILLET (ADRIAN) a celebrated French critic, was born at Neuville, a village in Piccardy, June 13, 1649. He wrote, 1. Observations upon such Authors as had distinguished their Names. 2. Jugemens des Sçavans, nine volumes. 3. Of Children become celebrated by their Study, and their Writings. 4. Of Personal Satires, or an Historical and Critical Treatise of those Satires which bear the title of Anti. 5. An History of Holland. 6. The Lives of the Saints, three volumes, folio; and other works. He died January 21, 1706.

BAILLI (ROCH LE) more known by the name of La Riviere, a famous physician, born at Falaise, in Normandy. He followed the principles of Paracelsus, which exposed him to censure, and obliged him to write an apology. He published, in 1578, Demonsterion, sive 300 Aphorismi, continentes Summam Doctrinæ Paracelsicæ; and in 1580, a Treatise on the Plague. He wrote several other works, and died at Paris, on the 5th of November, 1605.

BAILLOU (WILLIAM DE) a physician of Paris, born at Perche. He wrote several works, and died in 1616, aged seventy-eight.

BAILY. See BAYLY.

BAINBRIDGE (JOHN) an eminent physician and astronomer, was born at Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, in the year 1582, and educated at Emanuel college in Cambridge, where he took the degrees in arts, and applied himself to the study of physic, and the mathematics. He practised physic for some time, and afterwards removing to London, was chosen a fellow of the college of physicians. In 1619, he was appointed Savilian professor of astronomy, at Oxford, and in 1635, superior reader of Linacre's lecture. He wrote a great many books, particularly, 1. An astronomical Description of the late Comet, from the 18th of November, 1618, to the 16th of December following. 2. Procli Sphæra, and Ptolomæi de Hypothesibus Planetarum; to which he added, Ptolomy's Canon Regnorum. 3. Canicularia. 4. A Treatise on the Dog-Star, and the Canicular Days. These are all that have been printed; though he left many manuscripts, the most valuable of which are the following, preserved in the library of Trinity college, in Dublin, viz. 1. A Theory of the Sun. 2 A Theory of the Moon. 3. A Discourse concerning the Quantity of the Year. 4. Two volumes of Astronomical Observations; and nine or ten volumes of Miscellaneous Papers. He died November 3, 1643.

BAIUS, or BAY (MICHAEL DE) a famous doctor and chancellor of the university of Louvain, was born at Melin, in the territory of Aeth, in 1513. Having deviated from the common road in his explication of the Holy Scriptures, eighteen of his propositions were examined by the Sorbonne, who declared that fifteen of them were heretical, and the others false. Baius was some time after chosen to go to the council of Trent, but before he went, he published some of his works, and the rest at his return; on which Pius V. condemned seventy-six of his propositions, by a bull, dated the first of October, 1567, as heretical, erroneous, suspicious, rash, scandalous, and capable of offending pious ears. Notwithstanding this, he was no less commendable for his exemplary life, piety, and modesty, than for his genius and knowledge. Among his other works, there are some controversial pieces against several of the doctrines of Calvinism. He died September 16, 1589.

BAKER (DAVID) an English Benedictine monk, of whom Mr. Wood has given a very circumstantial account, and particularly of his miraculous conversion from Atheism to Christianity, was educated at Broadgate-hall, now Pembroke college, in Oxford, and afterwards studied at the Temple, where his excellent natural abilities enabled him, in a short time, to make a great proficiency in the law. Soon after his conversion, he went to Italy, where he entered into the order of St. Benedict, having changed his name from David to Augustin. In the reign of James I. he was a considerable time resident in England, in the quality of a missionary, but being much given to retirement and abstraction, was thought, by some of his brethren, to be a very improper person for that office. He was for several years the spiritual director of the English Benedictine nuns, at Cambray. The latter part of his life he spent in London, where he died, in 1641. He is said to have been much employed in mental prayer, and was the author of several books relating to the exercises of a spiritual life. He wrote an exposition of the famous mystical book, intitled Scala Perfectionis, by Walter Hilton. These and the rest of his works that are extant, are said to be preserved in nine large volumes, in folio, manuscripts, in the monastery of English Benedictine nuns, at Cambray. He made large collections for an Ecclesiastical History of England, and other subjects of antiquity, in which he was assisted by the most eminent of our antiquaries. But these, which were in six folio volumes, are lost, as are also three large volumes of his Translations of the Works of spiritual Authors. None of his works were ever printed; but Hugh Cressy, in his Church History of Brittany, and other writers, have been much indebted to him.

BAKER (Sir RICHARD) author of the Chronicle of the Kings of England, was born at Sissinghurst, in Kent, about the year 1568. After going through the usual course of academical learning at Hart hall, in Oxford, he travelled into foreign parts, and upon his return home was created master of arts, and soon after, in 1603, received from king James I. the honour of knighthood. In 1620 he was high sheriff of Oxfordshire; but engaging to pay some of the debts of his wife's family, he was reduced to poverty, and obliged to betake himself for shelter to the Fleet prison, where he composed several books, among which, are; 1. Meditations and Disquisitions on the Lord's Prayer. 2. Meditations, &c. on several of the Psalms of David. 3. Meditations and Prayers upon the seven Days of the Week. 4. Cato Variegatus, or Cato's Moral Distichs varied, &c. Mr. Granger observes, that "his Chronicle of the Kings of England was ever "more esteemed by readers of a lower class, than by such "as had a critical knowledge of history. The language of "it was, in this reign, called polite, and it long maintained its reputation, especially among country gentlemen. The author seems to have been sometimes more "studious to please than to inform, and with that view to "have sacrificed even chronology itself to method." In 1658, Edward Philips, nephew to Milton, published a third edition of this work, with the addition of the reign of Charles I. It has been several times reprinted since, and is now carried as low as the reign of George I. Sir Richard also translated several works from the French and Italian, and died very poor, in the Fleet priſon, on the 18th of February, 1645.

BAKER (Thomas) an eminent mathematician, was born at Ilton, in Somerſetſhire, about the year 1625, and entered at Magdelen-hall, Oxon, in 1640, after which he was vicar of Biſhop's-Nymmet, in Devonſhire, where he wrote The Geometrical Key, or the Gate of Equations unlocked, by which he gained a conſiderable reputation. A little before his death, the members of the Royal Society ſent him ſome mathematical queries, to which he returned ſo ſatisfactory an anſwer, that they preſented him a medal, with an inſcription full of honour and reſpect. He died at Biſhop's-Nymmet,, on the 5th of June, 1690.

BAKEWELL, a town in Derbyſhire, with a market on Monday. It is ſeated on the river Wye, on the north ſide of the Peak, and is a large town; for though it has only one church, it has ſeven chapels of eaſe. Its chief trade, which is very conſiderable, is in lead. Bakewell has five fairs, held on Eaſter-Monday, Whitſun-Monday, Auguſt 13, Monday after October 10, and Monday after November 22, for cattle and horſes. It is one hundred and fifty-two miles diſtant from London. Long. 2. 30. W. Lat. 55. 15. N.

BALA, a corporate town of Wales, in Merionethſhire, with a market on Saturday. It is governed by bailiffs, &c. and is one hundred and ninety-five miles from London. Long. 3. 37. W. Lat. 52. 54. N.

BALAAM, the prophet whom Balak, king of the Moabites, ſent for to curſe the Iſraelites. He at firſt told the king's meſſengers that he would not go with them; but, upon a ſecond deputation, he ſet out in order to go to Balak. When he was upon his journey, an angel of the Lord, with a ſword in his hand, appeared in the midſt of the road before the prophet, who was mounted on an aſs, which miraculouſly ſpoke, and complained of the blows which the prophet gave him, and then the angel ordered Balaam to ſay nothing but what the Lord commanded. Balaam being arrived, bleſſed the people whom Balak had ordered him to curſe, on which the king being enraged, the prophet, in order to pacify him, and obtain the reward he expected, adviſed him to ſend the moſt beautiful of the Moabite young women into the camp of the Iſraelites, in order to corrupt the people of God, and draw down the diſpleaſure of heaven upon them; and Balak following this pernicious counſel, cauſed a great number of the children of Iſrael to fall into fornication and idolatry. Balaam was killed by the army of the Iſraelites, as he was returning to his country.

BALAGATE Mountains, a chain of mountains, which divides the Malabar coaſt from that of Coromandel, running almoſt the whole length of the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges. Some parts of them are covered with fine red earth, which is blown by the ſtrong weſt winds as far as the iſland of Ceylon; when the rays of the ſun are reflected from theſe mountains, they ſeem to be all on fire. They make ſurpriſing alterations in the ſeaſons; for on the north ſide of Cape Comorin, it is winter in May, June, July, Auguſt, and September, in which months it is ſummer on the ſouth ſide of the cape; on one ſide there are continual tempeſts, thunder, and lightning, while the other enjoys a conſtant ſerenity; when black clouds are gathered about the mountains, they are followed by ſudden rain, which cauſe the overflowing of the rivers, and choak them up with ſand, inſomuch that they are unnavigable for ſome time afterwards. Theſe mountains give name to a province; for many people were driven hither from the plains, where their habitations were all deſtroyed by Aurengezebe. The buildings and clothes of the inhabitants are ſcarce ſufficient to defend them from the weather, and they live upon rice, milk, roots, and herbs, with very little meat; they have likewiſe a ſort of ſmall arrac, but are never given to drunkenneſs, nor do they import foreign vices, for they never travel abroad.

BALAGUER, a city of Catalonia, in Spain, ſeated on the north bank of the river Segra, at the foot of a high mountain, on which there was formerly a fortreſs. The land about it is extremely fertile. It is thirteen miles north-eaſt of Lerida, thirty-three ſouth-weſt of Balbaſtro, forty north of Tarragona, and ſeventy-five north-weſt of Barcelona. Long. 0. 48. E. Lat. 41. 38. N.

BALAK, king of Moab, the ſon of Zippor, who ſent for Balaam, to curſe the people of God, was ſlain in battle by the Iſraelites, about the one thouſand four hundred and fifty firſt year before the Chriſtian æra. See Balaam.

BALBASTRO, a city of Spain, in the kingdom of Arragon, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Vero, forty-four miles north-eaſt from Saragoſſa. Long. 0. 20. E. Lat. 41. 50. N.

BALBEC, a city of Aſia, in Syria, part of Turky in Aſia, being the ancient Heliopolis. It has a very agreeable ſituation, on the eaſt ſide of the valley of Bucca; it is quadrangular and ſurrounded with a good wall, adorned with towers at equal diſtances, and is about a mile and half in circuit; but the houſes are very mean, as they generally are in Turky. On the ſouth-eaſt ſide of the city are the noble ruins of an ancient Pagan temple, and of ſome other magnificent ſtructures, which, by joining to other buildings, they have converted them into a kind of caſtle. There are alſo the ruins of an old wall, made with ſtones of an incredible magnitude; for three, laid in the ſame rank, were together one hundred and eighty-three feet long; one was ſixty-three, and the two others ſixty each; all theſe were twelve feet deep, and as many broad, ſtanding twenty feet from the ground: the inhabitants ſay, this was the work of the devil. On the other ſide of the city, there is a plain full of marble tombs. The architecture of all theſe ruins is admirably fine, and would take up many days to conſider them thoroughly. It is twenty-eight miles north of Damaſcus. Long. 37. 30. E. Lat. 33. 25. N.

BALBINUS (Decimus Coelius) the Roman emperor, being choſen by the ſenate in 237, was maſſacred by the ſoldiers, who had a diſlike to ſuch emperors as were elected only by the ſenators. This prince was eloquent, and wrote pretty good verſes.

BALBUENA (Bernard de) one of the moſt celebrated Spaniſh poets, was a native of Valdepegnas, a village in the dioceſe of Toledo. Having received the degree of doctor at Salamanca, he was ſent into America, where he was made biſhop of Porto Rico, in 1620. He died in 1627, and left many excellent works.

BALBUS (Lucius Lucilius) ſcholar to Mutius Scævola, and preceptor to the famous Servius Sulpitius, was an excellent lawyer, and flouriſhed about the year of Rome 670, eighty-one years before the Chriſtian æra.

Balbus (Lucius Cornelius Theophanes) was born at Cadiz, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour in the war carried on by the Romans in Spain, againſt Sertorius and the Luſitanians, on which account Pompey gave him the privileges of a Roman citizen. He was conſul in the ſeven hundred and fourteenth year of Rome, and was the firſt foreigner on whom that dignity was conferred. He was the friend of Pompey, Cæſar, Craſſus, and Cicero.

There were many other illuſtrious Romans of the name of Balbus.

Balbus, Balbi, or Balbo (John) a Dominican friar, born at Genoa, flouriſhed in the thirteenth century, and is better known by the name of Joannes de Janua, or Joannes Januenſis. He underſtood Greek, which was a very uncommon qualification in that age, and more Latin than all his brother monks, and was no leſs eſteemed for his exemplary life than his learning. He compoſed ſeveral works.

BALCHEN (Sir John) a brave Engliſh admiral, was born on the 2d of February, 1669, and after receiving a ſuitable education, entered on board the royal navy, where he ſerved ſeveral years in inferior ſtations; but, in 1697, was appointed captain of the Virgin prize, and from thence forward was always conſidered as one of the moſt active commanders in the royal navy. He commanded the Shrewſbury in that memorable action near Sicily, in which the Spaniſh fleet was almoſt totally deſtroyed by that of Great Britain commanded by ſir George Byng. In 1728, he was made rear-admiral of the blue; and in 1731, commanded under ſir Charles Wager, when Don Carlos was placed on the throne of Naples. In 1734, he was made rear-admiral of the white; in 1739, was raiſed to the rank of vice-admiral of the red; in 1743, was appointed admiral of the white; and the next year governor of Greenwich hoſpital. Soon after ſir Charles Hardy having been ſent with a large convoy of ſtore-ſhips to admiral Matthews in the Mediterranean, who was in the utmoſt diſtreſs for proviſions and rigging, and ſir Charles being blocked up in the Tagus, the miniſtry in this extremity caſt their eyes upon admiral Balchen, who now ſailed with a large fleet for this important ſervice, with his flags hoiſted on board the Victory, the largeſt and fineſt ſhip in the royal navy, and having joined ſir Charles's ſquadron, convoyed him to Gibraltar, the French at his approach retiring into Cadiz. This ſervice being performed, ſir John Balchen proceed to cruize on the coaſt of Portugal, in hopes of coming up with ſome of the Breſt fleet; but being informed that the French had ſheltered themſelves under the fortifications of Cadiz, he continued his courſe for England; however on the 3d of October, 1744, being overtaken by a violent ſtorm which diſperſed the fleet, and the Victory being driven on the Caſkets, ſunk, and every perſon on board her periſhed. The whole nation ſhewed a generous concern for this terrible misfortune; and his late majeſty was pleaſed to ſettle a penſion of five hundred pounds per annum on the admiral's lady during her life; and to perpetuate his memory, a ſmall but elegant monument was erected for him in Weſtminſter-abey, in which his buſt is well executed in the fineſt marble: the enrichments, arms, and trophies are admirably wrought, and in the front is a fine baſſo relievo of a ſhip in a ſtorm.

BALDIVIA, or VALDIVIA, a ſea-port town of the province Chili, in South America, built by Baldivia, a Spaniſh general, who conquered Chili, about the year 1551. It is ſeated between the rivers Portrero and Callacalles, at their influx into the ſea. Long. 79. 5. W. Lat. 40. 5. S.

BALDOCK, a town in Hertfordſhire, with a markct on Thurſdays, and five fairs, on Wedneſday after St. Matthias, February 24, the laſt Thurſday in May, Auguſt 6, October 2, and December 11, all for cheeſe, houſhold-goods, and cattle. It is a long town, lying on the north road, and is ſeated between the hills, in a chalky ſoil, fit for corn, and is chiefly of note for its trading in malt. It is nine miles weſt of Royſton, fifty-eight ſouth-ſouth-eaſt of Oakham, and thirty-eight north-north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 51. 55. N.

BALDOCK (RALPH DE) biſhop of London in the reigns of Edward I. and II. was educated at Moreton-college, in Oxford, became archdeacon of Middleſex, and afterwards dean of St. Paul's; the ſee of London becoming vacant by the death of Richard de Graveſend, Baldock was unanimouſly choſen, September 20, 1304, and afterwards was made lord high chancellor of England. He had a very amiable character both for morals and learning, and deſerved well of his country for his writings, which were Hiſtoria Anglica, or An Hiſtory of the Britiſh Affairs down to his own Time; and A Collection of the Statutes and Conſtitutions of the Church of St. Paul. Biſhop Baldock died at Stepney, July 24, 1313.

BALDOCK (ROBERT DE) a canon of London and archdeacon of Middleſex, who lived about the ſame time as the former, and was in great favour with king Edward II. who made him his chancellor, and nominated him to the biſhopric of Norwich, into which he was elected in the year 1325; but ſoon after loſt his liberty and life by the inteſtine ſedition, which deprived king Edward of his crown; for being ſeized by the enraged populace, he was dragged to the priſon of Newgate, where he died in a moſt wretched condition.

BALDUIN, or BAUDOIN, (FREDERICK) a famous Lutheran divine, born at Dreſden, in 1572, taught divinity at Wirtemberg, aud died in 1627. He wrote a Commentary on St. Paul's Epiſtles, and a Treatiſe on Caſes of Conſcience.

BALDUS, a famous lawyer in the fourteenth century, was ſon to Francis Ubaldus, a phyſician of Perugia. The vivacity and ſubtilty of his genius acquired him great reputation; he gained a large fortune, and wrote many books. He died April 28, 1400, in a very ſhocking manner; for being extremely fond of a little dog, which he very often careſſed and kiſſed, the creature bit his lip as he was playing with him; and as he was mad, the ſubtile poiſon diſperſed itſelf over Baldus's whole body, and though for ſome time it had no ſenſible effect on his mind, yet at laſt it produced the dread of water, and the other fatal attendants of that diſeaſe. Baldus lived ſeventy-ſix years, and left two ſons, who were excellent civilians. Zenobius, the elder of them was biſhop of Tipherno.

BALDUS (JAMES) one of the beſt Latin poets that Germany produced in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Enſiſheim, in 1603, and turned Jeſuit in 1624. He taught rhetoric and polite learning; he was many years a preacher, and raiſed himſelf a prodigious reputation by his poems, which conſiſt of panegyrics, moral, devotional, and theatrical pieces, miſcellanies, odes, &c. He died at Neuburg, Auguſt 9, 1668. Several ſenators diſputed who ſhould have his pen, and it is ſaid, that he to whom it fell kept it in a ſilver caſe.

BALDUS (BERNARDIN) abbot of Guaſtalla, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Urbino, in 1553. While a ſtudent at Padua, he compoſed, 1. a work On the Engines of War, which ſpread his name beyond the Alps. He afterward wrote, 2. The Lives of the Mathematicians. 3. Commentaries upon the Mechanics of Ariſtotle. 4. De novo Gnomonice. 5. The Chaldee Paraphraſe of the Pentateuch, illuſtrated with a Commentary. 6. A Tranſlation from the Hebrew of the Books of Job and Lamentations, with notes; a poem in his mother tongue on the Art of Navigation; and began a prodigious work, intitled a Deſcription of the World, which he did not live to reduce into order. He died October 12, 1617.

BALDWIN, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. was born of obſcure parents at Exeter, where he had a liberal education. He firſt taught ſchool; but afterwards entering into holy orders, was made archdeacon of Exeter; but quitting that dignity, became a monk of the Ciſtertian order; from whence he was promoted to the ſee of Worceſter, and then to that of Canterbury; and on the 3d of September, 1190, performed the ceremony of crowning king Richard I. at Weſtminſter; but following that prince into the Holy Land, he died at the ſiege of Acres, or Ptolemais. He wrote ſeveral Latin tracts, viz. 1. Of the Sacrament of the Altar. 2. Faith recommended. 3. Of orthodox Opinions. 4. Of heretical Sects. 5. Of the Unity of Charity. 6. Of Love. 7. Of the Prieſthood of John Hircanus. 8. Of the Learning of Giraldus. 9. Thirty-three Sermons. 10. In Praiſe of Virginity, &c.

BALDWIN. See BAULDWIN.

BALE (JOHN) in Latin Baleus or Balæus, biſhop of Oſſory, in Ireland, was born in November, 1495, at Cove, a ſmall village in Suffolk. He was educated in the Romiſh religion; but afterwards, at the inſtigation of lord Wentworth, turned Proteſtant, which expoſed him to the perſecution of the Romiſh clergy, againſt which he was protected by lord Cromwell, but after his death was forced to retire into the Low Countries, where he wrote ſeveral pieces in the Engliſh language. He was recalled into England by king Edward, who nominated him to the ſee of Oſſory, where he underwent a variety of perſecutions from the popiſh party. In the reign of queen Elizabeth, he contented himſelf with a prebend in the cathedral church of Canterbury. He wrote the lives of the moſt eminent writers of Great Britain, in Latin, from Japheth, the ſon of Noah, through a ſeries of three thouſand ſix hundred and eighteen years, to the year of our Lord 1557; he alſo wrote a comedy or interlude of Johan Babtyſt's Preachynge in the Wilderneſſe, opening the Crafts of Hypocrytes, and a great number of tracts on different ſubjects. The intemperate zeal of this author, in his accounts of the papiſts, often carries him beyond the bounds of decency and candour. He died in November, 1563, aged ſixty-eight.

BALE. See BASIL.

BALES (PETER) the moſt famous maſter in the art of penmanſhip in his time, in our country, was born in the year 1547. He publiſhed the Writing-School-Maſter, in three Parts; the firſt teaching ſwift Writing, the ſecond true Writing, and the third fair Writing. His ſkill in his profeſſion made him taken notice of by the great; and it is ſaid, that he was even ſometimes employed by the ſecretaries of ſtate to counterfeit the hands of foreign miniſters.

BALESDENS (JOHN) advocate in the parliament of Paris and in the council, was born at Paris, and received into the French academy about the year 1647. He publiſhed ſeveral works, of which he was not the author, as, 1. Elogia clarorum Virorum Joannis Papirii Maſſonis, two volumes. 2. Gregorii Turonenſis Opera pia, cum Vitis Patrum ſui Temporis two volumes. 3. The Acts of the Conveyance of Dauphiny made over to the Crown of France. 4. A Treatiſe of Aqua Vitæ, by M. John Bronaut. 5. The Fables of Eſop, in French, corrected by himſelf; and other pieces. He lived till about the year 1676.

BALEY, or BAILEY, (WALTER) the author of ſeveral treatiſes, was born at Potſham, in Devonſhire, and educated at New College, in Oxford. He became proctor of the univerſity, and prebendary of Dutlingcote, or Dulcot, in the church of Wells, which preferment he reſigned, and, in 1563, took the degree of doctor of phyſic, and at laſt was appointed phyſician in ordinary to queen Elizabeth. He wrote, 1. A Diſcourſe of three Kinds of Pepper in common Uſe. 2. A brief Treatiſe on the Preſervation of the Eye-Sight. 3. Directions for Health, natural and artificial, with Medicines for all Diſeaſes of the Eye. 4. Explicatio Galeni de Potu Convalaſcentium & Senum, & principue de noſtræ Alæ & Biriæ Paratione, &c. i. e. An Explication of Galen on the Drink of thoſe who are recovered from a Fit of Sickneſs, and the Aged, and particularly concerning the Preparation of Engliſh Ale and Beer, &c. This piece is in manuſcript. He died March 3, 1592.

BALI, an iſland of Aſia, in the Eaſt Indies, to the eaſt of Java, between which there is a ſtreight about a mile over, through which the ſhips ſometimes paſs to China. This iſland is populous, and abounds in rice and various kinds of fruits. The inhabitants are black and warlike. They ſay they have mines of gold, but that the king will not ſuffer them to be opened. Long. 115. 30. E. Lat. 9. 0. S.

BALIOL, or BALLIOL, (Sir JOHN DE) founder of Baliol-college, in Oxford, was the ſon of Hugh Baliol, of Bernard's caſtle, in the dioceſe of Durham, and was a perſon very eminent for his power and riches. During the conteſts and wars between king Henry III. and his barons, he firmly adhered to the king. In 1263, he began the foundation and endowment of Baliol-college, which was afterwards perfected by his widow. He died in the year 1269.

BALIOL, BALLIOL, or BOILLIOL, (JOHN) the brother of Alexander, king of Scotland, and competitor with Robert Bruce for that crown. The contending parties choſe Edward I. king of England, umpire, who engaging Baliol to ſwear fealty to him, gave him the crown, in 1292; but Baliol afterwards attempting to free himſelf from his ſubjection to England, a new war broke out, and Baliol being taken priſoner, was obliged by king Edward to make an abſolute ſurrender of his kingdom, and afterwards retiring into France, died there, in the year 1314.

BALISORE, a port town in India, on this ſide the Ganges, ſeated on the north-weſt part of the bay of Bengal. Long. 85. 20. E. Lat. 21. 30. N.

BALK, a city of Aſia, in the kingdom of that name, having Sarmacand on the north, Candahor on the ſouth, Korazon on the weſt, and Great Bokaria on the eaſt. Some make Balk a province of Great Bokaria. The city is the beſt in the whole diſtrict, is ſeated on the Behaſk, and is large, handſome, and populous, moſt of the buildings being of ſtone or brick. It is fortified with bulwarks of earth, and fenced without a ſtone wall. The caſtle is a large ſtructure, built almoſt wholly of marble, which is got out of the adjacent mountains. It is at preſent a place of very great trade. Moſt geographers call Great Bokaria the country of the Uſbecks. Balk is two hundred miles north of Candahar. Long. 65. 20. E. Lat. 37. 10. N.

BALL (JOHN) the author of ſeveral treatiſes in divinity, was born at Caſſington, or Cherſington, near Woodſtock in Oxfordſhire, in October, 1585, and was educated at Brazen-Noſe college, in Oxford. After this he was tutor to lord Cholmondeley's children, and at laſt was made curate of Whitmore, in Staffordſhire, where he lived upon a ſalary of about twenty pounds a year, and the profits of a little ſchool. He wrote a ſhort Treatiſe concerning all the Principal Grounds of the Chriſtian Religion; A Treatiſe of Faith, in two parts; A friendly Trial of the Grounds tending to Separation; A Treatiſe of the Covenant of Grace; Of the Power of Godlineſs; and ſeveral other pieces. He died October 20, 1640.

BALLENDEN, or BOLLENDEN, (Sir JOHN) an elegant Scottiſh writer of the ſixteenth century. He attained extraordinary preferment in the church, being made canon of Roſs, and archdeacon of Murray; he afterwards obtained the employment of clerk-regiſter, and was made one of the lords of ſeſſion. He zealouſly ſtrove to ſtop the progreſs of the Reformation. The work which gave him the higheſt reputation was his tranſlation of Hector Boëthius. He likewiſe wrote a poem, entitled Virtue and Vice, addreſſed to James V. and many other pieces, which are now buried in oblivion. He died at Rome in the year 1550.

BALLIN (CLAUDIUS) a celebrated goldſmith of Paris, who carried his art to a degree of perfection that greatly ſurpaſſed every thing done before his time. He was acquainted with the art of deſigning, and by this means knew how to imitate the moſt beautiful pieces of antiquity, to which he added graces, and the moſt admirable beauties from his own invention. The cardinal de Richlieu, and afterwards Mr. Colbert, employed him in ſeveral works, which were all ſingularly beautiful, and are proofs of his great genius, and elegant taſte. This excellent goldſmith died at Paris on the 22d of January, 1678, aged ſixty-three.

BALLISHANNON, a town of Ireland, in the county of Donnegal. It ſtands on a river that runs out of Lough Ern into Donnegal Bay, where it has a harbour. It has a tolerable trade, and is pretty well inhabited, conſidering that this country is generally full of bogs, and great lakes and woods. It is ten miles ſouth of Donnegal, and one hundred and ten north-weſt of Dublin. Long. 8. 25. W. Lat. 54. 25. N.

BALMIS (ABRAHAM DE) a Jewiſh phyſician, born at Lecci, in the kingdom of Naples, flouriſhed at Venice in the beginning of the ſixteenth century. He wrote an Hebrew Grammar, which was printed in Hebrew and Latin; a book De Demonſtratione, and another De Subſtantia Orbis. He alſo tranſlated into Latin ſeveral commentaries of Averroes upon Ariſtotle, and ſome writings of Aven Pace.

BALSAMON (THEODORE) patriarch of Antioch, in the reign of the emperor Iſaac Angelus, and one of the moſt learned men of his time, lived in the twelfth century, and died about the year 1214. He writ notes on the Nemocanon of Photius, a collection of the decrees and conſtitutions of the church, and many other works.

BALSHAM, BEDESALE, or BELESALE, (HUGH DE) the tenth biſhop of Ely, and founder of St. Peter's college, otherwiſe Peter-houſe, in Cambridge, was at firſt a monk, and afterwards ſub-prior of the Benedictine monaſtery at Ely. He laid the foundation of St Peter's college, (the firſt college in the univerſity of Cambridge) A. D. 1259, the revenues of which have been ſince augmented by ſeveral benefactors. He died at Dodington, June 16, 1286.

BALTHASAR. See BELSHAZZAR.

BALTHASAR (CHRISTOPHER) a Frenchman of great learning and merit, in the ſixteenth century. He applied himſelf chiefly to the ſtudy of Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, which gave him a diſlike to the Romiſh religion, and a deſire to embrace that of the Proteſtants; and, therefore, to ſatisfy his conſcience, he left Auxerre, where he had a conſiderable poſt, and alſo an eſtate, relations, and friends, and went to Charenton, where he publicly joined the reformed church. He wrote a Latin Panegyric on Mr. Fouquet, which is extremely elegant, and ſome Diſſertations againſt Cardinal Baronius, which have never been publiſhed.

BALTIC SEA, a great gulph of the German ocean, included between the coaſts of Germany, Poland, Sweden, and Denmark. It forms ſeveral other gulphs, as, the Gulph of Bothnia, Finland, Livonia, and Dantzick, and flows into the ocean through a ſtrait called the Sound. It is the only place where yellow amber is found in any great quantity. It is frequently frozen three or four months in the year.

BALTIMORE, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, ſeated on a head-land, which runs fifteen miles into the ſea, fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Roſſe. Long. 9. 10. W. Lat. 51. 15. N.

BALTUS (JOHN FRANCIS) a learned Jeſuit, born at Metz. After having filled ſeveral poſts in that ſociety, he was made library-keeper to the Jeſuits of Reims, and enjoyed it till his death, which happened on the 9th of March, 1743, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age. He wrote an Anſwer to Fontenelle's Hiſtory of Oracles; The Chriſtian Religion proved from the Accompliſhment of Prophecies, and other works.

BALUE (JOHN) a famous cardinal, who, by his intrigues and crimes, aroſe to the higheſt dignities, under the reign of Lewis XI. king of France. He firſt ingratiated himſelf into the eſteem of John Juvenal, biſhop of Poictiers, and afterwards into that of John de Beauveau, biſhop of Angers. He was made biſhop of Evereux in 1465, biſhop of Angers in 1467, and the ſame year was made a cardinal by Paul II. He had ſuch an inclination to war, that he frequently reviewed the troops, dreſſed in his rochet and camail. But ſhewing the utmoſt ingratitude to his benefactors, and particularly to the king, whoſe ſecrets he betrayed to his enemies, he was thrown into priſon, where, notwithſtanding the ſolicitations of the pope, he continued above eleven years. However, cardinal Julian de la Rovere got him releaſed in 1480, after which he went to Rome, where he acquired great credit by his intrigues. He died at Ancona in 1491. The French writers ſay that he was groſsly ignorant, but by means of his impudence and audacity, was capable of undertaking any thing.

BALUZE (STEPHEN DE) one of the moſt learned men of the 17th century, was born at Tulles, in the year 1691, and raiſed himſelf by his merit to be library-keeper to Mr. Colbert, and afterwards profeſſor of canon law in the royal college, of which he was at length made director; but the Genealogical Hiſtory of the Houſe of Auvergne, which he publiſhed in 1708, was the cauſe of his diſgrace and baniſhment. He, however, returned ſome time after, and died at Paris, on the 28th of July, 1718, in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

Mr. Baluze wrote well in Latin, underſtood the canon law, was perfectly verſed in eccleſiaſtical and prophane hiſtory, and had read the fathers with the greateſt attention. He was of a mild, agreeable, generous, and communicative temper, freely aſſiſting by his advice, memoirs, and manuſcripts, thoſe who deſired it. His principal talent was that of collecting the manuſcripts of good authors, comparing them with the ſame works in print, and at length giving new editions, with very learned notes.

BALZAC (JOHN LEWIS GUEZ DE) was born at Angoulême, in the year 1595, and very early gained extraordinary reputation by his Letters, which were ſo admired, that cardinal Richelieu, to whom he wrote ſeveral times, did him the honour of anſwering them in a very obliging manner; and Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, deſired that he would write to her. Theſe letters, after they were printed, produced one of the moſt furious paper-wars between Balzac's friends and enemies, that ever was ſeen of the kind. He alſo wrote a work called Ouvres Diverſes, i. e. On various Subjects; The Prince; The Chriſtian Socrates, &c. All his works have been publiſhed in two volumes, folio. He died Feb. 18, 1654.

BAMBA, or WAMBA, king of the Viſigoths, in Spain, aſcended the throne in 642. He ſignalized himſelf by deſtroying an Arabian fleet, and died of a ſlow poiſon, after he had retired into a monaſtery, and reſigned the throne to Ervigus.

BAMBA, a province of Congo, in Africa. The inhabitants are of a jet black, and have been made a ſort of Chriſtians by the Portugueſe. The women are ſo modeſt as to cover their breaſts, contrary to the cuſtom of the reſt of the negroes. The elephants in this country are of a very monſtrous ſize, ſome of their teeth weighing upwards of two hundred pounds. The commanding prince is ſaid to be the moſt powerful of all the vaſſals of the king of Congo. Bamba is the capital of this province, and is at a diſtance from the ſea ſide.

BAMBERG, a city of Germany, in Franconia, and capital of a biſhoprick of the ſame name, is ſeated at the confluence of the Main and Rednitz. It is pretty well built, and the ſtreets are wide. It has handſome churches: the cathedral in particular has a lofty ſteeple, and four noble ſpires. There are ſeveral convents for men and women, among among them a fine Benedictine monaſtery, and a college of Jeſuits. There is likewiſe an univerſity, founded in 1585. The parts about the city are very agreeable, but in coming along the road from Nuremberg, there is a very diſagreeable ſight, for in a wood of fir-trees, for a quarter of a mile, you ſee nothing but wheels and gibbets. It is thirty miles north of Nuremberg, and two hundred and fifty north-weſt of Vienna. Long. 10. 15. E. Lat. 50. 10. N.

BAMBERG, a town in Bohemia, at the foot of a mountain, thirty miles ſouth of Glatz. Long. 16. 50. E. Lat. 49. 53. N.

BAMBOCCIO, whoſe real name was Peter Van Laer, was born in the city of Haerlem, in 1584, and was an excellent painter. Travelling to Italy, where he ſtaid a long time, the Italians gave him the name of Bamboccio, on account of his extraordinary figure, for his legs were long, his body ſhort, and his head ſunk into his ſhoulders; yet theſe defects were compenſated by the beauty of his mind, his good-nature and engaging manners hiding the diſagreeableneſs of his perſon. He chiefly ſtudied ſmall figures, yet was very induſtrious in the ſearch after every thing relating to his profeſſion, and was greatly eſteemed at Rome by the painters. He died at threeſcore years of age, by falling into a ditch, near the city of Haerlem, where he was drowned in 1644. His pictures are highly eſteemed.

BAMBRIDGE, or BAINBRIDGE, (CHRISTOPHER) archbiſhop of York, and cardinal prieſt, was born at Hilton, near Appleby, in Weſtmoreland, and, after various preferments, was advanced to the ſee of York in the year 1508 He was employed in ſeveral embaſſies, but chiefly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by that from king Henry VIII. to pope Julius II. who, in 1511, created him a cardinal, with the title of St. Praxede. This prelate died at Rome, July 14, 1514, being poiſoned by one of his domeſtics, in revenge for ſome blows he had given him.

BAMBURGH CASTLE, in Northumberland, ten miles north of Alnwick. It was built by Ida, firſt king of Northumberland, and then it was but a ſmall ſtructure. But being thought of importance to defend the northern parts againſt the incurſions of the Scots, it was made a place of great ſtrength, and was well garriſoned, and provided with ammunition. Its beauty was deſtroyed in the wars between the houſes of York and Lancaſter; ſince which it has been decaying continually; however, the lord of the manor holds a court-leet and baron in a corner thereof. A great part of the tower and ſome of the walls are ſtill remaining, which are ſufficient to ſhow that it has been a caſtle of great ſtrength and beauty. The town to which this caſtle belongs was a ſmall ſtrong place, ſurrounded with walls; but it is now of ſo little account, that it has neither market nor fair, and the living is a curacy of little value.

BAMF, the capital town of the ſhire of Bamf, in the north-eaſt part of Scotland. It is ſeated at the mouth of the river Doverne, but has no harbour, and conſequently no trade, except for corn and ſalmon. It is thirty-two miles north-weſt of Aberdeen, and one hundred and ten north of Edinburgh. Long. 2. 5. W. Lat. 57. 40. N.

BAMF, a ſhire of Scotland, bounded on the ſouth by Aberdeenſhire, on the north by the bay of Cromarty, on the weſt by Murray, and the eaſt by the German Ocean. It is thirty-two miles in length, and thirty in breadth. It contains part of Buchan, Strathdovern, Boyn, Euzy, Strathawin, and Balveny. It contains mountainous and arable lands, and the former yield graſs ſufficient to feed ſheep and cattle. There is a hill which abounds with whet-ſtones and hones, which are ſo plentiful, that ſome cover their houſes with them inſtead of ſlate. It ſends one member to parliament for the ſhire.

BAMPTON, a town in Devonſhire, with two fairs, on Whit-Tueſday and October 24, for cattle. It is ſeated in a bottom, ſurrounded with hills, and contains about one hundred houſes, with a large church. It is fourteen miles north-north-eaſt of Exeter, eighteen ſouth-ſouth-weſt of Minehead, and one hundred and ſixty-ſeven weſt-by-ſouth London. Long. 3. 40. W. Lat. 51. 5. N.

BAMPTON, a town in Oxfordſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays for ſellmongers wares, and a fair on Auguſt 26, for horſes and toys. The living is a vicarage, divided into three parts, which are ſeverally valued in the king's books, at 10l. each, making in the whole 30l. It is ten miles weſt of Oxford, and ſeventy weſt of London.

BANARA, or BANARES, a city of Aſia, in the empire of the mogul, and kingdom of Bengal. The houſes are very well built of brick and free-ſtone, and higher than in the other parts of India, but the ſtreets are very narrow. There are ſeveral caravanſeras, one of which is ſtrong and well built. In the middle of the court of theſe buildings there are two galleries, wherein they ſell ſtuffs, ſilks, and other merchandize. The city is ſeated to the north of the Ganges, which runs along the ſide of its walls. Here the Gentoos have one of their principal pagods, the moſt valuable part of which, in their opinion, is the gate, from which there are ſteps down to the river. On each ſide there are platforms and little dark rooms, ſome of which ſerve for the Bramins, and others for cook-rooms; for after the idolaters have waſhed their bodies, and performed other devotions, they go and dreſs their proviſions, leſt any unclean perſon ſhould touch them; beſides, they believe the drinking the waters of the Ganges waſhes away all their ſins. They carry away earthen bottles of this water, ſealed up; ſome of theſe are carried by the Bramins above a thouſand miles, when they either make preſents of them, or ſell them to the rich at a very great price. They drink it at the end of a feaſt as the moſt precious liquor in the world, and a ſmall cup or two of it is reckoned a great liberality.

The body of the pagod is built in the form of a croſs, and in the middle there is an high dome, which terminates in a ſpire. At the ends there are other towers, round which there are figures in relievo of all ſorts of animals. In the middle of the pagod, under the dome, is an idol, which ſhews only his face and neck; and near him is a figure, made up of the parts of different animals, in maſſy gold. But it would be endleſs to deſcribe all the decorations and riches that are to be found in this ſtructure; we ſhall only obſerve, that on the weſt ſide of the pagod there is a college, where the ſons of the richer ſort of people come for education, and are taught to read and write the learned language of the Bramins, which differs from the vulgar entirely. Near this is another pagod, which they viſit early in the morning, after having ſung and played on muſical inſtruments for half an hour. The idol is in the ſhape of a woman, with a boy like a Cupid, and their worſhip conſiſts in proſtrations and offerings, which laſt the Bramins take care of. Every pagod has a different idol, which they call gods and goddeſſes, each of which has a proper name. Theſe ſort of Indians make it a rule to go in pilgrimage to a pagod near the Ganges, once in their lives. Their great god they call Ram Ram, and theſe pilgrims carry an idol with them in proceſſion to make him a viſit.

About half a mile from the city, towards the north-weſt, there are ſeveral tombs of the Mahommedans, the fineſt of which are placed in the middle of a garden, incloſed with water. That of the king of Boutan is very magnificent. Long. 82. 30. E. Lat. 26. 20. N.

BANBURY, a borough town in Oxfordſhire, with a good market on Thurſdays. It ſtands on the weſt ſide of the rivery Charwell, and is large and well built, containing ſeveral good inns. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, twelve aldermen, and ſix burgeſſes. Out of the aldermen they chooſe a chamberlain. It is twenty-three miles north of Coventry, and ſeventy-eight from London. It ſends one member to parliament. Long. 1. 20. W. Lat. 52. 5. N. The church is a rectory, rated at 22l. in the king's books; and Banbury hoſpital is a diſcharged living of 17l. a year. The fairs are on Thurſday after January 17, for horſes, cows, and ſheep; on the firſt Thurſday in Lent for the ſame, and fiſh; June 13, for horſes, cows, and ſheep; Thurſday after October 20, for hogs, cheeſe, and hiring ſervants; Oct 29, for cheeſe, hops, and cattle.

BANCA, an iſland of Aſia, in the Eaſt-Indies, between Borneo and Sumatra, from which laſt it is ſeparated by a narrow channel. The Dutch have a fort there. Long. 105. 10. E. Lat. 25. S.

BANCOCK, a town of the kingdom of Siam, in Aſia, with a fort, which was once in poſſeſſion of the French, but they were driven from thence in 1688. The houſes are made with reeds or canes, and covered with palm leaves. They have little or no furniture, for the inhabitants are contented to ſit on the floor. They wear no other clothes but a cloth wrapped round their middle to cover their nakedneſs, for the whole country is very poor. Long. 101. 5. E. Lat. 13. 25. N.

BANCK (LAURENCE) profeſſor of civil law in the univerſity of Franeker, was born at Norcopin, in Sweden. He wrote the following books, 1. De Tyrannide Papæ in Reges & Principes Chriſtianos. 2. Romæ triumphans, ſeu Inauguratio Innocentio X. 3. De Bancæ Ruptoribus. 4. De Duellis. 5. De Conſiliis & Conſiliariis Principum, &c. He died October 13, 1662.

BANCROFT (RICHARD) archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the reign of king James I. was born at Farnworth, in Lancaſhire, in September, 1544. He was a rigid diſciplinarian, a learned controverſialiſt, an excellent preacher, and a great ſtateſman, but treated the diſſenters with great ſeverity. He died Nov 2, 1610.

BANCROFT (JOHN) biſhop of Oxford, in the reign of king Charles I. and nephew of the above archbiſhop, was born at Aſtell, or Eſtwell, a ſmall village between Whitney and Burford, in Oxfordſhire, and was advanced to the ſee of Oxford in 1632, upon the tranſlation of Dr. Corbet to that of Norwich. He died in 1640, leaving behind him, at leaſt among the Diſſenters, the character of a corrupt, unpreaching, popiſh prelate.

BANDA, the principal of the ſeven iſlands, called the Banda Iſlands, famous for producing nutmegs. The mace covers the nutmeg as the huſk covers a nut; but this muſt be underſtood with ſome diſtinction, for the nutmeg has three coats, the firſt is fleſhy, ſoft, and juicy, about a finger's breadth thick, of a reddiſh colour, with yellow and purple ſpots. When the fruit is ripe, this opens and diſcovers a reticular coat, which is the mace; under that is a ſhell, which contains the nutmeg. None of theſe iſlands are above twenty miles long. They have had ſeveral maſters, but they now belong to the Dutch. Long. 128. 5. E. Lat. 4. 30. S.

BANDER ABASSA, or GOMBROON. See GOMBROON.

BANDER CONGO, an open ſea-port, in the Perſian gulph, about a hundred miles weſt of Gombroon, but has now little or no trade. Long. 54. 50. E. Lat. 27. 0. N.

BANDORA, the capital of the iſland of Salſet, on the weſt coaſt of the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges. It is ſubject to the Portugueſe, and is divided from Bombay by a narrow chanel. Long. 72. 30. E. Lat. 19. 0. N.

BANDINELLI (BACCIO) a painter and celebrated ſculptor, of Florence, born in the year 1487, was the diſciple of Gio Franciſco Ruſtici, and by the help of anatomy, joined with his other ſtudies, became a very excellent and correct deſigner; but was ſo unfortunate in colouring, that hearing Michael Angelo condemn it for being hard and unpleaſant, he never could be prevailed upon to make any farther uſe of his pencil, but always employed ſome other hand in colouring his deſigns. He however ſucceeded better in ſculpture, and was knighted by the emperor for a deſcent from the croſs, in mezzo relievo. He was likewiſe much in favour with Francis I. and acquired great reputation by ſeveral of his figures, and by abundance of drawings; though they are more admired for the truth of their out-lines and proportion, than for their being either graceful or genteel. He died in the year 1559, aged ſeventy-two.

BANDINUS, one of the moſt ancient ſchool divines. His works were printed in 1519.

BANGIUS (THOMAS) doctor and profeſſor of divinity, in the univerſity of Copenhagen, was born in the year 1600, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learned writings, which are, 1. His Vindiciæ Lacorum Geneſ. xlviii. 16. Geneſ. vi. 1. Pſ. xix. 1. 2. Fontium Iſraelis trias, Jona, Michea, Ruth. 3. Exercitationes Glottologica ac Ortu Linguarum. 4. Exercitationes octo Literariæ Antiquitatis. 5. Obſervationum Philologicarum; and ſeveral others. He died October 27, 1661.

BANGOR, a city of Wales, in Caernarvonſhire. It was formerly a large place, but is now a very mean town, but retains the name of a city, becauſe it is a biſhop's ſee. The principal buildings are the cathedral, the biſhop's palace, and a free-ſchool. The market day is on Fridays, and the fairs are on April 5, June 25, and October 28, all for cattle. It is two hundred and thirty-ſeven miles diſtant from London. Long. 4. 10. W. Lat. 53. 20. N.

BANIANS, a Pagan people, ſpread all over the Eaſt Indies, but are moſt numerous in the province of Guzurat, where they may be diſtinguiſhed from the Mahomedans, by their dreſs; for they do not ſhave their heads, and have a yellow ſpot in their foreheads, made by the prieſt. Their women do not cover their faces, and their garments are quite open before, from their breaſts to their navels. They colour their teeth black, and think it a diſgrace to have white teeth, like dogs and monkies; yet are mighty fond of bracelets and jewels, for they cover their ears, in a manner, all over with pearls. Their garments are very ſlight and airy, agreeable to the heat of the climate. The children of both ſexes go quite naked till they are five years old. The men in thoſe parts, like the Jews in Europe, apply themſeves almoſt entirely to brokerage and trade. They can all write, and are very expert in accounts. They deal in every ſort of commodity, but proviſions of fleſh or fiſh, for as they eat no kind of animal food themſelves, they will not diſtribute it to others.

They are the moſt obſequious, humble, and patient people in the world. Whenever they quarrel, it never ariſes to blows or bloodſhed. The very killing of a fly with them is a crime. The horror they have for blood will never permit them to go to war; and their feeble vegetable diet, with the extreme heat of the ſun, which exhales their ſpirits, renders their conſtitutions weak and effeminate, producing a tractable diſpoſition, and a ſmooth regular deportment. They have as many different ſuperſtitions as they have trades or callings among them. The goldſmith, the merchant, the barber, and the taylor, have all different opinions, and different ceremonies of worſhip. And it is obſervable likewiſe, that every family has its own trade. The ſon muſt follow his father's profeſſion, and ſoon to the lateſt poſterity. For this reaſon all marriages are reſtrained to one ſect, and contracted only between perſons of the ſame perſuaſion and profeſſion. They marry their children at ſeven, eight, or nine years of age, and the girls ſeldom or never ſtay till twelve. When the wedding-day is come, the parents ſit in a hall round a fire, and cauſe the bridegroom and the bride to take three turns about it, during which the bramin or prieſt pronounces certain words, which ſerve for a nuptial benediction. The Banian widows are not permitted to take a ſecond huſband, but have their hair cut off, and their jewels taken away, which is the reaſon they are ſo ready to burn themſelves with the bodies of their dead huſbands. But the Mahomedans will not permit this to be practiſed ſo much as formerly, nor can they do it at all without leave from the governor. Thoſe widows that cannot bear a ſingle life, liſt among the dancers, and then they are free for every body. The men may marry again more than once, and even when the firſt wife is alive, if ſhe is barren. However, the firſt bears the ſway in the family.

As to the religion of the Banians, they believe in general that there is but one God, creator of the univerſe, and that there are ſubordinate deities, which are the objects of worſhip. Theſe our zealous or miſinformed travellers are pleaſed to call devils. But theſe Pagans never acknowledge a devil in the ſame ſenſe as the Chriſtians. Some of their images are deformed, and terrible to look upon, but they are not deſigned to repreſent any bad qualities in their ſuppoſed god. Beſides, they hope to obtain good by their proſtrations and offerings, not evil. Their many different idols in gold, ſilver, braſs, &c. have a ſtrange variety of ſhapes, and it would take up a volume to deſcribe them. Their pagods or temples are not only in towns, but upon the highways, in mountains and woods, where they keep lamps perpetually burning, and ſome of them have no other ornaments but fantaſtical paintings on the walls.

A principal part of their religion conſiſts in outward purifications, of which, bathing or waſhing is the principal. When they are upon a journey, and have no conveniency of a river, they will throw buckets of water on their heads, let the weather be ever ſo cold. They have extravagant opinions about the beginning of the world, affirming it to have been formed millions of years before Adam. They tell ſtrange ſtories of the metamorphoſes of their gods, and the wonderful revolutions that have been brought about by their means. They hold the tranſmigration of ſouls, and affirm they paſs into the bodies of beaſts. Thoſe that enter into the body of a cow are ſuppoſed to be moſt happy, and that the expiation of their ſins will be ſooner complete, than if they had animated any other beaſt. In ſhort, the creed of this ſort of people is more idle and extravagant than ſick men's dreams, and have more analogy with the conceptions of a Bedlamite, than with the writings of the ancient ſages of the Eaſt. The modern Bramins have books written in a dead language, which ſome ſuppoſe to be the productions of the ancient Brachmans, which, if true, muſt give us a very mean opinion of their wiſdom.

All the Banians are very ſuperſtitious, for they will not go out of their houſes till they have ſaid certain prayers, and if they meet an empty cart, an aſs, a dog, an ape, or a deer, at firſt when they go out, they will return to their houſes, and there is nothing to be done out of doors that day.

BANJAR, a river in the iſland of Borneo, in the Eaſt Indies, in the mouth of which there is a town, where the Eaſt India company have a factory.

BANIER (ANTHONY) a native of the dioceſe of Clermont, and member of the academy of belles lettres, at Paris, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing his Mythology of the Heathens, in four volumes, which has been tranſlated into Engliſh; and by his Tranſlation of Ovid's Metamorphoſes. He died at Paris, on the 19th of November, 1741, aged ſixty-nine.

BANISTER (JOHN) an eminent phyſician, who, in 1573, was licenſed by the univerſity of Oxford, and afterwards ſettled at Nottingham, where he had great practice, on account of his admirable ſkill in phyſic and ſurgery. He wrote, among ſeveral other works, one intitled, The Hiſtorie of Man, ſucked from the ſappe of the moſt approved anathomiſtes. In 1663, all his works were collected and printed in quarto.

BANISTER (RICHARD) a phyſician, who flouriſhed at the latter end of the ſixteenth and beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries. He wrote a treatiſe on a hundred and thirteen diſeaſes of the eyes and eye-lids, commonly called Baniſter's Breviary of the Eyes.

BANK, a ſhoal part of the ſea, which is generally of ſand; as the Banks of Newfoundland, famous for cod-fiſhing.

BANKES (Sir JOHN) lord chief juſtice of the common pleas, in the reign of king Charles I. was born at Keſwick, in Cumberland, in 1589, and educated at Oxford, from whence he removed to Gray's Inn, where he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the law, and ſoon became eminent in that profeſſion. In 1634 he was knighted, and made attorney-general, and in 1640 was raiſed to the office of chief juſtice of the common pleas. He followed king Charles to York, and there, in 1642, ſigned the declaration of the lords and gentlemen then with his majeſty. The ſame year, the univerſity of Oxford ſhewed their reſpect for him, by creating him doctor of laws, and his majeſty cauſed him to be ſworn of his privy council. In the ſummer circuit he loſt all his credit at Weſtminſter; for having declared from the bench at Saliſbury, that the actions of Eſſex, Manchester, and Waller, were treaſonable, and the commons voted him, and the reſt of the judges in that ſentiment, traitors. Mean while, lady Bankes, with her family, being at Corſſe-caſtle, in the iſle of Purbeck, in Dorſetſhire, gave an inſtance of female bravery that deſerves to be handed down to poſterity.

The friends of the parliament had already reduced all the ſea-coaſt, except Corſſe-caſtle, and were reſolved to reduce that likewiſe; when Sir John's lady, though ſhe had about her only her children, a few ſervants and tenants, and little hopes of relief, refuſed to ſurrender that fortreſs. Upon which, Sir W. Earl, and Thomas Trenchard, Eſq. who commanded the parliament forces, had recourſe to very rough meaſures: they thrice attempted the place by ſurpriſe, and were as often repulſed with loſs, though the firſt time lady Bankes had but five men in the place, and during the whole time her garriſon never exceeded forty. They then interdicted her the markets, and at length formally beſieged the fortreſs with a very conſiderable force, a train of artillery, and a great quantity of ammunition, which forced the little town dependant on the caſtle to ſurrender. The beſiegers now imagined the buſineſs done; when the lady, taking advantage of their remiſſneſs, procured a ſupply of proviſions and ammunition, which enabled her ſtill to hold out. At laſt, the earl of Carnarvon, with a conſiderable body of horſe and dragoons, came into the neighbourhood of Purbeck, when Sir W. Earl raiſed the ſiege, on the 3d of Auguſt, 1643, ſo precipitately, that he left his tents ſtanding, together with his ammunition and artillery, which all fell into the hands of lady Bankes's houſhold. Sir John was at this time at Oxford with the king, where he continued to diſcharge his duty as a privy counſellor, till the laſt day of his life, December 28, 1644.

BANKS (JOHN) a dramatic writer, was bred to the law, and belonged to the ſociety of Gray's Inn; but his genius being chiefly turned to tragedy, he wrote, 1. The Rival Kings. 2. The Deſtruction of Troy. 3. Virtue Betrayed, or Anna Bullen. 4. The Unhappy Favourite, or the Earl of Eſſex. 5. The Innocent Uſurper, or the Death of Lady Jane Grey; and 6. Cyrus the Great. Though his language has been cenſured as unharmonious, yet he is allowed to have conſiderable merit; for in all his plays he forcibly rouſes the paſſions, keeps the ſcene buſy, and never ſuffers his characters to languiſh. His Earl of Eſſex has been often acted, and never failed to affect the audience, and his Iſland Queens, or the Death of Mary Queen of Scots, though at firſt rejected, was ordered to be acted by queen Anne, when it met with great applauſe, and has often been ſucceſsfully revived.

BANNIER (JOHN) a celebrated Swediſh general, twice defeated the Saxons, beat the Imperialiſts, and died in 1641.

BANTAM, formerly the capital of a large kingdom, in the iſland of Java, in the Eaſt Indies, and a port-town of great trade. The Engliſh Eaſt India company had once a factory at this place, but the Dutch not only depoſed the king of Bantam, but expelled the Engliſh, in a time of full peace, and ſtill retain the poſſeſſion, both of the city and kingdom. However, they ſuffer one of the poſterity of the royal family to enjoy the title of king. This revolution happened in 1682, when they depoſed the old king, ſet his ſon on the throne, and then pretended to act by his authority. However, the natives bear no good-will to the Dutch, for if one of them goes a muſket-ſhot from the fort, it is five to one he never returns, for they are dextrous at throwing a lance, or ſhooting poiſoned darts through a wooden pipe or trunk; and the king always pretends the criminal cannot be found. The town ſtands about ſixty miles weſtward of Batavia, and the Dutch annually export from thence ten thouſand tons of pepper. We ſhall ſpeak particularly of the habits, cuſtoms, natural hiſtory, and religion of the inhabitants, when we come to treat of Java. Long. 105. 16. E. Lat. 6. 20. S.

BANTRY, a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, and province of Munſter. It is ſeated on a bay of the ſea, to which it gives its name, in the ſouth-weſt part of the kingdom. Long. 9. 15. W. Lat. 51. 30. N.

BAPAUME, a city of France, in the Artois, ſeated in a dry country, without a river or ſpring, about thirteen miles ſouth-eaſt from Arras, and ninety-three north of Paris. It is fortified, and has two gates oppoſite each other. The ſtreets are regular, but very ill paved; and there are two ſquares, the one in the middle of the city, and the other under the caſtle. The laſt is more regular than the firſt, and the great ſtreets run into it, from the two gates. The circumference of the town is very irregular, and the fortifications conſiſt of ſeven baſtions, three of which ſurround the caſtle. It is encompaſſed with a ditch, and has ſeven half moons, each of which has its particular ditch, which communicates with the great one. The principal buildings are, the church of Notre Dame, the caſtle, and the town-houſe. Long. 3. 1. E. Lat. 50. 6. N.

BAR, in the ſea-language, is a bank of ſand, or a chain of rocks, at the mouth of a river, or at the entrance into a port, which cannot be got over but at high water.

BAR, a duchy of France, bounded on the eaſt by Lorrain, on the north by Luxembourg, on the weſt by Champagne, on the ſouth by the ſame country, and Franche Compte. It is croſſed by the river Meuſe from north to ſouth, and watered by ſeveral other rivers, which render it very fertile. It is divided into four bailiages, Baſſigni, Bar, St. Michael, and Clermont. The chief towns are, Bar le Duc, Clermont, St. Michael, Longuey, Pont a Mouſſon, and Stenay. In 1736 it was given to Staniſlaus, formerly king of Poland.

BAR, a ſtrong city of Podolia, in Poland, upon the river Kiow, ſixty five miles north-weſt from Kaminec, and fifty-five north-eaſt from Bracklaw. Long. 28. 30. E. Lat. 50. 6. N.

BAR LE DUC, the capital of the duchy of Bar, is ſeated on the declivity of a hill. It is divided into the Lower and the Higher Town; the Lower is watered by the rivulet Orney, which abounds with excellent trouts. The wines of Bar are excellent, and not inferior to Champagne for delicacy. It is forty miles weſt of Nancy, and two hundred and forty eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 30. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

BAR SUR AUBE, an ancient town of France, in Champagne, where there are excellent wines. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, a hundred and four miles eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 50. E. Lat. 48. 14. N.

BAR SUR SEINE, a town of France, in the duchy of Burgundy, ſeated between a mountain, which covers it on the weſt, and the river Seine, which runs on the eaſt. It has three gates, and one pariſh church, a convent or two, and a ſmall hoſpital. It is twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Bar ſur Aube, and a hundred and four ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 4. 30. E. Lat. 48. 5. N.

BARACOA, a town in the north-eaſt part of the iſland of Cuba, in North America, fifty miles north-eaſt of St. Jago de Cuba. Long. 76. 10. W. Lat. 21. 5. N.

BARANCA DE MALAMBA, a town of Terra Firma, in America, with a biſhop's ſee, and a good haven. It is a place of great trade, and is ſeated on the river Magdaleine, ſeventy-five miles north-eaſt of Carthagena, and twenty miles from the mouth of the river. Long. 75. 30. W. Lat. 11. 10. N.

BARANWAHR, a town of Lower Hungary, in a county of the ſame name, taken by the emperor of Germany from the Turks, in 1684. It is ſeated between Buda and Belgrade, on the rivulet Craſſo, which falls into the Danube, ſixteen miles north of Eſſeck. Long. 20. 5. E. Lat. 46. 0. N.

BARANZANO (REDEMPTUS) a Barnabite friar, was one of the firſt who, in the ſeventeenth century, ventured to depart from the Ariſtotelian way of philoſophiſing. He wrote a work, De Novis Opinionibus Phyſicæ, and according to La Mothe le Vayer, was one of the firſt wits of the age.

BARATIER (PHILIP) a prodigy of learning, was the ſon of Francis Baratier, miniſter of the French church at Schwobach, near Nuremburgh, where he was born, on the 10th of June, 1721. At three years of age he was capable of reading correctly. The French was his mother tongue, and he had learned ſome words of the German. His father began to talk Latin to him, and he began of himſelf to utter it at random. This manner of proceeding, under the ſhew of amuſement in walking with him, either abroad or at home, ſucceeded ſo well, that in leſs than a twelvemonth, the Latin became as familiar to him as the French and German, ſo that, when he was four years old, he ſpoke theſe three languages, without mixing or confounding them, talking French to his mother, Latin to his father, and German to the maid-ſervant and his play-fellows. About the middle of his fifth year, his father, by an imperceptible method, and an eaſy introduction, taught him Greek, with ſuch ſucceſs, that at the end of fifteen months, the child perfectly underſtood all the Greek hiſtorical books in the New Teſtament, and readily tranſlated them into Latin. His father, by the ſame method, conducted him to the knowledge of the Hebrew, which he began in October, 1726, when he was five years and eight months old, and was as little difficult to him as the former; and in a year's time he perfectly knew all the books of the Hebrew Code, without that confuſion of rules that makes learning a burthen to youth. His father perceiving him much delighted with the Hebrew, employed the three following years in cultivating that tongue; at the end of which, the young ſcholar was ſo expert in the Hebrew text, that he could not only give at firſt ſight, from a Bible without points, the ſenſe of the original in Latin and French, but could tranſlate the Latin and French verſions into Hebrew. This, he not only performed with regard to the hiſtorical books, but even thoſe of Job, the Pſalms, Proverbs, and Iſaiah, which are known to be the moſt difficult. He afterwards ſtudied the rabbinical writers, which he carried on till his twelfth year, and at the ſame time became acquainted with the Chaldaic, Syriac, and Arabic, ſo far, as not only to read the Scripture, but other writings in thoſe languages. He alſo applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the Greek fathers, and the councils of the four firſt ages of the church, which gave him a taſte for eccleſiaſtical antiquity and divinity. In June 1731, he was matriculated in the univerſity of Altorf, and at the meeting of the reformed French and German churches, of the circle of Franconia, at Chriſtian Erlang, in 1732, his father preſented him to that venerable aſſembly, who, aſtoniſhed at his amazing talents, admitted him to aſſiſt at their deliberations, though he was not quite eleven years old; and to preſerve the memory of ſo ſingular an event, they had it regiſtered in the Acts of the Synod. In 1734, the margrave of Brandenburg Anſpach granted our young ſcholar the privilege of whatever books he wanted, from the Anſpach library, with a penſion of fifty florins. The ſame year, a pair of globes falling into his hands, he contemplated them with ſuch earneſtneſs and pleaſure, that, by the aſſiſtance of a few books, he, in eight or ten days time, obtained ſo clear a notion of all the ancient and modern ſyſtems of geography, that about three months after, he formed a project for the diſcovery of the longitude, which he communicated to the Royal Society at London, and the Royal Academy of Sciences at Berlin. His father being appointed by the late king of Pruſſia, miniſter of the French church at Stetin, in Pomerania, he, in 1735, viſited the univerſities of Jena, Leipſic, and Hall, in his way; and at the laſt mentioned univerſity, received the degree of maſter of arts. On his arrival at Berlin, the king of Pruſſia converſed with him very often, and he received particular marks of bounty from all the royal family. The queen, beſides a preſent in money, gave him what books he choſe, out of the library; and had his picture drawn. Even the Royal Academy at Berlin received him into their body. He had, from his infancy, a weak and delicate conſtitution, and being taken ill, prepared for death like a true Chriſtian hero and philoſopher, and died on the 5th of October, 1740, in the twentieth year of his age, after having publiſhed eleven different pieces, and left twenty-ſix manuſcripts on various ſubjects.

BARBA (St.) a virgin martyr of Nicomedia, in Aſia Minor, flouriſhed in the third century, in the reign of the emperor Maximinus. Dioſcorus, her father, was a rich Pagan, of an illuſtrious birth. Barba had a fine perſon, and a noble and delicate mind, which ſhe cultivated by the ſtudy of polite literature. The firſt uſe ſhe made of this learning, was ſearching into the knowledge of the Author of all Things, and deſpiſing the worſhip of idols. While ſhe was in this happy diſpoſition, ſhe learned, that a very wiſe and learned man, named Origen, made known, in the city of Alexandria, the One true God. Filled with joy at this news, ſhe privately wrote to that pious divine, to inſtruct her in the religion he preached. He immediately wrote an anſwer, and ſent it by a prieſt, named Valentine, who baptiſed her. In the mean time, Barba having attained the age of puberty, many of the moſt diſtinguiſhed young men of Nicomedia were deſirous of marrying her, and her father perſuaded her to make her choice; but this ſhe reſolutely oppoſed. A ſhort time after, having diſcourſed with her father on the Chriſtian religion, and having ſhewn, on different occaſions, marks of the greateſt contempt for Paganiſm, Dioſcorus was ſo enraged, that he cauſed her to be cruelly ſcourged, and complained of her to Martian, the prefect of the city; on which that magiſtrate had her to be brought before his tribunal, and threatened her with the moſt dreadful torments, if ſhe refuſed to ſacrifice to the gods. When Barba deſpiſing his menaces and his gods, he cauſed her to be torn with whips, and thrown into a dungeon, where ſhe lay, expecting the day of her laſt puniſhment. It is ſaid, that Barba being miraculouſly cured of her wounds, was again delivered to the executioner, who burnt her ſides with torches, and afflicted her delicate form with a thouſand other cruelties; but that nothing being able to ſhake her conſtancy, Dioſcorus, who was preſent, was ſo enraged, that he cut off his daughter's head with his own hand. It is alſo pretended, that this barbarous father, returning with Martian, and his attendants, the fire of heaven ſuddenly conſumed them ſo totally, that there was not even the leaſt remains of their aſhes.

BARBADILLO (Alphonso Jerome de Salas) a celebrated Spaniſh poet, born at Madrid, was diſtinguiſhed by his genius, his eloquence, and his learning, and was one of the poets who moſt contributed to perfect the Spaniſh tongue. His comedies are greatly admired. He died about the year 1630.

BARBADOES, an iſland of North America, the eaſtermoſt of the windward iſlands. It is thirty-two miles in length, and twenty-two in breadth. The air is very hot, and would be intolerably ſo, if it was not for the trade-wind, which conſtantly blows from the eaſt, except there chance to be a hurricane in July and Auguſt; but this they are not much ſubject to. It is a plain country, for which reaſon they have ſcarce any thing that can be called a river. The land was very fertile, but it is no wonder that length of time ſhould begin to wear it out for want of manure. The fields are always green, and they in ſome ſenſe enjoy a perpetual ſpring. The iſland produces ſugars, indigo, cotton-wool, ginger, and rum. Their fruits are oranges, ananas, or pine apples, citrons, limes, guavas, plantains, &c. It alſo produces a kind of petrolæum called Barbadoes tar, which riſes out of the earth, and is of great uſe in medicine. Barbadoes contains near twenty thouſand white inhabitants, and one hundred thouſand negroes. They receive moſt of their corn, cattle, fleſh, and ſalted fiſh, from the northern colonies, and their clothes and furniture from England. There are but few trees in this iſland, and therefore we ſhall defer ſpeaking of the production of this climate till we come to ſpeak of Jamaica. The capital is Bridge-Town, which ſee in its proper place.

BARBARA, wife to the emperor Sigiſmund, and the daughter of Herman, count of Cilia, in Hungary. She was remarkable for lewdneſs and atheiſm, and engaged in plots with ſeveral Bohemian lords, in order to drive Sigiſmund out of the kingdom; but he diſcovering this contrivance, condemned her to perpetual impriſonment. When he was dead ſhe was ſet at liberty, and as ſhe deſigned to marry again, ſomebody repreſented to her the example of the turtle-dove, who continues ſingle after the death of her mate. "If you will propoſe to me, ſaid ſhe, the example of birds, "propoſe that of pigeons and ſparrows." She grew old at Grats, in Bohemia, without renouncing her debaucheries, and died there about the year 1451.

BARBARINO, a town of Tuſcany, in Italy, ſeated on the river Sieve, at the foot of Mount Appennine, ſixteen miles north of Florence. Long. 12. 15. E. Lat. 43. 40. N.

BARBARO (Francis) a noble Venetian, greatly famed in the fifteenth century. He had not only a fund of learning, but was very eloquent; he was no leſs a ſtateſman than a man of letters, and this he ſhewed in all the public employments with which he was intruſted, and eſpecially in his government of Breſcia; the vigilance, reſolution, activity, and other great virtues he diſcovered in defence of that city, when beſieged for three years together by the forces of the Duke of Milan, can never be ſufficiently admired. He died in the year 1454.

Barbaro (Hermolaus) grandſon of the preceding, and one of the moſt learned men of the fifteenth century, was born at Venice, May 21, 1454. He was an author at eighteen years of age, and notwithſtanding the public employments with which he was very early entruſted, and being ſent on embaſſies to the emperor, the king of the Romans, and the pope, he cultivated polite learning, and publiſhed ſeveral works, among which is, A Treatiſe on the Agreement of Aſtronomy with Phyſics, and undertook the moſt difficult tranſlations, as Themiſtius upon Ariſtotle, and that of Dioſcorides, whoſe text he corrected, and added a learned Commentary. He corrected above five thouſand paſſages in Pliny, and reſtored three hundred in Pomponius Mela. He had alſo an extraordinary facility in making verſes, and it is ſaid that he compoſed above twelve thouſand. Pope Innocent VIII. to whom he was ſent ambaſſador, nominated him to the patriarchate of Aquileia, but the ſenate of Venice, diſpleaſed at his accepting of it without their permiſſion, forbad his taking advantage of the pope's nomination, under the penalty of the confiſcation of all his goods. His father being unable to cauſe this decree to be revoked, died of grief, and Hermolaus, who would not renounce the patriarchate, died at Rome, in a kind of exile, in the year 1493.

Barbaro (Daniel) grand-nephew of the preceding, lived in the ſixteenth century, and procured himſelf a great reputation by his learning. He publiſhed a Commentary upon the Five Fragments of Porphyrius; A Commentary upon the Three Books of Ariſtotle's Rhetoric, which had been tranſlated into Latin by Hermolaus Barbaro; and to him we are obliged for the edition of Speron Sperone's Dialogues.

Barbaro (Daniel) of the ſame family with the preceding, was patriarch of Aquileia, and famous for his learning. He was ambaſſador from Venice to England, and was one of the father's of the Council of Trent, where he acted with great zeal for the intereſt of the pope. He wrote, 1. A Commentary upon Vitruvius. 2. Catena Græcorum Patrum in quinquaginta Pſalmos Latine verſa. 3. La Prattica della Perſpettiva. He died in 1569, at forty-one years of age.

BARBAROSSA, a famous pirate, and king of Algiers in the ſixteenth century. His true name was Horuc, and he received that of Barbaroſſa from the red colour of his beard. He was the ſon of a potter in the iſle of Leſbos, and both he and his brother Hayradin, being prompted by a reſtleſs and enterprizing ſpirit, forſook their father's trade, and joined a crew of pirates, among whom they ſoon diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their valour and activity, and becoming maſters of a ſmall brigantine, obtained ſuch ſucceſs, that they aſſembled a fleet of twelve gallies, beſides many veſſels of ſmaller force, of which Barbaroſſa was admiral, and his brother the ſecond in command. They called themſelves the Friends of the Sea, and the Enemies of all who ſail upon it; and their names ſoon became terrible, from the ſtreights of the Dardanelles to thoſe of Gibraltar. As they frequently carried their prizes into the ports of Barbary, and enriched the inhabitants with the ſale of their booty, they became welcome gueſts in every place at which they touched. While they were in this proſperous ſituation, Eutemi, king of Algiers, having frequently attempted, in vain, to take a fort built by the Spaniſh governors of Oran, not far from his capital, applied to Barbaroſſa, whoſe valour the Africans conſidered as irreſiſtible. The active corſair gladly accepted of the invitation, and leaving his brother Hayradin with the fleet, marched at the head of five thouſand men to Algiers, where he was joyfully received. His forces gave him the command of the town, and ſecretly murdering the monarch whom he had come to aſſiſt, he cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king of Algiers in his ſtead. The authority he had thus baſely uſurped he endeavoured to eſtabliſh by an unbounded liberality to thoſe who favoured his promotion, and a no leſs unbounded cruelty towards all whom he had any reaſon to diſtruſt. He now attacked the neighbouring king of Tremexen, and having vanquiſhed him in battle, added his dominions to thoſe of Algiers. At the ſame time he continued to infeſt the coaſts of Spain and Italy, with fleets that reſembled the armaments of a great monarch, rather than the light ſquadrons of a corſair. The devaſtations which theſe committed obliged the emperor Charles V. king of Spain, in the year 1518, to furniſh the marqueſs de Comares, governor of Oran, with troops ſufficient to attack him. That officer, aſſiſted by the dethroned king of Tremecen, executed the commiſſion with ſuch ſpirit, that Babaroſſa's troops being beat in ſeveral engagements, he ſhut himſelf up in Tremecen, which he defended to the laſt extremity; but being at laſt overtaken in attempting to make his eſcape, was ſlain fighting with the moſt obſtinate valour.

BARBAROSSA II. the brother of the former, aſſumed the ſceptre of Algiers with the ſame ambition, abilities, and cruelty. His original name, as has been already intimated, was Hayradin, and he enjoyed greater ſucceſs than his brother. His reign being undiſturbed by the arms of the Spaniards, he regulated, with admirable prudence, the interior government of his kingdom, carried on his naval operations with great vigour, and extended his conqueſts on the continent of Africa. But perceiving that the Moors and Arabs ſubmitted to his government with the utmoſt impatience, and apprehending that his depredations would at length draw upon him the arms of the Chriſtians, he put his dominions under the protection of the Grand Seignior, and received from him a body of Turkiſh ſoldiers, ſufficient for his ſecurity, both againſt his domeſtic and foreign enemies, and at length Solyman offered him the command of the Turkiſh fleet againſt Andrew Doria, the greateſt ſea officer of that age. Proud of this diſtinction, Barbaroſſa, in 1535, repaired to Conſtantinople, where, mingling the arts of a courtier with the boldneſs of a corſair, he gained the entire confidence both of the ſultan and his vizier, and communicated to them a ſcheme he had formed of making himſelf maſter of Tunis, then the moſt flouriſhing kingdom on the coaſt of Africa.

His hopes of ſucceſs were founded on the inteſtine diviſions in the kingdom of Tunis. Mahmed, the laſt king, leaving thirty-four ſons by different wives, named Muley-Haſeen, one of the youngeſt, his ſucceſſor, who firſt poiſoned his father, in order to prevent his changing his mind, and then put to death all his brothers whom he could get into his power. Alraſchid, one of the eldeſt, eſcaping, found a retreat among the wandering Arabs, and, by their aſſiſtance, made ſeveral attempts to recover the throne, which of right belonged to him; but theſe proving unſucceſsful, and the Arabs being ready to deliver him to his mercileſs brother, he fled to Algiers, and implored the protection of Barbaroſſa, who received him with every poſſible demonſtration of friendſhip and reſpect. Being at that time ready to ſet ſail for Conſtantinople, he eagerly perſuaded Alraſchid to accompany him thither, promiſing him effectual aſſiſtance from Solyman, whom he repreſented to be the moſt generous, as well as the moſt powerful monarch in the world. But no ſooner were they arrived at Conſtantinople, than the falſe corſair laid before the ſultan his plan for conquering Tunis, and annexing it to the Turkiſh empire, by making uſe of the name of this exiled prince. Solyman approved of this perfidious propoſal. A powerful fleet and numerous army were ſoon aſſembled, at the ſight of which the credulous Alraſchid flattered himſelf that he ſhould ſoon enter his capital in triumph: but juſt as this unhappy prince was going to embark, he was arreſted by the ſultan's order, ſhut up in the ſeraglio, and was never heard of more.

Barbaroſſa ſailed from Conſtantinople with a fleet of two hundred and fifty veſſels, and appearing before Tunis, landed his men, pretending that he came to aſſert the right of Alraſchid, whom he left ſick aboard the admiral galley. The fort of Goletta, which commands the bay, ſoon fell into his hands, and the inhabitants of Tunis, weary of Muley Haſeen's government, took arms, and declared for Alraſchid with ſuch zeal, that the tyrant fled, leaving all his treaſures behind him. The gates were immediately ſet open to Barbaroſſa, but when Alraſchid himſelf did not appear, and when, inſtead of his name, that of Solyman alone was heard among the acclamations of the Turkiſh ſoldiers, the people of Tunis began to ſuſpect the corſair's treachery; and their ſuſpicions being ſoon converted into certainty, they, with the utmoſt fury, ran to arms, and ſurrounded the citadel, in which was Barbaroſſa; but he having foreſeen ſuch a revolution, was prepared for it, and turning againſt them, the artillery on the ramparts, by one briſk diſcharge of it, and of his ſmall arms, he diſperſed the numerous aſſailants, forced them to acknowledge Solyman as their ſovereign, and to ſubmit to himſelf as his viceroy. He firſt put the kingdom in a proper poſture of defence, ſtrengthened the citadel which commands the town, and fortifying the Goletta in a regular manner, made it the principal ſtation for his fleet, and his great arſenal both for military and naval ſtores. He now carried on his depredations againſt the Chriſtian ſtates with greater violence than ever. All Chriſtendom ſeemed to expect that the emperor Charles V. at that time the greateſt and moſt fortunate prince in Europe, would put an end to this odious ſpecies of oppreſſion. At the ſame time Muley Haſeen, the exiled king of Tunis, finding that none of the Mahommetan princes in Africa were willing to aſſiſt him in recovering his throne, applied to Charles, who being equally deſirous of delivering his dominions from the dangerous neighbourhood of Barbaroſſa, of appearing as the protector of an unfortunate prince, and of acquiring the glory annexed in that age to every expedition againſt the Mahometans, prepared for invading Tunis. In the mean time Barbaroſſa hearing of the emperor's immenſe armament, called in all his corſairs, drew from Algiers what forces could be ſpared, and diſpatching meſſengers to all the African princes, to inform them that this Chriſtian prince was coming to extirpate the Mahometan faith, twenty thouſand horſe, together with a vaſt body of foot, ſoon aſſembled at Tunis.

On the 16th of July, 1535, the emperor ſet ſail, with a fleet conſiſting of near five hundred veſſels, with about thirty thouſand regular troops on board, and landed within ſight of Tunis, and, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, reduced the Goletta, and became maſter of Barbaroſſa's fleet, conſiſting of eighty-ſeven gallies and galliots, together with his arſenal, and three hundred cannon, moſtly braſs, which were planted on the ramparts, a prodigious number in thoſe days. Barbaroſſa was ſtill maſter of Tunis, in which city were ten thouſand Chriſtian ſlaves, whom he ſhut up in the citadel, and ordered them to be maſſacred without mercy, before he left the city, in order to come to a battle with the emperor. But the barbarity of this propoſal was rejected by the officers, and he conſented to ſpare their lives. Charles marched towards Tunis, and the Moors and Arabs, emboldened by their vaſt ſuperiority in numbers, attacked the emperor, but were ſoon routed, and flying back to the city, found it in the utmoſt confuſion, the Chriſtian ſlaves having knocked off their fetters, and overpowered the Turkiſh garriſon, turned the artillery of the fort againſt their former maſters. Barbaroſſa fled to Bona, and the ſoldiers ruſhing into the town, began to kill and plunder without diſtinction, and above thirty thouſand of the innocent inhabitants periſhed on that unhappy day, and ten thouſand were carried away as ſlaves. Muley Haſeen took poſſeſſion of a throne ſurrounded with carnage, and the emperor lamented the blind fury of his troops, which had ſtained the luſtre of his victory, and there was only one ſpectacle that afforded him any ſatisfaction; ten thouſand Chriſtian ſlaves, among whom were ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, met him as he entered the town, and falling on their knees, thanked and bleſſed him as their deliverer. Theſe he took on board; and having engaged Muley Haſeen to conclude a treaty, in which he promiſed to do homage to the emperor, to releaſe all the Chriſtian ſlaves in his dominions, and never more keep any of the emperor's ſubjects in ſervitude, he ſet ſail and returned to Europe. Barbaroſſa baroſſa afterwards returned to Algiers, and at length died, by drinking to exceſs, in 1547, at eighty years of age.

BARBARY, a country of Africa, bounded on the eaſt by Egypt, on the weſt by the Atlantic Ocean, on the ſouth by Biledulgerid, Mount Atlas, and the Deſert of Barca, and on the north by the Mediterranean Sea. It is near two thouſand miles long, and ſeven hundred and twenty in ſome parts, but not half that breadth in others. It is ſituated between ſeven and forty-four degrees of longitude, and twenty-five and thirty-ſeven degrees of latitude. This country, though mountainous and woodland, is the fineſt in the north part of Africa, for the ſoil is fertile, and produces all the fruits which grow in Spain, Italy, and the ſouth parts of France. They have likewiſe a great quantity of dates, Indian corn, and cotton. The ſheep have large tails, generally weighing twenty-five pounds each. Their horſes, called Barbs, are very much admired for their beauty and ſtrength. They have a great number of camels, and ſome elephants; there are likewiſe lions, leopards, tygers, panthers, buffaloes, and monkies. They export barbs, cotton, and linen cloth, corn, dried fruit, figs, raiſins, dates, Turky and Morocco leather, and coral.

The chief rivers are the Ghir, the Ziz, and the Dras. The chief mountains are the Atlas, which gives its name to the Atlantic or Weſtern Ocean, and runs parallel to the coaſt at ſome diſtance, the whole length of Barbary.

Barbary is divided into four great countries or ſtates, Morocco, Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, which lie along the Mediterranean Sea, and the Ocean, from weſt to eaſt. The The original inhabitants of Barbary are the Moors, who dwell chiefly in Morocco and about Mount Atlas. In the firſt century after Mahommed, the Arabs over-ran all Barbary, and now inhabit the plains. Another ſort of inhabitants are the Turks, who, in the ſixteenth century, made themſelves maſters of the coaſts and towns of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. The languages ſpoken here are the Mooriſh, which is a dialect of the ancient Punic, or Hebrew; the Arabic ſpoken by the Arabs; the Turkiſh by the Turks; the Gemic, or Lingua Franca, which is a corruption of the Spaniſh and Portugueſe, and is ſpoken on the coaſts; and the Famacette, a perfect jargon.

With regard to the government, Morocco has princes of its own, of the race of Mahommed; hence they are called ſharif, or noble, and they prefix the title of muley to their name: we call them emperors. Algiers is governed by a prince called the dey, under whom each of the provinces is governed by a bey, which is the title of the ſovereigns of Tripoli and Tunis. Theſe laſt three may be ſaid to be republics of ſoldiers, under the government of the Turks.

BARBARY (the deſart of) called by ſome the Sarrah, is bounded on the north by Barbary, on the eaſt by part of Egypt and Nubia, on the ſouth by Negroland and Guinea, and on the weſt by the Weſtern Ocean. It is ſeated between thirty minutes, and forty-five degrees thirty minutes of longitude, and between fifteen and twenty-ſeven degrees of latitude; it is about two thouſand five hundred and twenty miles long from weſt to eaſt, and about ſeven hundred and twenty broad from north to ſouth in ſome parts, but in others not half ſo much. This deſart is barren, ſandy, and hot, but agrees well enough with the natives, though the caravans are often reduced to great extremities in croſſing this country to and from Negroland. There are few rivers or mountains of note; the moſt remarkable are the mountains along the ſea-coaſt, and the river St. Antony, which falls into the ocean to the ſouth of cape Blanco; there are alſo the lakes of Kayer and Kayde, on the borders of Guinea. The country is divided into five parts, on account of the different tribes that inhabit it, Sanhaga, Swenziga, Twarga, Lamptun, Berdoa, and Levata, lie one after another from weſt to eaſt. A geographer, who has travelled through theſe parts, gives the following account of the people. They have no rule nor legal form of government; their dreſs is a piece of coarſe cloth, which covers a ſmall part of their bodies; they have a ſmall turban of black cloth on their heads, and their principal men wear a ſhort gown of blue cotton, which reaches down to their knees, with wide ſleeves; they ride on dromedaries or camels, between the two boſſes, or between the boſs and the neck; they uſe no ſtirrups nor ſpurs, but prick the beaſt with a goad; the dromedaries uſed for riding have the griſtles of their noſes bored, through which they run a leathern ſtrap, and uſe it inſtead of a bridle. Inſtead of beds, they have mats made of reeds and canes; and their tents are of cloth made with camels-hair, or fibres of the date-tree; they have no bread, nor any kind of grain, but are nouriſhed chiefly with camel's-milk in the morning; and at night they eat fleſh, when they can get it boiled in milk; they have no plates, trenchers, knives, nor forks, but take a piece in their hand, and eat it like a piece of bread; they eat the broth in the hollow of their hands inſtead of ſpoons; while they have milk, they can ſhift without water, which they ſometimes do for ſeveral weeks together, when water is hard to come at; the camels alſo live without water, when they have no graſs to feed on. The men ſpend their whole time in hunting and robbing, and ſtay but a few days in a place, that is, while the graſs laſts. Though they have no legal government, yet each party has a chief, whom they honour and obey as their king. They are illiterate, and have no acquaintance with arts and ſciences. Their women are well featured, plump, and finely ſhaped, but their ſkins are of a dark colour. When a ſtranger happens to come among them, they are civil enough; but as for the caravans that paſs through their territories, they demand coarſe cloth to the value of a ducat. The princes entertain their gueſts with camels-fleſh, oſtriches, and ſuch other game as the wilderneſs affords, as alſo with cakes made of millet and the leſſer Guinea corn, with plenty of dates and milk; however, they look upon corn and bread as a foreign luxury, and therefore eat none of it themſelves, but only keep it for ſtrangers.

BARBATIUS (ANDREW) a celebrated civilian of the fifteenth century, was born at Noto, or, according to others, at Meſſina. He was profeſſor of civil law at Bologna; he wrote ſeveral works, and died in 1482.

BARBAY (PETER) a famous profeſſor of philoſophy at the college of Beauvais, at Paris, was a native of Abbeville. He printed a Courſe of Philoſophy, and died on the 2d of September, 1664.

BARBAZAN (ARNOLD WILLIAM) chamberlain to king Charles VII. and general of the armies of that prince was, on account of his glorious actions, called the Knight without Reproach. He conquered the Chevalier de l'Eſcales in the famous ſingle combat fought in 1404, at the head of the armies of England and France. He defended Melun againſt the Engliſh, and died, in 1432, of the wounds he had received at the battle of Belleville, near Nancy. His body was carried to St. Denys, and buried amongſt thoſe of the kings of France.

BARBERINI (FRANCIS) one of the moſt excellent poets of his age, was born at Barberino, in Tuſcany, in the year 1264. As his mother was of Florence, he ſettled in that city, where his profeſſion of the law, but eſpecially the beauty of his poetry, raiſed him a very conſiderable character. The greateſt part of his works are loſt; but that which is intitled the Precepts of Love, which is a moral poem calculated to inſtruct thoſe in their duty who have a regard for glory, virtue, and eternity, has had a better fate.

BARBERINO, a town of Italy, in Tuſcany, and in the Florentino. It is ſeated at the foot of the Appennine mountains, on the river Sieva. It is twelve miles ſouth of Florence. Long. 12. 15. E. Lat. 43. 40. N.

BARBEYRAC (JOHN) a native of Beſiers, and profeſſor of civil law and hiſtory at Lauſanne, and afterwards at Groningen, known by his tranſlantions of Puffendorf's two celebrated works, Grotius's Treatiſe De Jure Belli & Pacis, and ſeveral of Tillotſon's Sermons; by his being the author of a Treatiſe on the Morals of the Fathers, and a Defence of the Dutch Eaſt India Company, &c. His works were printed at Amſterdam, in 1739, in folio.

BARBIER D'ANCOUR (JOHN) a native of Langres, was advocate in the parliament of Paris, and one of the beſt French writers in the ſeventeenth century. He was preceptor to one of Mr. Colbert's ſons, and comptroller of the king's buildings, and, in 1683, was received into the French academy in the room of Mezeray. He wrote ſeveral works, but that which is moſt known is intitled the Sentiments of Cleanthes on the Converſations of Ariſteus and Eugenius, two volumes, duodecimo, which is a delicate and ingenious criticiſm againſt father Bohours; his Ointment for a Burn is a ſatire of about one thouſand eight hundred verſes, in favour of the Janſeniſts. He died in 1694.

BARBIER (MARY ANNE) a lady diſtinguiſhed by her knowledge in polite literature, was born at Orleans, and ſettled at Paris. She publiſhed ſeveral tragedies, and ſome operas, in which ſhe is ſuppoſed to have been aſſiſted by the abbé Pellegrin. She died in an advanced age, in the year 1742.

BARBOSA (ARIUS) born at Aviero, in Portugal, was one of the principal reſtorers of learning in Spain. He ſtudied under Angelus Politian, afterwards taught twenty years at Salamanca, and was at length preceptor to the princes Alphonſo and Henry, the ſons of Emanuel, king of Portugal. He died in 1540. We have ſeveral of his works in proſe and verſe.

BARBOSA (PETER) a celebrated lawyer, and chancellor of Portugal, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Viana, a ſmall town in Portugal, and died in 1596. He wrote ſeveral works, which are eſteemed.

BARBOSA (EMANUEL) a famous Portugueſe lawyer, born at Guimaraens, was advocate to the king of Portugal, and died in 1638, aged ninety. He wrote De Poteſtate Epiſcopi, and other works.

BARBOSA (AUGUSTIN) the ſon of the preceding, and a famous lawyer, was treaſurer of Guimaraens, where he was born.

born. He ſtudied at Rome, and at length went to Madrid, where Philip IV. in the year 1648, nominated him to the biſhopric of Urgento, in the territory of Otranto; but he died in the year following. He wrote a conſiderable number of works, among which are, 1. Remiſſiones Doctorum ſuper varia Loca Concilii Tridentini. 2. De Officio Epiſcopi, &c.

BARBUDA, one of the Britiſh Caribbee iſlands, ſeated forty-five miles eaſt of Antego, and is about twenty miles long and twelve broad. The inhabitants apply themſelves chiefly to the breeding of cattle, and the ſupplying the neighbouring iſlands. It is the property of the Codrington family, who have a great number of negroes, and have given large benefactions to have them inſtructed in the Chriſtian religion. Long. 61. 3. W. Lat. 18. 5. N.

BARCA, a country of Africa, formerly a kingdom, but now ſubject to the Turks, who keep a ſangiac here, under the baſha of Tripoli. It is bounded on the ſouth by the Sarrah, or the deſart of Barbary, on the eaſt by Egypt, on the weſt by Tripoli, and on the north by the Mediterranean Sea. It is a rocky, barren, deſart country at the beſt; but that part of it next the ſea has the moſt inhabitants, and contains the beſt land. The ſouth part has moveable ſands, inſomuch that a ſtrong wind will ſometimes bury whole caravans. It is famous for the temple of Jupiter Ammon, formerly ſituated here. This part is inhabited by Arabs, as well as by Bereberies, or the natural Africans. They are all Mohammedans, and thieves as well by neceſſity as inclination. The modern geographers make Barca a part of Tripoli, becauſe it is ſubject to the ſame government.

BARCELONA, a city of Spain, and the capital of Catalonia. It was formerly but a ſmall place, and was taken from the Moors, in 801, by Charlemagne, but is now one of the largeſt, richeſt, and moſt beautiful cities of Spain, ſituated by the ſea-ſide, of a form between a ſquare and an oval; it is ſurrounded with a good brick wall, round which is another, with fourteen baſtions, horn-works, ramparts, and ditches; the ramparts are high, broad, and ſpacious, inſomuch that an hundred coaches may be ſeen every evening driving thereon for pleaſure. The city is divided into two parts, the Old and the New, which are ſeparated from each other by a wall and a large ditch; the ſtreets are handſome, well paved with large ſtones, wide, and very clean. It is the reſidence of a viceroy, is a biſhop's ſee, has a fine univerſity, a mint, a good port, and is adorned with handſome buildings. The court of inquiſition, which the inhabitants look upon as an advantage, is the worſt thing that can belong to any place. The remarkable buildings are the cathedral, which is large, handſome, and adorned with two high towers, the church of the Virgin Mary, the palace of the biſhop, that of the inquiſition, and ſeveral religious houſes; add to theſe the palace of the viceroy; the arſenal, which contains arms for a thouſand men; the exchange, where the merchants meet; the terſana, where they build the gallies; the palace where the nobility of the country meet, called La Caſa de la Deputation; this laſt is built with fine large free-ſtone, and adorned with columns of marble; in this there is a large hall, with a gilt cieling, and a handſome portico, wherein perſons may either walk or ſit; the hall is adorned with the portraits of all the counts of Barcelona. There are ſeveral fine ſquares, particularly that of St. Michael, into which all the great ſtreets run. The port is wide, ſpacious, deep, and ſafe, defended on the one ſide by a great mole, and on the other ſheltered from the weſt wind by two mountains, that advance into the ſea, and form a kind of promontory; the mole is ſeven hundred and fifty paces long, with a quay, at the end of which is a light-houſe, and a ſmall fort. One of the mountains, called Mount Joy, is very high, and riſes in the middle of the plain near the city; it is covered with gardens, vineyards, groves of trees, and has a ſtrong fort for the defence of the city; this mountain being a rock, yields an inexhauſtible quarry of fine hard free-ſtone. Barcelona is a place of great trade, on account of the conveniency of its harbour; and it has a manufacture of knives greatly eſteemed in Spain, as alſo of blankets, beſides glaſs-houſes. The inhabitants are diligent, and equally fit for labour and trade; they are alſo very civil to ſtrangers. The women are well ſhaped, and as handſome as any in Spain; they are briſk and lively in their converſation, and more free and unreſtrained in their behaviour than in other parts of Spain.

Barcelona was beſieged and taken by the French, in 1697, and by king Charles, afterwards emperor of Germany, in September, 1705. In 1706, it was inveſted by Philip V. with a numerous army, when the ſiege was raiſed by ſir John Leak, and the French and Spaniards retiring precipitately, left all their cannon, ammunition, tents, baggage, and wounded men behind them. It remained in king Charles's poſſeſſion till 1712, when they ſet up for an independent ſtate, but was brought under ſubjection to Philip, in 1714. The country about it is very pleaſant and fruitful, well watered by ſprings and rivulets, and thick ſet with villages. It is three hundred miles eaſt from Madrid, one hundred and forty eaſt of Saragoſſa, and one hundred and eighty north-eaſt of Valencia. Long. 2. 5. E. Lat. 41. 26. N.

BARCELONETTA, a town of France, in Dauphiné, capital of the valley of Barcelonetta. It belonged to the duke of Savoy, but was ceded to France by the treaty of Utrecht, in 1712. It is fifty miles ſouth-eaſt of Embrun, and fifty north of Nice. Long. 6. 40. E. Lat. 44. 26. N.

BARCELOR, a town in the kingdom of Canara, on the coaſt of Malabar, in the Eaſt-Indies. It ſtands on the banks of a broad river, four miles from the ſea. The country abounds in rice, and has in many places two crops in a year, which is owing to lakes at the foot of the mountain Galii, the waters of which, being confined by ſluices, is let out at convenient times to water the rice-fields. The Dutch have a factory here, which is kept only to buy rice for their garriſons on the Malabar coaſt. It ſtands about a mile from the river's mouth, and is defended by a caſtle on the north ſide, ſo that none can go in or out without leave. The Portugueſe likewiſe get ſupplies of rice at this place for Goa. Long. 74. 15. E. Lat. 13. 45 N. See CANARA.

BARCELOS, a town of Portugal, with the title of a duchy, is ſeated on the river Cavado, and has a handſome bridge. Long. 7. 0. W. Lat. 41. 20. N.

BARCLAY, BARCLEY, BARKLAY, or DE BARKLAY, (ALEXANDER) an elegant writer in the ſixteenth century. It is diſputed whether he was born in England or Scotland, however, he was educated at Oriel-college, in Oxford, and afterwards became a monk of Ely; after this he was made doctor of divinity, and was preſented to the vicarage of St. Matthew, at Wokey in Worceſterſhire, and alſo to the vicarage of Baddow Magna, in the county of Eſſex. He was a polite writer, a great refiner of the Engliſh tongue, and left behind him many teſtimonies of his wit and learning; among which are, 1. His Eclogues on the Miſeries of Courtiers. 2. A Treatiſe againſt Skelton. 3. The Life of St. Catherine. 4. The Life of St. Margaret. 5. The Life of St. Ethelreda. 6. Five Eclogues from the Latin of Mantuan. 7. The Bucolic of Codrus. 8. The Caſtle of Labour; and, 9. Navis ſtultifera, or The Ship of Fools. He lived to a very advanced age, and died in 1552.

BARCLAY (WILLIAM) a learned civilian in the ſixteenth century, was born at Aberdeen, in Scotland, but being unable to make his fortune at that court, went to France, ſtudied law at Bourges, and was at length profeſſor of civil law at Pontamouſſon, counſellor of ſtate, and maſter of the requeſts in Lorrain; but ſome ill offices being done him with the duke of Lorrain, he returned to England, in 1603, where king James offered him a place in his council, with a very good penſion, on condition that he would embrace the religion of the church of England; but not being able to comply with this condition, he returned to France, and accepted of a profeſſorſhip in civil law, in the univerſity of Angers, where he died in 1605. The moſt famous of his works are his Treatiſe on the Power of the Pope, and that on the Power of Kings.

BARCLAY (JOHN) the ſon of the former, was born at Pontamouſſon, in 1582. He came with his father into England, in 1603, and publiſhed a poem on king James's coronation, to whom he dedicated the firſt part of his Euphormio. That prince was ſo well pleaſed with theſe performances, that he was deſirous of retaining him; but his father took him with him to France. After his father's death, he returned into England, where he publiſhed his Icon animarum, and other works. He afterwards returned to France, and from thence went to Rome, where he died in 1621. His principal works are, 1. Argenis. 2. A Collection of Poems. 3. Satyricon Euphormionis, &c. His proſe is more eſteemed than his poetry. He ſtrove to imitate Petronius, and diſcovers in all his works much wit and genius.

BARCLAY (ROBERT) one of the moſt eminent writers among the Quakers, was the ſon of colonel David Barclay; he was born at Edinburgh, in the year 1648, and educated under an uncle of his at Paris, where he became accompliſhed in moſt branches of learning. He returned to Scotland about the year 1664; in 1666, the colonel, his father, embraced the opinions of the Quakers, and the next year he embraced them himſelf, and became diſtinguiſhed for the zeal and abilities he employed in their defence. He travelled with the famous Mr. William Penn, through the greateſt part of England, Holland, and Germany, and was every where received with the higheſt reſpect; for though both his converſation and behaviour were ſuitable to his principles, yet there was ſuch livelineſs and ſpirit in his diſcourſe, and ſuch ſerenity and chearfulneſs in his deportment, as rendered him extremely agreeable to all ſorts of people. The great buſineſs of his life was doing good, and promoting what he thought to be the knowledge of God. He publiſhed ſeveral works, the moſt famous of which is his Apology for the Quakers, which he wrote in Latin, and afterwards tranſ-lated into Engliſh, and dedicated to king Charles II. this work has been alſo tranſlated into High and Low Dutch, French, and Spaniſh. Mr. Barclay lived up to what he profeſſed, and having paſſed through life without the leaſt imputation on his integrity, died at Ury, on the 3d of October, 1690.

BARCOCHEBAS, or rather BARCOCHAB, a Jewiſh impoſtor, whoſe real name was Akiba, but he took that of Barcochab, which ſignifies the Son of a Star, in alluſion to the prophecy of Balaam, "There ſhall a ſtar ariſe out of Jacob." He proclaimed himſelf the Meſſiah, and talking of nothing but wars, victories, and triumphs, made his countrymen riſe againſt the Romans, by which means he was the author of a thouſand diſorders; he ravaged many places, took a great number of fortreſſes, and maſſacred an infinite multitude of people, and particularly the Chriſtians. Rufus, the governor of Judea, being unable to quell this ſedition, the emperor Adrian ſent Julius Severus, a celebrated captain, who was recalled from Britain, to undertake this expedition. This general, inſtead of coming to an engagement with theſe Jews, cut off their proviſions, ſet upon them ſeparately, and at laſt reduced the whole affair to the ſiege of Bitter, a city which the impoſtor had choſen for his place of arms and the ſeat of his empire. As a vaſt number of Jews had thrown themſelves into that city, they defended it for a long time, and were at laſt reduced by famine to terrible extremities; and at its being taken Barcochebas was killed. By this war, the whole Jewiſh nation was almoſt extirpated, and thoſe who were left were ſold at ſeveral fairs at the price of horſes, and what could not be ſold were ſent into Egypt, when many periſhed by ſhipwrecks and famine, or were killed by the Pagans. Adrian alſo publiſhed an edict, forbidding the Jews to ſet foot in Jeruſalem, on pain of death.

BARCOS (MARTIN DE) abbot of St. Cyran, was born at Bayonne, and wrote ſeveral books, among which are, The Grandeur of the Roman Church, eſtabliſhed on the Authority of St. Peter and St. Paul; and, A Cenſure of the Prædeſtinatus of father Sirmond. He died in 1678.

BARDAS, the brother of the empreſs Theodora, and uncle of the famous Photius, is ſaid to have had no other good quality beſides that of loving the ſciences and polite literature, which he eſtabliſhed in the Eaſtern empire; for he was treacherous, cruel, and ambitious. In the year 856 he aſſaſſinated Theoctiſtes, general of the emperor Michael's forces, and obtained his poſt. At length he cauſed the diſgrace of the empreſs Theodora, and St. Ignatius, patriarch of Conſtantinople, reproaching him for his vices, he had him depoſed in 858, in order to make room for Photius. Bardas was aſſaſſinated by Baſilius the Macedonian, in 866.

BARDE (JOHN DE LA) marquis of Marolles upon the Seine, counſellor of ſtate, and ambaſſador from France to Switzerland, under the reign of Lewis XIV. He was a perſon of great reputation for his abilities and the elegance of his ſtyle. He wrote in Latin the Hiſtory of France, from the death of Lewis XIII. to the year 1652, and of this hiſtory he made a French Tranſlation: he alſo publiſhed a book of Controverſy, in Latin, againſt the opinions of Proteſtants, in relation to the Euchariſt. He died in the year 1692, in the ninety-firſt year of his age.

BARKHAM, or BARCHAM, (JOHN) a very learned divine and antiquarian, was born in the city of Exeter, about the year 1572, and educated at Oxford, after which he enjoyed ſeveral livings in the church, and was created doctor of divinity. He had great ſkill and knowledge in moſt parts of uſeful learning, being an exact hiſtorian, a good herald, an able divine, an excellent antiquarian, and well acquainted with coins and medals, of which he had the beſt collection of any clergyman in his time. He wrote ſeveral pieces, but never put his name to any. He died March 25, 1642.

BARDEWICK, a town of Germany, in the circle of Lower Saxony, and duchy of Lunenburgh, ſeated on the river Ilmenau, ſeven miles north of the city of Lunenburg. It was formerly a large city, but is now a ſmall town. It is ſubject to Hanover. Long. 10. 6 E. Lat. 53. 40. N.

BARDT, a ſtrong town of Germany, in the duchy of Pomerania, with a caſtle and a harbour. It is near the Baltick ſea, and is ſubject to Sweden. It is eighteen miles eaſt of Stralſund, and thirty north-eaſt of Roſtock. Long. 13. 20. E. Lat. 54. 23 N.

BAREGE, a village in the county of Bigorre, famous for its baths, is about thirteen miles ſouth of Banguieres. There are here four baths of different degrees of heat; the firſt is called the Great Bath, and conſiſts of two ſprings of limpid water, over the vapours of which, if you put ſilver it firſt becomes black, and then red. This effect is ſooner produced by putting it into the water. This bath is the hotteſt; all the reſt are of the ſame quality, but in a leſs degree. The water will neither ferment with acids nor alkalies, nor yet produces any change in ſyrup of violets.

BAREITH, a town of Germany, in Franconia, and in the margravate of Culembach, with a college. It belongs to a prince of the Houſe of Brandenburg, who takes the titles of margrave of Brandenburg-Bareith. It is fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Culembach, and thirteen eaſt of Bamberg. Long. 11. 50. E. Lat. 50. 0. N.

BARENT (DITERIC) an excellent painter, was born at Amſterdam, and was the ſon of a very indifferent painter. He ſtudied in Italy, and became the favourite diſciple of Titian, with whom he lived a long time, but at length returned to Amſterdam, where he performed many extraordinary pieces, and died in 1582, at forty-eight years of age.

BARFLEUR, a town of Normandy, was formerly one of the beſt port towns of France, but the harbour is now choaked up with ſand. It is one hundred and ſeventy-eight miles north-weſt of Paris, and twelve miles eaſt of Cherburg. Long. 1. 6. W. Lat. 49. 40. N.

BARI, a handſome rich town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, capital of the territory of Bari, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It ſtands on the Gulph of Venice, and is well fortified. It had a good port before it was ruined by the Venetians. It is twenty-five miles eaſt-by-north from Naples. Long. 17. 40. E. Lat. 41. 31. N.

BARI, a territory of Italy, is bounded on the north by the Capitanata, on the north-weſt by the Ulterior Principato, on the ſouth by the Baſilicata, on the ſouth-eaſt by the Terra d' Otranto, and on the north-eaſt by the Gulph of Venice. It has no conſiderable river, except the Offanto, which divides it from the Capitanata. The air is temperate, and the ſoil fruitful in corn, oil, almonds, and ſaffron. The principal towns are Bari the capital, Frani, Andria, Ravo, Bilonto, Converſano, Monopoli, Poligniano, Barletta, and Malfetto. The two firſt are archiepiſcopal, and the reſt epiſcopal.

BARKHAMPSTEAD, or BERKHAMPSTEAD, a town in Hertfordſhire, formerly of more note than it is at preſent. It conſiſts chiefly of one ſtreet, and had a market, which is now come to nothing. It had a caſtle, of which there is now very little remaining, it being long ſince demoliſhed. On Shrove-Monday and Whit-Monday there are ſmall fairs for cattle, and on St. James's-day another for cheeſe. Its market is on Saturdays. The living is a rectory, rated at 21l. a year in the king's books. It is nine miles north of Dunſtable, eleven weſt of St. Albans, and twenty-ſix north-weſt of London. Long. 0. 35. W. Lat. 51. 49. N.

BARKING, a fiſhing town in Eſſex, nine miles eaſt of London, with a market on Saturdays, and a fair on October 22, for horſes. The living is a vicarage, rated at 19l. 8s. 11d. in the king's books. Long. 0. 13. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

BARKLEY, a town in Glouceſterſhire, with a market on Wedneſdays, one hundred and eleven miles weſt from London, and fourteen ſouth-weſt of Glouceſter. Long. 2. 30. W. Lat. 51. 40. N. Barkley has a fair on May 14, for cattle and pigs.

BARLÆUS (JASPER) profeſſor of philoſophy at Amſterdam, and one of the beſt Latin poets of the age in which he lived, was born at Antwerp, in the year 1584. His father, who was of the Proteſtant religion, flying to Holland as ſoon as the duke of Parma had made himſelf maſter of that city. He ſtudied eight years at Leyden, and was afterwards made ſub-principal, and at length profeſſor of logic in that univerſity; but intereſting himſelf in the diſputes of the Arminians, he loſt his profeſſorſhip as ſoon as the oppoſite party prevailed in the ſynod of Dort. He then applied himſelf to phyſic, and in two years took his doctor's degrees at Caen; but in 1631 the magiſtrates of Amſterdam having erected a ſeminary, offered him the profeſſorſhip of philoſophy, which he accepted, and diſcharged with great honour till his death, which happened on the 14th of January, 1648. We have a volume of Orations, which he pronounced on ſeveral occaſions, and are valued for their ſtyle, and the ſtrokes of wit with which they abound; but poetry was his chief excellence, and there was ſcarce any thing great happened while he lived, but he made a pompous elogy upon it. He alſo publiſhed ſeveral ſharp pieces of controverſy againſt the adverſaries of Arminius, which made him ever after conſidered as a favourer of the Arminians. He ſhewed his abilities in hiſtory by his relation of what paſſed in Baſil during the government of Count Maurice of Naſſau. His Letters were publiſhed in two volumes, but not till after his death, which happened on the 14th of January, 1648.

BARLÆUS (LAMBERT) brother to the preceding, was born at Bommel, in Guelderland, in the year 1595, and became profeſſor of Greek in the univerſity of Leyden. He publiſhed the Timon of Lucian, with notes, and wrote a Commentary upon the Theogony of Heſiod, which was not printed till after his death.

BARLETTA (GABRIEL) a Dominican monk, born at Barletto, in the kingdom of Naples, diſtinguiſhed himſelf about about the end of the fifteen century, by a manner of preaching much more proper for a buffoon than a miniſter of the Goſpel. Theſe ſermons were printed in two vols. octavo, in the year 1571.

BARLETTA, a town of Naples, and in the territory of Bari, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the gulph of Venice, twenty-five miles weſt of Bari, and one hundred miles eaſt-by-north of Naples. Long. 16. 32. E. Lat. 41. 30. N.

BARLOW (WILLIAM) a learned biſhop in the ſixteenth century, was at firſt a monk in the Auguſtin monaſtery of St. Oſyth, in Eſſex, whence he was raiſed to the biſhoprick of St. Aſaph, and from thence to St. David's, and, in 1547, to Bath and Wells; but in the reign of queen Mary he was deprived of his biſhoprick, and impriſoned in the Fleet, but having the happineſs to eſcape from thence, he was, in the reign of queen Elizabeth, advanced to the biſhoprick of Chicheſter. He writ Chriſtian Homilies; a work intitled Coſmography; and was one of the biſhops who compiled The godly and pious Inſtitution of a Chriſtian Man, commonly called The Biſhop's Book. He died in Auguſt, 1568.

BARLOW (WILLIAM) ſon of the former, was born in Pembrokeſhire, and, after ſeveral preferments in the church, was, in 1614, made archdeacon of Saliſbury. He was the firſt who wrote on the nature and properties of the loadſtone; the firſt that made the inclinatory inſtrument tranſparent, and to be uſed hanging with glaſs on both ſides; the firſt that ſhewed the right way of touching magnetical needles; the firſt that invented the piercing and cementing of loadſtones; and the firſt who ſhewed the reaſons why a loadſtone being double capped, muſt take up ſo great a weight. He wrote The Navigator's Supply; The Magnetical Advertiſement; and, A brief Diſcovery of the idle Animadverſions of Mark Ridley, M. D. upon a Treatiſe, entitled, Magnetical Advertiſement. This ingenious gentleman died May 25, 1625.

BARLOW (THOMAS) biſhop of Lincoln, in the reign of king Charles II. was born at Langhill, in the pariſh of Orton, in Weſtmoreland, in the year 1607. He was educated at Oxford, and, after ſeveral preferments in the church, was raiſed to the ſee of Lincoln, upon the death of Dr. Fuller, in the year 1675. Mr. Granger obſerves, that "this "learned prelate, whom nature deſigned for a ſcholar, and "who acted in conformity with the bent of nature, was, "perhaps, as great a maſter of the learned languages, and "of the works of the celebrated authors who have written "in thoſe languages, as any man of his age. The greateſt "part of his writings, of which Mr. Wood has given us a "catalogue, are againſt Popery, and his conduct, for ſome "time, like that of other Calviniſts, appeared to be in direct oppoſition to the church of Rome. But after James "aſcended the throne, he ſeemed to approach much nearer "to popery than he ever did before. He ſent the king an "addreſs of thanks for his declaration for liberty of conſcience, and is ſaid to have written reaſons for reading "that declaration. His compliances were much the ſame "after the Revolution. His moderation, to call it by the "ſofteſt name, was very great, indeed ſo great, as to bring "the firmneſs of his character in queſtion. But caſuiſtry, "which was his moſt diſtinguiſhed talent, not only reconciles ſeeming contradictions, but has alſo been known "to admit contradictions themſelves. He was, abſtracted "from this laxity of principles, a very great and worthy "man." Among his works are, 1. The Caſe of Toleration in Matters of Religion. 2. A Letter concerning the Canon Law allowing the whipping of Heretics. 3. The Rights of the Biſhops to judge in capital Caſes in Parliament He died at Buckden, in Huntingdonſhire, on the 8th of October, 1691, in the eighty-fifth year of his age.

BARLOW (FRANCIS) an eminent Engliſh painter, was born in Lincolnſhire, and on his coming to London was placed with one Shepherd, a limner; but his genius leading him wholly to drawing of birds, fiſh, and other animals, he arrived at ſuch perfection, that had his colouring been equal to the drawing, he might have excelled all that went before him. Hence the prints, from his works, do him more honour than the works themſelves, they being engraved by Holler and Faithorn. There are ſix books of animals from his drawings, and he painted ſome cielings with birds for noblemen and gentlemen in the country. Notwithſtanding Mr. Barlow's excellency in his way, and his having a conſiderable ſum of money left him, he died poor in the year 1702.

BARNABAS, an apoſtle, one of the firſt preachers of the Goſpel, was of the tribe of Levi, and born in the iſle of Cyprus. It is ſaid that he went to Jeruſalem, and ſtudied with St. Paul under Gamaliel. On his having embraced the Chriſtian faith, he ſold a piece of land which he poſſeſſed, and laid the price of it at the feet of the apoſtles. He was afterwards declared the apoſtle of the Gentiles with St. Paul, travelled with him, and went with St. Mark into the iſle of Cyprus. It is ſaid by the church of Rome, that he ſuffered martyrdom, after having founded the church of Milan, and that his body was found in 488, with the Goſpel of St. Mark on his breaſt. An epiſtle attributed to him was publiſhed by Dom Luc d' Achery, in 1645.

BARNARD, or BERNARD, (JOHN) the ſon of John Barnard, gent. was born at Caſtor, in Lincolnſhire, and educated at Cambridge; after ſeveral preferments in the church, he was made a prebendary of the church of Lincoln. He wrote Cenſura Clerior, againſt ſcandalous miniſters, not fit to be reſtored to church livings; the Life of Dr. Heylyn, and a few other works. He died at Newark, Auguſt 17, 1683.

BARNES (ROBERT) profeſſor of divinity, and chaplain to Henry VIII. by whom he was employed in carrying on a correſpondence with the princes of Germany; he was ſent ſeveral times to thoſe courts, and, among other negotiations, was the firſt who was employed in the project of the marriage with Anne of Cleves. He was a hearty Lutheran, which he did not conceal in his ſermons, but openly attacked what biſhop Gardiner had advanced againſt Luther, for which he was obliged to ſign articles, and make a public recantation in the pulpit, which was done in ſuch a manner, that a complaint was made that in one part of his ſermon he very ſubtilly maintained what he had retracted in the other: upon which, by the king's command, he was ſent to the Tower, which he never came out of, but to ſuffer death in the midſt of the flames, for he was condemned as an heretic by the parliament, without being ſuffered to make his defence. He wrote the Articles of his Faith, and a Hiſtory of the Popes.

BARNES (JOHN) in Latin Barneſius, an Engliſh Benedictine monk, was one of thoſe Roman Catholics who, after the example of Eraſmus, and a great many others, have made a profeſſion all their life of the Romiſh religion, tho' they obſerved in it an infinite number of abuſes, which they paſſionately wiſhed to ſee reformed. He wrote a book againſt Mental Reſervations, and another intitled Catholica Romanus Pacificus, at which the court of Rome was extremely diſpleaſed. This unhappy man, whoſe morals were unexceptionable, was at Paris, when, on the 5th of December, 1626, he was ſeized, ſtripped of the habit of his order, and carried away into Flanders, bound on horſeback. After this he was ſent to Rome, where he continued in the priſon of the Inquiſition till he was removed into that of the Lunatics, where he ended his days.

BARNES (JOSHUA) profeſſor of the Greek language at Cambridge, was born at London, January 10, 1654, and had his education in grammar learning in Chriſt's Hoſpital, from whence he was ſent to Emanuel college, in Cambridge. In the year 1700, when he had publiſhed many of his works, Mrs. Maſon, of Hemmingford, in Huntingdonſhire, a widow lady of between forty and fifty, with a jointure of two hundred pounds per annum, who had been for ſome time a great admirer of him, came to Cambridge, and deſired leave to ſettle one hundred pounds a year upon him, after her death, which he politely refuſed, unleſs ſhe would likewiſe condeſcend to make him happy with her perſon, which was not very engaging. The lady was too obliging to refuſe any thing to Joſhua, for whom ſhe ſaid the ſun ſtood ſtill, and they were accordingly married. He wrote a great many books, among which are Sacred Poems; The Life of Oliver Cromwell, the Tyrant; an Engliſh Poem; ſeveral dramatic pieces, viz. Xerxes, Pythias and Damon, Holofernes, &c. Gerenia, or a new Diſcovery of a little Sort of People called Pigmies; A poetical Paraphraſe on the Hiſtory of Eſther, in Greek verſe, with a Latin tranſlation; The Life of Edward III. editions of Euripides, Anacreon, and Homer's Iliad and Odyſſey, with notes, and a Latin tranſlation. Beſides theſe, he wrote many others, that were never publiſhed. He wrote with greater eaſe in Greek than even in Engliſh, and yet is generally allowed not to have underſtood the delicacies of that language. He was of ſuch a humane diſpoſition, and ſo unacquainted with the world, that he has given his only coat to a vagrant begging at his door. This excellent man died on the 3d of Auguſt, 1712, in the fifty-eighth year of his age.

BARNET CHIPPING (or HIGH BARNET) a town in Hertfordſhire, with a market on Mondays, chiefly for hogs. It is a great thorough-fare, half a mile in length, and has ſeveral good inns. Here was fought a bloody battle between the houſes of York and Lancaſter, in which Edward IV. gained a victory over the Lancaſtrians. The fairs are July 24 and 25, for toys; Auguſt 24, 25, and 26, for Engliſh, Welſh, and Scotch cattle; October 18 and 19, for horſes, cows, and cheeſe. It is near twelve miles north-weſt of London. It is in the pariſh of Eaſt Barnet, to which it has a chapel of eaſe.

BARNET (EAST) two miles eaſt of the former, in the ſame county, is a rectory rated at 22l. 2s. 8d. in the king's books.

BARNEVELDT (JOHN ODEN) advocate-general, and one of the moſt celebrated miniſters of the ſtates of Holland; had long the chief adminiſtration of affairs, and was of ſervice to his country by his negotiations, his embaſſies, and his dexterity in the management of public buſineſs. He however oppoſed Maurice, prince of Orange, and his party, and in the diſpute which aroſe between Arminius and Gomar, on the ſubjects of predeſtination and grace, Barneveldt declared for the firſt, and the prince of Orange for the laſt. This prince cauſed the ſynod of Dort to be convened when the Arminians were condemned. At length, Barneveldt being charged with a deſign to deliver up the United Provinces to the Spaniards, was apprehended, and beheaded in 1618, in the ſeventy-third year of his age.

BARNSLEY, or BLACK BARNSLEY, a town in the Weſt Riding of Yorkſhire. It has a market on Wedneſdays; and fairs, held on the laſt Wedneſday in February, preceding the 28th; if Wedneſday be the 28th, it is held the Wedneſday before; ſo that it can never be later than the 27th, or ſooner than the 21ſt, and is a great fair for horned cattle and ſwine. May 12, ditto. October 10, ditto, and cheeſe and gooſe-pies. It is five furlongs in length, and is ſeated on the ſide of a hill, and either does, or did carry on a trade in wire. The living is only a curacy. It is thirty miles ſouth-weſt from York, and a hundred and ſeventy-ſix north-by-weſt from London. Long. 1. 20. W. Lat. 53. 35. N.

BARNSTAPLE, a corporation and port-town, in Devonſhire, with a market on Friday. It is governed by a mayor, a recorder, twelve aldermen, and twelve burgeſſes, and ſends two members to parliament. It is a neat populous town, and is ſeated on the river Taw, between hills, in the form of a ſemi-circle. On the ſouth ſide there is a handſome ſtone bridge, of ſeventeen arches, and on the north the ruins of a caſtle. It is thirty-nine miles north of Exeter, and a hundred and ninety-four weſt of London. The living is a diſcharged vicarage of forty-ſeven pounds a year. Long. 4. 5. W. Lat. 51. 15. N.

BARO, or BARON (PETER) profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Cambridge, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Eſtampes, in France, and educated in the univerſity of Bourges, where he was admitted a licentiate in the law; but being of the Proteſtant religion, was obliged to leave his native country to avoid perſecution, and withdrawing to England, was kindly entertained by lord Burleigh. He afterwards ſettled at Cambridge, and by the recommendation of his noble patron, was, in 1574, choſen lady Margaret's profeſſor there. For ſome years he quietly enjoyed his profeſſorſhip; but there was at laſt raiſed a reſtleſs faction againſt him, by his oppoſing the doctrine of abſolute predeſtination, which rendered his place ſo uneaſy to him, that he choſe to leave the univerſity, and to ſettle in London. He wrote, 1. In Jonam Prophetam Prælectiones xxxix. 2. De Præſtantia & Dignitate Divinæ Legis, and other pieces. He died in London, about the year 1600.

BAROCCI (FREDERICO) a graceful, judicious, and ſkilful painter, was born at Urbino, and went to Rome in his youth, where he painted ſeveral things in freſco, for pope Paul III. and then returned to Urbino, where he lived the reſt of his days. He drew a prodigious number of portraits and hiſtory-pieces. His genius particularly led him to religious ſubjects. One may perceive in his works a great inclination towards Correggio's manner; but though he deſigned more correctly, his out-lines are neither ſo natural, nor in ſo grand a guſto as Correggio's. He drew his Madona after his ſiſter, and the infant Chriſt after one of her children. He etched ſeveral of his pieces himſelf, and died at Urbino in 1612, aged eighty-four.

BAROCHE, a town in the dominions of the great mogul, in the province of Cambaya. It is a walled town, ſeated on a riſing ground, on the banks of the river Nerdaba, and was formerly a place of great trade. It is now inhabited by weavers, and ſuch mechanics as manufacture cotton cloth; and the baſtas made here are the beſt in all India, becauſe they have the beſt cotton in the world. The Engliſh and Dutch formerly had factories here, which are now abandoned. It is ſixty miles north of Surat. Long. 72. 5. E. Lat. 22. 15. N.

BARON (BONAVENTURE) whoſe true name was Fitz-Gerald, was deſcended from a branch of the Fitz-Geralds, of Burnchurch, in the county of Kilkenny, in Ireland. He was a Franciſcan friar, and prælector of divinity, at the college of St. Iſidore, in Rome; and was particularly famous for the purity of his Latin ſtyle. He wrote, 1. Orationes Panegyricæ Sacro-Prophanæ decem. 2. Theologica, ſix volumes. 3. Curſus Philoſophicus. 4. Opuſcula varia Herbipoli; and other works. He died at Rome, March 18, 1696.

BARON (VINCENT) a monk, of the order of St. Dominic, born at Martres, in Gaſcony, in 1622, was eſteemed for ſeveral books which he publiſhed, among which, is a Treatiſe on Moral Theology, two volumes, octavo, and Chriſtian Ethics, two volumes, octavo, &c.

BARON (MICHAEL) an excellent comedian, of Paris, was the ſon of Michael Baron, another comedian, who was a native of Iſſoudun. He died at Paris, on the 22d of December, 1729, aged ſeventy-ſeven. He wrote ſome poems, and ſeveral theatrical pieces, which are printed together in two volumes, duodecimo.

BARONI (ADRIANA BASILE) baronneſs of Pian-Caretta, a lady of diſtinguiſhed merit, was born at Mantua, and was ſo celebrated for her beauty, that ſhe was called The Fair Adriana: but ſhe was no leſs diſtinguiſhed by her wit, the charms of her voice, and the grace with which ſhe ſung, and was ſo much admired, that a great number of ingenious men compoſed verſes in her praiſe, of which a collection was printed in 1623, under the title of Teatro delle Glorie d'Adriana Baſile. She was the wife of Muzio, by whom ſhe had two daughters, who were like her great muſicians, eſpecially Leonara, the ſubject of the following article.

BARONI (LEONORA) the daughter of the former, was born at Naples, and ſpent the greateſt part of her life at Rome. She had leſs beauty than her mother, but excelled her in her profound ſkill in muſic, the fineneſs of her voice, and her excellent manner of ſinging. Theſe talents were accompanied with a fine genius, a happy facility in writing Italian poetry, and an irreproachable conduct. She was, like her mother, celebrated by the wits, who ſtrove to excel each other in recording her praiſes; and in 1639 there was publiſhed, at Bracciano, a collection of Latin, Greek, Italian, Spaniſh, and French poems made upon her, under this title, Applauſi Poetici alle Glorie della Signora Leonora Baroni.

BARONIUS (DOMINIC) a prieſt and preacher of Florence, in the ſixteenth century, who wrote very ſtrongly againſt the church of Rome, and concurred with the Vaudois in Piedmont, to maintain the orthodox faith. He compoſed a maſs according to his own fancy, which he thought a proper expedient for reconciling the differences of the two religions: but the reformed rejected his projects.

BARONIUS (CÆSAR) a learned cardinal, born at Sora, a town of Naples, in 1538. He finiſhed his ſtudies at Rome, under Philip of Neri, founder of the Congregation of the Oratory. Some time after, being made prieſt, he went to eſtabliſh that new order, in the church of St. John the Baptiſt, where he continued till the year 1576, when he was ſent to Santa Maria's, in Vallicella. In the year 1573 he was appointed ſuperior of his order; ſoon after, pope Clement VIII. choſe him his confeſſor, and in 1576, created him cardinal. Upon the death of that pope, in 1605, he was nigh being choſen to the pontificate, he having thirty-one voices; but the Spaniſh faction hindered his election, becauſe he had aſſerted, in his Annals, that the crown of Spain founded its claim to Sicily on falſe evidence. He was a man of great piety and learning, and a ſtrenuous advocate for the Romiſh church. He beſtowed great labour in clearing up eccleſiaſtical hiſtory; and his application to ſtudy was ſo intenſe, as to occaſion ſuch a weakneſs in his ſtomach, that towards the end of his life, he could hardly digeſt any nouriſhment, and had ſuch a loathing of food, that it was a pain to him to ſit down to table. He died on the 30th of June, 1605, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age. He wrote ſeveral works, the principal of which is his Annales Eccleſiaſtici, in twelve volumes, folio, which has been abridged by ſeveral perſons, particularly by Henry Spondæus, Bzovius, and Ludovico Aurelio.

BARRAUX, a fortreſs of Savoy, and in Dauphiné, belonging to France. It ſtands at the entrance of the valley of Greſivaudan, and was built by a duke of Savoy, in 1597. It was taken by the French in 1598, who have kept it ever ſince. It is ſeated on the river Iſer, eight miles eaſt of Chambery, twenty north-eaſt of Grenoble, and five weſt of Montmelian. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 45. 0. N.

BARRAY, one of the weſtern iſles of Scotland, which is five miles in length, and three in breadth, being rocky on the eaſt ſide, and having arable land on the weſt. There is plenty of cod and ling near this iſland; and ſeveral ſmall ſhips from Orkney come hither in ſummer, and return laden with theſe fiſh. Long. 6. 30. W. Lat. 56. 55. N.

BARRE (FRANCIS POULLAIN DE LA) an ingenious author, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Paris, in 1647, and in 1680 became curate of Flamingre, in the dioceſe of Laon; but having embraced the proteſtant religion, and dreading leſt he ſhould be thrown in priſon for the ſentiments he had expreſſed both in his ſermons and in converſation, he went to Paris, and from thence retired to Geneva, where he married, and taught the French language to the foreign nobility; and was at length declared a citizen, and had one of the firſt claſſes in the college of Geneva. He died in that city, in 1723. He wrote ſeveral works, works, among which, is a Treatiſe on the Equality of the two Sexes; and a Treatiſe on the Education of the Ladies, with reſpect to the Conduct of the Mind in the Study of the Sciences and Manners.

BARREME (Francis) a celebrated arithmetician, who died at Paris, in 1703, after his having publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes on Arithmetic, that are much eſteemed.

BARRINGTON (John Shute, Lord Viſcount) was the youngeſt ſon of Mr. Shute, merchant, and wholeſale linen-draper, of London. He ſtudied the law in the Inner Temple, and in 1708, was made a commiſſioner of the cuſtoms, from which he was removed by queen Anne, in 1711. In that reign, John Wildman, Eſq. adopted him for his ſon; and though he was no relation, ſettled his large eſtate upon him, and ſome years after, he had another conſiderable eſtate left him by Francis Barrington, Eſq. who had married his firſt couſin, who died without iſſue. On which occaſion he obtained an act of parliament to aſſume the name, and bear the arms of Barrington. On the acceſſion of king George I. he was choſen repreſentative in parliament for Berwick upon Tweed, without a bribe, which circumſtance is inſcribed on his monument; and in 1720, he was created baron Barrington, of Newcaſtle, and viſcount Barrington, of Ardglaſs. He died at his ſeat at Bachet, in Berkſhire, after a ſhort illneſs of ſeven hours, on the 14th of December, 1734, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age. He wrote, 1. Miſcellanea Sacra, two volumes. 2. An Eſſay on the Diſpenſations of God to mankind.

BARROS (John) a celebrated Portugueſe hiſtorian, born at Viſco, in 1496. He was educated at the court of king Emanuel, among the princes of the blood, and made a great progreſs in Greek and Latin. The infant John, to whom he attached himſelf, and became his preceptor, having ſucceeded the king his father in 1521, Barros obtained a place in this prince's houſhold, and in 1522, was made governor of St. George del Mina, on the coaſt of Guinea. Three years after, the king having recalled him to court, made him treaſurer of the Indies, and this poſt inſpired him with the thought of writing his hiſtory, for which purpoſe he retired to Pompas, where he died, in 1570. His Hiſtory of Aſia and the Indies is divided into decades, the firſt of which he publiſhed in 1552, the ſecond in 1553, and the third in 1563; but the fourth decade was not publiſhed till the year 1615, when it appeared, by order of king Philip III. who had the manuſcript purchaſed of the heirs of John Barros. This hiſtory is in Portugueſe: Poſſevin and M. de Thou extol it highly, but the Sieur de la Boulave le Goux is of different ſentiments. Several authors have continued this hiſtory, ſo that we have at preſent twelve decades. He left many other works, ſome of which have been printed, and others remain in manuſcript.

BARROW (Isaac) biſhop of St. Aſaph, in the reign of king Charles II. was the ſon of Iſaac Barrow, of Spiney-abbey, in Cambridgeſhire, and uncle of the famous Dr. Iſaac Barrow. In 1663 he was conſecrated biſhop of the Iſle of Man, and was the year following appointed governor of that iſland, which office he diſcharged with great reputation, all the time he held that ſee, and ſome time after his tranſlation to that of St. Aſaph. While he enjoyed that poſt, he collected, from pious perſons, one thouſand and eighty-one pounds, with which he purchaſed, of the earl of Derby, all the impropriations in the iſland, and ſettled them upon the clergy, in proportion to their ſeveral wants. He obliged them all likewiſe to teach ſchool in their reſpective pariſhes, and allowed thirty pounds per annum for a free-ſchool, and fifty pounds per annum for academical learning. He died June 24, 1680, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age.

Barrow (Isaac) an eminent mathematician and divine, of the laſt century, was the ſon of Mr. Thomas Barrow, a linen-draper, in London, where he was born, in 1630. He was at firſt placed at the charter-houſe ſchool, for two or three years, where his behaviour afforded but little hopes of ſucceſs, in the profeſſion of a ſcholar, he being fond of fighting, and promoting it among his ſchool-fellows; but being removed from thence, his diſpoſition took a happier turn; and having ſoon made a great progreſs in learning, he was admitted a penſioner of Peter houſe, in Cambridge. He now applied himſelf with great diligence to the ſtudy of all parts of literature, eſpecially to that of natural philoſophy. He afterwards turned his thoughts to the profeſſion of phyſic, and made a conſiderable progreſs in anatomy, botany, and chemiſtry; after this he ſtudied chronology, aſtronomy, and geometry. He then travelled into France and Italy, and in a voyage from Leghorn to Smyrna, gave a proof of his bravery; for the ſhip being attacked by an Algerine pirate, he ſtaid upon deck, and with the greateſt intrepidity, fought till the pirate, perceiving the ſtout reſiſtance the ſhip made, ſteered off and left her. It may not be improper to give here, another inſtance of his remarkable intrepidity and ſcrupuloſity. He was once at a gentleman's houſe in the country, where the neceſſary was at the end of a long garden, and conſequently at a great diſtance from the room where he lodged: as he was going to it before day, for he was a very early riſer, a fierce maſtiff, who uſed to be chained up all day, and let looſe at night for the ſecurity of the houſe, perceiving a ſtrange perſon in the garden at that unſeaſonable time, ſet upon him with great fury. The doctor catched him by the throat, threw him, and lay upon him, and whilſt he kept him down, conſidered what he ſhould do in that exigence; once he had a mind to kill him, but he altered this reſolution, upon recollecting that this would be unjuſt, ſince the dog did only his duty, and he himſelf was in fault for rambling out of his room before it was light. At length he called out ſo loud, that he was heard by ſome of the houſe, who came preſently out, and freed both the doctor and the dog from the danger they were both in. Dr. Barrow was for ſome time Greek profeſſor in the univerſity of Cambridge, and profeſſor of geometry in Greſham college. He was afterwards maſter of Trinity college, and vice-chancellor of the univerſity. The doctor's works were very numerous, and ſuch as do honour to the Engliſh nation: theſe are, 1. Euclid's Elements. 2. Euclid's Data. 3. Optical Letters, read in the public ſchool of Cambridge. 4. Thirteen Geometrical Lectures. 5. The Works of Archimedes, the four Books of Apollonius's Conic Sections, and Theodoſius's Spherics, explained in a new Method. 6. A Lecture, in which Archimedes's Theorems of the Sphere and Cylinder are inveſtigated, and briefly demonſtrated. 7. Mathematical Lectures, read in the public ſchools of the univerſity of Cambridge: the above were all printed in Latin; and as to his Engliſh works, they are printed together in four volumes, folio.

The doctor was remarkable for negligence in his dreſs, which ſometimes expoſed him to inconveniences, where he was not known; and for the length of his ſermons, which, though they were admired by all good judges, on account of the excellent ſenſe, of which they are full, muſt be conſidered rather as entire treatiſes, than diſcourſes fit to be delivered from the pulpit; for it was not unuſual for him to be three hours in preaching one diſcourſe. Apprehenſive that we have ſcarcely done juſtice to the character of this great man, we ſhall here inſert an abſtract of that given of him by the reverend and learned Mr. J. Granger, which will be a proper concluſion of this article. "The name of "Dr. Barrow, ſays he, will ever be illuſtrious for a ſtrength "of mind, and a compaſs of knowledge that did honour to "his country. He was unrivalled in mathematical learn-"ing, and eſpecially in the ſublime geometry, in which he "has been excelled only by one man, and that man was "his pupil, the great Sir Iſaac Newton. The ſame ge-"nius that ſeemed to be born only to bring hidden truths "to light, to riſe to the heights or deſcend to the depths "of ſcience, would ſometimes amuſe itſelf in the flowery "paths of poetry, and he compoſed verſes both in Greek "and Latin. He at length gave himſelf up entirely to di-"vinity, and particularly to the moſt uſeful part of it, that "which has a tendency to make men wiſer and better. He "has, in his excellent Sermons on the Creed, ſolved every "difficulty, and removed every obſtacle that oppoſed itſelf "to our faith, and made divine revelation as clear as the "demonſtrations in his own Euclid. In his Sermons he "knew not how to leave off writing till he had exhauſted "his ſubject; and his admirable Diſcourſe on the Duty "and Reward of Bounty to the Poor, took him up three "hours and a half in preaching. This excellent perſon, "who was a bright example of Chriſtian virtue, as well "as a prodigy of learning, died on the 4th of May, 1677, "in the forty-ſeventh year of his age." and was interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where a monument, adorned with his buſt, was ſoon after erected, by the contribution of his friends.

BARRY (Girald) better known by the name of Giraldus Cambrenſis, i. e. Girald of Wales, was born near Pembroke, in South Wales, about the year 1146, and was deſcended of a noble family, which he often obſerves in his works; for though he was a man of learning and addreſs, theſe qualities were tarniſhed by an exceſſive vanity, and his ſtyle is ſo puerile and affected, ſo diffuſe and full of quibbles, and gingling conceits, that it can by no means pleaſe men of taſte. He was offered ſeveral Welſh biſhoprics, which he refuſed to accept; though he longed for that of St. David's, which he could not obtain. He wrote a great many books in Latin; as 1. His own Life. 2. A Chronology in Metre. 3. Coſmography, embelliſhed with pentameter Verſes. 4 The Mirror of the Church. 5. A Collection of Pieces, or various Epiſtles, collected by himſelf. 6. The Lives of St. Ædelbert, St. David, St. Caradac, St. Remigius, and St. Hugo. 7. A Topography of Wales, and 8. A compendious Deſcription of both the Land and Cuſtoms of the Nation, &c.

BARRY (GERAT) a gentleman, deſcended from the noble family of Barrymore, in Ireland. He ſerved many years with reputation as an inferior officer in the armies of the king of Spain, in Germany and the Low Countries; but roſe no higher than to the office of a captain of foot. He wrote a book, intitled, a Diſcourſe of Military Diſcipline, which he printed at Bruſſels, in 1634. We have no account when he died.

BART (JOHN) a native of Dunkirk, who, from being a common fiſherman, aroſe to be commodore of a ſquadron. He was tall and robuſt, with a fierce and ſavage air. The chevalier de Fourbin introduced him at court, in 1691, where he was well received; though his clumſy appearance made the courtiers ſay, "There goes the chevalier Fourbin, leading his bear." He was however well ſkilled in navigation, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery on ſeveral extraordinary occaſions: he frequently gained great advantages over the Engliſh and Dutch, and died on the 27th of April, 1702, aged fifty-one.

BARTAS (WILLIAM DE SALUSTE DU) a French poet, who lived in the ſixteenth century. He was employed by Henry IV. of France, in England, Denmark, and Scotland, and commanded a troop of horſe in Gaſcony, under the marechal de Martignan. He was a Calviniſt, and died in 1590, aged forty-ſix. He wrote a great number of poems, the moſt famous of which are, 1. The Week, or the Creation of the World, in ſeven books. 2. The Poem of Judith; and 3. The Battle of Ivry, gained by Henry IV. in 1590. Du Bartas wrote in a bombaſt ſtyle.

BARTHE (PAUL DE LA) lord of Thermes, marſhal of France, and one of the greateſt commanders in the ſixteenth century, was more known by the name of marſhal de Thermes He was born at Conſeran, of a noble and ancient family; but it had few of the advantages of fortune. He ſignalized himſelf under the reigns of Francis I. Henry II. and Francis II. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the wars of Italy, from the year 1528, and contributed greatly to the victory of Ceriſoles, in 1544, where he fought bravely in the quality of colonel-general of the light-horſe, and was made priſoner, two horſes being killed under him; but the duke d'Enguien, who commanded the army, obtained his releaſe, by giving in exchange Raymond de Cardonna, Charles de Gonzagues, and colonel Aliſprand Madrucci, which proved the high eſteem to which he had ariſen. In 1547, he took the marquiſate of Saluces, and the caſtle of Ravel, one of the ſtrongeſt places in Piedmont. Two years after, he was ſent to command in Scotland, when he took ſeveral places, and oppoſed the Engliſh with ſuch ſucceſs, that they were obliged to conſent to a peace. Being at Rome in 1550, in quality of ambaſſador to pope Julius III. to bring about a peace with the Farneſes, and not being able to obtain any thing of that pope, he commanded the French troops in Italy, where he obtained great advantages, eſpecially in the iſland of Corſica, and continued to ſignalize himſelf till the year 1558, when he was made marſhal of France. He took Dunkirk the ſame year, but loſt the battle of Gravelines, where he was wounded and taken priſoner, on the 14th of July. He recovered his liberty at the peace of Chateau-Cambreſis, in 1559, and afterwards ſerved againſt the French proteſtants. He died at Paris, on the 6th of May, 1562, without leaving any poſterity.

BARTHIUS (GASPAR) one of the moſt learned men, and moſt copious writers of his age, was born at Cuſtrin, in Brandenbourg, the 22d of June, 1587. He became learned ſo early, that his childhood was admired by great men, and he wrote ſeveral books before he had a beard. He had a prodigious facility in making verſes, and publiſhed a great number of them. Bale obſerves, that all his writings riſe to ſuch a prodigious bulk, that one can ſcarce conceive a ſingle man could be capable of executing ſuch a great variety of things: but he loſt a great many of his manuſcripts by a fire which burnt his houſe. Some of the moſt famous of his works that have been printed are, 1. His Adverſaria, a large volume in folio; the ſecond and third volumes of which he left in manuſcript. 2. A Tranſlation of Æneas Gazæus. 3. A large volume of Notes upon Claudian, in quarto; and 4. Three large volumes upon Statius, &c. He died at Leipſic, in 1658, aged ſeventy-one.

BARTHOLINUS (CASPAR) a learned phyſician and anatomiſt, in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Malmoe, a town in the province of Schonen, which then belonged to Denmark. At three years of age he had ſuch a quick capacity, that in fourteen days he learned to read, and in his thirteenth year he compoſed Greek and Latin orations, and pronounced them in public When he was about eighteen, he went to the univerſity of Copenhagen, and afterwards ſtudied at Roſtock and Wirtemberg, at which laſt place he applied himſelf with ſuch aſſiduity to philoſophy and divinity, that he always roſe before break of day, and went to bed very late. Bartholinus now began his travels, and having gone through part of Germany, Flanders, and Holland, came to England, from whence he returned to Germany, and proceeded to Italy, neglecting no opportunity of improving himſelf at the different univerſities to which he came, and every where receiving marks of reſpect; particularly at Naples he was offered the profeſſorſhip of anatomy, which he declined; and at Sedan, in France, the Greek profeſſorſhip, which he alſo declined. Having travelled as far as the frontiers of Spain, he returned to Italy, in order to perfect himſelf in the practice of medicine; and from thence removed to Baſil, where he had ſtudied phyſic ſome time before, and here, in 1610, he received his doctor's degree in medicine. Returning to Copenhagen, he was in 1613 choſen profeſſor of phyſic in that univerſity, which he enjoyed eleven years, when falling into a dangerous illneſs, he made a vow, that if it ſhould pleaſe God to reſtore him, he would ſolely apply himſelf to the ſtudy of divinity. He recovered and kept his word, and ſoon after obtained the profeſſorſhip of divinity, and the canonry of Roſchild. He died on the 13th of July, 1629, after having wrote ſeveral ſmall works, chiefly on metaphyſics, logic, and rhetoric.

BARTHOLINUS (THOMAS) a celebrated phyſician, was the ſon of the former, and was born at Copenhagen, on the 20th of October, 1616. After ſtudying ſome years in his own country, he in 1637 went to Leyden, where he ſtudied phyſic during three years; he then travelled into France, and reſided two years at Paris and Montpellier, in order to improve himſelf under the famous phyſicians of thoſe univerſities; afterwards going to Italy, he continued three years at Padua, and at length went to Baſil, where he obtained the degree of doctor of philoſophy; ſoon after he returned to Copenhagen, where, in 1647, he was appointed profeſſor of the mathematics, and the next year was nominated to the anatomical chair, an employment better ſuited to his genius and inclination, which he diſcharged with great aſſiduity for thirteen years, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by making ſeveral diſcoveries with reſpect to the lacteal veins and lymphatic veſſels; but his cloſe application having rendered his conſtitution very infirm, he, in 1661, reſigned his chair; but the king of Denmark allowed him the the title of honorary profeſſor. He now retired to a little eſtate he had purchaſed at Hageſted, near Copenhagen, where he hoped to have ſpent the remainder of his days in peace and tranquillity; but his houſe being burnt in 1670, his library, with with all his books and manuſcripts, was deſtroyed. In conſideration of this loſs the king appointed him his phyſician, with a handſome ſalary, and exempted his land from all taxes; the univerſity of Copenhagen alſo appointed him their librarian; and, in 1675, the king did him the honour to give him a ſeat in the grand council of Denmark. He wrote, 1. Anatomia Caſpari Bartholini Parentis novis Obſervationibus primum locupletata, octavo. 2. De Monſtris in Natura & Medicina, quarto. 3. De Armillis Veterum, præſertim Danorum Schedion, octavo; and ſeveral other works. This great man died on the 4th of December, 1680.

BARTHOLOMOEUS ALBICI, a monk of the order of St. Francis, lived in the fourteenth century. He was born at Piſa, and rendered himſelf famous by his book on the Conformity of St. Francis to Jeſus Chriſt, in which he blaſphemouſly raiſes the actions of that patriarch of the monks not only above thoſe of all other ſaints, but pretends that they were equal to thoſe of the Son of God.

BARTHOLOMEW, that is, the Son of Him who ſuſpends the Waters, was one of the apoſtles. He is ſaid to be the ſame as Nathaniel; that he preached the goſpel in the Eaſt Indies, in Æthiopia, and Lycaonia; and that he ſuffered martyrdom in Armenia, where he was flead alive. Euſebius relates, that Pantænus going into the Indies, found there the Goſpel of St. Matthew, written in Hebrew, which had been left there by St. Bartholomew; but this fact is uncertain.

BARTHOLOMEW of the Martyrs, a pious and learned Dominican monk, born at Liſbon, in 1514. He was preceptor to Don Antonio, the nephew of John III. king of Portugal; and the queen having nominated him to the archbiſhopric of Braga, he was conſecrated in 1559; but at length having obtained his diſmiſſion from that archbiſhopric from Gregory III. he retired to Vienna, where he died in 1590, aged ſeventy-ſix. He wrote Stimulus Paſtorum, and ſeveral other works, all of which have been printed together in two volumes folio.

BARTHOLOMEW (ST.) a ſmall iſland in North America, and one of the Caribbees, belonging to the French. It is about twenty-four miles in compaſs, and has a good haven. Long. 62. 15. W. Lat. 18. 6. N.

BARTOLOCCI (JULIUS) a learned monk, and profeſſor of Hebrew at Rome, was born at Celeno, in 1613, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing an excellent Bibliotheca Rabbin. in four volumes folio, a continuation of which was performed by Imbonati his diſciple. He died in 1687.

BAR-

BARTOLOMEO (FRANCISCO) a celebrated painter, born at Savignano, a village ten miles from Florence, in the year 1469, was the diſciple of Coſimo Roſſelli, but was much more beholden to the works of Leonardo da Vinci for his extraordinary ſkill in painting. He was well verſed in the fundamentals of deſign, and had ſo many other laudable qualities, that Raphael, after quitting the ſchool of Perugino, applied to this maſter, and under him ſtudied the rules of perſpective, with the art of managing and uniting his colours. In the year 1500, he turned Dominican friar, and ſome time after was ſent by his ſuperiors to the convent of St. Martin, in Florence. He painted both portraits and hiſtories; but his ſcrupulous conſcience would hardly ever ſuffer him to draw naked figures, though no body underſtood them better. He was the firſt who invented and made uſe of a layman. He died in 1517, aged forty-eight.

BARTON (ELIZABETH) vulgarly called the Holy Maid of Kent, a noted impoſtor raiſed up by the miniſter of Aldrington in Kent, and other prieſts, to ſupport the Romiſh church under its tottering condition, in the reign of king Hen y VIII. She was ſervant to one Thomas Knob of Aldrington, and had been long troubled with convulſions that diſtorted her mouth and limbs in an extraordinary manner, and threw her body into the ſtrangeſt agitations. The continuance of this diſtemper at laſt ſo diſpoſed her body, that when ſhe recovered, ſhe could throw it into the ſame diſtortions. Maſters, the miniſter of Aldrington, with ſeveral monks and friars, thought her a proper tool to anſwer their purpoſes; they perſuaded her to pretend that what ſhe ſaid and did was by a ſupernatural impulſe, and taught her to act her part to the higheſt degree of perfection; ſhe would lie as it were in a trance for ſome time, and then coming to herſelf, after many ſtrange geſticulations, would break out into devout ejaculations, hymns, and prayers; ſometimes delivering herſelf in ſet ſpeeches, ſometimes in uncouth monkiſh rhymes, pretending that ſhe had been honoured with viſions, heard heavenly voices, and the moſt raviſhing melody, and had been favoured with revelations, declaiming againſt the wickedneſs of the times, againſt hereſy and innovations, exhorting the people to frequent the church, to hear maſſes, to uſe frequent confeſſion, and to pray to our Lady and all the ſaints. Her artful management of this affair, together with her pretended piety, virtue, and auſterity of life, not only deceived the vulgar, but ſeveral learned men, as ſir Thomas Moore, Fiſher biſhop of Rocheſter, and Warham archbiſhop of Canterbury, the latter of whom appointed commiſſioners to examine her. She was now inſtructed to ſay in her counterfeit trances, that the bleſſed Virgin had appeared to her, and that ſhe ſhould never recover till ſhe went to viſit her image, in a famous chapel dedicated to her at Court at Strete. Thither ſhe at length went, attended by above three thouſand people, and ſeveral perſons of quality of both ſexes; ſhe then fell into trances, and uttered many things in honour of the ſaints and the Popiſh religion, after which it was given out, that by the interceſſion of our Lady ſhe was miraculouſly recovered of her diſtemper. She was then, by the archbiſhop's order, put into the nunnery of St. Sepulchre's, Canterbury, where ſhe pretended to have frequent viſions and inſpirations, and alſo to work miracles for all ſuch as would make a good profitable vow to our Lady of Court at Strete. The prieſts now reaped great gains by her, and the deſign of the contrivance being anſwered, ſhe went on for ſome years, and ſeveral books were written on her ſanctity of life, viſions, revelations, and prophecies. Emboldened by this great ſucceſs, ſhe at laſt, by the advice of her aſſociates, publicly declared, that God had revealed to her, that in caſe the king went on with the divorce of queen Catherine of Arragon, and married another wife while ſhe was living, he ſhould not be king of England a month longer, but ſhould die a villain's death. This coming to the ears of the biſhop of Rocheſter, and others who adhered to the queen's intereſt, they had frequent meetings with her and her accomplices, and ſeveral methods were taken to draw the people from their allegiance. At length, this affair being no longer a ſecret, the king, who had hitherto deſpiſed it, ordered that the maid and her accomplices ſhould be brought into the ſtar-chamber, where there was a numerous appearance of lords, &c. and being cloſely examined, they all confeſſed the whole to be a contrivance and impoſture; for which they were all ſentenced to read their public recantations on a ſcaffold erected at St. Paul's Croſs, and were ſome time after executed at Tyburn, when the nun made a ſhort ſpeech, in which ſhe voluntarily acknowledged her crime and the juſtice of her ſentence.

BARTON, a town of Lincolnſhire, with a good market on Saturday, and a fair on June 13, for ſheep. It is ſeated on the ſouthern ſhore of the Humber, thirty-five miles from Lincoln. There is horſe-ferry from hence over to Hull in Yorkſhire.

BARUCH, the prophet, was the ſon of Nerias, and of a diſtinguiſhed family; but his high birth did not hinder him from becoming the diſciple and ſecretary of Jeremiah, and expoſing himſelf to the ſame dangers as that prophet. Several learned authors ſuppoſe that Baruch accompanied Saraias, his brother, to Babylon; and that he wrote the book which bears his name, the following year, which was the fifth of the captivity of Jechonias, who had been ſucceeded by Sedecias; but other interpreters believe, that the book of Baruch was not written till the fifth year after the ruin of Jeruſalem; for that city being beſieged a third time by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, Jeremiah and Baruch were put in priſon; but after the deſtruction of the city, Nebuzaradan having reſtored them to liberty, according to Joſephus, Baruch went into Egypt with Jeremiah, where the latter died. After the death of that prophet, Baruch retired to Babylon, where he wrote the book which bears his name, and read it before Jechonias and the numerous captives, in the fifth year after the Chaldeans had taken Jeruſalem and burnt it. The frequent Hebraiſms found in this book ſufficiently prove that it was originally written in Hebrew; but the original Hebrew is loſt, and we have only the Greek verſion; however, neither the Jews nor the Proteſtants acknowledge this book to be canonical.

RARUTH, an ancient town of Turky in Syria, where there is a Chriſtian church of the Neſtorian perſuaſion. It is inconſiderable now to what it was formerly, though it is ſeated in a fine fertile ſoil, twenty miles north-eaſt of Seyda, and forty-two eaſt of Balbec. Long. 34. 20. E. Lat. 33. 30 N.

BARWICK (JOHN) dean of St. Paul's, was born at Wetherſtock, in Weſtmoreland, on the 20th of April, 1612, and in 1631, was admitted into St. John's college, Cambridge, of which he was choſen fellow. He was principally concerned in ſending the plate of that college to king Charles I. and with ſome others wrote the complaint of the univerſity publiſhed by Royſton. On being driven with ſome others, from the univerſity, he came to London, and was the means of bringing back ſir Thomas Middleton and colonel Pope to their allegiance. Under the cover of paſſports of commerce procured from the rebels, he ſent meſſages and money to the royaliſts; and by the help of old women, perſonating ſtrollers, conveyed letters to and from the king. He was alſo often ſent by his majeſty to his friends in London. He aſſiſted Mr. Lacy in his confinement, and concealed ſir Marmaduke Langdale, after his eſcape from priſon, till he had an opportunity of leaving the kingdom; and was afterwards ſo afflicted at the king's death, that he fell into a dangerous illneſs. Having ſhewn himſelf a ſteady friend to the royal cauſe, king Charles II. offered him the ſee of Carliſle, which he refuſed, that it might not appear that his former loyalty was the effect of ambition. In 1661, he was made dean of St. Paul's, and the ſame year was choſen prolocutor of the convocation; but died on the 22d of October, 1664.

BARWICK (PETER) an eminent phyſician, was brother to the former, and born at Wetherſtock, in Weſtmoreland, in 1619. In 1637, he went to St. John's college, Cambridge, and was afterwards nominated to a fellowſhip in that college by the biſhop of Ely. In 1655, he was created doctor of phyſic, and two years after marrying the widow of an eminent merchant, who was a near relation to archbiſhop Laud, he ſettled in London, where he ſoon gained a very great reputation for his ſkill in his profeſſion, and in 1660, was made one of the phyſicians in ordinary to king Charles II. In 1666, being compelled by the fire of London to quit his houſe, where he had remained all the time of the plague, he took another near Weſtminſter abbey, for the ſake of being near that cathedral, to which he conſtantly reſorted at ſix o'clock prayers. In 1694, growing quite blind, and being frequently afflicted with the ſtone, he gave over practice, and dedicated the remainder of his life to the ſervice of God and the converſation of a few intimate friends. He died on the 4th of September, 1705, at eighty-ſix years of age. He wrote, 1. A Defence of Dr. Harvey's Diſcovery of the Circulation of the Blood. 2. The Life of the dean his brother. 3. A Defence of Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ againſt Dr. Walker.

BASARTSCHICK, a conſiderable town of Turky in Europe, and in Romania. It is pretty well built, and the ſtreets are clean and broad. It has a great trade, and is ſeated on the river Meritz; here are alſo ſeveral baths. Long. 24. 40. E. Lat. 41. 49. N.

BASCHI (MATTHEW) a Franciſcan monk, a native of the duchy of Spoletto, and the founder of the order of Capuchins, died at Venice, in 1552. His congregation had been approved by pope Clement VII. in 1528.

BASIER, or BASIRE, (ISAAC) a learned and active divine, born in the iſle of Jerſey, in the year 1607. He aroſe to be chaplain in ordinary to king Charles I. was inſtalled prebendary of Durham, and in 1644, was collated to the archdeaconry of Northumberland, with the rectory of Howick; but being ſequeſtered, plundered, and forced to fly, he repaired paired to king Charles at Oxford, and on the ſurrender of that city to the parliament, went to propagate the doctrines of the church of England in the Eaſt, among the Greeks, Arabians, and Copties; but on the reſtoration of king Charles II. was recalled to England, reſtored to his preferments and dignities, and made chaplain in ordinary to the king. He wrote De & Eccleſiæ ſacrum, or Sacrilege condemned by St. Paul; the Hiſtory of the Engliſh and Scots Preſbytery; and other works. He died Oct. 12, 1676, in the ſixty-ninth year of his age.

BASIL, the capital of the canton of the ſame name, in Swiſſerland, and the principal city in all that country, with regard to its antiquity, beauty, extent, and riches, ſtands on the banks of the Rhine at a place where this river having run from eaſt to weſt turns towards the north. Baſil is divided into two parts by the Rhine, which are joined together by a handſome bridge. The leaſt of the two is on the ſide of Germany. There are here two hundred and twenty ſtreets, ſix market places, forty-ſix fine fountains, thirty-one mills, whereof twenty-one are for grinding corn, and ſix for making paper. That part on the other ſide is ſeven thouſand five hundred paces in circumference, has nine or ten churches, and ſeven or eight convents, which ſerve for other uſes than to maintain monks and nuns. The ſmaller part of the city is about three miles in compaſs, and has three convents, and as many fine churches, beſides the pariſh church. Baſil, taken all together, is, from the cleanneſs and neatneſs of its ſtreets, the beauty of its civil and religious buildings, public and private, a very fine city. The religion profeſſed at Baſil, as well as in the reſt of the canton, is the Proteſtant. The cathedral or minſter is a very ſtately building, with two ſteeples or towers on each ſide the grand portico. Within there is a fine marble altar, a beautiful font, and very handſome organ loft, painted by Hans Holbein.

Behind the cathedral, on the borders of the Rhine, they have raiſed a magnificent terras, ſupported on the outſide with walls of a prodigious height. From hence there is a delicious proſpect along the Rhine, and into the neighbouring fields. The church of St. Peter is at the extremity of the city, and is remarkable for the fine ſquare behind it, which extends to the walls of the city. It is adorned with fountains, and one hundred and forty-four linden-trees and elms. This is the common place for walking in the cool of the evening, though in the heat of the day the trees yield a delightful ſhade. On the ſide of this ſquare ſtands the arſenal, which is well furniſhed with warlike ammunition and artillery. The church of the Dominicans ſerves for the French, and againſt its walls, in the church-yard, is a famous painting of Holbein's, called the Dance of Death; the deſign is ſo grand, that ſeveral painters have come to ſtudy it; but being almoſt effaced by time, it has been mended, or rather marred, by other painters.

The town-houſe is not far from the cathedral, and is adorned with ſeveral paintings, chiefly by Holbein; particularly, there is one by him in the great council-hall. in eight compartments, repreſenting the paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt, for which a very great ſum has been offered. On the outſide of the town-houſe is a painting in freſco of the laſt judgment, where the devils are repreſented as thruſting the damned into hell. Next to the town-houſe, the moſt remarkable ſight is the univerſity, founded in 1459, which has educated a great number of famous men, and is now reſorted to by a great number of ſtrangers of all ranks. There is nothing remarkable in the colleges but the public library, which is very handſome, and has a great number of curious manuſcripts, and twenty pictures by Hans Holbein.

The bridge over the Rhine is of wood, and two hundred and fifty paces in length, over which they paſs into the Leſſer City, which is walled like the former. The pariſh church is here a fine ſtructure, and the chartreuſe is ſo built, that every monk had his cell and his garden. The city of Baſil is very populous, but it may be more ſo; for on the ſouth ſide there is a large piece of land, which is taken up with gardens. It is fortified in the modern way, with baſtions and other works. Long. 7. 36. E. Lat. 47. 40. N.

The Canton of Baſil is a pleaſant, rich, and fruitful country, producing every neceſſary of life, particularly excellent corn and good wine, eſpecially about Baſil; for here the fields are level, and reach to the extremity of Mount Jura. This country is divided into ſeven baillages, Farnſberg, Homberg, Munchenſtein, Walleburgh, Ramſtein, Ricchey, and Liechtſtall.

BASIL (St.) the Great, one of the moſt learned and eloquent doctors of the church, was born at Cæſarea, in Cappadocia, about the year 328, and went to finiſh his ſtudies at Athens, where he contracted a ſtrict friendſhip with St. Gregory Nazianzen. Some years after his return he retired for a time into ſolitude, and was the founder of the monaſtic life in Pontus and Cappadocia. Being elected biſhop of Cæſaria in 369, the emperor Valens reſolved to prevail upon him to embrace the doctrine of Arius, and to communicate with Eudoxius, and for that purpoſe ſent Modeſtus, his præfectus prætorio, to him; but his arguments, perſuaſions, and threatnings, were ineffectual. St. Baſil afterwards endeavoured to unite the eaſtern and weſtern churches, that were then at variance about Meletius and Paulinus, two biſhops of Antioch, but this too was without effect. He erected a biſhoprick at Zazima, and gave it to his friend, St. Gregory Nazianzen. He wrote againſt Apollinarius and Euſtathus, and died in 379. The beſt edition of his works is that of Father Garnier, printed in Greek and Latin, in three volumes, folio.

St. Baſil's ſtyle is pure and elegant, his expreſſions grand and ſublime, his thoughts noble and full of majeſty; and Eraſmus places him among the greateſt orators of antiquity.

BASILICATA, a territory of Naples, in Italy, bounded on the north by the Otranto, Bari, and the Capitanata, on the weſt by the Principato, and a ſmall part of the Tuſcan Sea, on the ſouth by Calabria, and on the eaſt by the gulph of Taranto. It is watered by ſeveral rivers, the principal of which are the Brandano, Baſiento, Agri, and Sino; but as it is almoſt all occupied by the Appenine mountains, it is neither very populous nor fertile; however, it produces enough to maintain its inhabitants, and has a ſmall quantity of cotton. The principal towns are Cirenza, the capital, Meſi, Turſi, Rapollo, Muro, Lavello, Tracarico, Monte Peloſe, and Venoſa, which are all epiſcopal ſees.

BASILIGOROD, a town of the Ruſſian empire, in Muſcovite Tartary, ſeated on the ſide of the river Wolga, at its confluence with the Sura.

BASILIDES, a native of Alexandria, and the diſciple of Simon Magus, lived in the ſecond century, and died under the emperor Adrian, about the year 130.

BASILIUS, ſurnamed the Macedonian, emperor of the Greeks. He was a common ſoldier, and of an obſcure family in Macedonia, and yet raiſed himſelf to the throne; for having pleaſed the emperor Michael by his addreſs in the management of his horſes, he became his firſt equery, and then his great chamberlain. He at length aſſaſſinated the famous Bardas, and was aſſociated to the empire in 866. He murdered the emperor Michael in 867, held the eighth general council at Conſtantinople, depoſed the patriarch Photius, but in 878 reſtored him to the patriarchate, and declared againſt the popes, who refuſed to admit him into their communion. He carried on a ſucceſsful war in the Eaſt, and took ſeveral towns in Sicily from the Saracens. He died in 886. Under his reign the Ruſſians embraced Chriſtianity, and the doctrine of the Greek church.

He ought not to be confounded with Baſilius the Young, who ſucceeded Zemiſcus in 975, and, after a reign of fifty years, died in 1025.

BASINA, the wife of Childeric, king of France, and the mother of the great Clovis. She had been married to a king of Thuringia, when Childeric, having exaſperated his people by his debaucheries, was obliged to fly from his dominions, and came to the court of her huſband, who received him with the greateſt kindneſs. Baſina was a princeſs of extraordinary beauty, and Childeric in return for the favours he received from the king, made her the ſubject of his gallantry, debauched her, and engaged her affections ſo ſtrongly, that being recalled eight years after, ſhe left her huſband and followed him. Childeric, on ſeeing her at his court, aſked the occaſion of her journey, when ſhe plainly told him, that it was for her love of him, and that if ſhe had known any prince beyond the ſea more proper for her, ſhe would have gone in ſearch of him. Childeric was pleaſed with this ſpeech and married her.

BASINGE (JOHN) more commonly known by the name of Baſingſtochius, or Baſingſtoke, a perſon of diſtinguiſhed learning in the thirteenth century, was born at Baſingſtoke, in Hampſhire, and having ſtudied at Oxford and Paris, went to Athens, where he bought a great number of Greek manuſcripts, and at his return to England introduced here the uſe of the Greek numeral figures. On account of his uncommon merit, he was preferred to the archdeaconry of London, and not long after to that of Leiceſter. He took all proper methods to inſpire youth with the love of learning, and particularly to promote the ſtudy of the Greek language. He died in 1252, under the reign of Henry III. He wrote a Greek Grammar, a Latin Tranſlation of a Harmony of the Goſpels, &c.

BASINGSTOKE (RICHARD). See WHYTE or VITUS.

BASINGSTOKE, a town of Hampſhire, is governed by a mayor, a recorder, ſeven aldermen, ſeven burgeſſes, &c. It is ſixteen miles north-eaſt from Wincheſter, and forty-eight ſouth-weſt from London. Long. 0. 10. W. Lat. 51. 20. N. It has a diſcharged vicarage of 49l. a year. It has a market on Wedneſdays; and two fairs, held on Wedneſday in Whitſun-week, for pedlary, and Oct. 10, for hiring ſervants and cattle.

BASKARIA,

BASKARIA, a country of Muſcovite Tartary, bordered on the north by the Tartars of Tumen, and on the eaſt by thoſe of Baribinſkoi, and by the territories of Abli; on the ſouth by the mountains of Sortora, and on the weſt by the duchy of Bulgaria.

BASKERVILE (Sir SIMON) an excellent ſcholar, and eminent phyſician, in the reigns of king James I. and king Charles I. was born at Exeter, in 1573, educated at Oxford, and, in 1606, was choſen ſenior proctor of that univerſity, when he applied himſelf wholly to the ſtudy of phyſic, and became an eminent proficient. After this he came to London, when his great reputation introducing him to the knowledge of the court, he was choſen phyſician to king James I. and afterwards to king Charles I. who conferred upon him the honour of knighthood. He died July 5, 1641, aged ſixty-eight.

BASNAGAR, a city of Aſia, and capital of Golconda, in the dominions of the great mogul. It is ſaid to be large, well built, and inhabited only by people of fortune, except in the ſuburbs called Erengabad, which is taken up by tradeſmen, merchants, and the lower rank of people, who in the day-time come to trade in the city. It is ſeated on the river Nerva, in a plain, ſurrounded with little hills. The city and ſuburbs are about five miles in length. The river waſhes the walls of the city on the ſouth-weſt ſide, and paſſing along, falls into the gulph of Bengal, near Maſlipatan. The entrance is over a large bridge, and within the city there are broad handſome ſtreets, but they are ſandy, and on that account very troubleſome in hot weather. There are three fine moſques in the ſuburbs, which ſerve inſtead of caravanſeras for ſtrangers, and in the neighbourhood are ſeveral pagods.

BASNAGE (BENJAMIN) the ſon of the learned N. Baſnage, miniſter of the church of Carenton, in Normandy, was born in 1580, became miniſter of Carenton, and, in 1637, was choſen moderator to the national ſynod of Alençon. He wrote ſome controverſial works, and a Treatiſe on the Church, which was much eſteemed. He died in 1652.

BASNAGE (HENRY) the ſon of the former, and one of the moſt eloquent advocates in the parliament of Roan, was born in 1615. He publiſhed the Common Law of Normandy, with very large commentaries, and a Treatiſe on Mortgages. He died at Roan in 1695, in the eighty-firſt year of his age.

He ought not to be confounded with Henry Baſnage de Beauval, his ſon, who wrote The Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, and publiſhed an edition of Furitier. This laſt gentleman died at the Hague in 1710, aged fifty-three.

BASNAGE (JAMES) a learned and accompliſhed author, and paſtor of the Walloon church at the Hague, was born at Roan, in Normandy, Auguſt 8, 1653. He was the ſon of the advocate, and had a politeneſs ſeldom to be met with among learned men. He correſponded by letter with ſeveral princes, lords, and miniſters of ſtate, both Catholic and Proteſtant, and with a great many learned men in England, France, Germany, and Italy; he was affable and eaſy in his behaviour, and always ready to uſe his intereſt in favour of the unfortunate; and the works he wrote, which are moſtly in French, ſpread his reputation almoſt all over Europe: among theſe are, 1. The Hiſtory of the Religion of the Reformed Churches. 2. Jewiſh Antiquities. 3. The Hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament; and many others. He died September 22, 1723.

BASNAGE (SAMUEL) born at Flottemanville, was the grandſon of Benjamin Baſnage above mentioned. He was a Proteſtant miniſter at Bayeux, and afterwards at Zutphen. He publiſhed, in 1706, Annales Politico-Eccleſiaſtici, in three volumes, folio. He alſo wrote a Latin Critique on Baronius's Annals.

BASNET (EDWARD) dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin, and privy counſellor to king Henry VIII. and king Edward VI. ſignalized himſelf on the following occaſion. In 1539 O'Neal and O'Daniel, with ſome Iriſh chieftains, or heads of clans, made terrible ravages in the county of Meath, by burning towns and villages, as far as mount Tara, before the country was able to oppoſe them; at length the lord deputy Grey, attended by ſeveral of the nobility and gentry, and the citizens of Dublin and Drogheda, marched out to ſuppreſs them: dean Baſnet, laying aſide his ſacerdotal habit, attended them, and in the engagement which followed, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his courage and conduct; the rebels were routed, and the king was pleaſed to reward the dean by a grant to him and his heirs of the caſtle, town, lands, and rectory of Kilternan, in the county of Dublin, to hold in capite by the ſervice of one knight's fee for ever. He died in the firſt year of the reign of queen Mary.

BASQUES, a ſmall territory of France, towards the Pyrenean mountains. It comprehends Labour, Lower Navarre, and the diſtrict of Soule.

BASRAH, by ſome called Balſera, and by others Baſſora, or Buſſerah, a ſea-port town in Turky, in Aſia, ſtands on the ſide of the river Shat el Arab, which is formed by the confluence of the Euphrates and Tigris, in Irac Arabi. The compaſs of this city is a mile and a half, in which there are about ten thouſand houſes, all built of brick, dried in the ſun, as well as the caſtle, walls, and other public ſtructures. The houſes are low and flat-roofed, after the Turkiſh manner. It is about ſeventy miles from the Perſian Gulph, which is called by ſome the Gulph of Baſrah. The port is very good and ſafe, and ſince the deſtruction of Ormus, a great number of veſſels come thither loaded with merchandize from the Indies. The ſituation of Baſrah is ſo advantageous, that it might be made one of the fineſt cities in the world, and might be able to carry on a trade with the greateſt part of the earth.

There is great plenty of grapes in the territory of Baſrah, and yet they make neither wine nor brandy; but the Carmelite monks, by ſeeing the baſha, are allowed to make both. The baſha of Baſrah is not changed every three years, but is in ſome ſort hereditary; for by preſents the ſon procures the grand ſeignior's leave to continue in the ſame poſt. He lets his ordinary revenues to one that farms it, except the cuſtom-houſe, which he keeps in his own hands. He likewiſe gets a great deal of money from the Perſians, who all paſs this way in their pilgrimage to Mecca, and ſells them camels when they want them, at his own price. If he allows them a guard of three hundred horſe to eſcort them to Mecca, and back again to Baſrah, they pay him thirty ſequins each.

The inhabitants of Baſrah are Arabs, with ſome Perſians and Indians. The laſt have two pagods in this place. There are no other Chriſtians that have a church but the Carmelites, and this ſerves for the Armenians and the Neſtorians, who make uſe of it occaſionally when they come to this city. Neither the Portugueſe, the Dutch, nor the Engliſh, make any ſtay at this place when their trade is over, and the wind is fair. The city is under very good regulations, without intrenching on the liberties of the inhabitants, inſomuch that a ſtranger may walk thro' the ſtreets in the night with the greateſt ſafety. Beſides merchants that come by ſea from the Indies, here may be ſeen at the ſame time ſome from Aleppo, Cairo, Damaſcus, Conſtantinople, and Smyrna, to purchaſe the merchandizes that come from the Indies, wherewith they load young camels, that are bought upon the ſpot; for the Arabs bring them here to ſell, and drive a great trade with thoſe animals. Thoſe that come from Diarbekir, Mouſſul, Bagdad, and other places near the Tigris, carry their goods back up that river, but with great trouble and expence, for the voyage from Baſrah to Bagdad takes up two months.

All the country, from the junction of the two rivers to the ſea, is covered with date trees, which brings them much riches, for they export ten thouſand tuns of dates yearly. However, they are ſo cheap, that you may buy one hundred and ſixty pounds for two ſhillings and three pence. They have very fine horſes, that will travel for thirty hours together, without eating or drinking. The principal judge here is a cadi, who is appointed by the baſha.

Beſides the Chriſtians above mentioned, there is a particular ſect, called the Chriſtians of St. John, who are pretty numerous, and formerly lived on the ſide of the river Jordan, till they were driven away by the Mahommedans when they conquered Paleſtine; after which they ſubmitted to the patriarch of Bagdad, but ſeparated from him about two hundred and ſixty years ago, and came to live in the towns about Baſrah, for the conveniency of water, for they will not live where there is no river. They call themſelves the diſciples of St. John the Baptiſt, from whom they pretend to have received their faith, their books, and their cuſtoms. Every year they have a feſtival, which continues five days, when they all, great and little, flock to the biſhops to be baptiſed, which is always in a river, and on a Sunday. When an infant is to be baptiſed, they carry him to church, and when the biſhop has read certain forms of prayer, they take him to the river, where all the company goes in up to their knees, and after other prayers, he ſprinkles the child three times, ſaying each time, "In the name of the Lord, the "firſt and the laſt of the world and of paradiſe, the moſt "high Creator of all things." Then the biſhop reads ſomething more, while the godfather dips the child in the water; this done, they attend the child home, where there is generally a feaſt. They know nothing of the Trinity, but ſay with the Mahommedans, that Jeſus Chriſt is the ſpirit and word of God. They ſay likewiſe that the angel Gabriel is the ſon of God, begotten of light, and yet they will not admit the eternal generation of Chriſt. However, they allow he was made fleſh to deliver us from the guilt of ſin; that he was conceived without the help of a man, of a pure virgin, by the means of the water of a certain ſpring, which ſhe drank. They believe that he was crucified by the Jews, that he roſe again the third day, and that his ſoul aſcended into heaven while his body remained on earth: but yet affirm that it was not he himſelf that ſuffered, but a phantom in his room.

The ſacramental bread is made with meal, wine, and oil, the better to repreſent the body and blood of Chriſt. They ſay the oil is added to repreſent the grace that is communicated by the ſacrament, and to put them in mind of the love that is due both to God and man. They make their wine with raiſins, as we do here in England. Inſtead of conſecrating the elements, they make long prayers, at the ſame time bleſſing the bread and wine, in memory of Jeſus Chriſt, without mentioning his body and blood. After which the prieſt takes part of the bread himſelf, and diſtributes the reſt to his aſſiſtants. Their biſhops and prieſts are in ſome ſenſe hereditary; however, they are conſecrated with faſtings and prayers: they marry in the ſame manner as the laity, only they are reſtrained to marrying virgins. They all wear long hair, and a ſmall croſs worked with a needle. At a wedding there is an aſſembly of the friends of both parties at the biſhop's, who goes to the intended bride, and demands whether ſhe is a virgin or not; if the anſwer is in the affirmative, he makes her confirm it with an oath, and then returns to his aſſiſtants. But not content with this, he cauſes her to be examined by his wife and other women; then he makes his wife give her report upon oath; if all be right, the whole company goes down to the river, where the biſhop baptiſes the couple with the uſual ceremonies. Then they return home, and the biſhop conſults a book for a fortunate hour to perform the ceremony in, with which he acquaints the company, who acquieſces in his determination. But if after the ſearch the biſhop's wife declares all is not right, if the man is willing to proceed any farther, he muſt apply to a prieſt, for the biſhop will have nothing more to do in the affair; and yet they all believe it a great ſin to marry any but a virgin, and yet are forced to comply, otherwiſe the couple to be married will turn Mahommedans: however, theſe Chriſtians may be married by their conſcientious prieſts to more wives than one.

But to return to Baſrah. It ſtands ſo low, that it would be in danger of being drowned without the dyke they have made by the ſide of the ſea with free-ſtone, above three miles in length, which is very ſtrong, and the ſtones are cloſely united. The river diſcharges itſelf through four or five channels into the Perſian Gulph, but none of them are navigable for ſhips of burthen, but that which trades to Baſrah. It abounds with fiſh, but there is none good but a ſhad, of the ſize of a herring. There is great plenty of ſwans, geeſe, ducks, teal, widgeons, and curlews. The fields abound with patridges of ſeveral kinds, plover, ſnipes, pigeons, and larks. They have likewiſe birds of prey, as eagles, hawks, kites, crows, black and white; and it is remarkable that thoſe of the ſame colour keep together, and will not ſuffer any ſtragglers of the contrary colour to come among them.

There are abundance of ſmall turtle in the river, but they remain unmoleſted, becauſe the Mahommedans, as well as the Jews, are forbid to eat ſhell-fiſh. They have ſeveral ſorts of wild beaſts, and their wild ſwine eat exceeding well, though they are not fat. The peaſants, who dare not eat any themſelves, invite the Chriſtians to come and kill them, becauſe they make ſad havock with their corn and roots. They have plenty of black cattle, wild and tame, and good milk, but bad cheeſe, and no butter; inſtead of which laſt they uſe the fat of the tails of their ſheep. Coffee and ſmoaking always go together, and are uſed both by the ladies and gentlemen. In the Deſert of Arabia, which is very near Baſrah, there are wild camels, horſes, aſſes, goats, lions, leopards, panthers, and jackals, which they hunt on horſeback, with ſwords and lances, and on foot with fowling-pieces. They have plenty of pomegranates, peaches, nectarines, apricots, quinces, olives, apples, pears, and grapes; but the moſt common and uſeful of all their fruits are the dates, which ſupport and maintain many millions of people, who make them their daily food; and what is remarkable, from hence to the river Indus, or Sinde, they live upon nothing elſe but dates and dried fiſh. Long. 47. 10. E. Lat. 30. 1. N.

BASS, an inacceſſible rock and fort, on the coaſt of Eaſt Lothian, in Scotland, at the entrance of the frith of Forth, forty-five miles from Edinburgh. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 56. 3. N.

BASSAIM, a town of Aſia, in the kingdom of Viſapour, on the coaſt of Malabar. It is fortified, and belongs to the crown of Portugal. It ſtands on a ſmall iſland, ſeparated from the continent by a rivulet. Its walls are pretty high, and about two miles in circumference. It contains three or four churches, ſome convents and monaſteries, with a college and hoſpital, beſides a little citadel in the middle. The trade might be enlarged if moſt of its riches did not lie buried in the churches, or in the hands of indolent country gentlemen, who ſpend their days in eaſe and luxury, without regarding the poverty and calamity of their country. There is an inlet between the town and the iſland of Salſet, which is about half a league diſtant; it ſerves for a harbour for ſmall ſhipping only. The governor is called General of the North, having Diu, Daman, and Chaul, under him, with all their territories. Long. 72. 5. E. Lat. 19. 30. N.

BASSANO (Giacomo da Ponte da) an excellent Italian painter, thus called from the place of his birth. He was born in the year 1510, at Baſſano, a village belonging to the republic of Venice, and was inſtructed by Francis, his father, in the firſt principles of his art, and by the works of Titian and Parmeſan; but above all by the attentive ſtudy of nature, for which purpoſe he lived chiefly in the country, where he principally applied himſelf to painting of landſcapes and animals. He alſo became well acquainted with hiſtory and polite literature, which furniſhed him with excellent ſubjects. He has likewiſe drawn ſeveral night-pieces, but is ſaid to have found great difficulty in repreſenting feet and hands, and for this reaſon theſe are generally hid in his pictures. Annibal Carrache going to ſee Baſſano, was ſo deceived by a book painted on the wall, that he went to lay hold of it. Baſſano was fond of muſic, and uſed alſo to amuſe himſelf with gardening; and it is ſaid, that among the plants he reared, he often intermingled the figures of ſerpents and other animals, drawn ſo much to the life, that the ſpectator could hardly fail of being deceived. The works of this painter are ſpread all over Europe, many of them were purchaſed by Titian, and there are ſeveral in the French king's cabinet, the royal palace, and the Hotel de Toulouſe. He died in 1592, aged eighty-two, leaving four ſons, of whom Francis and Leander were alſo diſtinguiſhed painters.

BASSANTIN (James) a Scots aſtronomer in the ſixteenth century, was the ſon of the laird of Baſſantin in the Mers, and born ſome time in the reign of king James IV. He was ſent while young to the univerſity of Glaſgow, where, inſtead of applying himſelf to words, he arrived at a ſurpriſing knowledge (for that time) in almoſt all the branches of the mathematics; and afterwards, in order to improve himſelf in this kind of knowledge, went to France, and travelled thro' the Netherlands, Switzerland, Italy, and Germany; he was, however, ſtrongly tinctured with the ſuperſtition of the times, in relation to aſtrology. He wrote Aſtronomia Jacobi Baſſantini Scoti, i. e. The Aſtronomy of James Baſſantin, a Scot: Paraphraſe de l'Aſtrolabe, i. e. An Explanation of the Aſtrolabe; and ſeveral other works. He died in 1568.

BASSET (Fulk) biſhop of London in the reign of king Henry III. was brother to Gilbert Baſſet, one of the barons, and was elected to the ſee of London in the year 1241. In 1250 he began to have a warm diſpute with archbiſhop Boniface, concerning the right of metropolitan viſitation, but, after a long conteſt, thought it beſt to ſubmit. He however ſucceeded better in the oppoſition he made to Ruſtand, the pope's legate. The king and the pope had agreed, with their joint force, to ſqueeze a large ſum of money out of the Engliſh clergy, and to ſhare the plunder: to this end Ruſtand, the pope's legate, ſummoned a council at London, in October, 1255, in which he produced a commiſſion from the pope, to demand a certain ſum of them: upon which the biſhop of London, riſing up, ſaid, "Before "I will ſubmit to ſuch ſervitude, injury, and intolerable "oppreſſion, I will loſe my head." The reſt of the prelates being animated by Baſſet's reſolution, it was unanimouſly decreed, that the pope's demand ſhould not be complied with, nor any regard paid to Ruſtan's authority or cenſures. The legate carried his complaint to the king, who, ſending for the biſhop of London, uſed him very roughly, and threatened him with the ſevereſt papal cenſures. To which Baſſet replied, "The king and the pope, though they cannot juſtly, yet, as being ſtronger than me, may force my biſhoprick from me; they may take away the mitre, but the helmet will remain." This ſteadineſs, and the decree of the council, quite diſconcerted the ſcheme. He died of the plague in 1259.

Basset (Peter) a gentleman of a good family, was chamberlain, or gentleman of the privy-chamber, to king Henry V. a conſtant attendant on that brave prince, and an eye-witneſs of moſt of his glorious actions both at home and abroad; all which he particularly deſcribed in a volume intitled, The Actes of King Henry V. which remains in M.S. in the College of Heralds. This author flouriſhed about the year 1430, in the reign of king Henry VI.

BASSE Terre, the capital of the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's. See Christopher's.

BASSEVILLE, a town of North America, in the iſland of Martinico, with a very good harbour. It was built by the French.

BASSI (Angelo). See Politian.

BASSIGNANA, a village of Italy, in the duchy of Milan, ſeated at the confluence of the rivers Po and Tanaro, famous for a battle that was fought near it, on November 25, 1745.

BASSIGNI, a ſmall territory of France, partly in Champagne, and partly in Barrois, of which Chomonte is the capital. It is extremely fertile in all things neceſſary for life, and has plenty of wood.

BASSOLIS (JOHN) a learned divine, of the order of St. Francis, lived in the fourteenth century, and obtained the name of Doctor Ordinatiſſimus. He wrote a Commentary on the Sentences.

BASSOMPIERRE (FRANCIS DE) colonel of the Swiſs, and marſhal of France, was born in Lorrain, of an ancient and noble family, in the year 1579. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct; but, in 1631, was thrown into the Baſtile, by the king's order, from whence he was not diſcharged till after the death of the cardinal de Richelieu. He wrote his Memoirs while he was in priſon: we have alſo his Account of his Embaſſies, and Remarks on the Hiſtory of Lewis XIII. compoſed by Dupleix.

BASTA (NICHOLAS) an Epirote by nation, was an excellent officer of the cavalry in the ſervice of the Spaniards, in the Low Countries, where he ſerved under the duke of Alva, in the year 1567. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the defeat of La Noue, before Engelmunſter, in 1580.

BASTA (GEORGE) a famous general, born in a village called la Rocca, near Tarentum. The duke of Parma made him commiſſary general of horſe, in the year 1580, and there was no conſiderable enterprize in which he did not give him a principal ſhare. The nobleſt theatre of his actions was in Tranſilvania and Hungary; he gained a ſignal victory in 1601 over Sigiſmund Battori, who had procured himſelf to be choſen prince of Tranſilvania; on the ſide of the Imperialiſts ſcarce was there three hundred men killed, though Sigiſmund loſt above ten thouſand, one hundred and ten colours, forty pieces of cannon, and the whole baggage of his army. This great general wrote a work intiled, Maeſtro di Campo Generale; and another intitled, Governo della Cavalleria leggiera.

BASTARD (THOMAS) a clergyman and a poet, was born at Blandford, in Dorſetſhire, and educated at New college, in Oxford, of which he was choſen perpetual fellow, in the year 1588, but indulging his talent for ſatire, he was expelled the college for a libel. He was afterwards chaplain to Thomas, earl of Suffolk, lord treaſurer of England, through whoſe intereſt he became vicar of Beer-Regis, and rector of Amour, or Harmer, in his native county. He had great natural endowments, was well ſkilled in the learned languages, and was alſo a celebrated poet, and in his latter years an excellent preacher. He publiſhed ſeveral ſermons. Towards the latter end of his life he grew diſordered in his ſenſes, and being thrown into priſon for debt, he there died in a very mean and obſcure condition, April the 19th, 1618.

BASTIA, the capital city of Corſica, an iſland of the Mediterranean, with a good port, a ſtrong caſtle, and a biſhop's ſee. Long. 9. 42. E. Lat. 42. 35. N.

BASTIA, a maritime town of Turky, in Europe, over-againſt the iſland of Corfu, at the mouth of the river Calamon. Long. 10. 35. E. Lat. 39. 40. N.

BASTIMENTOS, ſmall iſlands near Terra Firma, in North America, lying a little to the eaſtward of Porto Bello. One of them has a ſpring of excellent water; they are inhabited by Indians.

BASTION OF FRANCE, a place in Africa, on the coaſt of Barbary, to the north-eaſt of Bona. It is conſiderable for the fiſhing of coral, and for corn, leather, wax, and horſes. The French are ſettled there.

BASTOGNACK, a ſmall town of the Low Countries, in the duchy of Luxemburg, twenty miles north-eaſt of the city of Luxemburg. Long. 6. 0. E. Lat. 50. 10. N.

BASTON (ROBERT) a Carmelite monk, and afterwards prior of the convent of that order at Scarborough, and alſo poet laureat and public orator at Oxford, flouriſhed in the fourteenth century. King Edward I. in his expedition into Scotland in 1304, took Robert Baſton with him, in order to celebrate his victories over the Scots; but our poet being taken priſoner, was obliged, by torments, to change his note, and ſing the ſucceſſes of Robert Bruce. He wrote ſeveral books in Latin, on the Wars of Scotland, the Luxury of Prieſts, Synodical Sermons, &c. and alſo a volume of Tragedies and Comedies, in Engliſh. He died about the year 1310.

BASTWICK (JOHN) a phyſician whoſe writings and puniſhment made a great noiſe in the laſt century, was born at Writtle, in Eſſex, in the year 1593, and was entered in Emanuel college, Cambridge, in 1614. On his leaving the univerſity, he travelled abroad for nine years, and then ſettled at Colcheſter, where he practiſed phyſic, and wrote two books in Latin againſt Popery, a treatiſe called Elenchus Religionis Papiſticæ, with Flagellum Pontificis & Epiſcoporum, i. e. a Confutation of Popery, and a Scourge for the Latian Biſhops. Though, in his epiſtle to the reader, he declared that he intended nothing againſt ſuch biſhops as acknowledged their authority from kings and emperors, our Engliſh prelates imagining that ſome things in theſe books were levelled at them, the author was called before the high commiſſion-court, and fined one thouſand pounds, ſentenced to be excommunicated, debarred his practiſe of phyſic, his books to be burnt, to pay coſts of ſuit, and to remain in priſon till he made a recantation. In purſuance of this ſentence he lay two years in the Gate-houſe, where he wrote Apologeticus ad Præſules Anglicanos, &c. An Apology for Himſelf, addreſſed to the Biſhops; and another book called the Letany, in which he taxed the biſhops with an inclination to popery, and exclaimed againſt the ſeverity and injuſtice of the high-commiſſion's proceedings againſt him. Upon this an information was exhibited againſt him, and in the end, he was ſentenced to pay a fine of five thouſand pounds, to ſtand in the pillory in the Palace-yard, Weſtminſter, and there to loſe his ears, and to ſuffer perpetual impriſonment in a remote place of the kingdom. This ſentence was executed; and he was ſent to Launceſton-caſtle, in Cornwall, and was afterwards removed to St. Mary's caſtle, in the iſle of Scilly; but upon the meeting of the parliament, in 1640, a petition was ſigned by his wife and friends, who were not allowed to come near him, that the juſtice and rigour of his ſentence might be reviewed and conſidered; upon which, warrants were ſent to the governors of the ſeveral caſtles, to bring him to London. Baſtwick landed at Dover, and was every where received by vaſt numbers of people with acclamations of joy, and when he came to Southwark, he was met by great crowds of the citizens of London, with boughs and flowers in their hands, and conducted by them to his lodgings in the city. On the 21ſt of February following, the houſe of commons declared, that the ſeveral proceedings againſt him were illegal, unjuſt, and againſt the liberty of the ſubject: that the ſentence paſſed upon him be reverſed, his fine remitted, and he reſtored to his profeſſion; and that, for reparation of his loſſes, he ought to have five thouſand pounds out of the eſtates of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the high-commiſſioners, and thoſe lords who voted againſt him in the ſtar-chamber: but the enſuing confuſion of the times prevented the payment of the money. See the articles BURTON and PRYNNE.

BATA, a town of Africa, and capital of a province of the ſame name, in the kingdom of Congo; the land about it is fruitful in corn.

BATAVIA, the fineſt town in all the Eaſt Indies, is ſituated in the iſland of Java, and is the capital of all the Dutch Eaſt India ſettlements. The ſtreets are long and broad, all drawn by a line, with two rows of trees, always green, and which at all times afford a refreſhing ſhade when the ſun ſhines. Moſt of the ſtreets are thirty feet broad, and on both ſides near the houſes paved with bricks. The buildings are all well contrived, moſt of the private houſes having handſome gardens, well planted with fruit-trees, and enjoying all the uſual conveniences. There are eight principal ſtreets, of which Princes-ſtreet is the chief. It begins at the point of the caſtle, and runs in a ſtraight line to the town houſe. This is on the eaſtern ſide of the river that runs through the town. The weſtern bank of the river is planted with pleaſant trees, and adorned with houſes, all in a ſtraight line, as far as the Dieſt-gate. There are fourteen ſtreets with canals in the middle, which they call Grachts; of theſe the Tigreſgracht is the moſt ſtately, and the moſt pleaſant, both for the goodneſs of the buildings, and the beauty of the trees. The canal is lined and edged with ſtone, over which are four ſtone bridges, ſuſtained by as many high ſtone arches; beſides which, there is a wooden bridge at one end. There are fifty-ſix bridges in all, beſides the draw-bridges which are over the canals without the walls.

Among the public buildings, the church called the Croſs church is the chief. It is built all of ſtone, and has a ſteeple in the middle, finely adorned with iron work; this church has a great deal of fine carving, and excellent workmanſhip, both within and without. The town-houſe ſtands very near the centre of the city, in a ſpacious ſquare. It is two ſtories high, and built with brick. The great gate is in the middle of the ſtructure, and has pillars of the Corinthian order, which ſupport a ſtone balcony or gallery. The windows are large, glazed, and defended on the out-ſide with iron-work. In this houſe a court of juſtice is kept, and the ſenators meet; as alſo the maſters of the hoſpitals, the overſeers of other places, and the court for the direction of military affairs within the city. The officers of juſtice live in a court, incloſed with a high wall, and a double row of ſtone pillars. There is likewiſe an hoſpital for the ſick, where they are maintained till they are cured. All the people people neceſſary for ſuch a place have diſtinct apartments. There is a ſpin-houſe, where the common women are ſet to work; it has windows only on one ſide, and they are ſo contrived, that the women can neither ſee nor be ſeen, but when the maſter pleaſes. The Chineſe hoſpital is for the ſick and aged of that nation; and they have alſo an hoſpital for orphans. There are ſeveral ſtructures which properly belong to the Eaſt India company, wherein the artificers are lodged, and their goods, ſtores, and rice laid up. They have particular markets for fiſh, rice, fleſh, fowls, and fruit. The caſtle is of a quadrangular form, with two baſtions that front the city. The weſt ſide of the river waſhes the walls of the caſtle, which is incloſed by part of the city, and lies open on that ſide. The two other baſtions face the ſea, and all the baſtions, as well as the curtains, are faced with white ſtone, from the bottom to the top. The ditch is very broad and deep, and is incloſed with a quickſet hedge. In this caſtle the governor of all their dominions in the Indies reſides, and all the members of the council dwelling at Batavia; as alſo the head factors, and other neceſſary officers belonging to the company. The palace of the governor ſurpaſſes all the reſt. Long. 105. 5. E. Lat. 6. 10. S.

The land which ſurrounds the city is all well cultivated with rice, ſugar-canes, gardens, orchards, country-houſes, wharfs, and ſugar-mills, which are all of great conſequence to this city. There are likewiſe four gun-powder mills, a corn-mill, a ſaw-mill, and a paper-mill. There are forts at certain diſtances from the city, to keep the barbarous inhabitants in awe, that the reſt may manage their buſineſs with ſecurity. The inhabitants of Batavia are either citizens or ſervants of the company, and are of divers nations; but the Dutch exceed the reſt, both in riches and dignity, and enjoy the places of honour and profit. The Chineſe were always looked upon as the moſt induſtrious of all the Eaſtern nations, but in 1740 the Dutch pretended they had entered into a conſpiracy, and for that reaſon maſſacred twenty or thirty thouſand of them. However, they let their wives and children ſurvive. They deal in fiſh, manage the rice, ſugar-canes, and corn-fields. They dreſs in their own faſhion, in a gown with wide ſleeves, of callicoe or ſilk, according to their abilities.

The Malayans live chiefly on fiſh, and have a governor of their own at Batavia. The more common ſort wear light callicoes and ſilks, but the women of faſhion wear ſtriped and flowered ſilks, with their black hair behind in a knot; but the men wear a piece of cloth about their heads. There are a few merchants among them. Their houſes are very mean, being only covered with leaves, and planted round with cocoa-trees. They are continually chewing betel, and ſmoaking tobacco through a ſugar-cane.

The Moors or Mahomedans live almoſt in the ſame manner as the Malayans. A few of them drive a little pedling trade with coral and glaſs beads, in the ſtreets. They are dreſſed in the Turkiſh manner.

The Amboyneſe inhabit a particular part of the ſuburbs, near the Chineſe burying-ground, and near it their governor has a ſtately houſe, in their own faſhion. They are chiefly carpenters, and build houſes with bamboo-canes, in a dexterous manner. They have a terrible aſpect, are very courageous, and wear their black hair very long. Their weapons are ſcymeters, with oval targets to ward off blows. The men wear a piece of callicoe wrapt ſeveral times about their heads, both ends of which hang down, and are adorned with flowers and other figures. The women have only a piece of callicoe wrapt about their middle, and another round their ſhoulders, their arms being left bare. Their houſes are made of wooden planks, carved with leaves, and are indifferently high built. The men dreſs like the Moors.

The Javaneſe live in houſes of bamboo-canes, ſome of which are neatly built, and covered with the twigs of cocoa-trees. Some maintain themſelves by tilling the ground and planting rice, and others by building boats, uſed by the inhabitants for carrying their commodities to the city. They alſo go a-fiſhing in boats of the figure of a half moon, which are ſo ſwift that they call them the flying proes. The Javaneſe men go almoſt naked, having nothing but a piece of cloth wrapt about them from the middle to the knees. Some wear a kind of a ſaſh or ſcarf, whereto they faſten their ſwords. The Javaneſe women enjoy as much freedom as thoſe of Europe. They are extremely amorous, and as ſome ſay, conſtant to their gallants. On the upper part of their bodies they wear a waiſtcoat, which is open before to ſhew their breaſts. Below this they wrap a piece of ſilk or cotton, two or three times about them. As they wear no ſhifts, there is always a bare ſpace between their wrapper and their waiſtcoat, which diſcovers a tawny ſkin, which would not be very tempting in our parts of the world. Some Europeans pretend they are greatly to be admired for their fine features, exquiſite ſhape, and extraordinary neatneſs, for they waſh often, and keep their bodies very clean. Beſides, they have a languiſhing air, ſprightly eyes, and an agreeable laugh; but if their gallant is inconſtant, they ſeldom fail to poiſon him.

The Topaſſers are a mixture of various Indian nations, and will accommodate themſelves to the religion and cuſtoms of thoſe they live among. They live both within and without the city; and the chief of them being merchants, live in ſtately houſes, and traffic in their own veſſels to the neighbouring iſlands. The reſt till the ground, and cultivate gardens; they have a few artificers among them, beſides ſchool-maſters to teach their children to read and write. They imitate the dreſs of the Dutch, only their breeches are like ſailors trowſers. Their women are clad like other Indian women. Their houſes are built with ſtone, covered with tiles, and arched in a handſome manner. Before their houſes they plant all manner of Indian fruits and flowers. On the back ſide they keep hogs and poultry for ſale.

The Macaſſar ſoldiers have poiſoned arrows, which they ſhoot through trunks, and are always fatal when they draw blood. The Timoreſe ſoldiers have ſwords of ſandal wood, with which, as they ſay, they can cut a man through the middle. They are a barbarous people, and were formerly Pagans, but now moſt of them are turned Mahomedans, and ſome Roman Catholics. The Bougiſſes wear only a piece of ſtuff round their middles. The women go half naked, like moſt other Indians. The men are good ſoldiers, and have ſcymeters, arrows, and ſhields for their arms. Their king has a palace in the city, on the brink of the river, with pleaſant walks, flower-gardens, and a moſt delightful vineyard.

Thus we ſee that at Batavia there is a collection of various nations, among which the chief artificers are the Dutch, who likewiſe keep the principal public-houſes, in which arrack is ſold. Some are cooks, and others get a livelihood by ſelling a ſort of beer made with ſugar.

The government is the ſame as in the United Provinces, and conſiſts of ſix peculiar colleges, or councils. The firſt is compoſed of the members of the council of the Indies, in which all affairs of ſtate are tranſacted, and the grievances of the people redreſſed. The ſecond conſiſting of nine perſons, beſides the preſident, manage every thing relating to the revenue and treaſury. The third is compoſed of aldermen or ſenators, choſen out of the principal inhabitants, who determine cauſes between the citizens. The fourth is made up of the overſeers of the hoſpitals, and their buſineſs is to take care of poor orphans. The fifth council is to determine matters of leſs moment. They grant licenſes for marriages; and will not permit a man to marry before twenty-one, nor a maid before eighteen, nor yet muſt a Chriſtian marry with a Pagan or Mahomedan. The ſixth is the council of war, where matters are determined relating to military affairs. But matters of conſequence are referred to the ſenators.

The eccleſiaſtical government is adminiſtred by the clergy, church-wardens, and overſeers, of the poor, who aſſemble in the veſtry of the church, upon the ſummons of the preſident, and is choſen every month.

The grounds about Batavia, and indeed all the iſland of Java, are extremely fertile; European plants grow ſtronger and larger than in their native ſoils, and ſeeds brought from diſtant parts produce herbs, plants, and fruit to great perfection; the vines, which flouriſh all the year round, are in great plenty, and yield excellent grapes, each bunch weighing about a pound.

The plants proper to theſe parts are the fokky, which yields a fruit like a pear near a yard long, and of the thickneſs of a man's arm; the rind is thin, but ſo ſmooth and bright it may ſerve for a looking-glaſs. The leaves are green, but rough, and covered with a ſort of hair. They eat this boiled with wine and pepper, and it reſembles artichoke bottoms. The jamboe is a ſort of a plum, or rather ſloe, which, on account of its aſtringency, is uſed in an inflammation of the throat and the bloody-flux. The Chineſe cubebs, ſo called becauſe they are exported to China in great plenty, are ſmaller than pepper, and grow on a tree like an apple-tree. The Javaneſe boil them before they export them, that they may not grow in other places. It is a ſort of a ſpice that is good to attenuate phlegm, and expel wind; it is a great provocative, and good in women's cold diſeaſes. Aſſa fœtida is much uſed by the Indians in their ſauces. It is the concreted juice of the root hin, or hingiſh. The cardamoms grow in the woods and are well known with us. Mouli bebek, or duck's beak, is an ever-green; the leaves ſteeped in vinegar are uſed againſt St. Anthony's fire. Benzoin, or benjamin, is got out of a ſhrub, by making an inciſion in the bark. The pyzang banana, or Indian figs, grow in ſix months time to the height of thirty feet, and four in circumference, but the trunk is ſo ſoft, you may cut it like a cabbage ſtalk. The leaves are from five to ſeven feet long, and a foot and a half broad. The fruit is like a cucumber, and is gathered while green, but being hung up in the houſe, turns yellow in a few days time. The rind rind is thin, and peels off readily. They grow in cluſters, ſometimes two hundred together. Some fry them in butter, and others dry them in the ſun, and then they have a pleaſant taſte. Some uſe the leaves inſtead of diſhes, or to wrap up goods, and others inſtead of napkins.

Bamboos grow all over Batavia. They are ſtrait canes or reeds, which ſeem to be cloven at the top. They grow in the water, and bear flowers like white lilies, which have a moſt agreeable ſmell. The jakka or nanka is one of the largeſt fruit-trees in the Indies, for it will grow up to the height of an oak. The leaves are blue beneath, but green above, and leſs than the leaves of the cherry-tree. It has no flowers, for the fruit grows out of the ſtem and branches, one of which ſometimes weighs nine or ten pounds, and is a foot and a half long. It has the look of a large melon above, but below like a pine-apple. It has a thick rind, and is covered with a ſort of down. The kernels are incloſed in a yellow pulp, and are larger than dates. This fruit is luſcious, but will not digeſt. The kernels are eaten boiled with a little ſalt inſtead of rice. The mangoes grow on trees as big as a large oak. The fruit is larger than a plum, and is of an orange colour when ripe. Theſe, when pickled, taſte like olives, and when preſerved with ſugar, are uſed as a ſweet-meat. The manges-tanges are reckoned the beſt of the Indian fruits; they ſeem to be of the pomegranate kind, and are purple without, but white within. The pulp is cooling, exceeding pleaſant, and very wholeſome. The rind is of a quality like that of a pomegranate. Betel is uſed all over the Indies, and the leaves at a diſtance look like thoſe of black-pepper. They are ſix inches broad, and as many long. The plant runs up about any thing like hops, and thrives beſt in ſhady places. They continually chew a leaf of this with oyſter-ſhell-lime, and a nut called areka. However, it is apt to make the head dizzy. They pretend this mixture is of vaſt advantage to the teeth and gums, but it ſeems to be ill calculated for that purpoſe. But be that as it will, it is a preſent at all viſits.

The quadrupeds peculiar to theſe parts, are firſt, the lynx, a creature of the ſize of a large dog, and ſeems to partake of the nature both of a dog and a cat. He is of a brown colour, checkered with red, with black ſtreaks. His tail is very ſhort, and his ears black. The ſucotario is as big as a large ox, with a ſnout like a hog, two long rough ears, and the cleft of the eyes perpendicular. On the ſide of the head near the eyes there are two long horns, which have the appearance of elephants teeth, but they are not ſo thick; it feeds upon herbage, and is ſeldom taken. The Macaſſar fox has a prodigious long buſhy tail, which ſtands upright, with flat feet, long claws, and ſhort ears. Monkies are pretty well known all over England, they live in the woods, and feed on fruits. Some are green, with a long beard and large eye-brows, and ſome have long buſhy tails, for which reaſon many take them to be of the fox kind. Others carry their long tails quite upright, and others again have pale faces, for which reaſon the Dutch call them death's heads. The Suri monkies are ſhaped like a ſquirrel, with ſhort round ears, large eyes, and large buſhy tails, wherewith they can cover their whole bodies. They leap from tree to tree as if they flew. Some are of the ſize of rats, and are very miſchievous; but thoſe called ſanguins, of the ſame bigneſs, with a black face, hands, and ears, are very diverting. The ant-bear or piſmire-eater is of ſeveral ſorts, one is of the ſize of a young hog, another leſs, and a third like a cat; they have all heads like a pig, with a long ſharp ſnout, ſmall ears, and are of the colour of a fox. The porcupines grunt like hogs, and are covered with ſharp pointed quills. Some are of the ſize of a large dog, but ſomewhat longer, and ſhorter legged. They are generally brown, with a great tuft on the head, and a mouth like a hare; the two fore feet are like thoſe of a deer, and behind like a bear. The quills are a foot long, which they lay cloſe to their bodies, unleſs they are vexed; but when this is the caſe, they ſtand erect, and the creature can ſhoot them off ſo as to wound man or beaſt.

The ſheep are about the ſize of ours, but ſome have wattles below the throat like ſome of our hogs, others have exceeding long ears, and others have tails from twenty to thirty pounds weight, which are like a lump of fat; ſome have hair like goats, and others have wool like ours. The goats are not ſo large as the ſheep; ſome are pied, with long hair, others have very long ears, with horns ſtanding upright on their heads, and in ſome places they bring three or four kids at a time. The buffaloes are more bulky and ſtronger than an ox, and their horns lie cloſe to their heads. When they are tamed they work like oxen. They guide them by putting a chain through their noſtrils. Their milk is very good. There are oxen brought to Batavia from Surat not much bigger than large dogs, theſe are put into ſmall carts to draw children, and any other things not too heavy.

There are many birds in theſe parts not to be found in Europe, ſuch as the emeu, called by the Dutch the caſuaris. He is about five feet high, and carries his head and neck quite upright. The head is ſmall in proportion to the body, and is of a dark blew colour; on the fore part of the neck are two red teats or bags, and from the middle of the bill to the crown of the head grows a hard yellow ſubſtance, like a cockle-ſhell, and they have two noſtrils at the end of the bill. The feet are long and thick, covered with a yellowiſh rind, but without ſpurs. The feet are thick and knobby, with three long horny claws. They are covered all over with plumes of a dark red mixed with black. In their motion they rather run than fly, for they can ſcarce raiſe themſelves from the ground. They are very greedy, and ſwallow any thing, but all incongruous ſubſtances come away unchanged. Their proper food is herbage, and their ſtrength lies in their legs and feet, with which they will kick very violently. They lay greeniſh eggs among the ſhrubs, which are not larger than thoſe of a hen; but they are ſpotted with a dark green. The inhabitants eat the yolk. Their bats are very extraordinary, for in bulk and ſhape they reſemble a cat. The hair is red, except on the back, where it is black. The wings are two ſkins, reaching from the fore to the hind feet. In Java there are cormorants, like a gooſe, but much bigger; underneath the bill there is a large bag, wherein to keep the fiſh, which they can contract or extend at pleaſure. They ſwallow oyſters with the ſhells, and keep them in the bags till they open, and then they throw them up and take out the oyſter. The lory is a bird of the ſize of a parrot, but of a much finer colour. The breaſt is yellow, the wings green, the head black and ſhining, with a yellow bill. They are very tame, and will talk to admiration, for which reaſon they fetch a great price. The cockatoos, ſo called from their note, which they will repeat in the ſame tone of voice in which you ſpeak to them; for if you whiſper, they will whiſper too; ſometimes they are three quarters of a yard long, blew on the back, and yellow under the belly. Another kind are white all over, except a yellow tuft on the head. There are ſome birds of the ſize of magpies, which will mimic a man's voice exceeding well. They are of a bluiſh colour, marked with dark blue ſpots and ſtreaks. The head is black, and as ſmooth as velvet, with a yellow tuft on the top. There are ſeveral other birds, but as they bear ſome reſemblance to thoſe in our parts of the world, we need not mention them in particular.

They have curious large butterflies, ſome as big as the palm of the hand, painted with various colours, and with two ſmall feathers on the head. They have ſcorpions of a prodigious ſize. They ſkulk and lurk in all parts of a houſe, and therefore great care muſt be taken to avoid them. They have centipedes five or ſix inches long, and as thick as a man's finger, of a ruddy colour, and compoſed of many joints. Their bite occaſions violent pains, and is cured like that of the ſcorpion's ſting, with oils. They have ſerpents of various kinds, one of which has large ſhining ſcales and eyes, and in the day time may be ſeen at a great diſtance. They have harmleſs ſnakes that frequent houſes, and live upon flies, ants, and other inſects. They have likewiſe flying ſnakes, or more properly lizards, for they have four legs and a tail, and have wings like a bat, with which they fly from tree to tree, twenty or thirty paces diſtant. They are quite harmleſs, and live as the former. This is all of the dragon kind there is any authentic account of. There are fire-flies, which ſhine in the dark: and horſe-flies about two inches broad; they are a pernicious inſect, and ſting moſt furiouſly.

BATACALA, a ſmall kingdom of the Eaſt Indies, on the coaſt of Malabar. It had a very large town of the ſame name, ſtanding on a little river, about four miles from the ſea. There is now nothing left worth taking notice of, but ten or eleven ſmall pagods, covered with copper and ſtone. The country produces a good deal of pepper; and the Engliſh had a factory here, who were all murdered by the natives, becauſe an Engliſh bull-dog had killed a conſecrated cow.

BATE, in Latin Bateus, (JOHN) prior of the monaſtery of Carmelites at York, in the fifteenth century, was born in Northumberland, and educated at York, whence he removed to Oxford, where he finiſhed his ſtudies. He was an eminent philoſopher, and was particularly remarkable for his ſkill in the Greek tongue. He wrote the following treatiſes: 1. On the Conſtruction of the Parts of Speech. 2. On Pophyry's Univerſalia. 3. On Ariſtotle's Predicaments. 4. On Porretanus's ſix Principles. 5. On the Aſſumption of the Virgin. 6. A Courſe of Sermons for the Year. 7. A Preface to the Bible; and other works. He died January 26, 1429.

BATE (GEORGE) an eminent phyſician, was born at Maid's-Morton, near Buckingham, in the year 1608. He was principal phyſician to king Charles I. and afterwards to Oliver Cromwell. At the Reſtoration, he ingratiated himſelf with the royal party, by means of a report induſtriouſly triouſly by his friends, that he had ſecretly, by a doſe, haſtened the uſurper's death, upon which he was made principal phyſician to king Charles II. and fellow of the Royal Society. He wrote, in Latin, An Account of the late Commotions in England, together with a ſhort Narrative of the regal and parliamentary Privileges, and ſome other pieces. He died April 19, 1669.

There was another George Bate, who wrote a work intitled The Lives, Actions, and Execution of the prime Actors and principal Contrivers of that horrid Murther of our late pious and ſacred king Charles I.

BATECALO, a city of Aſia, in the eaſtern part of the iſland of Ceylon, and the capital of the kingdom of the ſame name. It is ſeated on the river Batecalo, and has a fort at the mouth of the river, where there is a haven. The Dutch poſſeſs the beſt part of the country, having driven the Portugueſe from thence. Long. 81. 3. E. Lat. 8. 2. N.

BATECUMBE, or BADECUMBE, (WILLIAM) an eminent mathematician, who, according to Pits, flouriſhed about the year 1420, in the reign of Henry V. He wrote the following mathematical works: 1. De Sphæræ concavæ Fabrica & Uſu, i. e. Of the Formation and Uſe of the concave Sphere. 2. De Sphæra ſolida, i. e. Of the ſolid Sphere 3. De Operatione Aſtrolabii, i. e. Of the Uſe of the Aſtrolabe. 4. Concluſiones Sophiæ, i. e. Philoſophical Concluſions.

BATEMAN (WILLIAM) biſhop of Norwich in the fourteenth century, and the founder of Trinity-hall, in Cambridge, was born at Norwich, and ſtudied at Cambridge. The biſhoprick of Norwich was conferred upon him by the pope on the 23d of January, 1343; and, in 1347, he founded Trinity-hall, in Cambridge, for the ſtudy of the civil and canon law. He was a perſon of great wiſdom, eloquence, and fine addreſs, and was often employed by the king and parliament in affairs of the higheſt importance; and particularly was at the head of ſeveral embaſſies ſent to determine the great differences between the crowns of England and France.

BATES (WILLIAM) D.D. in Latin Bateſius, an eminent Preſbyterian divine, born in November, 1625. He was admitted in Emanuel college, Cambridge, and from thence removed to King's college, in 1644. He was one of the commiſſioners, at the conference in the Savoy, for reviewing the public liturgy, and was concerned in drawing up the Exceptions againſt the Common Prayer; however, ſoon after the Reſtoration, he was appointed chaplain to king Charles II. and became miniſter of St. Dunſtan's in the Weſt, but was depived of that benefice for nonconformity. Dr. Bates bore a good and amiable character, and was honoured with the friendſhip of the lord keeper Bridgman, the lord chancellor Finch, the earl of Nottingham, and archbiſhop Tillotſon. He was offered, at the Reſtoration, the deanery of Litchfield, which he refuſed. He publiſhed Select Lives of illuſtrious and pious Perſons, in Latin; and ſince his death all his works, except his Select Lives, have been printed in one volume in folio. He died in July 14, 1699, in the ſeventy-fourth year of his age.

BATH, a city of Somerſetſhire, ſeated on the river Avon, in a valley beſet with hills. It is not a large place, having but one pariſh-church beſides the cathedral or abbey; however, of late it has had many elegant buildings erected for the reception of perſons of quality, who reſort every ſeaſon to drink or bathe in the waters; there is likewiſe a magnificent hoſpital, built by the contributions of the nobility and gentry, for the benefit of the poor, who come from all parts to be cured of various diſeaſes. It is governed by a mayor, recorder, common council, &c. and has two markets, on Wedneſday and Saturday; it has two fairs, held on February 3 and June 29, for cattle. There is a bridge over the Avon, which waſhes it on the ſouth and eaſt ſides, which river, not many years ſince, was made navigable to Briſtol. It is much enlarged ſince the walls were built, which are ſaid to be very ancient; there are four gates, namely, the north, weſt, and ſouth, the fourth leads only to the river; of theſe the weſt gate is beſt, being a handſome ſtone building; without the walls there is a handſome ſquare, with a fine chapel, and an obeliſk in the centre ſeventy feet high. The ſtone of which the houſes are built is moſtly dug out of quarries on Carlton-Down, and is conveyed down a ſteep hill by a curious contrivance of the late Mr. Allen. The grove near the church is now called Orange-ſquare; over the market houſe is the town-hall, which is a large ſtone building, ſupported by twenty-one ſtone pillars. In 1740, they began to build another new ſquare in the gardens adjoining to the public walks on the ſouth ſide of the city, near the Avon, which is the chief ornament of the city.

The two ſeaſons for drinking Bath waters are the ſpring and fall; the ſpring begins with April and ends with June; the fall with September, and terminates at December: the ſpring ſeaſon is the beſt for health, and the fall for pleaſure. The common charge for bathing is two ſhillings a time; that is, a ſhilling for the chair, ſix-pence for linen, and ſix-pence to the guide. There is an officer here put in by the mayor, whoſe buſineſs it is to maintain order and prevent miſchief. There is here a conſtant round of diverſions of almoſt every kind.

The hot ſprings of this city exhale a kind of a miſt, which is not of a very agreeable ſmell, on account of the ſulphureous particles wherewith they abound. The quantity of water they yield is much the ſame, whether the weather be rainy or dry. That called the Croſs Bath is of a gentle moderate warmth, for which reaſon a perſon may ſtay much longer in it than in the reſt. It is incloſed with a wall, on the ſides of which are ſeats, and at the end galleries for muſick and the ſpectators, under which are ſlips, or ranges of ſmall dreſſing-rooms, one of which ranges are for the gentlemen, and the other for the ladies, who being dreſſed in linen habits, go both together into the water, the men keeping on one ſide, and the women on the other. This baths fills in ſixteen hours. The Hot Bath, ſo called from its being hotter than the Croſs Bath, is fifty-eight feet and a half diſtant from the former. This bath has a well, which not only ſupplies its own pump with water, but that of the Croſs Bath, by means of pipes.

The King's Bath, which is much larger, is ſupplied with a great many ſlips or dreſſing-places, ſome of which belong to the women. They both bathe in linen drawers and ſhifts. In this there is a ſpring ſo hot, they are forced to turn moſt of it away, for fear of making the bath too warm; however, the heat of the hotteſt ſpring is not ſufficient to boil an egg. The Queen's Bath has no ſpring of its own, but is ſupplied by water from the King's Bath. There is alſo a bath for thoſe that are ſuppoſed to have the leproſy, or a ſimilar cutaneous diſeaſe. This is made by the overflowing of the Croſs-Bath, and the poor that bathe in it are maintained by the contribution of the wealthy, who come to uſe the waters.

With regard to the effects of drinking the waters, it is obſervable, that they paſs off by urine, without the addition of ſalts. The mud, applied as a poultice, is good for white ſwellings, contractions of the limbs, and defluxions on, or flatulent tumours of the joints, or rather when the ſynovia of the joints is coagulated, and they begin to grow ſtiff. It is alſo good for ſcald heads, or ſuch as are over-run with ſcurf or dry ſcales, by letting it lie on it till it is dry, and then waſhing it with Bath water. This practice muſt be continued for ſome time. The Croſs Bath will prey on ſilver, all of them on iron, but none on braſs.

The Bath water certainly acts like a ſaponaceous fluid, mixt with ſulphureous particles, which penetrate through the pores of the ſkin, and tend to diſſolve the viſcid coheſions of the blood and humours; beſides, it ſoftens the rigid fibres, relaxes the coats of the veſſels, and renders them more ſoft and yielding, to which the heat of the water does not a little contribute; for this, by rarifying the humours, diſtends the minuteſt veſſels, and renders the circulation eaſy and free: therefore we can hardly meet with a more powerful deobſtruent, or a more ready way to cure many chronic diſeaſes

Hence we find that bathing yields great relief in gouty caſes, provided it be managed in a proper manner; for in this caſe the ſtay in the bath muſt be ſhort, and the heat moderate, therwiſe it will be attended with feveriſh ſymptoms, by tranſlating the gouty matter to the blood; therefore after the firſt bathing, it will be proper to ſtay till the patient falls into a ſpontaneous fetid ſweat, attended with turbid urine. Bathing can never be proper in a fit of the gout, becauſe this is an effort of nature to give relief; and therefore, if in this caſe the gouty matter is driven back to the noble parts, it will produce terrible ſymptoms, as all phyſicians muſt have obſerved; and then the only thing that can be done will be by recalling it back to the foot as ſoon as poſſible. In this and all other diſeaſes the body ſhould be prepared for bathing, and a proper regimen ſhould be obſerved during the uſe of it; and therefore thoſe who make uſe of this remedy ſhould take the advice of a phyſician reſiding on the ſpot, who muſt be the beſt judge of the proper uſe of theſe ſalutary waters. However, we may obſerve, in general, that the head ſhould never be dipt, unleſs when affected with eruptions, and then laſt of all.

Pumping the Bath water on the parts affected has been found to be of ſingular uſe in many caſes, ſuch as pains in the head, deafneſs, the hip-gout, palſy of a limb, and local decays of the muſcular parts. At firſt pumping was uſed in the bath, but this was found inconvenient, becauſe bathing does not agree with all diſorders. Pumping is particularly ſerviceable in old pains and aches, when the pores of the ſkin are ſhut up, and when cold phlegmatic humours are fixed on any part, as alſo in ſprains and relaxations of the membranous and tendinous parts.

Bath water, taken inwardly, ſtrengthens the ſtomach, invigorates the blood, helps digeſtion, and conſequently be-ſtows freſh vigour on the vital parts; beſides, by ſubtilizing the humours, it cauſes the recremental parts of the blood to paſs off freely, by their proper outlets, and ſo cruſhes many diſeaſes in the bud, eſpecially by promoting inſenſible perſpiration, ſo neceſſary to the enjoyment of uninterrupted health. Hence it is good in the gout in the ſtomach and bowels, as well as other diſorders of the inteſtines, and to prevent a return of a fit of the gout. Some baths are more particularly appropriated to particular diſeaſes. Thus the King's Bath is moſt proper for relaxed bowels, looſeneſs, wind, gouty cholics, morning reachings, and want of appetite. It ſhould be drank in a morning, beginning with ſmall quantities: but if it renders the patient coſtive, recourſe muſt be had to the Hot Bath, or at leaſt ſome laxative ſhould be taken along with it. But the Croſs Bath is more opening than either, as well as more cooling, and may be ſafely drank when other ſprings are hurtful. Gouty perſons, whoſe lungs are tender, may let the more active particles of the water of the Croſs Bath fly off, and drink it at home, with a ſpoonful of milk in each glaſs, which will render it ſafe; for ſometimes, ſuch perſons drinking theſe waters at the pump immediately, have found inflammatory diſorders in their lungs, occaſioned by the too great irritation of the more active particles, contained in the water. Bath is twelve miles eaſt of Briſtol, and one hundred and eight weſt of London. Long. 2. 30 W. Lat 51. 27. N.

BATHA, or BACHIA, a town of Hungary, ſeated on the eaſtern bank of the Danube, five miles from its confluence with the Drave. It is eighteen miles eaſt of Eſſeck, and ſeventy miles north-weſt of Belgrade. Long. 20. 40. E. Lat. 46. 40. N.

BATHE (HENRY DE) chief juſtice of the king's bench, in the reign of Henry III. was a younger brother of an ancient family of that name, probably born at the ſeat of that family, called Bathe-houſe, in Devonſhire. In 1251, when he was an itinerant juſtice for ſeveral counties, he was charged with being guilty of the baſeſt corruption, and it is ſaid, that in one circuit alone he got land of inheritance to the value of two hundred pounds per annum. He was alſo charged with treaſon, and other crimes: but what appears moſt remarkable is, that the king was preſent at his trial, and ſeeing that Bathe was likely to be acquitted, he mounted his throne, and with his own mouth made proclamation, that whoſoever ſhould kill Henry de Bathe, ſhould have the royal pardon for him and his heirs; after which ſpeech he flung out of the room in a great paſſion. Means were, however, afterwards found for reſtoring him to the king's favour, ſo that he eſtabliſhed him again in the ſame ſeat of judicature, and made him chief juſtice of the king's bench, which he enjoyed till the time of his death.

BATHURST (RALPH) M. D. an eminent phyſician, poet, and divine, born in the year 1620. He ſtudied divinity in Trinity college, Oxford, but the times of confuſion coming on, he changed the courſe of his ſtudies, and applied himſelf to phyſic. He took a doctor's degree in that faculty, in which he roſe to ſuch eminence, that he was, in the time of the uſurpation, appointed phyſician to the ſtate. Upon the Reſtoration he quitted his profeſſion of phyſic, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and preſident of his college; and having entered into holy orders, he was made chaplain to the king, and afterwards dean of Wells. Soon after he ſerved the office of vice-chancellor of Oxford, and was nominated by king William and queen Mary to the ſee of Briſtol, which he refuſed to accept. His learning and talents were various. He was an orator, a philoſopher, and a poet: he poſſeſſed an inexhauſtible fund of wit, and was a facetious companion at eighty years of age. Ridicule was the weapon with which he uſed to correct the delinquents of his college, and he was ſo abſolute a maſter of it, that he had it always at hand. His poetical pieces in the Muſæ Anglicanæ are excellent in their kind. He wrote ſeveral poems, both in Engliſh and Latin, and died June 14, 1704, in the eighty-fourth year of his age.

BATHYLLUS, a youth of Samos, paſſionately beloved by Anacreon, who often mentions him in his verſes.

BATHYLLUS, of Alexandria, a freed-man of Mecænas. He and Pylades diſtinguiſhed themſelves by being the inventors of a method of repreſenting all kinds of theatrical pieces by dancing; this new method was called the Italic, and contained the tragic, the comic, and the ſatyric; each of them kept ſcholars, who perpetuated their maſter's name; for the followers of Bathyllus, who excelled in the comic part, called themſelves Bathylli, and thoſe of Pylades, who excelled in the tragic, called themſelves Pyladæ.

BATHYLLUS, a Latin poet, cotemporary with Virgil.

BATILDA, queen of France, a lady famous for her wiſdom and piety, married Clovis III. and governed the kingdom during the minority of her ſon Clotaire II. She founded the abbeys of Chelles and Corbie, took the habit of a nun in the firſt of them, and died there about the year 685.

BATMANSON (JOHN) a perſon of great piety and learning, was firſt a monk, and afterwards prior of the Carthuſian monaſtery, or Charter-houſe, in the ſuburbs of London. He wrote two Latin Treatiſes againſt Luther, which he afterwards retracted, and alſo publiſhed the following books in Latin, viz. 1. Commentaries on the Proverbs of Solomon, and on the Canticles. 2. An Enquiry whether there was only one Magdalen, againſt Faber Stapulenſis. 3. Inſtructions for Youth. 4. Of the Contempt of the World. 5. A Homily on Luke ii. 42. He died November 16, 1531.

BATTAGLIA (DALLE) an excellent painter, who received this name from the fine battle-pieces, in which he excelled. His real name was Michael Angelo Gerquozzi. He was born at Rome, in the year 1600, and bred up in the ſchool of Antonio Salviati, a Bologneſe. Beſides his great ſkill in painting battles, he was very ſucceſsful in all ſorts of figures, and painted fruit better than any maſter in his time. He died at Rome in the year 1660, in the ſixtieth year of his age.

BATTEL, a town in Suſſex, five miles north-weſt of Haſtings, and fifty-ſeven eaſt-by-ſouth from London, with a market on Thurſdays. It has two fairs, the one on Whit-Monday, and the other on November 22, for cattle and pedlars wares. The living is a vicarage, rated at 24l. 13s. 4d. in the king's books. The incumbent is called Dean of Battle. It was formerly called Epiton, and is the place where William the Conqueror vanquiſhed king Harold, on October 14, 1066. William, in memory of this victory, erected an abbey, calling it Battle Abbey; and if a criminal could but reach this abbey, he was diſmiſſed from thence, and was afterwards in no danger of puniſhment for his paſt faults. The market day was on a Sunday, but it was changed to Thurſday by act of parliament. The abbey was a large and noble ſtructure, as may be judged by the gateway, which is ſtill entire, as well as from the other remains. Soon after its diſſolution the lord viſcount Montacute built a ſtately pile on the ſouth ſide, which is now become ruinous. It was purchaſed not very long ſince by ſir Thomas Webſter, Bart. This abbey was honoured with the mitre, and was valued at 881l. according to Dugdale, but by Speed at 987l. Long. 0. 35. E. Lat. 50. 55. N.

BATTERSEA, a large village in Surry, four miles ſouth-weſt of London, noted for aſparagus, and was the ſeat of the late lord viſcount Bolingbroke. The living is a vicarage, valued at 13l. 15s. 2d. in the king's books.

BATTICALO, a town on the coaſt of Malabar, in the Eaſt-Indies. Long. 92. 50. Lat. 14. 8.

BATTISTA (FRANCO) a celebrated painter, born at Venice, was one of the diſciples of Michael Angelo, whoſe manner he followed ſo cloſely, that in the correctneſs of his out-lines, he ſurpaſſed moſt of the maſters of his time. His paintings are pretty numerous, and diſperſed all over Italy, and other parts of Europe; but his colouring being very dry, they are not much more eſteemed than the prints etched by his hand. He died in 1561.

BATTORI (STEPHEN) one of the greateſt kings that have reigned in Poland, complained of the government of that kingdom, in which he found a great number of defects. He was elected in 1575, and dying in 1587, was ſucceeded by Sigiſmund III.

BATTUS, the ſon of Polymneſtes, derived his origin from Uphemes, one of the Argonauts who accompanied Jaſon to Colchis. Battus was thus named from his ſtammering, his true name being Ariſtotalas. By order of the oracle of Delphos, he ſet out from the iſland of Theræ, where he was born, now called Santorini, with a colony, and landed in Lybia, where he founded the city of Cyrene, in the ſpot where was born Ariſteus, the ſon of Apollo and Cyrene.

BATTUS, in fabulous hiſtory, an herdſman, who ſeeing Mercury ſteal a drove of cattle from Apollo, to conceal the theft Mercury gave him a milk-white heifer; but ſoon after, aſſuming the ſpeech and habit of a peaſant, aſked if he had ſeen his ſtray bullocks and heifers paſs that way, and promiſed, that if he would aſſiſt him in finding them, he ſhould have a bullock and heifer for his pains. Upon this, the clown haſtily told him where they were, when Mercury, to revenge his perfidy, turned him into a touch-ſtone.

BAVARIA, a duchy and electorate in Germany. It is the largeſt and moſt conſiderable part of the Circle of Bavaria, and is bounded on the north by the palatinate of Bavaria, Bohemia, and the duchy of Neuburg, on the weſt by Suabia, on the ſouth by Tyrol, and on the eaſt by the archbiſhoprick of Saltſburg, the biſhoprick of Paſſaw, and Auſtria. This electorate may be about one hundred and twenty miles from eaſt to weſt, and one hundred and five from north to ſouth. It is watered by a great number of rivers, whereof the principal are the Inn, the Iſer, and the Lech. It contains thirty-five cities, ninety-four market towns, eight biſhopricks, ſeventy-five convents, one thouſand noblemens and gentlemen's ſeats, eleven thouſand and ſeventy-four villages, villages, and twenty-eight thouſand ſeven hundred and nine churches. The air is healthy and temperate; the ſoil, tho' over-run with woods and mountains, produces a little wine, ſome corn, and good paſtures. There are likewiſe ſome mines; however, it is not rich, becauſe it has very little trade. It was raiſed to the dignity of an electorate in 1623. This electorate is divided into two general parts, High Bavaria, on the weſt, which comprehends the governments of Munich and Ingolſtadt: Lower Bavaria, on the eaſt, which contains the governments of Straubing, Landſhut, and Burckauſen.

The Upper Palatinate, or the Palatinate of Bavaria, is bounded on the north by Franconia and Bohemia; the firſt bounds it likewiſe on the weſt, and the latter on the eaſt; on the ſouth it is terminated by the duchies of Neuburg, Bavaria, and the biſhoprick of Paſſaw. It is about eighty miles long, and the ſame in breadth. It is well peopled, and the ſoil is fertile, but it has little trade. The principal places are Amberg, the capital, and Hochſtett, famous for the duke of Marlborough's victory over the French, in 1704. Beſides theſe, it has ſome ſmall territories in the Circle of Bavaria, and ſome ſmall abbies.

BAVARIA (the Circle of) conſiſts of three capital provinces; the electorate of Bavaria, the Upper Palatinate, and the the archbiſhoprick of Saltſburg.

BAVAY, a little town of the province of Hainault, in French Flanders, which has been often ruined in the wars of the Low Countries. It is twelve miles ſouth-weſt of Mons, and ten eaſt of Valenciennes. Long. 3. 45. E. Lat 50. 25. N.

BAUCIS, in fabulous hiſtory, the name of a poor old woman of Phrygia, where ſhe lived in a cottage with Philemon her huſband. Jupiter and Mercury, travelling over Phrygia, were well received by them, and though they were refuſed entertainment by all the country, theſe poor people treated them with all the hoſpitality in their power. Theſe divinities therefore rewarded their humanity by preſerving them from a deluge, and changing their cottage into a temple, where they were to officiate as prieſt and prieſteſs. They there ſpent their lives in the greateſt harmony, and when grown very old, were changed into trees at the gate of the temple.

BAUDELOT (CHARLES CÆSAR) a learned advocate in the parliament of Paris, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in ancient monuments, and was received into the academy of Belles Lettres in 1705. He wrote a Treatiſe on the Advantages of Travelling, many Letters and Diſſertations on Medals, &c. and died in 1722, aged ſeventy-four.

BAUDERON (BRICE) a French phyſician, born at Parei, in the county of Charlois, flouriſhed about the cloſe of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventh century. He ſettled at Macon, practiſed phyſic there a long time, and publiſhed a Pharmacopœia in French, and a work, intitled, Praxis in duos Tractatus diſtincta, &c.

BAUDIER (MICHAEL) a gentleman of Languedoc, lived in the reign of Lewis XIII. and publiſhed ſeveral books, which procured him the character of a copious and laborious author; among which are, 1. An Inventory of the General Hiſtory of the Turks. 2. The Hiſtory of the Seraglio. 3. That of the Religion of the Turks. 4. That of the Court of the King of China. 5. The Life of Cardinal Ximenes, &c.

BAUDIUS (DOMINIC) profeſſor of hiſtory in the univerſity of Leyden, was born at Liſle, April 8, 1561. He ſtudied in ſeveral univerſities, and in 1585 followed the ambaſſador of the States General to England, where he became acquainted with ſeveral perſons of diſtinction, and particularly with the illuſtrious ſir Philip Sydney. After this, he was ten years in France. In 1602 he was made profeſſor of eloquence at Leyden, and in 1611 the States divided between him and Meurſius the office of hiſtoriographer. He wrote the Hiſtory of the Truce, was a great Latin poet, and publiſhed a number of his Letters. He died at Leyden, Auguſt 22, 1613.

BAUDOUIN (FRANCIS) in Latin Balduinus, a famous civilian, born at Arras, January 1. 1520. He was profeſſor of civil law, firſt at Bourges, then at Heidelberg, then at Doway, then at Angers, &c. and died in the college of Arras, at Paris, October 24, 1573. He had a ſharp conteſt with Calvin. He wrote a Treatiſe of the Methods of attaining a good Reformation with Regard to Religion; a Commentary upon the Laws of the Twelve Tables, &c. and other works.

BAUDRAND (MICHAEL ANTHONY) a celebrated geographer, born at Paris, July 18, 1633. He travelled into ſeveral countries, and then applied himſelf to the reviſal of Ferrarius's Geographical Dictionary, which he enlarged by one-half. He wrote. 1. Notes to Papirius Maſſo's Deſcription of the Rivers of France. 2. A Geographical and Hiſtorical Dictionary. 3. Chriſtian Geography, or an Account of the Archbiſhopricks and Biſhopricks of the whole World, and made ſeveral maps. He died at Paris, May 29, 1700.

BAUDRICOURT (JOHN DE) marſhal of France, and governor of Burgundy, contributed greatly to the victory of St. Aubin de Cormier, in 1488. He followed Charles VIII. to the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples, in 1495, and died at his return, in 1499.

BAVERE (JOHN WILLIAM) an excellent painter, who was born at Straſburg, and died at Vienna, in Auſtria, in 1640.

BAUGE, a town of France, in Breſſe, pleaſantly ſeated on a fruitful hill, with the title of a marquiſate. It is three miles from Macon. Long. 4. 54. E. Lat 46. 20. N.

BAUHIN (JOHN) one of the greateſt botaniſts that ever lived, was born about the middle of the ſixteenth century. He took his doctor's degree in phyſic, in 1562, and afterwards became principal phyſician to Frederick, duke of Wirtemberg. The moſt conſiderable of his works is his Univerſal Hiſtory of Plants.

BAUHIN (CASPAR, or GASPAR) younger brother to the preceding, was born at Baſil, January 17, 1550, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in anatomy and botany. In 1580 he was choſen firſt profeſſor of theſe ſciences, at Baſil, and in 1614, was made firſt profeſſor of phyſic, and firſt phyſician of that city, which he held till his death, which happened in Auguſt, 1623, at the age of ſixty-three. He wrote, 1. Anatomical Inſtitutions, 2. a work intitled, Prodromus Theatri Botanici, and other works.

BAULDWIN, or BALDWIN, the name of two of the Latin emperors of Conſtantinople, of ſeveral kings of Jeruſalem, and of many counts of Flanders and Hainault.

BAUME (NICHOLAS AUGUSTUS DE LA) marquiſs of Montrevel, and marſhal of France, was the ſon of Ferdinand de la Baume, count of Montrevel. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral battles and ſieges, and died at Paris, on the 11th of October, 1716, aged ſeventy.

BAUME (St.) a mountain of France, in Provence, between Aix, Marſeilles, and Toulon. It is pretended Mary Magdalene died here, upon which account it is much frequented.

BAUME LES NONES, a town of France, in the Franche Comté, with a rich nunnery, ſeated on the river Doux, fifteen miles north-eaſt of Beſançon. Five miles from this town there is a famous cavern, whoſe entrance is twenty paces wide, and after deſcending three hundred paces, a gate of a grotto is ſeen, twice as large as a city gate. It is thirty-five paces deep, ſixty wide, and is covered with a kind of a vaulted roof, from which, water continually drops. There is alſo a ſmall brook which is frozen in ſummer, but not in winter, and at the bottom there are ſtones that perfectly reſemble candied citron-peel. When the peaſants perceive a miſt proceeding from the mouth of the cave, they are certain it will rain the next day. Long. 6. 20. E. Lat. 47. 12. N.

BAUMEN, or BAUMAN, a cave of Germany, in Lower Saxony, about a mile from Wermigerode, and eighteen from Goſlar. The entrance through a rock is ſo narrow, that not above one perſon can paſs at a time. There are ſeveral paths in it, which the peaſants have diſturbed in ſearching for the bones of animals, which they ſell for unicorn's horns. Some think it reaches as far as Goſlar; but be that as it will, it is certain that ſkeletons of men have been found there, of the common ſize, who are ſuppoſed to have been loſt in the turnings and windings. Not far from the entrance there is a brook that falls from a rock, whoſe water is good for the ſtone. The water that drops from the top turns into a ſtone, or ſpar, as is common in vaſt cavities. When reduced to powder, it heals the wounds of animals.

BAUR (WILLIAM) an eminent Flemiſh painter, was born at Straſburg, and was the diſciple of Brendel. He was ſome time at Rome, where his ſtudies were wholly employed about architecture and landſcapes, which prevented his ſtudying the antique. He painted ſmall figures in diſtemper, on vellum. His pencil was light, and his general expreſſions and compoſitions, beautiful, even to ſublime. He himſelf etched Ovid's Metamorphoſes from his own deſigns, which make a volume. Several of his deſigns of ſubjects taken from the holy Scriptures and other hiſtories, were graved by Melchior Kuſſel, and make another volume of prints. He died at Vienna, in 1640.

BAUSK, or BAUTKO, a ſmall, but important town, in the duchy of Courland, and on the frontiers of Poland, with a ſtrong caſtle built on a rock. It was taken by the Swedes, in 1625, and by the Ruſſians in 1705, after a bloody battle between them and the Swedes. It is ſeated on the river Muſza, fifteen miles eaſt of Mittaw. Long. 24. 44. E. Lat. 56. 30. N.

BAUTZEN, a town of Germany, and the capital of Luſatia, ſeated on the river Sprey, thirty-five miles north-eaſt of Dreſden, and forty miles eaſt of Meiſſen. It is ſubject to the the elector of Saxony. Long. 14. 42. E. Lat. 51. 10. N.

BAWTRY, a pleaſant town in Yorkſhire, in the road from London to York, is ſituated upon the bank of the river Idle, is well provided with inns, and has a conſiderable trade in grind-ſtones, mill ſtones, lead, and iron, which are conveyed hither by the river from Derbyſhire. It has a market on Saturdays, and its fairs are on Holy Thurſday, and November the 22d, for horſes and cattle. It is a rectory, rated at 6l. 6s. 8d. in the king's books. It is ſeven miles ſouth of Doncaſter, and a hundred and fifty-three north-by-weſt of London.

BAXTER (Richard) an eminent divine among the Nonconformiſts, was born at Rowton, in Shropſhire, November 12, 1615, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his exemplary life, his pacific and moderate principles, and his numerous writings. He had a congregation at Kidderminſter, and after the Reſtoration became one of the king's chaplains in ordinary; preached before him once, had frequent acceſs to his royal perſon, and was offered the biſhopric of Hereford, by the lord chancellor Clarendon, which he refuſed to accept: after this he was ſeveral times arreſted, fined, and thrown in priſon, for preſuming to preach to a body of diſſenters, though he was honoured with the friendſhip of ſome of the greateſt and beſt men in the kingdom, as the duke of Landerdale, the earl of Balcarras, lord chief juſtice Hales, Dr. Tillotſon, &c. Among his moſt famous works, were 1. his Saints Everlaſting Reſt, and 2. his Call to the Unconverted, of which laſt twenty thouſand were ſold in one year; and it was tranſlated not only into all the European languages, but into the Indian tongue. 3. his Poor Man's Family Book. 4. Dying Thoughts; and 5. his Paraphraſe on the New Teſtament. His practical works have been printed in four volumes, folio. He died December 8, 1691, and was interred in Chriſt-church, whither his corpſe was attended by a numerous company of perſons, of different ranks, and many clergymen of the eſtabliſhed church. Few men have wrote more books, and few have had more written againſt them; for he compoſed above a hundred and forty-five tracts, and above ſixty anſwers were at different times made to him. The former, however, it ſhould ſeem, were greatly preferable to the latter, ſince Dr. Barrow, an excellent judge, ſays, that "his practical writ-"ings were never mended; his controverſial ſeldom con-"futed."

Baxter (William) nephew and heir to the former, was an eminent ſchool-maſter and critic. He was born at Llanlugany, in Shropſhire, in the year 1650, and it is remarkable, that at the age of eighteen, when he firſt went to ſchool, he knew not one letter, nor underſtood one word of any language but Welſh: but he ſo well improved his time, that he became a perſon of great and extenſive knowledge. His genius led him chiefly to the ſtudy of antiquities and philology, in which he compoſed ſeveral books. The firſt he publiſhed was a Grammar, in 1679, intitled De Analogia ſeu Arte Latinæ Linguæ Commentariolus: he alſo publiſhed a new and correct edition of Anacreon, with Notes; an edition of Horace; a Dictionary of the Britiſh Antiquities, in Latin, and ſeveral other books. He was a great maſter of the antient Britiſh and Iriſh tongues, was particularly ſkilled in the Latin and Greek, and in the northern and eaſtern languages. He died May 31, 1723, after being above twenty years maſter of Mercer's ſchool, in London.

BAYA, or Baja, a town of Lower Hungary, in the county of Bath, is ſituated near the Danube, ſixty-five miles north-eaſt of Buda, and forty-five north-weſt of Eſſeck. Long. 19. 30. E. Lat. 46. 25. N.

BAYARD (Peter du Terrail de) one of the braveſt, moſt prudent, and moſt virtuous captains of his time, was deſcended from an ancient and noble family in Dauphiné. He was with Charles VIII. at the conqueſt of the kingdom of Naples; where he gave remarkable proofs of his valour, eſpecially at the battle of Fornoue. He was dangerouſly wounded at the taking of the city of Breſcia, and there reſtored to the daughters of his hoſt two thouſand piſtoles, which their mother had directed them to give him, in order to prevent the houſe from being plundered. An action that has been celebrated by many hiſtorians. At his return to France he was made lieutenant-general of Dauphiné. He fought by the ſide of Francis I. at the battle of Marignan, and that prince afterwards inſiſted on being knighted by his hand, after the manner of the ancient knights. The chevalier Bayard defended Meziers during ſix weeks, againſt Charles the Fifth's army: but in 1524 was ſhot at the retreat of Rebec, when cauſing himſelf to be laid under a tree, he ordered thoſe about him to place him with his face towards the enemy, "For," ſaid he, "as I have "never turned my back upon an enemy, I would not be-"gin to do it at the end of my life." He died ſoon after, aged forty-eight.

BAYER (Theophilus Sigefroi) a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed learning, in the eighteenth century, was the grandſon of John Beyer, an able mathematician. He was born on the 16th of January, 1694, and ſtudied at Koningſberg. He learned many languages, and even the Chineſe. He at length went to Dantzick, Berlin, Hall, Leipſic, and ſeveral other cities of Germany; every where obtaining ſome uſeful knowledge, and acquiring the eſteem of the learned. On his return to Koningſberg, in 1717, he was made librarian. He was invited to Peterſburg in 1726, where he was made profeſſor of the Greek and Roman antiquities. He wrote a great number of learned and curious Diſſertations, and ſome other works that are highly eſteemed, particularly his Muſæum Sinicum, printed in octavo, in 1730. He died at Peterſburg, on the 21ſt of February, 1738.

BAYEUX, a city of France, in Normandy, capital of Beſſin, with a biſhop's ſee and a caſtle. There are twenty-ſeven pariſhes in the city and ſuburbs; three monaſteries, and four nunneries. The Jeſuits have a college in this city, and the miſſion of St. Lazarus a ſeminary. The cathedral church is the largeſt and beſt built in all the provinces: Its portico and three ſteeples deſerve the attention of the curious. It is ſeated on the little river Aur, four miles from the ſea, eighteen north-weſt of Caen, ſeventy-five weſt of Rouen, and a hundred and forty-ſix weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 33. W. Lat. 49. 16. N.

BAYLE (Peter) author of the Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary, was born November 18, 1687, at Carla, a village in the county of Foix, in France, where his father John Bayle was a proteſtant miniſter. In 1666 he went to the proteſtant univerſity at Puylaureus, where he ſtudied with the greateſt application; and in 1669, removed to the univerſity of Toulouſe, whither the proteſtants at that time frequently ſent their children to ſtudy, under the Jeſuits; but here, to the great grief of his father, he embraced the Romiſh religion; however, being ſoon ſenſible of his error, he left that univerſity, and went to ſtudy at Geneva. After which he was choſen profeſſor of philoſophy at Sedan; but that proteſtant univerſity being ſuppreſſed by Lewis XIV. in 1681, he was obliged to leave that city, and was ſoon after choſen profeſſor of philoſophy and hiſtory at Rotterdam, with a ſalary of about forty-five pounds a year. Mr. Bayle was extremely affected with the perſecution of the proteſtants in France, and the abrogation of the edict of Nantes in 1685. Upon this dreadful occaſion he wrote, in French, a pamphlet entitled "What is to be underſtood by France's being entirely Catholic under the Reign of Lewis the Great;" and ſome time after, a Philoſophical Commentary upon the Words "Compel them to come in." In 1690 he had a very troubleſome diſpute with Mr. Jurieu, who at laſt ſucceeded in his deſign of procuring Mr. Bayle to be removed from his profeſſorſhip at Rotterdam, of which he was deprived in 1693. This misfortune gave Mr. Bayle little or no pain, and therefore, as he was far from being poor, and was not at all avaricious, he did not give himſelf any trouble to obtain another preferment.

Mr. Bayle wrote a prodigious number of books, which gained him great reputation, and made him known to the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſons of that age, particularly to Chriſtina, queen of Sweden; the princeſs Sophia, electoreſs dowager of Hanover, and her daughter the electoreſs of Brandenburg, afterwards queen of Pruſſia. The moſt known of all his works, is his Hiſtorical and Critical Dictionary. He died on the 28th of December, 1706, in the ſixtieth year of his age.

BAYLY (Lewis) biſhop of Bangor, in the reign of king James I. and author of the Practice of Piety, was born at Caermarthen in Wales, and educated at Oxford. He was promoted to the ſee of Bangor in 1606, and died in the beginning of the year 1632.

Bayly (Thomas) doctor of divinity, and ſon of Dr. Lewis Bayly, biſhop of Bangor, was educated at Cambridge, and in 1638, was preſented by king Charles I. to the ſubdeanery of Wells. In 1644 he retired among the other loyal miniſters to Oxford, and in 1646 was with the marquiſs of Worceſter, in Ragland-caſtle, and, after its being ſurrendered to the parliament, travelled into France, but returning after the king's death, was committed priſoner to Newgate, on account of ſome of his books which had given offence: he however ſoon made his eſcape into Holland, where he embraced the Romiſh religion, ſettled at Douay, and at laſt went to Italy, where he died obſcurely in an hoſpital. He wrote, 1. Certamen Religioſum; or, A Conference between king Charles I. and Henry, late marquiſs of Worceſter, concerning Religion. 2. The royal Charter granted unto Kings by God himſelf. 3. Herba Parietis; or "the Wall-flower, as it grows out of the Stone-"chamber belonging to the Metropolitan Priſon; being an "Hiſtory which is partly True, partly Romantic, morally "Divine, &c." and ſeveral other pieces.

BAYNARD (Anne) a lady diſtinguiſhed by her piety and her learning, was the only child of Dr. Edward Baynard, fellow of the college of phyſicians, at London, and was born at Preſton, in Lancaſhire. Her father obſerving that ſhe had a ſprightly and elegant genius, gave her a very liberal education, and ſhe became well ſkilled in the learned languages, and in philoſophy; yet was diſtinguiſhed by her humility, and the greateſt propriety of behaviour. Her words were few, well choſen, and expreſſive. She was naturally of a ſtoical diſpoſition, and never ſpoke of thoſe philoſophers without a manifeſt pleaſure. She had a great contempt for the gaities of life, and always expreſſed the higheſt veneration for the ſacred name of God, making it the buſineſs of her life to promote his honour and glory; the great end of her ſtudies being to encounter atheiſts and libertines, which ſhe has done in ſome ſevere ſatyrs written in the Latin tongue. She died at Barnes, in Surry, on the 12th of June, 1697.

BAYNES (Sir Thomas) an eminent phyſician and profeſſor of muſic, at Greſham-college, in London, was born about the year 1622, and educated at Chriſt's college, Cambridge. He ſpent great part of his life in Italy; and his friend ſir John Finch being appointed embaſſador extraordinary to the grand ſeignor, in the year 1672, he attended him as his phyſician, and before he ſet out, received the honour of knighthood. He died at Conſtantinople, in 1681. Sir John and he jointly left four thouſand pounds to Chriſt's college, Cambridge, where they were both educated.

BAYONNE, a city of Gaſcony, in France; is ſeated near the mouth of the river Adour, which forms a good harbour. It is moderately large, and of great importance. It is divided into three parts. The great town is on this ſide the river Nive: the little town is between the Nive and the Adour; and the ſuburb of Saint Eſprit is beyond this laſt river. Both the former are ſurrounded with an old wall, and a dry ditch, and there is a ſmall caſtle in each. That of Great Bayonne is flanked with four round towers, and is the place where the governor reſides. The new caſtle is flanked with four towers, in the form of baſtions. The firſt incloſure is covered with another, compoſed of eight baſtions, with a great horn-work, and a half moon, all which are encompaſſed with a ditch, and a covered way. There is a communication between the city and the ſuburb, by a bridge, and the ſuburb is well fortified. The citadel is ſeated beyond the Adour, on the ſide of the ſuburb abovementioned. The public buildings have nothing remarkable; it is the only city of the kingdom that has the advantage of two rivers, wherein the tide ebbs and flows. The river Nive is deeper than the Adour, but leſs rapid, by which means ſhips come up into the middle of the city. There are two bridges over this river, by which the old and new town communicate with each other. The trade of this town is the more conſiderable, on account of its neighbourhood to Spain, and the great quantity of wines which are brought hither from the adjacent country. The Dutch carry off a great number of pipes in exchange for ſpices and other commodities, which they bring thither. The inhabitants have the privilege of guarding two of their three gates, and the third is kept by the king. This city is ſeated two miles and a half from the ſea, twenty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Dax, forty-two north of Pampalune, forty weſt of Pau, and three hundred and twenty-five ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 1. 20. W. Lat. 43. 30. N.

Bayonne, a maritime city of Spain, in Galicia, with a very commodious port. It ſtands in a very fruitful country, and there is a great quantity of excellent fiſh on the coaſt. It is ſixty miles ſouth of Compoſtella, and thirty-five north-weſt of Braga. Long. 9. 30. W. Lat. 43. 3. N.

BAZAS, a town of France, the capital of the Bazadois, in Gaſcony, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on a rock, ſeven miles from the river Garonne, thirty-eight north-weſt of Condom, thirty-five ſouth-eaſt of Bourdeaux, and three hundred and forty-ſix ſouth-by-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 30 W. Lat. 44. 20. N.

BEACONSFIELD, a town in Buckinghamſhire, with a market on Thurſdays. It is ſeated on a hill, in the road from London to Oxford, and has ſeveral good inns, though not above a hundred houſes. Its fairs are on February 13, and on Holy Thurſday, for horſes, cows, and ſheep. It is twenty-ſeven miles weſt-north-weſt of London, and twenty-eight eaſt-ſouth-eaſt of Oxford. It is a rectory, valued at 26 l. 2 s. 8 d. in the king's books. Long. 0. 25. W. Lat. 51. 36. N.

BEALE (Mary) particularly diſtinguiſhed by her ſkill in painting, was the daughter of Mr. Craddock, miniſter of Waltham upon Thames, and learned the rudiments of her art from Sir Peter Lely. She painted in oil, water-colours, and crayons, and had much buſineſs; her portraits were in the Italian ſtyle, which ſhe acquired by copying pictures and drawings from Sir Peter Lely's, and the royal collections. Her maſter, ſays Mr. Walpole, was ſuppoſed to have had a tender attachment to her; but as he was reſerved in communicating to her all the reſources of his pencil, it probably was a galant, rather than a ſucceſsful one. Dr. Woodfall wrote ſeveral pieces to her honour, under the name of Beleſia. Mrs. Beale died in Pall-mall, on the 28th of December, 1697, aged ſixty-five. Her paintings have much nature, but the colouring is ſtiff and heavy.

BEAR ALSTON, a poor town in Devonſhire, which however is a borough by preſcription, and ſends two members to parliament. The portreeve is the returning officer, who is choſen yearly at the lord's court. It is only a hamlet; the pariſh church is at Bear-Ferrers, and is built in the form of a croſs, having a body with two ailes, but the tower is low and ordinary. Bear-Ferrers is a rectory, valued at 24 l. 1 s. in the king's books. It is two hundred and twelve miles weſt-by-ſouth from London, and eight north of Plymouth. Long. 4. 30. W. Lat. 50. 25. N.

BEARN, a province of France, is bounded on the eaſt by Bigorre, on the ſouth by the mountains of Arragon, on the weſt by Soule, and part of Navarre; and on the north by Gaſcony and Armagnac. This country is forty miles in length, and thirty in breadth. It is mountainous and dry, and yet the plains are fertile. They ſow a little wheat and rye, and a great deal of maillioc, a ſort of corn brought from the Indies, which the people live upon. They have likewiſe ſome flax. On the hills there are a great many vineyards, the wine of which is in ſome places excellent. In the mountains of Moneins there are mines of lead, copper, and iron, with a great number of fir-trees, fit for maſts for ſhipping, as well as boards. In the valley of Oſſaw there are mineral waters, which are good for the head and ſtomach. There are two principal rivers of this country, called the Gave Bearnois, and the Gave d'Oleron. The Gave Bearnois has its ſource in the mountains of Barege, in Bigorre, runs by the city of Nay, and falls into the Adour. The Gave d'Oleron is compoſed of the Oſſau and the Aſpe. The firſt deſcends with great rapidity from the mountains of Oſſau, and runs to Oleron. The Gave of the Aſpe has its ſource in the Pyrenean mountains, paſſes through the valley of Aſpe, then runs to the city of Oleron, and joins the former. Thus united, they afterwards meet with the Gave of Bearnois, and at laſt fall into the Adour as above. Theſe rivers are full of fiſh, but are too rapid for boats. The trout, ſalmon, pike, and ſalmon-trout are excellent. At Sallies there is a ſpring of ſalt water, wherewith they make ſalt. There is a mountain in this county called the Pic de Midi, from whence the two ſeas may be ſeen, and alſo the mountains of Caſtile.

The Bearnois are robuſt, laborious, ſober, and lively; but without ſincerity, and are greatly attached to their own intereſt. Many of theſe people go into Spain to till the ground, to mow the hay, and reap the corn, and bring back a great deal of ready money. By theſe means the Bearnois are rendered tolerably happy. The towns in Bearn are Pau, the capital city, Leſcar, Nay, Ortez, Sauveterre, Navarreins, Saillies, Oleron, Monein, Morlas, and Lambeye.

BEAT (St.) a town of France, in the county of Comminges, at the confluence of the Garonne and the Pique. It is ſeated between two mountains, which are cloſe to the town on each ſide. This is a very bad ſituation, but all the houſes are built with marble, becauſe they have no other materials. The priory is a very handſome church. It is five miles ſouth of St. Bertrand. Long. 1. 6. W. Lat. 42. 50. N.

BEATON, Beton, or rather Bethune (David) archbiſhop of St. Andrew's, cardinal, and primate of Scotland, was nephew to archbiſhop Beaton his predeceſſor, and was born in 1494. Soon after his promotion to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Glaſgow, he diſcovered a warm and perſecuting ſpirit againſt thoſe who oppoſed the Romiſh religion, and it is ſaid, that he preſented the king a roll of three hundred and ſixty of the chief nobility and barons, as ſuſpected of hereſy, the firſt perſon in this liſt being the earl of Arran: but a ſtop was for ſome time put to his bloody deſigns, by the death of the king. And as this happened when the king had none near him but the cardinal, it gave him an opportunity of forging a will for him, or at leaſt afforded a pretence for ſuggeſting that he forged it, which occaſioned its being ſet aſide, though he cauſed it to be ſolemnly proclaimed over the croſs at Edinburgh, in order to eſtabliſh the regency in himſelf, the earls of Argyl, Huntley, and Arran; by which means he was entirely excluded from the government, and before the cloſe of the year 1542, the earl of Arran was declared ſole regent during the minority of queen Mary, who was then but a few days old. The cardinal was however ſoon after made chancellor, and appointed by the pope legate à latere. He then reſumed his ſcheme of perſecution, and having ſeized Mr. George Wiſhart, the moſt famous proteſtant preacher in Scotland, had him tried and burnt at the ſtake, as an obſtinate heretic. But ſome time after, the cardinal having diſobliged Mr. Norman, the eldeſt ſon of the earl of Rothes, that gentleman, with his uncle uncle Mr. John Leſley, one of the cardinals moſt violent enemies, and a few other gentlemen, ſurpriſed the caſtle of St. Andrew's, on the 24th of April, 1546, before the cardinal was ſtirring, ſeized the porter, called up the ſervants, and turned them, to the number of fifty, out at the gate, as they did above an hundred workmen, employed in repairing the caſtle, and then knocking at the cardinal's door, obliged him to open it, by threatning to ſet it on fire, they then ruſhed in with their drawn ſwords, and inſtantly murdered him. The cardinal left ſix children by Mrs. Mary Ogilby his concubine.

BEATON, BETON, or rather BETHUNE (JAMES) archbiſhop of Glaſgow, and nephew to the former, was a prelate of great prudence, learning, and moderation. He was raiſed to the archbiſhopric of Glaſgow in 1552, but the proteſtants carrying every thing before them with great violence, he retired into France in the year 1560, with the treaſures and records of his archiepiſcopal ſee; but immediately after his departure, the proteſtants ſeized on the revenues of his archbiſhopric, and proceeded againſt his perſon. His return being thus in a manner rendered impracticable, the queen, in 1561, declared him her embaſſador to the moſt Chriſtian king, which he enjoyed till his death, which happened April 24, 1603.

BEATRIX, empreſs of Germany, was the daughter of Renaud, count of Burgundy, and was married to the emperor Frederic, in 1156. That princeſs having heard the beauty and magnificence of the city of Milan highly extolled, was deſirous of ſeeing that celebrated city; but her curioſity coſt her dear; for the people being enraged againſt the emperor Frederic, who had deprived them of their ancient privileges, diſcharged their reſentment on the innocent Beatrix, whom they ſeized, placed upon an aſs with her face to the tail, which they made her hold in her hand, inſtead of a bridle, and in this ſituation lead her through all the ſtreets of the city, in the midſt of the ſhouts and inſults of the people. The emperor, tranſported with rage, ſpeedily revenged this outrage. In 1163 he beſieged Milan, took it, and ſparing only the churches, deſtroyed even its very foundations, and cauſed the place on which it ſtood to be ſowed with ſalt. All the citizens who were taken had the ignominious puniſhment of being obliged, on pain of death, to draw out with their teeth a fig put into the backſide of the aſs on which the empreſs had rode; but many choſe death rather than ſubmit to it.

BEAUCAIRE DE PEGUILLON (FRANCIS) in Latin, Belcarius Peguilio, biſhop of Metz, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his learning. He was born in 1514, and was preceptor to cardinal Charles, of Lorrain, who reſigned to him the biſhopric of Metz, which Beaucaire, in his turn, afterwards reſigned to cardinal Lewis of Lorrain. He wrote, in Latin, a Hiſtory of his own Time, which is much eſteemed, and a Treatiſe on the Children who die in the Womb of their Mother, againſt the Calviniſts. He died in 1591.

BEAUCE, a country of France, whoſe bounds are not well determined. Formerly it contained all the country between the Iſle of France, Normandy, Brittany, and the river Loire. But now what they call Beauce, is ſurrounded by Proper Orleanois, Blaſoiſe, Perche, and the Iſle of France. It is covered with trees, meadows, water, and vineyards, and conſiſts in large plains, very fruitful in corn, whence it has been called the Granary of France.

BEAUCHAMP (THOMAS DE) earl of Warwick, diſtinguiſhed by his bravery and conduct, was the eldeſt ſon of Guy, earl of Warwick, and was born in the year 1313. In his ſeventeenth year he took up his hereditary offices of ſheriff of Worceſterſhire, and chamberlain of the exchequer; and before he was twenty, king Edward III. made him governor of Guernſey, and the ſmall iſlands adjacent. He attended that prince in his wars in Scotland and France, and did great ſervice in the famous ſea-fight, in 1340. In the eighteenth of Edward III. he was conſtituted ſheriff of Warwick and Leiceſterſhire for life, and the ſame year was created earl marſhal of England. He commanded the van of the Engliſh army, and afterwards, for the great ſervice he performed at the ſiege of Calais, had a thouſand marks a year granted him during life. After this, he was preſent in the famous battle of Poictiers, where the king of France was taken priſoner, and where our earl fought ſo long, that his hand was extremely galled with uſing his ſword and poll-axe; but he had the good fortune to take priſoner William de Melun, archbiſhop of Seinz, for whom he received a ranſom of eight thouſand pounds. He attended Edward the Black Prince in ſeveral other campaigns; and in 1360 paſſed through France with a train of ſix hundred horſe, in his paſſage to the Eaſt, where he made war againſt the infidels for three years, and at his return into England, brought with him the ſon of the prince of Lithuania, who was chriſtened at London by the name of Thomas, the earl being his godfather. This noble earl, and his brother John, were two of the firſt knights of the garter, and he continued in the exerciſe of his military virtues, till his deceaſe in 1369, when he commanded the king's army in France, and died there of the plague.

BEAUCHAMP (RICHARD) earl of Warwick, and one of the moſt conſiderable perſons of the age in which he lived, was grandſon of the former; he was born at the manor-houſe of Salwarpe, in the county of Worceſter, on the 28th of January, 1381, and was made knight of the Bath at the coronation of Henry IV. in 1399. In 1404 he diſtinguiſhed himſelf in the rebellion raiſed by Owen Glendower, whoſe ſtandard he took in open battle. He alſo gained great honour at the famous battle of Shrewſbury. In 1408 he obtained a licence from king Henry IV. to viſit the holy ſepulchre at Jeruſalem, in purſuance of a vow he had made. In his way thither, and in his return, he was received by many ſovereign princes with great reſpect, and ſignalized himſelf by his bravery and ſucceſs in ſeveral tournaments. He was conſtituted lord high ſteward at the coronation of king Henry V. and in the year 1415 was declared captain of Calais. He reduced to the king's obedience ſeveral towns and caſtles in France; for which ſervices the king created him earl of Aumarl, or Albemarle. King Henry afterwards ſent him to the king of France, attended by a thouſand men, to treat of a marriage between him and the princeſs Catherine, that king's daughter, but the dauphin being ſenſible that this marriage was intended to defeat his ſucceſſion, ſent a body of five thouſand men, under the command of the earl's of Vendôme and Lymoſin, to obſtruct his paſſage, to whom the earl gave battle, in which both thoſe noblemen were killed, one of them falling by the earl of Warwick's own hand, and about two thouſand of their troops were either ſlain or taken priſoners. He then proceeded on his embaſſy, in which, notwithſtanding the difficulties he had to ſtruggle with, he happily ſucceeded. But as many places in France had declared for the dauphin, it was thought requiſite to take the ſtrongeſt of them, which was Melun, in order to ſet an example to the reſt; and this place, which the French imagined impregnable, the earl took in fourteen weeks and four days. King Henry V. dying, committed to the earl of Warwick the tutelage of his ſon, then an infant. He was afterwards made captain of Calais, which being beſieged by Philip, duke of Burgundy, it was ſo gallantly defended, that the duke was forced to riſe from before it. In ſhort, on the death of the duke of Bedford, he was made regent of France for king Henry VI. which great and difficult poſt he enjoyed for the four laſt years of his life, and died in the caſtle of Roan, on the 30th of April, 1439.

BEAUCHAMP (HENRY DE) ſon to the former, was born at Henley caſtle, in Worceſterſhire, on the 22d of March, 1424. He offered his ſervice for the defence of Normandy before he was quite nineteen years of age; the king made him duke of Warwick, and heaped many favours and honours upon him, and at length even made him king of the Iſle of Wight, placing the crown upon his head with his own hands; but as this was the higheſt honour the king could beſtow, ſo it proved the laſt favour the duke could receive, for he was taken off in the flower of his age, at Henley caſtle, on the 11th of June, 1445, leaving no other iſſue but one daughter,

For other famous earls of Warwick, ſee NEVIL.

BEAUCHAMP (JOHN DE) baron of Kidderminſter, in the reign of king Richard II. and the firſt baron created by patent, was the ſon of ſir Richard Beauchamp, of Holt, in Worceſterſhire, was born in 1320, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf in ſeveral engagements in France and Flanders, during the reign of Edward III. and attended that king's ſon, John, duke of Lancaſter, in his expedition into Spain. By his long and faithful ſervices to the crown, he raiſed his credit at court, and after receiving repeated teſtimonies of the favour of Richard II. was advanced to be ſteward of the king's houſhold, received a grant of all the lands and manors belonging to the priory of Deerhurſt, in Glouceſterſhire, and obtained the title of baron; but the king's army being defeated in 1388, by the duke of Glouceſter, and other powerful lords, they forced him to ſummon a parliament, when, among other noble perſons then called to an account for their paſt behaviour, the lord Beauchamp was one, who was removed from his office of high treaſurer, and condemned and executed for high treaſon, upon Tower-hill, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age.

BEAUCHAMP (WILLIAM DE) lord Bergavenny, was the younger ſon of Thomas de Beauchamp, earl of Warwick, and ſeems to have made his firſt campaign in 1366, under the famous John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a glorious manner on ſeveral important occaſions. He was captain of Calais, and of the caſtles of Pembroke and Kilgaran, in Wales, when he behaved in a manner that deſerves for ever to be remembered. Among other baſe ſchemes put into the head of king Richard II. by his favourites, one was to retire to France; when the duke of Glouceſter and the other lords were marching to London

London with an army, and there purchaſe the aſſiſtance of that monarch, by giving up to him moſt of the fortreſſes he held in that realm. But when all things were ready at home for carrying this dark deſign into execution, and the young prince ſent orders to this lord to quit his command, and tranſmit certain letters to the court of France, he boldly refuſed both, and declared, with reſpect to the former, that he was intruſted with that important fortreſs by the advice and conſent of the nobility, and, without their conſent, would not render up his command. As for the letters, (gueſſing at their contents) inſtead of ſending them to Paris, he tranſmitted them to the duke of Glouceſter, in England. He even went ſtill farther, for when John de la Pole, brother to Suffolk, the great favourite, came with the king's orders to take from him the command of Calais, he not only refuſed to yield it into his hands, but ſeized him, and carried him over priſoner to England. This entirely ruined the ſcheme, and the king was ſo incenſed againſt the lord Bergavenny, that, immediately after his arrival, he cauſed him to be arreſted, and committed to cloſe cuſtody; but ſoon after, either thro' fear or choice, ordered him to be ſet at liberty. This noble lord died about the year 1411.

BEAUCHATEAU (Francis Matthew Chatelet de) a French poet, was the ſon of a comedian, and was born at Paris in 1645. He diſcovered, from his infancy, ſuch an extraordinary genius for poetry and polite literature, that the queen, the mother of Lewis XIV. cardinal Mazarin, Seguier, the chancellor, and perſons of the firſt rank at court, took great pleaſure in converſing with him, and in making him exert his abilities. He was but eleven years old when he publiſhed a collection of his Poems, intitled, La Lyre du june Appollon, ou la Muſe naiſſante du petit Beauchâteau, in which he makes an elogium on the moſt illuſtrious perſons of his time. Two years after he came to England, where Cromwell detained him ſome time, from hence he went into Perſia, and it is not known what became of him after.

BEAVER (John) otherwiſe named Bever, and in Latin Fiber, Fiberius, Caſtor, and Caſtorius, was a Benedictine monk in Weſtminſter abbey, and flouriſhed about the beginning of the fourteenth century. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the hiſtory and antiquities of England, and among other things wrote a Chronicle of the Britiſh and Engliſh Affairs, from the coming-in of Brute to his own time, which remains in manuſcript in the Cottonian library.

BEAUCLERK (Aubrey, lord) a brave but unfortunate commander, was the youngeſt ſon of Charles, duke of St. Alban's, by Diana, daughter of Aubrey de Vere, earl of Oxford. He went early to ſea, and had the command of a ſhip given him in 1731. In 1740 he was ſent upon the famous expedition to Carthagena, under the command of admiral Vernon, in the Prince Frederick man of war, which, with three others, were ordered to cannonade the caſtle of Boccachica. One of theſe being obliged to quit her ſtation, the Prince Frederick was expoſed, not only to the fire from the caſtle, but to that of Fort St. Joſeph, and to two ſhips that guarded the mouth of the harbour, which he bravely ſuſtained for many hours that day, and part of the next. As he was giving his commands upon deck, both his legs were ſhot off; but ſuch was his magninimity, that he would not ſuffer his wounds to be dreſſed till he had communicated his orders to his firſt lieutenant, which were to fight till the laſt extremity. Soon after he gave ſome directions about his private affairs, and then reſigned his ſoul with the dignity of a hero and a chriſtian. Thus was this brave commander taken off, in the thirty-firſt year of his age. He was equalled by few in politeneſs, modeſty, candour, and benevolence. He married the widow of colonel Francis Alexander, a daughter of ſir Henry Newton, knt. envoy extraordinary to the court of Florence and Genoa. Soon after his death a monument was erected to his memory in Weſtminſter abbey, adorned with arms, trophies, and naval enſigns, and in an oval niche, on a beautiful pyramid of dove-coloured marble, is a fine buſt of this young hero; on this pyramid is an hiſtorical inſcription to the above purpoſe, and over it the following lines.

"Whilſt Britain boaſts her empire o'er the deep,
"This marble ſhall compel the brave to weep;
"As men, as Britons, and as ſoldiers, mourn:
"'Tis dauntleſs, loyal, virtuous Beauclerk's urn.
"Sweet were his manners, as his ſoul was great,
"And ripe his worth, tho' immature his fate;
"Each tender grace that joy and love inſpires,
"Living he mingled with his martial fires;
"Dying he bid Britannia's thunder roar,
"And Spain ſtill felt him, when he breath'd no more."

BEAUFORT, a town of France, in Anjou, with a caſtle near the river Authion. It contains two pariſhes, and a convent of Recolets, and yet has but eighty-three houſes. It carries on a great trade in corn. It is fifteen miles eaſt of Angers, forty weſt of Tours, and one hundred and fifty-eight ſouth-weſt of Paris. Long. 0. 3. W. Lat. 47. 26. N.

Beaufort, a ſtrong town in Savoy, on the river Oron, thirteen miles north of Montiers. Long. 6. 48. E. Lat. 45. 40. N.

Beaufort, was at firſt the ſurname, and became afterwards the title of a noble family, which hath produced ſeveral eminent perſons of both ſexes. It was taken from the caſtle of Beaufort, in Anjou, which came to the houſe of Lancaſter, by Blanche of Artois, queen of Navarre, and wife to Edmund Crouch-back, ſecond ſon of king Henry III. and firſt earl of Lancaſter. The children to whom that ſurname was firſt given, were, John, Henry, Thomas, and Joan, the natural iſſue of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, fourth ſon of king Edward III. but they were legitimated by act of parliament, bearing date Feb 9, 1396-7.

Beaufort (John) eldeſt ſon of John of Gaunt, was born in Beaufort caſtle, in Anjou, in 1394, and was advanced to the honour of earl of Somerſet, in 1396-7, and the ſame year was created marquis of Dorſet. He was afterwards raiſed to ſeveral places of great truſt; but being one of thoſe lords who, in 1397, impeached Thomas, duke of Glouceſter, &c. of high treaſon, he and the reſt of thoſe lords were adjudged in the firſt parliament of Henry IV. to loſe their titles, and the eſtates that had been given them, at or ſince the laſt parliament, belonging to any of thoſe they had impeached. But ſoon ingratiating himſelf with the new king, he was conſtituted by him chamberlain of England for life, and was afterwards conſtituted admiral of the king's whole fleet. He died on the 21ſt of April, 1410.

Beaufort (Henry) biſhop of Wincheſter, and cardinal prieſt, was brother to the former. He ſtudied for ſome time at Oxford, but had his education chiefly at Aix la Chapelle, where he applied himſelf to the civil and common law. He was made biſhop of Lincoln in 1397, aud of Wincheſter in 1404, when he was alſo lord high chancellor of England, and ambaſſador in France. In 1404 pope Martin V. gave him a cardinal's hat, and ſome time after ſent him as his legate into Germany. In 1431 he crowed Henry VI. king of England, in the church of Notre Dame, at Paris, and was one of that prince's guardians during his minority; but there were perpetual jealouſies and quarrels between him and the protector Humphrey, duke of Glouceſter, which ended in the ruin and death of the latter, who was murdered in the Tower; but the cardinal being ſuddenly taken ill, did not ſurvive him a month, he dying June 11, 1447. He had the character of an ambitious, haughty, and turbulent prelate: he, however, left at his death immenſe ſums to charitable uſes.

Beaufort (Joan) queen of Scotland, was the eldeſt daughter of John Beaufort, earl of Somerſet, ſon to John of Gaunt. In February, 1423, ſhe was married, with great ſolemnity, in the church of St. Mary Overy, in Southwark, to James I. king of Scotland, who had been priſoner in England ever ſince the 30th of March, 1404, and in March, 1423, ſet out with the king, her huſband, for Scotland, being attended as far as Berwick by her father, and her uncle, cardinal Beaufort. She diſtinguiſhed herſelf by the noble reſolution with which ſhe endeavoured to preſerve the life of the king her huſband, at the hazard of her own: for in the year 1437, receiving information of a conſpiracy formed againſt him, ſhe rode poſt to Roxborough to inform him of it, but all in vain; for ſoon after ſome ruffians ruſhed into the room, when ſhe ſhrouded the king from the aſſaſſins, and could not be drawn from him till ſhe had received two wounds. She afterwards married James Stewart, called the Black Knight, ſon to the lord of Lorne, and died in the year 1446.

Beaufort (Margaret) the foundreſs of Chriſt's and St. John's colleges, in Cambridge, was born at Blatſhoe, in Bedfordſhire, in the year 1441. About the fifteenth year of her age ſhe was married to Edmund of Haddam, earl of Richmond, by whom ſhe had a ſon, named Henry, who was afterwards king, by the title of Henry VII. Her ſecond huſband was ſir Henry Stafford, ſecond ſon to Henry, duke of Buckingham, and he dying about the year 1481, ſhe married Thomas, lord Stanley, afterwards earl of Derby, who died in 1504.

Her whole life was filled up with acts of beneficence. She eſtabliſhed in her life-time many noble foundations, among which were the colleges above mentioned, the firſt founded in 1505, for one maſter, twelve fellows, and forty-ſeven ſcholars; the laſt in the year 1508, for a maſter, and fifty fellows and ſcholars: but this being juſt begun, or rather only deſigned, before her deceaſe, was completed by her executors She died June 29, 1509, in the firſt year of her grandſon king Henry VIII's reign.

BEAUJEU, a town of France, in Beaujolois, with an old caſtle. It is ſeated on the river Ardieres, at the foot of a mountain, thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Macon. Long. 4. 40. E. Lat. 46. 9. N.

BEAUJOLOIS, a little territory of France, bounded on the ſouth by Proper Lyonois, on the weſt by Forez, on the north by Burgundy, and on the eaſt by the principality of Dombes and part of Breſſe. The principal places are Ville Franche, the capital, Belle Ville, and Beaujeu. It is about twenty-five miles in length, and twenty in breadth. This country is very fruitful, eſpecially about Ville Franche.

BEAULIEU, the name of two ſmall towns in France; one of which is in Touraine, ſeated on the river Indre, with the title of a barony, and a Benedictine abbey; the other is in Turenne, on the river Dordogne, with alſo a Benedictine abbey.

BEAULIEU (LEWIS LE BLANC, ſieur DE) miniſter and profeſſor of divinity at Sedan, in the ſeventeenth century, rendered himſelf famous by his learning and virtue. He had a great number of theſes in divinity maintained under his direction, which, after his death, were collected into one volume, and printed in England. Some of his ſermons have alſo been printed. He died in 1675, aged ſixty-one.

BEAUMANOIR (JOHN DE) marquis of Lavardin, and marſhal of France, more known by the name of Marſhal de Lavardin, was the ſon of Charles de Beaumanoir, lord of Lavardin. He was educated at the court of Henry IV. while that prince was only king of Navarre, and, in 1569, was in the Proteſtant army, at the ſiege of Poitiers. He was made colonel of the French infantry in 1580, and had the command of the army in 1586. The king rewarded his ſervices by giving him the government of Maine, with the collar of his orders, and alſo made him marſhal of France, and erected his eſtate of Lavardin into a marquiſate. The marſhal de Lavardin commanded the army in Burgundy in 1602, and was ſent to England in 1612, in the capacity of ambaſſador extraordinary. He died at Paris in 1614.

The marſhal had been educated in the Proteſtant religion, but turned Papiſt after the death of his father, who was a rigid Calviniſt.

BEAUMARIS, a town of the iſle of Angleſea, in Wales, with two markets, viz. Wedneſdays and Saturdays, and four fairs, on February 13, Holy Thurſday, September 19, and December 19, for cattle. It was fortified with a caſtle by Edward I. which was never quite finiſhed. The town is well built, and is governed by a mayor, a recorder, two bailiffs, and twenty-one common-council men. Here the county goal is kept, and the general and quarter ſeſſions. It is fifty-nine miles weſt-by-north of Cheſter, eighty north-weſt of Shrewſbury, and two hundred and forty-two north-weſt of London. Long. 4. 15. W. Lat. 53. 20. N.

BEAUMONT, a village of Swiſſerland, in the territory of Vaud. It is ſeated between the river Ord and Mount Jura, and is the chief of a ſmall government, which depends on the canton of Bern.

BEAUMONT SUR OISE, a town of the iſle of France, ſeated on the declivity of a hill, twenty miles north of Paris. Long. 2. 29, E. Lat. 49. 9. N.

BEAUMONT, a town of the Low Countries, in Hainault, between the Sambre and the Meuſe. It had a caſtle, but king William blew it up in 1691. It is ten miles eaſt of Maubeuge. Long. 4. 1. E. Lat. 50. 12. N.

BEAUMONT LE ROGER, a town of France, in Upper Normandy. It is an open place, and conſiſts only of one ſtreet, and has one pariſh church. It had a caſtle, built on a rock, but it is now deſtroyed. It is eight miles from Bernay, and five from Harcourt. Long. 0. 56. E. Lat. 49. 2. N.

BEAUMONT LE VICOMTE, a town of France, in Maine, ſeated on the river Sarte, between Alençon and Mans. It is ſixteen miles diſtant from the former, and ten from the latter. Long. 0. 10. E. Lat. 48. 12. N.

BEAUMONT (FRANCIS DE) baron Des Adreti, was one of the noblemen of France, whoſe courage and military actions were moſt celebrated in the religious wars under the reign of Charles IX. He ſided with the Proteſtants againſt the duke of Guiſe, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by the moſt glorious victories; but theſe he ſullied by his cruelty. At laſt, being worked upon by the promiſes and threats of the oppoſite party, his conduct became ſuſpected by the prince of Conde and the admiral, on which his perſon was ſecured, on the 16th of January, 1563, and he was not freed from his confinement till the treaty of peace, which was concluded the ſame year; after which he returned to the popiſh religion, and took up arms againſt the other, but without any ſucceſs or glory. He died Feb. 2, 1586.

BEAUMONT (LEWIS) biſhop of Durham in the reign of king Edward II. was deſcended from the royal blood of the kings of France and Sicily. He was made treaſurer of Saliſbury in the year 1294, and from thence advanced to the ſee of Durham, in 1317. It was with difficulty that pope John XXII. conſented to his conſecration, for which he made him pay ſo large a ſum, that he was never able entirely to diſcharge the debt it involved him in. As he was on the road to Durham, accompanied by two cardinals, in order to be inſtalled, they were attacked by a party of Scots, who, having plundered their baggage, ſuffered the cardinals to proceed, but carried the biſhop and his brother Henry priſoners to Mitteford caſtle, and obliged them to pay a large ſum of money for their ranſom, towards which the prior of Durham was obliged to ſell the habits, plate, and jewels of the church. He died Sept. 24. 1333.

BEAUMONT (ſir JOHN) the elder brother of Mr. Francis Beaumont, the famous dramatic poet, was born in the year 1582, and, in 1626, had the dignity of a baronet conferred upon him by king Charles I. In his youth he applied himſelf to the Muſes with good ſucceſs, and wrote The Crown of Thorns, a poem, in eight books; Tranſlations from the Latin Poets; and ſeveral poems on religious and political ſubjects, as, On the Feſtivals; On the Bleſſed Trinity; A Dialogue between the World, a Pilgrim, and Virtue; Of the miſerable State of Man; Of Sickneſs, &c. He died in 1628. His poetic genius was celebrated by Ben Johnſon, Michael Drayton, and others.

BEAUMONT (FRANCIS) a celebrated dramatic poet, who, in concert with Mr. Fletcher, wrote a great number of plays, was the ſon of Francis Beaumont, one of the judges of the common-pleas, and was born at Grace Dieu, in Leiceſterſhire, about the year 1585 or 1586, in the reign of queen Elizabeth. He was educated at Cambridge, and afterwards admitted a ſtudent in the Inner Temple; but it appears probable that his fondneſs for the muſes would not ſuffer him to apply his thoughts to the ſtudy of the laws, in the knowledge of which he made no great proficiency. He died in March, 1615, before he was thirty years of age, and was buried in the entrance of St. Benedict's chapel, within St. Peter's Weſtminſter.

Mr. Beaumont, beſides the plays in which he was jointly concerned with Mr. Fletcher, wrote a ſmall dramatic piece, intitled, A Maſque of Gray's Inn Gentlemen, and the Inner Temple; with ſeveral poems printed together, in octavo. It has been already ſaid that Beaumont and Fletcher generally wrote in conjunction. The former was remarkable for the accuracy of his judgment, and the latter for the force of his imagination; and indeed Beaumont was eſteemed ſo accurate a judge of plays, that Ben Johnſon, while he lived, ſubmitted all his writings to his cenſure.

BEAUMONT (JOSEPH) D. D. an eminent divine and poet in the laſt century, ſucceeded Dr. Pearſon in the maſterſhip of Jeſus college, in Cambridge, and was, within two years after, appointed maſter of Peter-houſe. In 1672 he was preferred to the chair of regius profeſſor of divinity, in which he ſat many years with great reputation. He wrote Pſyche or Love's Myſtery, in twenty-four cantos, diſplaying the Intercourſe between Chriſt and the Soul. This allegorical poem had its admirers in the laſt century. He alſo wrote Obſervations upon the Apology of Dr. Henry More, and, in 1749, a conſiderable number of his poems were publiſhed by ſubſcription, with the Life of the Author prefixed. He died in 1699, in the eighty fourth year of his age.

BEAUNE, a fortified town of Burgundy, in France, ſeated between Autun, Chalons, and Dijon, eight miles from the river Saone, in an agreeable fruitful country; its wines have a very high reputation. The collegiate church is one of the moſt celebrated in all France. The great altar is adorned with a table enriched with jewels. The organs are agreeably placed on a piece of architecture, which is the admiration of the curious. It has ſeveral other churches and convents. The church of the Chartreux is handſome, and is adorned with ſtatues and paintings. The hoſpital of Beaune is one of the fineſt buildings of this kind in France, and the celebrated abbey of Citeaux, which is in its territory, is a great curioſity. Its incloſure is very large, and all things are made therein that ſerve for the neceſſities and ornaments of life. The church is in the Gothic taſte, adorned with a great number of paintings, which are generally copies of the fineſt at Rome; beſides, there are a great number of baſſo relievos, and other curious pieces of workmanſhip. The refectory is a handſome ſtructure, after the Gothic manner. Beaune is ſixteen miles north of Chalon ſur Saone, thirteen eaſt of Arnay-le-duc, thirty ſouth of Dijon, and twenty-three north-eaſt of Autun. Long. 4. 50. E. Lat. 47. 2. N.

BEAUPORT, or PORTO HERMOSO, a fort and harbour of St. Domingo, in the Weſt-Indies, and one of the Caribbee Iſlands; it is on the ſouth ſide, and to the weſt of the town of St. Domingo.

BEAUQUAIRE, a town of France, in Languedoc, ſeated on the banks of the Rhone. It is chiefly remarkable for its fair, which is the greateſt in all France. The collegiate church is the chief, and has its front adorned with Gothic figures. It is ten miles eaſt of Niſmes, ten north of Arles, thirteen ſouth-weſt of Avignon, and three hundred and ſeventy-five ſouth-and-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 4. 42. E. Lat. 43. 49. N.

BEAUSOBRE (Isaac de) a learned miniſter of the Reformed religion, was born at Niort. He retired into Holland, and from thence to Berlin, where he was made chaplain to the king of Pruſſia, and counſellor of the Royal Conſiſtory. He wrote a Defence of the Doctrines of the Reformation; a Tranſlation of the New Teſtament into French, with notes, in two vols. quarto; and ſeveral other works. He died in 1738, aged ſeventy nine.

BEAUVAIS, a town of France, in Upper Languedoc, ſeated on the river Teſcou, eight miles eaſt of Montaulau. Long. 1. 43. E. Lat. 44. 2. N.

Beauvais, a city of France, capital of Beauvoiſis, in the government of the iſle of France, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Therin, and is a very agreeable town, indifferently well built. It is ſurrounded with ditches, filled with water from the river Therin, part of which is of great uſe to the manufacturers of ſtuffs eſtabliſhed here. The ſtreets are fine and large, but the houſes are all built with wood. Strangers admire the market-place, which is the fineſt and the largeſt in the kingdom; the biſhop's palace, which is ſtrong and well built; and the choir of St. Peter's church, which is a ſtupendous ſtructure. Beſides this, there are ſix collegiate churches, thirteen pariſh churches, as alſo eccleſiaſtical houſes, monaſteries, and abbeys. This city is famous for fine tapeſtry. It is thirty miles ſouth of Amiens, thirty-eight eaſt of Rouen, and forty-three north of Paris. Long. 2. 15. E. Lat. 49. 26. N.

BEC, a town of France, in Normandy, and in the dioceſe of Roan, ſeated on a tongue of land, at the confluence of two rivers, with a rich, large, and handſome Benedictine abbey. It is eighteen miles ſouth-weſt of Rouen or Roan. Long. 0. 52. E. Lat 49. 12. N.

BECANER, a town of India, capital of the territory of Becar, ſeated on the river Ganges, two hundred miles north-eaſt of Agra, and one hundred and eighty miles eaſt of Delli. Long. 83. 5. E. Lat. 27. 40. N.

BECCAFIUMI (Dominico) a celebrated painter in the ſixteenth century, born at Sienna. It is ſaid that while he was very young, and attending his father's ſheep, Laurenzo Beccafiumi, a gentleman of Sienna, found him near a river, drawing figures on the ſand, on which he aſked him of his father, and, when he was in his ſervice, ſent him to a painter to learn to draw, and that afterwards, in remembrance of his benefactor, he changed his real name, which was Macherino, for that of Beccafiumi. He firſt copied ſome pieces of Perugino, and then went to Rome, where he ſtudied the works of Raphael and Michael Angelo; after which he returned to Sienna, did ſeveral pictures in oil and diſtemper, and ſome conſiderable pieces in freſco; but what chiefly ſupported his reputation for a long time, was his work of the Pavement of the great Church in Sienna. He engraved ſeveral of his deſigns in wood, was a good ſculptor and founder, of which he gave ſufficient proofs at Genoa, whither he went towards the latter end of his life; and having given many inſtances of his ability and induſtry, died there in the year 1549, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age.

BECHIN, a town of Bohemia, thirteen miles ſouth of Tabor, and twenty north of Budeweis. Long. 15 5. E. Lat. 49 14. N.

BECCLES, a town in Suffolk, with a good market on Saturdays, and three fairs, on Aſcenſion-day, St. Peter, June 29, and October 2, for petty chapmen, as alſo on July 15, for toys. It is a large town, with a handſome church, and a tall bulky ſteeple ſeated on an eminence ſome diſtance from the church. Here the ſeſſions for the liberty of Blithing are commonly held. It is fifteen miles ſouth-weſt of Yarmouth, thirty-nine north-north eaſt of Ipſwich, and one hundred and nine north-eaſt of London. Long. 4. 30. E. Lat. 52. 38. N.

BECHER (John Joachim) a celebrated chemiſt, was born at Spires, in 1645. He was connected with the moſt learned men in Europe; and the emperor, the electors of Mentz and Bavaria, and other perſons of high rank, furniſhed him with the means of making experiments in mathematics, natural philoſophy, medicine, and chemiſtry. As his thoughts were very judicious and uncommon, with reſpect to oeconomy and to increaſing the revenues of a ſtate, he was invited to Vienna, where he contributed greatly to the eſtabliſhment of ſeveral manufactures, a chamber of commerce, and an India company; but the jealouſy of ſome of the miniſters occaſioned his diſgrace and ruin. He was not leſs unhappy at Mentz, Munich, and Wurtzburg, which determined him to go to Haerlem, where he invented a machine for working a great quantity of ſilk in a little time, and with few hands; but new misfortunes made him come to England, and he died at London, in 1685. He wrote many works, the principal of which are, 1. Phyſica Subterranea, which was reprinted at Leipſic, in 1703, and in 1739, in octavo, with a ſmall treatiſe, by M. Stahl, intitled Specimen Becherianum. 2. Experimentum chymicum novum, octavo. 3. Character pro Notitia Linguarum univerſali. 4. Inſtitutiones Chymicæ, ſeu Manuductio ad Philoſophiam Hermeticam, quarto. 5. Inſtitutiones Chymica prodromæ, duodecimo. 6. Experimentum novum ac curioſum de Minera arenaria perpetua, &c.

BECKER (Daniel) a learned phyſician, born at Koningſberg, was firſt phyſician to the elector of Brandenburg. He publiſhed Commentarius de Theriaca, and other works, and died at Koningſberg, in 1670, aged forty-three.

BECKET (St. Thomas) archbiſhop of Canterbury in the reign of king Henry II. famous for his martyrdom and miracles, was the ſon of Gilbert, a merchant of London, and Maud, or Matilda, a Saracen lady. He was born in London, in 1119, educated at Oxford, then at Paris, and afterwards ſtudied the civil law at Bononia, in Italy. Upon his return to England, he was made archdeacon of Canterbury, provoſt of Beverley, and prebendary of Lincoln and St. Paul's; and his patron, Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſo effectually recommended him to king Henry II. that, in 1158, he was made high chancellor, and preceptor to the young prince Henry. Becket now laid aſide the eccleſiaſtical habit, affecting the dreſs and manners of a courtier, and at the ſame time diſcharged the duties of his ſtation, ſo as to give entire ſatisfaction. In the character of chancellor, he made a campaign with king Henry in his expedition into France, in 1159, having in his own pay twelve hundred horſe, and in his retinue ſeven hundred knights or gentlemen, who were always forward in action, and commanded at the ſieges of ſeveral ſtrong places. In 1160, he was ſent by the king to Paris, to treat of a marriage between prince Henry, who was then but ſeven years old, and the king of France's daughter, then no more than three, in which negotiation Becket ſucceeded, and returned with the young princeſs to England. He had not, however, been much above four years chancellor, when archbiſhop Theobald dying, the king advanced him to the ſee of Canterbury; but ſoon after his conſecration, he, to the ſurpriſe and vexation of the king, reſigned the office of chancellor, and immediately exchanged the gaiety and luxury of a courtier for the gravity and auſterities of a monk. At the ſame time, he began vigorouſly to exert himſelf in defence of the pretended rights and privileges of the church, by proſecuting ſome of the nobility and others, for lands and poſſeſſions, he maintained, they had uſurped from the ſee of Canterbury, and even laid claim to the cuſtody of the caſtle and tower of Rocheſter, then in the hands of the crown; and as he proceeded with the greateſt turbulence and obſtinacy, he alienated from himſelf the minds of the king and nobility, and ſoon came to an open rupture with them; for the king reſolving to ſubject eccleſiaſtics guilty of murder, felony, and other crimes, to the judgment of the civil courts, met with violent oppoſition from the archbiſhop. This affront of a ſubject raiſed by the king's favour could not be digeſted by a prince ſo jealous of his prerogative as king Henry; he therefore called a ſynod of the biſhops at Weſtminſter, which broke up without any effect; but at length, having gained over ſeveral of the biſhops, Becket was prevailed on to acquieſce, when, to bind the clergy the more ſtrongly, the king ſummoned a parliament at Clarendon, where the ancient cuſtoms and prerogatives of the crown were reduced to writing. In this inſtrument, which was afterwards called the Conſtitution of Clarendon, it was declared, that the king being ſupreme, both the clergy and laity owed obedience to him and to the laws of the land, and were not ſubject to any foreign juriſdiction, in any caſe whatſoever, and particularly that no appeals ſhould be made to the pope. Theſe being reduced to ſeveral articles, Becket was at length prevailed upon to ſign and ſwear to the obſervance of them; but ſoon breaking his oath, and growing more troubleſome than before, the king demanded the public money he had ſquandered away; upon which he fled in diſguiſe to a monaſtery in Flanders, and from thence went to France, where he iſſued out excommunications againſt various perſons who had oppoſed or violated the ſuppoſed rights of the church. This however only ſerved to exaſperate men's minds againſt him, and the king was ſo provoked at his excommunicating ſeveral of his great officers and immediate attendants, that he baniſhed all his relations. However, the king of France by his entreaties, and the pope by his perſuaſions and threats, at laſt brought about a reconciliation, and Becket returned to England, after an abſence of ſeven years. The king had a ſhort time before cauſed his ſon prince Henry to be crowned at Weſtminſter, by the archbiſhop of York; on which Becket had prevailed on the pope to ſuſpend the archbiſhop, and excommunicate the biſhops who had aſſiſted him. Becket, therefore, almoſt as ſoon as he arrived, received an order from the young king to abſolve the ſuſpended and excommunicated biſhops; but refuſing to comply, the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhops of London and Saliſbury, immediately carried their complaints plaints to the old king, who was then in Normandy, and was ſo highly exaſperated at this freſh inſtance of his obſtinacy, that he could not forbear exclaiming with great warmth, "That he was very unfortunate to have maintained ſo many cowardly and ungrateful men in his court, none of whom would revenge him of the injuries he had ſuſtained from one turbulent prieſt." Theſe words were heard by four gentlemen of the court, who immediately formed a deſign againſt the archbiſhop's life, which they executed in the cathedral church at Canterbury, on the 29th of November, 1171. Upon this, all divine offices ceaſed in the church of Canterbury for one year wanting nine days, at the end of which, by order of the pope, it was conſecrated anew. Two years after, Becket was canonized; and the ſame year, a particular collect was appointed to be read in all the churches of the province of Canterbury, for expiating the guilt of his murder. The next year, king Henry returning from France, went to Canterbury, where he did penance as a teſtimony of his grief for the murder. When he came within ſight of the church where the archbiſhop was buried, he alighted off his horſe, and walked barefoot, in the habit of a pilgrim, till he came to Becket's tomb, where, after he had proſtrated himſelf and prayed for a conſiderable time, he ſubmitted to be ſcourged by the monks, and paſſed all that day and night without any refreſhment, kneeling upon the bare ſtones; which done, he beſtowed great benefactions upon the church of Canterbury. In 1221, Becket's body was taken up, fifty years after his murder, in the preſence of king Henry III. and a great concourſe of the nobility and others, and depoſited in a rich ſhrine, erected at the expence of Stephen Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, which was ſoon viſited from all parts, and enriched with the moſt coſtly gifts and offerings; and the miracles ſaid to be wrought at his tomb were ſo numerous, that Gervaſe of Canterbury tells us, there were two large volumes of them kept in that church; though, forty-eight years after his deceaſe, the doctors of the univerſity of Paris had a warm diſpute, whether he was ſaved or damned.

"He was, ſays the lord Lyttelton, a man of great talents, of elevated thoughts, and of invincible courage; but of a moſt violent and turbulent ſpirit; exceſſively paſſionate, haughty, and vain-glorious; in his reſolutions inflexible, in his reſentments implacable: it cannot be denied, that he was guilty of a wilful and premeditated perjury; that he oppoſed the neceſſary courſe of public juſtice, and acted in defiance of the laws of his country, laws which he had moſt ſolemnly acknowledged and confirmed; nor is it leſs evident, that during the heat of this diſpute, he was in the higheſt degree ungrateful to a very kind maſter, whoſe confidence in him had been boundleſs, and who, from a private condition, had advanced him to be the ſecond man in his kingdom."

BECKINGTON (Thomas) biſhop of Bath and Wells, was born in Somerſetſhire, towards the end of the fourteenth century, and educated at New college, Oxford. After his obtaining ſeveral preferments in the church, he was made tutor to king Henry VI. when writing in oppoſition to the ſalique law, in which he ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the right of the kings of England to the crown of France, he arrived to ſuch a degree of eſteem and favour with that prince, that he was made ſecretary of ſtate, keeper of the privy-ſeal, and at laſt biſhop of Bath and Wells. He performed many works of munificence and charity, and was ſo generous a patron of all learned and ingenious men, that he was called the Mecænas of the age. He died at Wells, January 14, 1464-5.

BECSANGIL, a province of Aſia, in Natolia, bounded on the north by the Black Sea, on the weſt by the ſea of Marmora, on the ſouth by Proper Natolia, and on the eaſt by the province of Bolli. It was anciently called Bithynia, and the principal town is Burſa.

BEDA, or Bede, an Engliſh monk, in the eighth century, well known to the world by the name of Venerable Bede, and one of the beſt writers of his time, was born in the biſhopric of Durham, in the year 672 or in 673. At the age of nineteen, he was ordained deacon; and in 702, being then thirty, he was ordained prieſt. His amazing diligence and application, his comprehenſive genius, his extenſive and various learning, rendered him ſo remarkable, that his fame ſpread over the continent, and pope Sergius wrote, in very preſſing terms, to his abbot Ceolfrid, to ſend him to Rome, where he wanted to conſult him upon many important ſubjects; but notwithſtanding this honourable invitation, Bede remained in his own cell, purſuing his ſtudies, without ever going to Rome. He wrote a great variety of books, and particularly an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, intitled Eccleſiaſticæ Hiſtoriæ Gentis Anglorum Libri quinque, by all which he obtained ſo eſtabliſhed a reputation, that he was conſulted by the greateſt prelates of that age. His works have been collected and printed in eight volumes folio. A monk, who gives a particular account of his death, ſays, that it happened on the 26th of May, 735.

BEDALL, a town in the North Riding of Yorkſhire, with a market on Tueſday, and four fairs, viz. on Eaſter-Tueſday, Whit-Tueſday, and July 5 and 6, for horned cattle, horſes, leather, pewter, braſs, tin, millenery goods, and ſheep; and October 10 and 11, for horned cattle, ſheep, hogs, and leather; and on the Tueſday ſe'nnight before Chriſtmas, for horned cattle and ſheep. It is a rectory rated at 89l. 4s. 9d. in the king's books, and is worth five hundred pounds a year. A Roman cauſeway paſſes through this town, and thence to Richmond, Barnard's-Caſtle, &c. The parts adjacent are noted for hunting and road-horſes. It is thirty miles north-weſt from York, and two hundred and twenty north-by-weſt from London. Long. 1. 30. W. Lat. 54. 30. N.

BEDARIEUX, or Bec d'Arieux, a town of France, in Languedoc, ſeated on the river Orbe, twenty miles north of Beſiers. Long. 3. 24. E. Lat. 43. 29. N.

BEDAS, a people in the iſland of Ceylon, who inhabit a large foreſt near the ſea, and in the north-eaſt part of the iſland. They are ſavages, but are very ſkilful in ſhooting with a bow. They have neither towns nor villages, and live upon hunting, and the honey which they find in the foreſt in plenty.

BEDE. See Beda.

BEDELL (William) biſhop of Kilmore, in Ireland, and one of the moſt famous prelates in that kingdom, during the laſt century, was born in the year 1570, at Black-Notley, in Eſſex, and educated at Emanuel college, Cambridge. He attended ſir Henry Wotton, ambaſſador to the ſtate of Venice, as his chaplain, and ſtaid there eight years, where, by the aſſiſtance of the famous rabbi Leo, he improved himſelf in the knowledge of the Hebrew language. In 1629, he was advanced to the ſee of Kilmore and Ardagh, where he reformed many capital and enormous abuſes. At the breaking out of the bloody rebellion in 1641, the biſhop did not at firſt feel the violence of its effects; but afterwards, refuſing to deliver up the many Proteſtants who had fled to him for protection, he was carried priſoner with them to the caſtle of Cloughboughter; however, after three weeks confinement, he was exchanged for ſome of the principal rebels, but died ſoon after.

BEDER, a ſtrong town of Aſia, in the dominions of the great mogul, ninety-three miles north of Golconda, near as much eaſt of Viſapour, and one hundred and fifty ſouth of Aurengabad. Long. 95. 10. W. Lat. 16. 50.

BEDERICK (Henry) a celebrated preacher in the fourteenth century, was a monk of the order of St. Auguſtin, at Clare, and ſurnamed De Bury, from his being born at St. Edmund's Bury, in Suffolk. He was remarkable for his integrity, prudence, and dexterity, in the management of affairs, on which account he was choſen provincial of his order throughout England. He wrote, 1. Lectures upon the Maſter of the Sentences, 2. Theological Queſtions. 3. Sermons upon the Bleſſed Virgin. 4. A Courſe of Sermons for the year, and other pieces.

BEDFORD, the county town of Bedfordſhire, is divided by the river Ouſe as it were into two towns, which are joined by a ſtone bridge, that has two gates to ſtop the paſſage when neceſſary. The market, on the ſouth ſide, is on Tueſday for live cattle; and on Saturday, on the north ſide, for corn. The ſituation is low, and the houſes not extraordinary; and there is one ſtreet, which runs the whole length of the town, which is ſeven furlongs, and excels all the reſt. It has five churches, St. Peter's, St. Cuthbert's, and St. Paul's, on the north ſide of the river; and St. John's, and St. Mary's on the ſouth. It had a caſtle, but the ſpot where it ſtood is turned into a bowling-green. Bedford is governed by a mayor, two bailiffs, a recorder, twelve aldermen, two chamberlains, a town-clerk, and three ſerjeants. It ſends two members to Parliament, and gives the title of duke to the noble family of the Ruſſels. It has ſix fairs, viz. on the firſt Tueſday in Lent, April 21, July 5, Auguſt 21, October 11, and December 19, all for cattle of every kind. A great part of Bedford priory is ſtill ſtanding in good repair, it being converted into private uſes, and now belongs to the lord Aſhburnham. It is fifty-two miles eaſt-north-eaſt of Oxford, twenty-eight weſt-ſouth-weſt from Cambridge, and fifty-two north-by-weſt from London. Long. 0. 20. W. Lat. 52. 6. N.

Bedford (John, duke of) the third ſon of Henry IV. king of England, and regent of France in the minority of his nephew, Henry VI. He was wiſe, judicious, maſter of his paſſions, and of a genius ſuperior to all employed by him, and was equally diſtinguiſhed by the ſolidity of his judgment, his penetration, and his valour. To all theſe qualities he added a majeſtic ſtateline's, which became his birth and high rank both in France and England, but never carried it farther than was neceſſary to command a due reſpect and regard for his perſon and authority. He defeated the French fleet near Southampton, took Crotoi, entered Paris with his troops, defeated the army commanded by the duke duke of Alençon, and made all France tremble; but his good fortune was at length forced to yield to that of Joan of Arc, an enthuſiaſtic viſionary, who cauſed the Engliſh to raiſe the ſiege of Orleans, and ſoon after to evacuate their conqueſts in France. He died on the 14th of September, 1435. It is ſaid, that Charles VIII. king of France, viewing his tomb at Rouen, ſome of the gentlemen in his retinue adviſed him to deſtroy it; but he anſwered, "Let the "dead now reſt in peace, who when living made all France "tremble."

BEDFORD, earls of. See RUSSEL, &c

BEDFORDSHIRE, is twenty-four miles long, and ſixteen broad, and is bounded on the north by Northamptonſhire and Huntingdonſhire, on the eaſt by Cambridgeſhire, on the weſt by Buckinghamſhire, and on the ſouth by Hertfordſhire. The chief river is the Ouſe. The air is temperate, clear, and healthy, and the ſoil fruitful, eſpecially on the north ſide of the Ouſe. The commodities it produces are fuller's earth, cattle, veniſon, fowls, timber, woad, wheat, and barley; the chief manufactures are bone-lace and ſtraw hats; the principal towns are, Bedford, the county town, Dunſtable, Woburn, Ampthill, Leighton, Luton, Shefford, Biggleſwade, and Potton. The noblemens ſeats are Woburn-abbey, belonging to the duke of Bedford, near the town of the ſame name; Wreſt-houſe, ſix miles ſouth of Bedford, belonging to the ſame nobleman; Ampthill is now the duke of Bedford's; Luton-Hoo, belonging to lord Bute; Bletſoe, to lord St. John; Hawnes, to lord Granville; and Bromhall to lord Trevor. This county ſends four members to parliament, two for the county, and two for Bedford. It is in the Norfolk circuit, and dioceſe of Lincoln; it is divided into nine hundreds, which contain five hundred and fifty villages, one hundred and ſixteen pariſhes, twelve thouſand, one hundred, and ſeventy houſes, and it was formerly computed to contain upwards of ſixty thouſand inhabitants; the number of acres are ſaid to be two hundred and ſixty thouſand.

BEDWIN, a town in Wiltſhire, is a borough by preſcription, and has a market on Tueſday. The church is a ſtately fabrick, built with flints, in the form of a croſs. It is governed by a portreeve, who is choſen yearly by a jury of the court-leet; the portreeve chooſes a bailiff and other officers. It ſends two members to parliament, and is ſeventy-two miles from London. Long. 1. 12. W. Lat. 51. 25. N.

BEDWINS, a people of Arabia, that live in tents, and tranſport themſelves from one place to another, for the convenience of paſture; they are divided into tribes, and ſubdivided into families, the chiefs of whom are called ſkeiks, that is to ſay, princes of a tribe. All their riches conſiſt in camels, horſes, goats, and ſheep. There are a great number of theſe Arabs in all Arabia; but thoſe are moſt properly called Bedwins that inhabit the mountains which lie to the eaſt of Mecca and Medina. They are great robbers, and, when they can, pillage the caravans which come from theſe cities. They live on milk, and cakes made with flour, butter, and honey. Their arms are lances or half-pikes, ſabres, and long daggers; they make no uſe of fire-arms, but have bucklers covered with ſheep-ſkins. They are a ſort of Mohammedans; but all their ceremonies conſiſt in ſaying a few prayers, or rather in repeating the word Biſmallah pretty often, which ſignifies, In the name of God. See ARABIA.

BEFORT, a ſmall, but ſtrong town of France, and capital of Suntgaw, in Alſace. It was ceded to France, by the treaty of Weſtphalia, in 1648. It is ſeated at the foot of a mountain, ten miles north-eaſt of Belliard, and twenty-eight weſt of Baſil, or Baſle. Long. 6. 2. E. Lat. 47. 38. N. There is not above one hundred houſes in this town, and ſeven hundred inhabitants; but it is important, on account of the great road by this place to Alſace from Franche Compté. The fortifications were greatly augmented by Lewis XIV.

BEGER (LAURENCE) a learned antiquarian, was born at Heidelberg, in 1653; and after the death of Charles-Lewis and Charles, electors palatine, to whom he was librarian, he became counſellor and keeper of the library and medals of Frederic-William, which he held during the remainder of his life. He wrote many works, the principal of which are, 1. Conſiderations on Marriage, by Daphnæus Arcuanus: he wrote this to authoriſe polygamy, at the deſire of the elector Charles-Lewis, who, being diſguſted at his wife, reſolved to marry the baroneſs de Degenfeld; but at length Beger refuted his own work, to recover the good opinion of the elector Charles, who had ſucceeded his father; but this refutation has never been publiſhed. 2. Theſaurus ex Theſauro Palatino ſelectus, ſive Gemmæ, &c. in folio 3. Specilegium Antiquitatis, ſive Faſciculi variarum Antiquitatum, &c. folio. 4. Theſaurus Reg. Elect. Brandenburgicus ſelectus, ſive Gemmæ, numiſmata, &c. three volumes folio. He died in 1705.

BEGIA, or BEGGIA, a town of Africa, in the kingdom of Tunis, with a ſtrong caſtle, ſeated in a territory abounding in corn. It is built on the declivity of a mountain, twenty-five miles weſt of Tunis. Long. 19. 30. E. Lat. 37. 0. N.

BEGLERBEG is an officer in Turky, and one of the principal of the empire, and ſignifying lord of lords. The grand ſeignor gives enſigns to each of theſe, to ſhew their quality and their juriſdiction over ſeveral ſangiacs or particular governors, as well begs, agas, and other officers. Some of theſe are maintained by the places they preſide over, and others have ſalaries paid out of the treaſury. Baſha has nearly the ſame ſignification.

BEGON (MICHAEL) born at Blois, in 1638, was the ſon of the marquis de Seignelai, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his probity and merit, at firſt in the diſcharge of the principal poſts of the law, and afterwards in the navy. In 1682, he was intendant of the French iſlands in America; in 1685, he was intendant of the gallies; and at the time of his death, which happened in 1710, was intendant of Rochfort and Rochelle. Never was any man more diſintereſted, more attentive to fulfil the duties of his poſt, more zealous in promoting the good of the public, or more univerſally beloved and eſteemed by the people; he was paſſionately fond of the ſciences, and intereſted himſelf in the progreſs of the arts and the glory of his country; he had a very choice library, with a rich cabinet of medals, ancient monuments, and curioſities. On the titles of moſt his books was written Michaelis Begon & amicorum. The perſon who had the care of his library obſerving to him, that by giving the uſe of it to every body, he loſt his books, "I had much "rather, he replied, loſe a book, than ſeem to diſtruſt an "honeſt man."

BEHN (APHARA) a celebrated poeteſs, born in the reign of king Charles I. Mr. Johnſon, her father, being appointed lieut. general of Surinam, and ſix and thirty iſlands, ſet ſail for the Weſt Indies with his whole family, when our poeteſs was very young; he however died at ſea, but his family arrived at Surinam, where our poeteſs became acquainted with the ſtory and perſon of Oroonoko, the American prince, whoſe adventures ſhe has ſo feelingly related. After her return to England, ſhe was married to Mr. Behn, a merchant of London, of Dutch extraction. King Charles II. to whom ſhe had given an entertaining and juſt account of the colony of Surinam, thought her a proper perſon to be intruſted with the management of ſome important affairs during the Dutch war, which occaſioned her going into Flanders, where, by her intrigues in love and politics, ſhe diſcovered the deſign, formed by the Dutch, of ſailing up the river Thames, and burning the Engliſh ſhips in the harbour, which ſhe communicated to the court of England; but her intelligence, though well grounded, as appeared by the event, being only laughed at and ſlighted, ſhe laid aſide all farther thoughts of ſtate affairs. She publiſhed three volumes of Miſcellany Poems, two volumes of Hiſtories and Novels, and tranſlated into Engliſh Fontenelle's Hiſtory of Oracles and Plurality of Worlds, &c. She died April 16, 1689, and was interred in the cloiſters of Weſtminſter abbey.

BEJA, an ancient town of Portugal, in the province of Alentejo. It is ſeated in a very agreeable plain, fruitful in all things, eſpecially excellent wine. The town has three gates remaining, which are of Roman architecture; and a great many Roman antiquities are dug out of the earth. It has a good caſtle for its defence. It is thirty-three miles ſouth of Evora, and ſixty-three ſouth-by-eaſt of Liſbon. It was taken from the Moors in 1162. Long. 7. 20. W. Lat. 37. 58. N.

BEJAR, a town of Spain, in Eſtramadura, famous for its baths. It is ſeated in an agreeable valley, ſurrounded with high mountains, whoſe tops are always covered with ſnow. There are foreſts near, which are full of game, and watered with fine ſprings. The dukes of Bejar have a handſome palace here. Near it is a lake of excellent fiſh, and particularly trouts: they pretend, that it makes ſuch a noiſe before a ſtorm, that it may be heard fifteen miles off. Long. 6. 45. W. Lat. 40. 2. N.

BEICHLINGEN, a city of Thuringia, in the circle of Upper Saxony, fifteen miles north of Weimar, and forty-two weſt of Leipſic. Long. 11. 50. E. Lat. 51. 20. N.

BEIER (HARTMAN) a famous divine, born at Franckfort on the Maine, was the diſciple and friend of Luther. He wrote, among other works, a Commentary on the Bible, and died in 1577, aged ſixty-one.

BEIRA, a province of Portugal, bounded on the north by Tra-los-Montes and Entre-Douro, and Minho; on the ſouth by Eſtramadura of Portugal; on the eaſt by Eſtramadura of Spain; and on the weſt by the Atlantic Ocean. It is in length, from the north-weſt to the ſouth-eaſt, from Feyra near the ſea to Salvaterra near the river Elia, one hundred and thirty-five miles; and in breadth, from Lamego to Mirando, ſixty five.

This

This province is watered with ſeveral conſiderable rivers, which render the ſoil fruitful. The Douro is at one end, the Vouga and the Mondego run acroſs it; the Zezera, the Ponſul, the Aravil, and the Elia. The laſt three fall into the Tajo. The chief towns are Lamego, Feyra, Aveiro, Coimbra, Veſeu, Guarda, and Idanha. This province is very agreeable, and fruitful in every thing neceſſary for life. It produces a great quantity of fruit, wheat enough for the ſubſiſtence of the inhabitants, millet and rye in abundance, and excellent wine in ſeveral places: and it has a kind of apples, called by the Portugueſe verdeais, becauſe they continue in perfection all the year. There is a great quantity of cheſnuts, which ſerve to maintain the poor when there is a ſcarcity of corn. The mountains are rich in fine paſtures, which maintain a great number of ſheep.

BEIRLINCK (LAWRENCE) archbiſhop of Anvers, wrote a work in Latin, intitled, The great Theatre of Human Life, and many other works. He died in 1627, aged forty-nine.

BEK, BEC, or BEAC (ANTHONY) biſhop of Durham in the reigns of Edward I. and II. was advanced from the archdeaconry of Durham to the biſhoprick of that city, in the room of Robert de Inſula. He is ſaid to have been the richeſt biſhop (if we except Wolſey) that ever held the ſee of Durham; for, beſides the revenue of his biſhoprick, he had a temporal eſtate of five thouſand marks per annum; part of which, we are told, he gained by unjuſtly converting to his own uſe an eſtate which he held in truſt for the natural ſon of the baron of Veſcey. In 1305, he had the title of patriarch of Jeruſalem conferred on him by the pope, and about the ſame time received from the king a grant of the principality of the Iſle of Man. He was of a martial diſpoſition, magnificent and expenſive, extremely active, and remarkably chaſte. He died at Eltham, March 3, 1310.

BEK, or BEEK (ANTHONY) biſhop of Norwich, in the reign of Edward III. rendered himſelf remarkable by his oppoſition to archbiſhop Winchelſea, on that prelate's intending to viſit the dioceſe and chapter of Norwich. He was advanced to that ſee by the pope's collation in 1337, and was at laſt poiſoned by one of his own domeſtics.

BEK (DAVID) a celebrated portrait painter, born at Delft, in Holland, practiſed firſt under Van Dyk, and other celebrated maſters. His ſkill in his profeſſion, added to his polite behaviour, procured him the eſteem of almoſt all the courts of Europe. He was in great favour with Charles I. king of England, and taught the principles of drawing to the two princes, Charles and James: after which, he was in the ſervice of the kings of France and Denmark; and next went to Chriſtina, queen of Sweden, who not only gave him rich preſents, but made him firſt gentleman of her bed-chamber, and ſent him to Italy, Spain, France, England, Denmark, and to all the courts of Germany, to draw the portraits of the different kings and princes, which not only made him very famous, but we are told he was preſented with nine gold chains, and a number of medals, from thoſe princes. It is ſaid, that when he was upon a journey in Germany, he was ſeized with a fit of illneſs, and at length every body about him thinking him dead, they undreſſed him, and laid him upon ſome ſtraw in a room where two of his ſervants were drinking. Upon which, one of them propoſed, that as he had no averſion to wine when living, he would give him ſome now he was dead, and accordingly held the glaſs to his lips, when the ſmell of the wine putting his ſpirits in motion, he ſipped ſome of it. The ſervant, though greatly amazed, ſtill held the glaſs to his mouth, and he again ſipped, and thus came by degrees to himſelf. He lived ſeveral years after, and died at the Hague, in 1656.

BEKINSAU (JOHN) author of a book intitled De Supremo & abſoluto Regis Imperio, was born at Broadchalke, in Wiltſhire, and educated at New college, Oxford. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his extraordinary ſkill in the Greek language, and was highly eſteemed by the moſt learned men of the nation, particularly the famous antiquary and hiſtorian John Leland, who has beſtowed an encomium on him. He died December 20, 1559, aged about ſixty-three.

BEKKER (BALTHAZAR) one of the moſt famous Dutch divines, and author of the celebrated book, intitled, The World Bewitched, an ingenious piece, againſt the vulgar notion of ſpirits; was born in the year 1634, at Warthuiſen, a village in the province of Groningen. In 1665 he took his degree of doctor of divinity, at Franeker, and the next year was choſen one of the miniſters of that city. Beſides the book already mentioned, he publiſhed ſeveral Catechiſms; an Enquiry concerning Comets, and other pieces. He died June 11, 1698.

BEL, in the heathen mythology, ſee BAAL.

BEL (MATTHIAS) was born in Hungary, and became a Lutheran miniſter at Preſburg, and hiſtoriographer to the emperor Charles VI. He is celebrated for writing ſeveral good works, and particularly for his excellent Hiſtory of Hungary, which was ſo much admired, that the emperor ſent him letters of nobility; and notwithſtanding his being a Lutheran, the pope, in 1736, ſent him his picture, and many large gold medals. He was a member of the Royal Society of London, and of the academies of Berlin and Peterſburg, and died in 1749, at ſixty-ſix years of age.

BELEZERO, or BIELO-OZERO, the capital of the province of Bielo-Ozerſkoi, in Ruſſia, ſeated on the ſouth-eaſt ſhore of the White Lake, one hundred and fifty miles north-eaſt of Peterſburg, and one hundred north-eaſt of Novorogod. Long. 36. 10. E. Lat. 61. 50. N.

BELFAST, a town of Ireland, in the county of Antrim. It is ſeated at the bottom of Carrickfergus bay, and is the chief town and port in this part of Ireland, as well for beauty and the number of its inhabitants, as for its wealth, trade, and ſhipping. There is a very long ſtone bridge over the river; and ſhips come up to Curmoil road, where there is a ſafe commodious harbour, below the town, with a good depth of water. It drives a conſiderable trade with Glaſgow; the inhabitants are Scots, and under the ſame church-government. Long. 6. 15. W. Lat. 54. 38. N.

BELGOROD, a town of Ruſſia, and capital of a province of the ſame name. It is ſeated on the river Donets. Long. 18. 5. E. Lat. 51. 20. N.

BELGOROD, a ſtrong town of Turky, in Europe, and in Beſſarabia, ſeated at the mouth of the river Nieſter, on the Black Sea, eighty miles ſouth-eaſt of Bender.

BELGRADE, a city of Turky, in Europe, and capital of Servia, ſeated at the confluence of the Save and the Danube. The Danube is very rapid near this city, and its waters look whitiſh. This city is built on a hill, and was once large, ſtrong, and populous; it was ſurrounded with a double wall, flanked with a great number of towers, and had a caſtle ſituated on a riſing ground, and built with ſquare ſtones. The ſuburbs are very extenſive, and reſorted to by Turkiſh, Jewiſh, Greek, Hungarian, and Sclavonian merchants. The ſtreets where the greateſt trade is carried on is covered with wood, to ſhelter the dealers from the ſun and rain. The rivers render it very convenient for commerce, and as the Danube falls into the Black Sea, the trade is eaſily extended to diſtant countries, which renders it the ſtaple town in theſe parts: and as that river runs up to Vienna, they ſend goods from thence with a great deal of eaſe. The Armenians have a church here, and the Jews a ſynagogue, both theſe being employed as factors; the ſhops are but ſmall, and the ſellers ſit on tables, diſpoſing of their commodities out of a window; for the buyers never go on the inſide. The richeſt merchandize are expoſed to ſale in two bezeſteins or bazars, built croſs-wiſe. There are two exchanges, built with ſtone, and ſupported with pillars, not unlike the Royal Exchange at London. There is likewiſe a caravanſera or public inn, and a college for young ſtudents. It has been taken backwards and forwards by the Turks and Imperialiſts ſeveral times; but was ceded to the Turks, in 1739, and the fine fortifications demoliſhed. It is three hundred and forty miles ſouth-eaſt of Vienna, three hundred ſouth-eaſt of Preſburg, ſixty ſouth of Temeſwaer, and four hundred and fifty north-weſt of Conſtantinople. Long. 21. 2. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

BELGRADO, a town of the Venetian territories, in Italy, and in Friuli. It ſtands near the river Tajamento, between the city of Udina and that of Concordia, it being twelve miles from each. Long. 13. 5. E. Lat. 46. 0. N.

BELGRAVE (RICHARD) a Carmelite friar, who flouriſhed in the year 1320, under the reign of king Edward II. and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his great ſkill in the Ariſtotelian philoſophy, philoſophy, and ſchool divinity. He was born at the village of Belgrave, near Leiceſter, and educated in the univerſity of Cambridge. He wrote, among other works, Theological Determinations whether the Divine Eſſence could be ſeen.

BELIDES, in fabulous hiſtory, the fifty daughters of Dananus, the ſon of Belus, who were alſo called Danaïdes. Danaus quarrelling with his brother Ægyptus, the latter propoſed a reconciliation, by marrying his fifty ſons to their couſin germans the Belides; to this Danaus conſented; but being told by an oracle, that he ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of his kingdom by a ſon-in-law, he directed his fifty daughters to kill their huſbands on the firſt night of their marriage. This advice they all of them followed, except Hypermneſtra, who ſuffered her huſband Lyncæus to eſcape, who afterwards dethroned Danaus. For this unnatural crime, the reſt of the Belides were puniſhed in Tartarus, by being condemned to the endleſs labour of pouring water into a veſſel full of holes.

BELING (Richard) the ſon of Sir Henry Beling, knight, was born at Belingſtown, in the county of Dublin, in the year 1613. His natural inclination leading him to arms, he engaged in the rebellion of 1641, and though but about twenty-eight years of age, was then an officer of conſiderable rank. He afterwards became a leading member in the ſupreme council of the confederated Roman Catholics, at Kilkenny, to which he was ſecretary, and was ſent ambaſſador to the pope, to crave aid for the ſupport of their cauſe. He brought back with him the pope's nuncio, who, contrary to his promiſe, ſplit the party into factions, on which, Mr. Beling endeavoured to oppoſe his meaſures, by which he obtained the favour of the marquiſs of Ormond, who intruſted him with many negotiations, both before and after the Reſtoration. When the parliament army had ſubdued the Iriſh, he retired to France, where he employed himſelf in writing ſeveral books in Latin, and particularly an Account of the Tranſactions in Ireland during the Time of the Rebellion. He died at Dublin, in 1677.

BELISARIUS, general of the emperor Juſtinian's armies, and one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed commanders of his time. In the year 529 he marched againſt Cabades, king of Perſia, and in 532 obliged him to conclude a treaty of peace. The next year he commanded a fleet of five hundred veſſels, fitted out for the conqueſt of Africa; he then took Carthage, and in the year 534 defeated Gilimer, who had uſurped the crown of the Vandals; took him priſoner, and brought him to Conſtantinople, where he received the honour of a triumph. Thus Africa became reunited to the empire. Juſtinian then reſolving to deliver Italy from the tyranny of the Goths, ſent Beliſarius into Sicily, where he took Catanea, Syracuſe, Palermo, &c. The next year he beſieged Naples, appeared with an army before Rome, and was received into that city. The Goths having put to death Theodatus, their king, Vitiges placed himſelf on the throne, and went to beſiege Rome; but was taken, with his whole family, two years after at Ravenna, when Beliſarius conducted them to Conſtantinople, and refuſed the crown which was offered him by the Goths. Some time after, Tortilla being choſen king of the Goths, ravaged Italy, took Rome, and in 546, plundered and diſmantled the city; on which, Beliſarius returned to Rome, and rebuilt its walls. At length he was recalled into the Eaſt, againſt the Perſians, and in 558 drove back the Huns, who had made an irruption into the empire. It is ſaid, that in 561, this great man being accuſed of conſpiring againſt Juſtinian, that prince ordered his eyes to be put out; and that he was forced to beg about the ſtreets of Conſtantinople; but others ſay, that he was reſtored to his dignities, and died in peace at Conſtantinople, in 565.

BELLAC, a town of France, in la Marche, on the little river Unicon. It contains about ſeven hundred and ſeventy houſes, and three thouſand inhabitants. It is twenty miles north of Limoges. Long. 1. 14. E. Lat. 46. 4. N.

BELLARMIN (Robert) a famous cardinal, and one of the beſt controverſial writers of the Romiſh church, was born at Monte Pulciano, in Tuſcany, in the year 1542, and entered himſelf among the Jeſuits in 1560. He taught divinity at Louvain, and lived ſeven years in the Low Countries; but returning to Italy, he read lectures on controverſies at Rome, and in 1599 was honoured with a cardinal's hat. It is reported, that they were obliged to force him by the threats of an anathema to accept of that dignity. Three years after he had the archbiſhopric of Capua given him, which he reſigned in 1605. He died on the 17th of September, 1621, at ſeventy-eight years of age. His works are printed in four volumes, folio. And it may be truly ſaid of him, that no author ever defended the cauſe of the Romiſh church in general, and that of the pope in particular, to more advantage

BELLAY (William du) lord of Langei, the ſon of Lewis du Bellay, was born about the year 1498, at Glatigni, in France. He was an excellent captain, and an able negotiator; his pen was alſo as uſeful as his tongue and his ſword. He was of great ſervice to Francis I. both by his valour and his abilities, and was one of the principal ſprings which led ſome of the univerſities of France to give their judgment agreeable to the deſires of Henry VIII. when that prince wanted to divorce his wife, that he might have the liberty of marrying Anne Bullen. He wrote, in Latin, an Hiſtory of his own Times, which he afterwards, at the king's deſire, tranſlated into French.

Bellay (John du) the younger brother of the preceding, was a man of great abilities. He concurred with his brother in promoting the deſires of Henry VIII. and decoying the proteſtants of Germany to give their opinions in favour of the divorce of Catharine of Arragon, in order to ſerve Francis I. whoſe affairs required, that the correſpondence between the emperor and England ſhould be broken off at any price. He was archbiſhop of Paris in the year 1534, when he was ſent to Rome, to ſoften matters with regard to the king of England. He was promoted to the dignity of a cardinal by pope Paul III. in the year 1535, and died at Rome in 1560. He wrote ſome poems and other works, in Latin.

Bellay, a city of France, capital of Bugey, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the Rhone, eighteen leagues north-eaſt of Chamberry, forty eaſt of Lyons, forty ſouth-weſt of Geneva, and two hundred and fifty ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 5. 50. E. Lat. 45. 43. N.

BELLE (Stephen de la) a celebrated engraver, born at Florence, who improved himſelf by imitating the deſigns of Callot, and died in 1664, after his being loaded with honours by the grand duke.

BELLEAU (Remi) a French poet, of the ſixteenth century, was born at Nogent le Retrou. He tranſlated the Odes of Anacreon into French verſe, and wrote a Commentary upon the ſecond Part of the amorous Poems of Peter Ronſard. His Paſtorals are in the greateſt eſteem. He alſo wrote an excellent Poem on the Nature and Difference of precious Stones. He died in 1577, in the fiftieth year of his age.

BELLEFOREST (Francis de) a French poet, and voluminous author, born in the province of Guienne, in 1530. He wrote French verſes to pleaſe the ladies, and afterwards ſupported his family by writing books on whatever ſubject was propoſed to him by the bookſellers, according to the taſte of the public. It is ſaid of him, that he had moulds in which he caſt new books with great readineſs. He died at Paris, January 1, 1583.

BELLEGARDE (Roger de St. Lary, lord of) after having ſignaliſed himſelf in many campaigns, was, in 1574, made marſhal of France by Henry III. and received ſuch a ſwift ſucceſſion of obligations from that prince, that he was called The Torrent of Favour; but his credit did not laſt long, which obliged him to retire into Piedmont, where he rendered himſelf maſter of the marquiſate of Saluces, and drove out the governor. That affair made a great noiſe at court; however, queen Catharine de Medicis, going to Lyons in 1579, pretended to be ſatisfied with the marſhal's reaſons, and confirmed him in the government of Saluces, which ſhe could not take from him. He died in 1579. He ought not to be confounded with Roger de Bellegrade, duke and peer of France, who received many favours and honourable employments from Henry III. Henry IV. and Lewis XIII.

Bellegarde (John Baptist Morvan de) known by the multitude of his tranſlations and other works, was born in 1648, at Pihyriac, in the dioceſe of Nantes. It is ſaid, that he left the Jeſuits on account of his attachment to the opinions of Des Cartes, and died in 1734. His principal works are Tranſlations of St. Chryſoſtom, St. Baſil, and St. Gregory Nazianzen.

Bellegarde, a ſtrong town of France, in Rouſſillon, on the frontiers of Catalonia. It is well fortified, and is an important place, on account of the paſſage to the Pyrenean mountains. Long. 3. 0. E. Lat. 42. 20. N.

Belle-Isle, an iſland of France, on the coaſt of Brittany. It is about thirteen miles in length, and five in breadth; and was made a duchy, in 1742, in favour of marſhal Belle-iſle. It has a mixture of craggy rocks, ſalt-works, and fertile land; it contains four pariſhes, has a good citadel, and a convenient port. It was taken by the Engliſh on the 7th of June, 1761; but was reſtored to the French by the late treaty of peace. Long. 3. 5. W. Lat. 47. 20. N.

Belle-Isle, an iſland of North America, lying at the mouth of the ſtreight between the country of the Eſkimaux, or New-Britain, and the north end of Newfoundland; from whence it is called the Streight of Belle-Iſle. Long. 58. 5. W. Lat. 51. 50. N.

Belle-Ville, a town of France, in Beanjolois, near the river Saone, five miles north of Ville-Franche, fifteen ſouth of Mazon, and eight ſouth of Beau-Jeu. Long. 4. 46. E. Lat. 45. 5. N.

BELLENGER (Francis) doctor of the Sorbonne, applied himſelf principally to the ſtudy of the Greek language. He wrote a French Tranſlation of Dionyſius of Halicarnaſſus, from the Greek; a Critique on the Works of M. Rollin, and a Commentary on the Pſalms, in Latin. He alſo tranſlated Herodotus into French; but died before it was publiſhed, on the 12th of April, 1746, aged ſixty-one.

BELLERE (John) a famous printer at Anvers, who lived in the ſixteenth century, and acquired great reputation by his works.

BELLEROPHON, in fabulous hiſtory, the ſon of Glaucus, king of Epirus, happening accidentally to kill his brother, fled to Prœtus, king of Argos, who gave him a hoſpitable reception; but Sthenobea, his queen, falling in love with the beautiful ſtranger, and finding that nothing could induce him to injure his benefactor, ſhe accuſed him to her huſband of an attempt to violate her honour. Prœtus, however, not being willing to act contrary to the laws of hoſpitality, ſent him to Iobates, king of Lyſia, and the father of Sthenobea, with letters deſiring him to put him to death. That prince, at the receipt of theſe letters, was celebrating a feſtival of nine days, which prevented Bellerophon's deſtruction. Iobates however ſent him in the mean time to ſubdue the Solymi, the Amazons, and Lyſians, and thought to get rid of him by expoſing him to the greateſt dangers; but by his prudence and courage he came off victorious. Iobates next employed him to deſtroy the Chimæra, when Minerva, or according to others, Neptune, in conſideration of his innocence, furniſhed him with the horſe Pegaſus, by whoſe aſſiſtance he killed the Chimæra. Iobates, on his return, being convinced of his truth and integrity, and charmed with his heroic virtues, gave him his daughter Philonoë in marriage, and declared him his ſucceſſor. Bellerophon at length growing vain with his proſperity, reſolved, by the aſſiſtance of Pegaſus, to aſcend the ſkies; when Jupiter checked his preſumption, by ſtriking him blind in his flight, on which he fell down to the earth, and wandered till his death in contempt and miſery: but Pegaſus mounting into heaven, Jupiter placed him among the conſtellations. See Pegasus, and Chimæra.

BELLINI (Laurence) an eminent phyſician, born in Florence, in the year 1643. He gained great reputation by his ſkill in anatomy, and was made profeſſor in ordinary of that ſcience at Piſa; being afterwards ſent for to Florence, he was advanced to be firſt phyſician to the grand duke Coſmo III. He wrote the following books in Latin, 1. An anatomical Diſcourſe on the Structure and Uſe of the Kidneys. 2. A Speech by way of Thanks to the ſerene Duke of Tuſcany. 3. Some anatomical Obſervations, and a Propoſition in Mechanics. 4. Of the Urine and Pulſe, of Blood-letting, Fevers, and Diſeaſes of the Head and Breaſts. 5. Several Tracts concerning Urine, the Motion of the Heart and Bile, &c. He died January 8, 1703, at ſixty years of age.

BELLINO (Giacomo) a famous painter at Venice, in the fifteenth century. He had two ſons, Gentil and John, who were alſo very good painters, and made the excellent pictures in the council-hall of Venice. Mahomet II. emperor of the Turks, having ſeen ſome of Gentil's paintings, was ſo charmed with them, that he wrote to the republic of Venice, to deſire that he might be ſent to him. Upon which, Bellino went to Conſtantinople, and made ſeveral pictures for the grand ſeignior, and among others, a decollation of St. John the Baptiſt. Mahomet admired the diſpoſition, and the ſhading of this laſt piece, but obſerved that the neck was both too long and too thick; and to prove the truth of this obſervation, called a ſlave, and had his head cut off in Bellino's preſence, when he made him obſerve, that the neck, on being ſeparated from the head, ſhrunk up extremely. Bellino was ſeized with terror at the view of ſuch a dreadful object, and had not a moment's reſt till he got leave to return; when the grand ſeignior made him rich preſents, put a gold chain of great value, with his own hands, about his neck, and ſent him to Venice with letters of recommendation to the republic, who ſettled a penſion upon him. He died at Venice, in 1501, aged eighty.

John Bellino, his brother, painted with more art and ſweetneſs than he, and died in 1512, aged ninety.

BELLINZONA, a town of Italy, in the Milaneſe, and one of the bailiwicks which the Swiſs poſſeſs in that country. It is ſeated on the river Jeſino, five miles above the place where it falls into the Lago Maggiore, and is fortified by two ſtrong caſtles that had been joined together by a wall, flanked with towers; but the Swiſs have demoliſhed part of it. Long. 9. 0. E. Lat. 46. 8. N.

BELLONA, in Pagan mythology, the goddeſs of war, is generally reckoned the ſiſter of Mars, and ſome repreſent her as both his ſiſter and wife. She is ſaid to have been the inventreſs of the needle, and from that inſtrument is ſuppoſed to have taken her name, Βελόνη, ſignifying a needle.

This goddeſs was of a cruel and ſavage diſpoſition, delighting in blood-ſhed and ſlaughter; and was not only the attendant of Mars, but took a pleaſure in ſharing his dangers. She is commonly repreſented in an attitude expreſſive of fury and diſtraction, her hair compoſed of ſnakes clotted with gore, and her garments ſtained with blood: ſhe is generally depictured driving the chariot of Mars, with a bloody whip in her hand; but ſometimes ſhe is drawn holding a lighted torch, or brand, and at others a trumpet.

Bellona had a temple at Rome, near the Circus Flaminius, before which ſtood the column of war, from whence the conſul threw his lance, when he declared war. She was alſo worſhipped at Comana, in Cappadocia; and Camden obſerves, that in the time of the emperor Severus, there was a temple of Bellona in the city of York. For the origin of this deity, ſee Mars.

BELLONARII, in Roman antiquity, the prieſts of Bellona, who, in honour of that goddeſs, uſed to cut themſelves with knives, and catching the blood in the palm of their hands, gave it to thoſe who were partakers of their myſteries.

BELLUNESE, a territory of Italy, belonging to the Venetians, which lies between Friuli, Codorino, Feltrino, the biſhoprick of Trent, and Tirol. It has good iron-mines. Belluno is the only conſiderable place.

BELMEIS, or Beaumes (Richard de) biſhop of London, in the reign of Henry I. was advanced to that ſee July 26, 1108, and expended the whole revenues of his biſhoprick on the ſtructure of St. Paul's cathedral in London, but deſpairing of ever finiſhing it, he turned the ſtream of his liberality another way, and built a convent of regular canons at St. Oſith de Chick, in Eſſex. He died on the 16th of January, 1127.

BELMEYS (John) commonly called Joannes Eboracenſis, or John of York, was an eminent divine in the twelfth century, and eſteemed the moſt learned man of his time. After having laid the foundation of learning in his own country, he viſited the moſt famous univerſities of France and Italy; returning home, was made canon and treaſurer of the cathedral church of York; but ſoon quitting thoſe poſts, he returned to Italy; and, in 1159, was made biſhop of Poitou, in France, from whence he was twenty years after tranſlated to the biſhoprick of Lyons, and became thereby primate of all France. He wrote, 1. The Golden Hiſtory of John of York. 2. Thirty-two Letters to Thomas Becket. 3. An Invective againſt that Prelate; and other works.

BELMONTE, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and in the Hither Calabria. It is ſeated on the coaſt of the Tuſcan Sea, ten miles weſt of Cozenza. Long. 16. 50. E. Lat. 39. 20. N.

BELON (Peter) in Latin Bellonius, was born at Le Mans, the capital city of the province of Maine in France, and flouriſhed about the middle of the ſixteenth century. He wrote, in French, of birds, fiſhes, ſerpents, inſects, &c. and obſervations on ſeveral ſingularities he found in his travels in Greece, Aſia, Judea, Egypt, Arabia, and other countries. He was murdered, near Paris, by one of his enemies, in 1564.

BELOY (Peter de) advocate-general of the parliament of Toulouſe, rendered himſelf very famous by publiſhing a book againſt the league, which was the more remarkable, as he was a catholic. For this work, he was thrown into the Baſtile, in the year 1587, where he was confined four years. He alſo wrote a Computation of Time from the Creation of the World to the Year 1582, and other pieces

BELSHAZZAR, or Balthasar, the laſt king of Babylon, ſucceeded his father Evilmerodach; but while he was at a grand feſtival with his wives, his concubines, and nobles, he ordered the veſſels of gold and ſilver to be brought, which his grandfather Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple of Jeruſalem, and drinking out of them praiſed his gods. At this inſtant, there appeared a hand, which wrote upon the wall; the king turned pale and trembled; he ordered his aſtrologers and ſoothſayers to be called, and, when they appeared, told them, that he who read the writing, and explained its meaning ſhould be cloathed in ſcarlet, have a chain of gold about his neck, and be the third ruler in the kingdom. They being unable to read the writing, the king's apprehenſions were redoubled; but the queen-mother coming in, propoſed their ſending for Daniel. He, on his arrival, had the ſame magnificent offers made to him; but, inſtead of thanking the king, he reproached him for his impiety and ingratitude to the Lord of heaven, and reading the writing, Mene, mene, tekel, uphraſin, obſerved, that it ſignified, that he had been weighed in the balance, and had been found wanting, and that his kingdom ſhould be divided, and given to the Medes and Perſians.

Perſians. That very night, Cyrus, or, as he is called in Scripture, Darius the Median took the city, and Belſhazzar was ſlain.

BELT (the Great) a ſmall ſtreight of Denmark, between the the iſland of Zealand and that of Funen, at the entrance of the Baltic Sea. This ſtreight is not ſo commodious, nor ſo much frequented, as the Sound. It is obſervable, that, in 1658, this ſtreight was frozen ſo hard, that Charles Guſtavus, king of Sweden, marched over it, with a deſign to take Copenhagen.

BELT (the Leſſer) lies to the weſt of the Great Belt, between the iſland of Funen and the coaſt of Jutland. It is one of the paſſages from the German Ocean to the Baltic, though it is not three miles in breadth, and is very crooked.

BELVEZOR (AYMERIC) a Provençal poet, who flouriſhed about the year 1233. He was a man of diſtinguiſhed learning, and wrote a great number of fine poems in the Provençal language, in honour of a lady of Gaſcony; but finding that his affection for her expoſed them both to public cenſure, he went to the court of the earl of Provence, where he wrote ſeveral ſonnets in praiſe of that earl and his lady. He there fell in love with a princeſs of Provence, a lady of incomparable beauty, of the moſt unexceptionable character, and converſant in all the ſciences, and to her he addreſſed ſeveral of his poems. Being one day in converſation with her and ſeveral other ladies of the court, ſhe dropped her glove, which Aymeric took up, and kiſſing it, preſented it to her again. The ladies who were preſent took offence at this, and privately reproved her for her condeſcenſion; upon which ſhe replied, "that ladies of ho-"nour could not ſhew too much favour, within the bounds "of modeſty, to the poets who ſung their praiſes, and ren-"dered them immortal by their works;" but ſome time after, ſhe being choſen abbeſs of Modlegez, in Provence, our poet died with grief, becauſe he was now no longer permitted to converſe with her. This happened in the year 1264.

BELVIDERE, a town of Greece, the capital of the province of the ſame name, in the Morea. It is placed on the weſt ſide, next the ſea, and is the richeſt and moſt fertile of the whole country. We have the Belvidere raiſins from this province. It is eighteen miles north-eaſt of Chiarenza, and eighteen ſouth of Patras. Long. 22. 0. E. Lat. 38. 5. N.

BELUS, thought to be the ſame with the Nimrod mentioned in the Scriptures, was, it is ſaid, the firſt king of Aſſyria, and began to reign at Babylon in the one thouſand three hundred and twenty-ſecond year before the Chriſtian æra. He was alſo the firſt, according to St. Cyril, who aſſumed the name of God, and introduced idolatry.

BEMBO (PETER) a noble Venetian, ſecretary to Leo X. and afterwards cardinal, was one of the beſt writers of the ſixteenth century. He was a good poet, both in Italian and Latin; but he is juſtly cenſured for the looſeneſs and immodeſty of ſome of his poems. He publiſhed, beſides theſe, A Hiſtory of Venice, his Letters, and a book in praiſe of the duke and ducheſs of Urbino. He died in 1547, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age.

BENAVIDIUS, or BONAVITUS (MARCUS MANTUA) a celebrated civilian, taught civil law with reputation, during ſixty years, at Padua, the place of his birth, and died on the 28th of March, 1582, at ninety-three years of age His principal works are, 1. Collectanea ſuper Jus Cæſareum 2. Conſiliorum, tom. ii. 3. Problematum legalium. 4. De illuſtribus Juriſconſultis, &c.

BENBOW (JOHN) colonel of a regiment in the reign of king Charles I. and the father of the brave vice-admiral of the ſame name. He was a great ſufferer for his loyalty to his prince; and when king Charles II. marched from Scotland towards Worceſter, he attended and fought for him with the utmoſt intrepidity, but had the misfortune to be taken priſoner by the parliament's army. However, after a ſhort confinement, he made his eſcape, and lived privately in Shropſhire, till after the Reſtoration, when he was very far advanced in years, and yet ſo much to ſeek for a livelihood, that he was glad to accept of a ſmall poſt belonging to the ordnance in the Tower. In this ſituation he was, when a little before the breaking out of the laſt Dutch war, the king went to the Tower to examine the magazines; and there his majeſty caſt his eye on the good old colonel, who had now, for twenty years, been diſtinguiſhed by a fine head of grey hair. The king, whoſe memory was as quick as his eye, knew him at firſt ſight, and immediately came up and embraced him. "My old friend, colonel "Benbow, (ſaid he) what do you here." "I have, re-"turned the colonel, a place of fourſcore pounds a year, "in which I ſerve your majeſty as chearfully as if it "brought me in four thouſand." "Alas! (ſaid the king) "is this all that could be found for an old friend at Wor-"ceſter? Colonel Legge, bring this gentleman to me to-"morrow, and I will provide for him and his family as it "becomes me." But ſhort as the time was, the colonel did not live to receive, or even to claim the effects of this gracious promiſe; for the ſenſe of the king's gratitude and goodneſs ſo overcame his ſpirits, that ſitting down on a bench, he breathed his laſt, before the king was well out of the Tower.

BENBOW (JOHN) vice admiral of the blue, and one of the moſt eminent Engliſh ſeamen mentioned in our hiſtories, was the ſon of the former, and was born about the year 1650, of a very ancient and honourable family in Shropſhire. His father left him no other proviſion than the profeſſion of a ſailor, but he had ſuch ſucceſs, that before he was thirty, he became maſter, and in a good meaſure owner, of a ſhip, called the Benbow frigate, employed in the Mediterranean trade, during which time the following remarkable incident brought him to ſerve in the Britiſh navy, with equal reputation to himſelf and glory to his country. In the year 1686 he was attacked in his paſſage to Cadiz by a Sallee rover, againſt whom he defended himſelf with a very unequal number of men, with the utmoſt bravery, till at laſt the Moors boarded him, but were quickly beat out of the ſhip again, with the loſs of thirteen men, whoſe heads he ordered to be cut off, and thrown into a tub of pork pickle. When he arrived at Cadiz, he went aſhore, and ordered a negro ſervant to follow him, with the Moors heads in a ſack. He had ſcarce landed before the officers of the revenue enquired of his ſervant What he had there? The captain anſwered, Salt proviſions, for his own uſe. "That may be, anſwered the officers, but we muſt "inſiſt upon ſeeing them." Captain Benbow alledged, that he was no ſtranger there, that he did not uſe to run goods, and pretended to take it ill that he was ſuſpected. The officers told him that the magiſtrates were ſitting not far off, and that if they were ſatisfied with his word, his ſervant might carry the proviſions where he pleaſed, but that otherwiſe it was not in their power to grant any ſuch diſpenſation. The captain conſented to the propoſal, and away they marched to the Cuſtom-houſe, Mr. Benbow in the front, his man in the centre, and the officers in the rear. The magiſtrates, when he came before them, treated captain Benbow with great civility, told him they were ſorry to make a point of ſuch a trifle, but that ſince he had refuſed to ſhew the contents of his ſack to their officers, the nature of their employments obliged them to demand a ſight of them, and as they doubted not their being ſalt proviſions, the ſhewing them could be of no great conſequence one way or the other. "I told you, ſaid the captain ſternly, "they were ſalt proviſions for my own uſe. Cæſar, throw "them down upon the table; and, gentlemen, if you like "them, they are at your ſervice." The Spaniards were exceedingly ſtruck at the ſight of the Moors heads, and no leſs aſtoniſhed at the account of the captain's adventure, who, with ſo ſmall a force, had been able to defeat ſuch a number of Barbarians; and ſending an account of the whole affair to the court of Madrid, Charles II. then king of Spain, was ſo much pleaſed with it, that he would needs ſee the Engliſh captain, who made a journey to court, where he was received with great teſtimonies of reſpect, and not only diſmiſſed with a handſome preſent, but his Catholic majeſty was alſo pleaſed to write a letter in his behalf to king James, who, upon the captain's return, gave him a ſhip.

After the Revolution, captain Benbow was at firſt employed in protecting our trade in the channel, and bombarding the French ports, in which he ſhewed the moſt intrepid bravery, by going in perſon in his boat to encourage and protect the engineers, and his vigour and activity ſo effectually recommended him to king William, that he was early promoted to a flag. After the peace, he was ſent with a ſquadron into the Weſt Indies, when he obliged the governor of Carthagena to reſtore two Engliſh ſhips that had been ſeized by the Spaniards; and afterwards, ſailing to Porto Bello, forced the governor, by his threats, to ſend him ſeveral veſſels which had been taken under the pretence that the ſettlement of the Scots at Darien was a breach of the peace. Upon the war breaking out a-freſh, he was again ſent into the Weſt Indies, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a memorable engagement againſt the French fleet, commanded manded by admiral Du Caſſe, on the 19th and 20th of Auguſt, 1702, near the coaſt of St. Martha, in which he had one of his legs ſhattered to pieces by a cannon-ſhot, and after its being dreſſed, he was carried up and placed with his cradle on the quarter-deck; but when he had a moral certainty of taking or deſtroying the whole French ſquadron, he had the vexation of loſing this victory by the cowardice of ſeveral of his captains, who baſely refuſed to continue the fight, and ſigned a paper, importing that they were reſolved to deſiſt. He oppoſed this reſolution, ſo injurious to the honour of the nation, to the utmoſt of his power, and on his arrival at Jamaica, ordered the officers who had behaved in this ſcandalous manner to be confined, and a court-martial being held for their trial, ſome of the moſt guilty were condemned, and ſuffered according to their deſerts. This brave commander died at Jamaica, of a conſumption, occaſioned by the cutting off his leg, on the 4th of November, 1702.

BENBOW (JOHN) ſon to the vice-admiral above-mentioned, was educated for the ſea, but his misfortunes began in the very year in which his father died; by his being ſhipwrecked on the coaſt of Madagaſcar, where, after many diſmal and dangerous adventures, he was reduced to live with, and in the manner of the natives, for many years. However, at laſt, when he leaſt expected it, he was taken on board by a Dutch captain, out of reſpect to the memory of his father, and brought ſafe to England. Though he was naturally of a very briſk and lively temper, his misfortunes entirely altered his diſpoſition, ſo that after his return, he had a conſtant habit of ſerioufneſs, and did not much affect ſpeaking, except amongſt his intimate friends. He however wrote A complete Deſcription of the ſouth Part of the Iſland of Madagaſcar, in reference to the Soil, Climate, Produce, Animals, and Inhabitants, with Remarks on the Coaſts, Harbours, and Commerce of that Iſland; but the manuſcript is unhappily loſt.

BENCIO (FRANCIS) an Italian Jeſuit, and one of the moſt excellent orators of his time, was born at Aquapendente, in 1542. He taught rhetoric at Rome, in the Jeſuits college, for ſeveral years. He was alſo a good Latin poet, and printed a Collection of Latin Poems, and his Orations. He died at Rome, May 6, 1594.

BENCOOLEN, a fort and town belonging to the Engliſh, on the ſouth-weſt coaſt of the iſland of Sumatra, in the Eaſt Indies, from whence they import large quantities of pepper, the growth of the adjacent country. The houſes of the Indians are ſmall and low, built on ſtakes, after the Malayan manner. They chooſe a ſpot near the ſide of a river to build on, for the conveniency of waſhing, in which they take great pleaſure; beſides, as Mahomedans, it is a part of their religion, and therefore, when they can, they drive ſtakes in the river itſelf, on which to fix their houſes. The climate is very unwholeſome, eſpecially to ſtrangers, being nearly under the line. In the rainy ſeaſon, which is moſt violent in September, October, and November, the air is extremely hot, with ſtorms of thunder and lightning, which ſoon after end in a calm. Beſides, the heat of the ſun exhales noxious vapours from marſhy places, and ſtanding waters, which infect the air, and produce malignant fevers. The firſt Engliſh fort was in a lower ſituation, and then the ſoldiers died in a very little time; but ſince they have built one upon an eminence, it is a little more healthy. The face of the country is agreeable enough, there being pleaſant woods, high craggy mountains, agreeable vallies, fruitful plains, and the marſhes and ponds are ſtocked with young oak-trees. Likewiſe, the graſs is long and thick. Long. 101. 5. E. Lat. 4. 5. S.

BENDER, or TEKIN, a town of Turky, in Europe, in Beſſarabia, ſeated on the river Nieſter, four hundred and ninety miles north of Conſtantinople, and one hundred and ten from the Black Sea. It is remarkable for being the place of retreat of the king of Sweden, after he was defeated by the Ruſſians, at the battle of Pultowa, in 1709. Long. 29. 5. E. Lat. 46. 40. N.

BENDLOWES (EDWARD) author of ſeveral poetical pieces, was the ſon and heir of Andrew Bendlowes, Eſq. and was born in the year 1613. He was educated at Cambridge, from thence went with a tutor to travel, and returned home a moſt accompliſhed gentleman; but by his liberality in rewarding the poets, his generoſity in giving a handſome fortune to his neice, and engaging for the payment of other men's debts, together with his buying curioſities, he ſpent his eſtate, which amounted to ſeven hundred or one thouſand pounds a year, and, after ſuffering many hardſhips, died in great want, December 18, 1686, aged ſeventy-three years.

BENEDETTO (ST.) a conſiderable town of Italy, in the Mantuan, thirty-five miles north of Mirandola, and thirty-five ſouth-eaſt of Mantua. Long. 11. 25. E. Lat. 45. 0. N.

BENEDICT (St.) the founder of the order of Benedictine monks, was born in the province of Nurſia, in Italy, about the year 480. When he was about fourteen years of age, it is ſaid, he ſhut himſelf up in a cavern, and continued there ſeveral years, before any perſon knew any thing of him, except St. Romanus, who let proviſions down to him by a rope; but being afterwards diſcovered, the monks of a neighbouring monaſtery choſe him for their abbot. Their manners, however, not agreeing with the auſterity of St. Benedict, he returned to his ſolitude, whither a conſiderable number of perſons came, and put themſelves under his direction, ſo that in a ſhort time he built twelve monaſteries in that place. In 528, or 529, he retired to mount Caſſino, where he built a monaſtery, and founded an order, which in a ſhort time extended itſelf all over Europe. He wrote, Regula Monachorum, and ſome authors aſcribe to him, A Letter to St. Remigius, Archbiſhop of Rheims; A Letter to St. Maurus; and other pieces. He died, according to Dr. Cave, in 542 or 543, or, according to others, in 547.

BENEDICT (BISCOP, or EPISCOPUS) a famous abbot, in the ſeventh century, was born of a noble family, among the Anglo-Saxons, and flouriſhed under Oſwi and Egfrid, kings of Northumberland. In the 25th year of his age he abandoned all his temporal views and poſſeſſions, to devote himſelf wholly to religion, and to this purpoſe travelled to Rome, in the year 653, where he acquired an exact knowledge of eccleſiaſtical diſcipline, which, upon his return home he laboured to eſtabliſh in Britain. He went ſeveral times after to Rome, built a large monaſtery at the mouth of the river Were, and another on the banks of the Tyne, called Girwy or Jarrow. He wrote a Latin Treatiſe on the Agreement of the Rule of the Monaſtic Life, and died January 12, 690.

BENEDICT I. a Roman, alſo called Benoſus, ſucceeded pope John III. in 573. He was a perſon of great zeal and charity, and was the father and friend of the poor. He died on the 30th of July, 577, and was ſucceeded by Pelagius II.

BENEDICT II. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Leo II. on the 20th of Auguſt, 684, and died on the 7th of May, 685. He was pious and learned; he applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the holy Scriptures, and was ſucceeded by John V.

BENEDICT III. a Roman, was elected pope on the 17th of July, 855, and, in ſpite of his reſiſtance, was conſecrated, on the 29th of September following. He was mild, humble, pious, and ſuffered with admirable patience the indignities offered him by the antipope Anaſtaſius. He died on the 5th of February, 858, and was ſucceeded by Nicholas I.

BENEDICT IV. a Roman, was elected pope after John IX. He governed the church with great wiſdom, and took particular care of the poor; but died a few months after his election, in 905, and was ſucceeded by Leo V.

BENEDICT V. was elected pope after John XII. during the ſchiſm made by the antipope Leo VIII. when the emperor Otho taking Rome, carried Benedict to Hamburgh, where he died, on the 10th of June, 965, and was ſucceeded by John XIII.

BENEDICT VI. a Roman, was elected pope on the 20th of December, 972; but cardinal Boniface cauſed him to be ſtrangled in priſon, in 974, and at length placed himſelf in the papal chair.

BENEDICT VII. biſhop of Sutri, ſucceeded pope Benedict VI. in the year 975. He governed the church with great prudence; died on the 10th of July, 984, and was ſucceeded by John XIV.

BENEDICT VIII. biſhop of Porto, was elected pope on the 7th of June, 1012. He implored the aſſiſtance of the emperor Henry II. againſt the antipope Gregory; defeated the Saracens in Italy, and engaged in a war with the Greeks, in Apulia. He died on the 28th of February, 1024, after having held a council at Pavia, and was ſucceeded by his brother John XX.

BENEDICT IX. the ſon of Alberic, count of Freſcati, ſucceeded his uncle pope John XX. in 1033. His youth and ignorance occaſioned his falling into the moſt ſcandalous vices, on which account he was driven from the papal chair, in 1043; but the counts of Freſcati cauſed him to be reſtored. He died in 1054.

BENEDICT X. biſhop of Veletri, was elected pope in 1059, while Nicholas II. ſat in the papal chair; but he ſubmitted to the latter, and died ſome months after. He is not reckoned by ſome authors among the number of the popes.

BENEDICT XI. was the ſon of a ſhepherd, or, according to others, of a recorder of Treviſo; and his real name was Nicholas Bocaſini. He was elected pope on the 22d of October, 1303, and immediately after his election, annulled the bulls publiſhed by his predeceſſor Boniface VIII. againſt Philip the Fair, king of France, and revoked the condemnation of the two cardinals Columna. The mother of this pontiff coming to his palace in a magnificent dreſs he refuſed to ſee, and acknowledge her; but as ſoon as ſhe had changed her cloaths, and appeared in her old rags, the pope owned her for his mother, and received her with joy before all his court.

court. This pope governed the church with wiſdom; but his reign was ſhort, he being poiſoned at Perugia, on the 16th of July, 1304. He was afterwards beatified. He left a Commentary on a Part of the Scriptures, and other works.

BENEDICT XII. the ſon of a miller at Severdun, was elected pope at Avignon, on the 20th of December, 1334. He confirmed the cenſures of his predeceſſor againſt Lewis of Bavaria, and excommunicated the Fratricelli. This pontiff was admired for the manner in which he conferred benefices, and is ſaid to have always preferred perſons of learning and virtue. He ſtrove alſo to reform the ſeveral orders of monks; he wrote a Treatiſe on the State of Souls after Death, and ſeveral other works; and died at Avignon, on the 25th of April, 1342.

BENEDICT, a famous antipope, called Peter de Luna, quitted the ſtudy of the civil and canon law, to follow the profeſſion of arms; but ſome time after reſumed his ſtudies, and taught civil law at Montpellier with reputation. He was made archdeacon of Saragoſſa, then provoſt of Valencia, and in 1375, was created cardinal by Gregory XI. who conſulted him in the moſt important affairs. After the death of that pope, he was at the election of Clement VII. and followed him to Avignon, without ſhewing the leaſt regard to Urban VI. who was at Rome. Clement ſent him as his legate into Spain, and then into France; where he was almoſt always accompanied by St. Vincent Ferrier, and was continually talking of the ſchiſms cauſed by the plurality of popes, proteſting, that if he was in their place, no human conſideration ſhould hinder his uniting the faithful under one head. But being elected pope, after the death of Clement, on the 28th of September, 1394, he took the name of Benedict XIII. and immediately forgot his promiſe, and the act, by which all the cardinals had obliged themſelves, before the election, to renounce the pontificate, at the requeſt of the ſacred college. He was ſome time after ſeized at Avignon, but found means to make his eſcape; after which he was declared a ſchiſmatic at the councils of Piſa and Conſtance. He died at Paniſcola, a ſmall town in the kingdom of Valencia, in September 1424.

BENEDICT XIII. was born in 1649, and elected pope on the 29th of March, 1724. He was mild, humble, charitable, and pious; he regularly attended his devotions, and frequently uſed faſting and mortifications. He held a council at Rome in 1725, in which he confirmed the bull Unigenitus; he approved of the doctrines of the Thomiſts, in relation to grace and predeſtination; wrote ſeveral works, and died on the 21ſt of February, 1730, aged eighty-one.

BENEDICT XIV. one of the moſt learned popes that has governed the church of Rome, was born at Bologna, in 1675. His original name was Proſper Lambertini. He enjoyed ſucceſſively many offices in the church, and at length became archbiſhop of Theodoſia, and afterwards biſhop of Ancona. In 1728 he received the cardinal's hat; in 1731 became archbiſhop of Bologna, and on the 17th of Auguſt, 1740, ſucceeded pope Benedict XIII. and took the name of Benedict XIV. He with great zeal exerted himſelf in putting a ſtop to the diſſenſions that had riſen in the church, protected the arts and ſciences, and founded ſeveral academies at Rome. He was an able canoniſt, and was well verſed in hiſtory and eccleſiaſtical antiquities. Though he governed the church with great wiſdom, and had much zeal for religion, he was gay in his converſation, took a pleaſure in being witty, and converſed with foreigners of the proteſtant religion with the greateſt candour and politeneſs. He died in 1758, at eighty-three years of age, beloved by the proteſtants, as well as by thoſe of the church of Rome. His works were printed before his death, in fifteen volumes, folio, and are all in Latin. He was ſucceeded by cardinal Rezzonico, a Venetian, who took the name of Clement XIII.

BENEDICT, abbot of Peterborough, was originally a Benedictine monk, in the monaſtery of Canterbury, and afterwards prior of that houſe, from whence he was advanced, in the year 1177, by king Henry II. to the abbey of Peterborough. He wrote an Hiſtory of the Life and Miracles of the famous Becket, and died in the year 1200.

BENEDICT (Father) a learned Maronite, born of noble parents, at Guſta, in Phœnicia, in 1663. He was ſent to the college of the Maronites at Rome, when only nine years of age; and there made a great progreſs in the Eaſtern languages. At length, returning into the Eaſt, he applied himſelf to preaching the goſpel, till the Maronites of Antioch ſent him to Rome, in quality of deputy of their church. Coſmo III. grand duke of Tuſcany, invited him to come to Florence, loaded him with honours and favours, and made him Hebrew profeſſor at Piſa. At forty years of age he became a Jeſuit. His ſweetneſs of temper, his probity and profound ſkill in the Eaſtern languages, procured him the eſteem of the learned. He died at Rome, on the 22d of September, 1742, at eighty years of age. He publiſhed the firſt volumes of the excellent edition of St. Ephraim, which was continued and finiſhed by M. Aſſemani.

BENEFIELD (Sebastian) an eminent divine, of the ſeventeenth century, was born Auguſt 12, 1559, at Preſtonbury, in Glouceſterſhire, and educated at Corpus Chriſti college, in Oxford. In 1608, he took the degree of doctor in divinity; and five years after, was choſen Margaret profeſſor in that univerſity. He had been preſented ſeveral years before to the rectory of Meyſey-Hampton, in Glouceſterſhire. He publiſhed Commentaries upon the firſt, ſecond, and third chapters of Amos; a conſiderable number of Sermons; and ſome Latin Treatiſe. He died Auguſt 24, 1630.

BENESOEUF, a town of Africa, in Egypt, remarkable for its hemp and flax. It is ſeated on the weſtern ſhore of the Nile, and is the reſidence of a bey, who is the governor of it. The moſques give it a grand look. It is fifty miles ſouth-weſt of Cairo. Long. 31. 0. E. Lat. 29. 10. N.

BENEVENTE, a town of Spain, in the province of Leon, ſeated on the river Eſla, forty miles ſouth of the city of Leon, thirty north of Zamora, and twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Aſtorga. Long. 5. 5. W. Lat 42. 4 N.

BENEVENTO, a city of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſeated near the confluence of the rivers Sabbato and Calore, in a fertile valley called the Strait of Benevento, which extends itſelf as far as the ſprings of Silaro. This valley is agreeable all the way, and full of gentlemens ſeats and houſes of pleaſure. It has ſuffered terribly by earthquakes, eſpecially in the year 1703, when a great part of it was overturned, and the reſt greatly damaged. It is fifteen miles eaſt of Capua, twelve north of Avellino, thirteen weſt of Ariano, thirty north-eaſt of Naples, and one hundred and twenty ſouth-eaſt of Rome. Long. 14. 57. E. Lat. 41. 6. N.

BENFELD, a town of Alſace, in France, whoſe fortifications were demoliſhed in conſequence of the treaty of Weſtphalia. It is ſeated on the river Ill, twelve miles ſouth-weſt of Straſburg, and ſeven north of Scheleſtat. Long. 7. 45. E. Lat. 48. 14. N.

BENGAL, a kingdom in the Eaſt Indies, ſeated on a gulph of the ſame name. It is about three hundred and ninety miles in length, and two hundred and thirty in breadth. It had formerly its own kings, but is now ſubject to the great mogul. It is bounded on the north by the provinces of Patna and Jeſuat; on the eaſt by the kingdoms of Tipra and Arracan; on the ſouth by the bay of Bengal; and on the weſt by the province of Orixa. It is a very plentiful country, and is overflowed by the river Ganges as Egypt is by the Nile. The chief towns are Daca, which is the ſeat of the viceroy; Coſſambar and Hughly, or Hughgeli, are towns of good trade on the river; Chatigan, near the eaſtern branch of the river, is a very large populous city, and has alſo a very good trade.

The Gulph of Bengal is that part of the great gulph between the two peninſulas that lies to the north, and waſhes the coaſt of the kingdom of Bengal, and that of Orixa, to the weſt, and thoſe of Arracan and Pegu on the eaſt; the river Ganges empties itſelf into this gulph by ſeveral mouths, and makes many ſmall iſlands, ſome of which abound with tame hogs, one of which, weighing ſeventy pounds, may be bought for the value of a ſhilling.

Bengal is a very fruitful country, and is well watered, not only by the Ganges, but by canals cut out of it. On the banks of theſe grow pulſe, muſtard-ſeed, ſeſamums, of which they make oil, and little mulberry-trees to feed their ſilk-worms, which ſupply them with ſilk for their manufactures, which are exceeding good; they have likewiſe aloes, ſalt-petre, gum-lac, opium, wax, muſk, long pepper, ginger, and butter; it ſends vaſt quantities of rice every year to the Moluccas, Sumatra, Malabar, Coromandel, the Maldivia iſlands, Ceylon, and Goa; as alſo ſugar to Golconda, Carnate, Arabia, Irak Arabi, and Perſia; beſides muſlins, cottons, callicoes, ſilks called Bengals, elaches, and herba ſtuffs, indico, and canes to Europe.

They have almoſt continual rains in Bengal, from April to September; this cauſes the Ganges to overflow, which does a great deal of good, and ſometimes a great deal of miſchief; during the other ſix months, the weather is fair and pretty cool, by the blowing of the north-eaſt wind; but in December, January, and February, the mornings are foggy and cold. Their ſhorteſt day is eleven hours long, and their harveſt is at that time of the year.

They have plenty of freſh and ſalt fiſh, fowls, ducks, and geeſe, which are exceeding cheap; ſheep, kids, and pork are the chief food of the Europeans, who victual their ſhips therewith; the food of the common people is pulſe, rice, butter, and boiled fiſh; they uſe a little oil and muſtard, but no ſalt or pepper, and every one eats by himſelf; they uſe banana leaves for their napkins, and the ground for their table; they boil their rice in an earthen platter, and uſe cow-dung for fuel; when a perſon of any other religiondrinks out of their earthen cup, they will uſe it no more, but break it immediately. See CALCUTTA.

BENGUELA, the capital of the territory of Benguela, in Africa, ſeated at the mouth of a river of the ſame name. Long. 12. 5. E. Lat. 10. 3. S. The territory is moſtly in poſſeſſion of the Portugueſe; and to preſerve it, they have built a fort with palliſadoes, and a ditch round it; about this they have built houſes, which are ſhaded with orange, lemon, and banana trees. The ſoil is fruitful, and the land low.

Benguela is bounded by Angola on the north, by Cimbeſes on the ſouth, and by the ocean on the weſt, and extends in length, along the coaſt, about three hundred and ſixty-two miles. The negro towns or villages are not worth mentioning; nor have the negroes in their manners and cuſtoms any thing peculiar to themſelves.

BENI (PAUL) profeſſor of eloquence in the univerſity of Padua, from the year 1599 to his death, which happened in 1625, was one of the moſt fruitful writers that flouriſhed in his time. His works, which are in Latin, ſhew a great deal of learning and reading, and ſome genius; the principal of theſe are, 1. A Commentary on Ariſtotle's Poetics and Rhetoric. 2. A Commentary on the ſix firſt books of the Æneid. 3. Another on Salluſt. 4. A Treatiſe on Hiſtory. 5. A Diſſertation on the Annals of Baronius; and, 6. A Treatiſe on Poetry and Rhetoric, drawn from the Writings of Plato.

BEJAMIN, the twelfth and youngeſt ſon of Jacob, was born near Bethlehem, about one thouſand ſeven hundred and thirty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra, and at length went into Egypt, and became the head of the tribe which bore his name.

BENJAMIN, of Navarre, a Jewiſh rabbi, flouriſhed about the year 1170; he travelled over ſeveral of the moſt remote countries, and wherever he came, wrote a particular account of what he either ſaw himſelf or was informed of by perſons of credit, which he publiſhed in his Itinerarium. He died in 1173, not long after his return from his travels, BENIERE (THOMAS) a young ſtatuary, was born in England, of French parents, in 1663. His models and ſmall works in marble are much commended; and the anatomic figure commonly ſeen in the ſhops of apothecaries, was taken from his original model. He died in 1693, at thirty years of age.

BENIGNUS, archbiſhop of Armagh, in Ireland, was the immediate ſucceſſor of St. Patrick in that ſee, anno 455. He wrote, 1. A book, partly in Latin and partly in Iriſh, on the Virtues and Miracles of St. Patrick. 2. An Iriſh poem, on the Converſion of the People of Dublin to the Chriſtian Faith; and, 3. The Munſter Book of Reigns. He died November 9, 468.

BENIGNUS (St.) the apoſtle of Bnrgundy, was the diſciple of St. Polycarp. He came to France under the reign of Marcus Aurelius, and ſuffered martyrdom at Dijon.

BENIN, a country of Guinea, in Africa, has part of the gulph called the Bite of Benin, and the Slave Coaſt, on the weſt, part of Gago and Biafaro on the north, Myjac and Makoko on the eaſt, and Congo on the ſouth, where it extends about one degree beyond the equinoctial line; the length, from eaſt to weſt, is about ſix hundred miles; but its north and ſouth bounds are not ſo well determined. The land in general is low, woody, in ſome parts has rivers and lakes, but in others there is a ſcarcity of water. There are here a great number of wild beaſts, particularly elephants, lions, tygers, leopards, baboons, monkeys, wild boars, deer, &c. The birds are partridges, of which ſome are blue and ſome green, turtles, wild ducks, woodcocks, divers, water-hens, and crown-birds. The river is full of fiſh, which they eat ſmoke-dried as well as freſh; and their grain is Indian corn; they have no potatoes, but plenty of yams, which are of the potatoe kind, but vaſtly larger and more coarſe; theſe are their ordinary food, and ſerve in the room of bread; they have two ſorts of beans, like horſe-beans, but not near ſo good. The fruits are cocoa-nuts, cormantine apples, bananas, wild figs, and ſome others.

The negroes have ſeveral colours which might ſerve for painting, and a good ſort of ſoap, made with palm-oil and wood-aſhes; they have a great deal of cotton, which not only ſerves for their own uſe, but is exported to diſtant places. The river Rio or Benin has a great many arms, ſome of which are ſo large, that they deſerve the name of rivers; they are all inhabited by different people, the chiefs of each of whom are dignified by the generous ſailors, with the title of King. The place of trade in this river is at Arebo, about one hundred and twenty miles diſtant from its mouth; and to this place the ſhips may ſail up. Thoſe who take this voyage ſee the mouths of a great many rivers fall into the principal channel to the right and the left; but how far it aſcends into the country is not known. A little higher up, the country is very low and marſhy, and ſeems to be divided into iſlands; and yet there are trees of all ſizes growing on the banks; this renders the country very unhealthy, as many of our Britiſh ſailors have found to their coſt; it is alſo incommoded with vaſt numbers of flies, called muſquitoes, which ſting terribly, and render the ſkin full of puſtules. There are three principal villages, to which the negroes come from the inland countries to traffic; one is called Boodadou, and conſiſts of about fifty houſes, or rather huts, for they are made with reeds and covered with leaves; the ſecond, called Arebo, was mentioned above; this is much larger than the former, and pretty well ſtocked with inhabitants, and the houſes have much more room, but they are built after the ſame manner; the third has the name of Agaton, and was built upon a hill; but it is almoſt ruined by the wars; the negroes were about rebuilding it, on account of its agreeable ſituation; it is ſurrounded with ſeveral ſorts of fruit-trees. Great Benin is a day's journey from Agaton, and is the place of reſidence of the king. This will be particularly mentioned below.

The inhabitants of Benin are full as good-natured and civil as any of the negroes; they are very exact in their trading, and will not recede from any of their old cuſtoms; this renders them very ſlow in their dealings, and backward to pay their debts, which ſometimes obliges the traders to ſail before they receive ſatisfaction; but then they are paid as ſoon as they return. Some of the merchants are appointed by the government, which demands a ſort of cuſtom; but it is very trifling. There are three ſorts of officers under the king; the firſt are always near him, and none can addreſs him but by their means: there are ſeveral of the ſecond ſort; one takes care of the ſlaves, another of the cattle, another of the ſtreets, another of war, and ſo on.

Children go almoſt naked till they are fourteen, and then they wrap a cotton cloth round their middles; the richer ſort will put on a ſort of callico gowns when they go abroad, with a kind of drawers; but within they are contented with their uſual cloth; the better ſort of women wear their cotton cloths like petticoats, and have a covering round their ſhoulders, but take care they ſhall be open before. But, now I am upon the ſubject of the negroes dreſs, I cannot but obſerve, that I have been near nine hundred miles along the coaſt of Guinea, and have been often among them in their own villages, and never ſaw any dreſs they had, except the cloth round their middles, ſome of which were ſo ſcanty, that they were ſcarce ſufficient to cover what decency obliged them to conceal; the governor's miſtreſs at Cape Coaſt Caſtle had only a finer cloth than other women; but the chief diſtinction was her hair, which was finely ſet off with ornaments of gold: indeed, I have ſeen their nominal kings in looſe callico gowns, with red woollen caps on their heads; but then theſe were robes of ſtate, which they wore on particular occaſions, for otherwiſe, they were not to be diſtinguiſhed from their ſubjects. However, it cannot be denied, but the people of Benin may have more regard for dreſs than the reſt of the negroes, ſince they are neareſt the dominions of the negus of Abyſſinia, they not being above nine hundred miles from the the ſea-coaſt; beſides, the confines of theſe countries are not above ſix hundred miles diſtant, which renders a communication between them probable, eſpecially as there is an affinity between ſome of their cuſtoms; for the people of Benin uſe circumciſion in both ſexes; now we know of no other nation in the world, but the Abyſſinian, that practiſes the ſame, which is a ſtrong preſumption, that one derives this cuſtom from the other.

The richer ſort of the inhabitants of Benin live upon beef, mutton, and poultry, and eat yams inſtead of bread; that is, they pound them ſmall after they are boiled, and then form them into cakes; their drink is water, and brandy when they can get it. The poorer ſort live upon dried fiſh, bananas, and beans; their drink is water and palm-wine. Their chief handicraft men are ſmiths, carpenters, and curriers; but they perform all their work in a very bungling manner. The men have as many wives as they can keep, which they take without any ceremony, except treating their relations. The wives of the lower ſort may go wherever they have a mind; but thoſe of the rich are ſhut up: they allow their wives to be very familiar with the Europeans, and yet pretend to be very jealous of their own countrymen. When a woman is caught in adultery, ſhe is turned away, and the goods of the man are forfeited to the huſband; but if the relations of the woman are rich, they prevail with him to overlook the fault by dint of preſents.

The circumciſion mentioned above is performed ſeven days after the children are born, at which time the father makes a feaſt for the relations. They have cuſtoms, relating to uncleanneſs, reſembling thoſe of the Jews; but if you aſk them whence they are derived, they will tell you, from their anceſtors. Thieves are puniſhed by making the party amends, if he can, otherwiſe he is baſtinadoed; but murder is always puniſhed with death. When a perſon is only ſuſpected

ſuſpected of a crime, they have ſeveral ways of putting him to a trial, like the fire ordeal, or the bitter water of the Jews; but they are of ſuch a nature, that the innocent may be as often condemned as the guilty.

With regard to their religion, they believe in an almighty and inviſible God; yet worſhip images in a human form, and in thoſe of all ſorts of animals, making them offerings, every one being his own prieſt: they look upon theſe leſſer deities as mediators between him and man; ſome of theſe idols are in the houſe, and ſome in cabins by themſelves. Every fifth day is holy, on which the rich kill cows, ſheep, and goats, and others dogs, cats, and fowls, which they diſtribute among their poor neighbours.

BENIN, the capital of a kingdom of the ſame name, is the reſidence of their kings, and is ſeated pretty far in the country; it ſtands in a plain, and is about four miles in compaſs; the ſtreets are long and broad, and there are markets twice a day, where they ſell cows, cotton, elephants teeth, European merchandizes, and whatever the country produces; the houſes are large, with clay walls, and at a diſtance from each other; they are covered with reeds, ſtraw, and leaves. The women in this place are the greateſt ſlaves; for they go every day to market, manage the houſhold affairs, take care of the children, cook the victuals, and till the ground. The king's palace makes a great part of the town, and, its great extent excepted, there is nothing worth taking notice of, it being only a confuſed heap of buildings, made with boards and clay, without regularity or neatneſs. In the middle, there is a wooden tower, about ſeventy feet high, made like a chimney, and on the top is a brazen ſerpent, hanging with his head downwards; this is pretty well made, and is the moſt curious thing in all the town; there is a gallery of ſtatues, but ſo wretchedly carved, that there is no knowing what they repreſent without being told; behind a curtain, there are eleven brazen heads, with an elephant's tooth on each; theſe are the king's idols: the king's throne is made of ivory, on which he ſits in a pavilion of India ſtuff. The king ſhows himſelf but once a year, on the day of a certain feſtival; and then he is ſurrounded with his wives and a great number of his officers, who walk out in proceſſion to begin the feaſt by ſacrificing to their gods; this done, he beſtows victuals and wine among the multitude, which is imitated by his officers. All the inhabitants of this town and country go under the the denomination of the king's ſlaves; and ſome relations ſay, that none of them wear any habit till given them by the king; but this ſeems to be only a ſalvo to account for the great number of men and women that are daily ſeen naked in the ſtreets; for if it be true, that the king of Benin can bring one hundred thouſand fighting men into the field, his ſubjects muſt be very numerous; and I am afraid his majeſty is not rich enough to beſtow garments upon them all; but thoſe that write inconſiſtent accounts of any country are often reduced to ſuch ſhifts. The Europeans reſort hither to purchaſe ſlaves. Long. 5. 4. E. Lat. 7. 40. N.

BENNET, or BENET, (HENRY) earl of Arlington, an eminent ſtateſman in the reign of king Charles II. was the ſecond ſon of ſir John Bennet, knt. and was born in the year 1618. He was educated at Chriſt-church college in Oxford; and upon the king's coming thither after the breaking out of the civil war, Mr. Bennet was introduced to him, entered himſelf a volunteer, and was afterwards placed by the lord Digby, then ſecretary of ſtate, at the the head of his office. When it was no longer in his power to ſerve the royal cauſe, he retired to France, and from thence went to Italy. In 1646, he became ſecretary to the duke of York; in 1658, the king conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and ſent him, as his miniſter, to the court of Madrid, from whence he did not return till after the Reſtoration, when he was made ſecretary of ſtate; in 1663, he was created baron of Arlington; in 1672, he was raiſed to the dignities of earl of Arlington and viſcount Thetford; and in 1674, was appointed lord chamberlain. He was for a conſiderable time at the head of the miniſtry, but was at length over-ruled by ſeveral new miniſters, and obliged to juſtify his conduct before the houſe of commons, for adviſing a freſh war againſt the Dutch after the concluſion of the peace; at length his credit was ſo low with the king, that, it is ſaid, his majeſty ſuffered ſome to mimick his perſon and actions in his preſence; and it became a common jeſt for ſome courtier to put a black patch upon his noſe, and ſtrut about with a white ſtaff in his hand, in order to make the king merry. He died July 28, 1685, at the age of ſixty-ſeven. His letters to ſir William Temple were afterwards publiſhed.

BENNET (CHRISTOPHER) an eminent phyſician in the ſixteenth century, was the ſon of John Bennet, of Raynton, in Somerſetſhire. He was educated at Lincoln college, Oxford, and gave the public a treatiſe on conſumptions, intitled, Theatri Tabidorum Veſtibulum, &c. alſo Exercitationes Diagnoſticæ, cum Hiſtoriis demonſtrativis, quibus Alimentorum & Sanguinis vitia deteguntur in pleriſque morbis, &c.

BENNET (Dr. THOMAS) an eminent divine, born at Saliſbury, on the 7th of May, 1673, and educated at St. John's college, Cambridge. In 1700, he was made rector of St. James's, in Colcheſter; afterwards he was lecturer of St. Olave's, Southwark, and morning preacher at St. Lawrence, Jewry; and at laſt was preſented to the vicarage of St. Giles's, Cripple-gate, worth five hundred pounds a year. While he was in this ſtation, he was engaged in ſeveral expenſive law-ſuits, in defence of the rights of the church, to which he recovered one hundred and fifty pounds a year. He wrote, 1. An Anſwer to the Diſſenters Plea for Separation. 2. A Confutation of Popery. 3. A Diſcourſe of Schiſm. 4. An Anſwer to a Book intitled Thomas againſt Bennet. 5. A Confutation of Quakeriſm. 6. A brief Hiſtory of the joint Uſe of pre-conceived Forms of Prayer. 7. An Anſwer to Dr. Clarke's Scipture Doctrine of the Trinity. 8 A Paraphraſe, with Annotations, on the Book of Common Prayer. 7. An Hebrew Grammar; and other pieces. He died Oct. 9, 1728, in the 56th year of his age.

BENNO, biſhop of Miſnia, in Germany, in the eleventh century, was canonized by Adrian VI. on account of his being the only biſhop in Germany that was faithful to the court of Rome in the conteſts between Gregory VII. and the emperor Henry IV. and for the pretended miracles he wrought, the chief which are, that the keys of his cathedral, which he had caſt into the Elbe, after having locked up that church againſt the emperor and his ambaſſadors, were found in the belly of a fiſh, and brought again to that prelate; that he went dry ſhod over the Elbe; turned water into wine; and with a ſtamp of his foot, cauſed a fountain to ariſe out of the earth. Luther wrote a Treatiſe in High-Dutch againſt his canonization, intitled Againſt the new Idol and the old Dæmon of Miſnia.

BENOIST, in Latin Benedictus, (RENETUS) a famous doctor of the Sorbonne, and curate of St. Euſtathius, at Paris, was born at Sevennes, near Angers, and was a ſecret favourer of the Proteſtant religion. He publiſhed a French Tranſlation of the Bible, which had been made by the reformed miniſters of Geneva; but it was immediately condemned, though king Charles IX. had granted a privilege for printing it. King Henry IV. promoted him to the biſhoprick of Troyes, in Champagne; but he could never obtain the pope's bulls to be inſtalled. He wrote the Hiſtory of the Coronation of Henry III. and ſeveral other pieces. He died at Paris, March 7, 1608.

BENOIT (ELIAS) a celebrated French divine of the reformed church, was born at Paris, on the 20th of January, 1640. He ſtudied at ſeveral colleges, and at length became miniſter of a congregation in the province of Beauce, where he ſtaid about nine months, and from thence removed to Alençon, where he continued miniſter upwards of twenty years. After the revocation of the edict of Nantes, in 1685, he took refuge in Holland, and was one of the paſtors of the church of Delft till his death, which happened on the 15th of November, 1728, when he was near eighty-nine years of age, though he had all his life a weak and delicate conſtitution. He wrote many works in French which are eſteemed, the principal of which are, 1. Hiſt. de l'Edit de Nantes, five volumes, quarto. 2. Mélange des Remarques crit. hiſt. philoſ. & theol. ſur deux Diſſertations de M. Toland, &c. 3. Hiſtoire & Apologie de la Retraite des Paſteurs, à Cauſe de la Perſecution de France, &c.

BENSERADE (ISAAC DE) an ingenious French poet of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Lions. He made himſelf known at court by his verſes and his wit, and had the good fortune to pleaſe the cardinals de Richlieu and Mazarin. He wrote, 1. A Paraphraſe upon Job. 2. Verſes for Interludes. 3. Rondeaux upon Ovid. 4. Several Tragedies. Some years before his death, he applied himſelf to works of piety, and tranſlated almoſt all David's Pſalms. In Benſerade's houſe and gardens, every thing ſavoured of his poetical genius, and the barks of the trees were filled with poetical inſcriptions. He ſuffered at laſt ſo much from the ſtone, that, notwithſtanding his great age, he reſolved to ſubmit to the operation of cutting; but his conſtancy was not put to this laſt trial; for a ſurgeon letting him blood, by way of precaution, pricked an artery, and, inſtead of endeavouring to ſtop the effuſion of blood, ran away. There was but juſt time to ſend for his confeſſor, who came time enough to ſee him die. This happened on the 19th of Nov. 1691, in the eighty-ſecond year of his age.

BENSON (Dr GEORGE) a learned diſſenting miniſter, born at Great Salkeld, in Cumberland, in 1699. His love of learning was ſo ſucceſsful, that, at eleven years of age, he was able to read the Greek Teſtament. He afterwards ſtudied at Dr. Dixon's academy, at Whitehaven, from whence he removed to the univerſity of Glaſgow. In 1721, he was choſen paſtor of a congregation of diſſenters at Abingdon, in Berkſhire; in 1729, he received a call from a ſociety of diſſenters in Southwark, with whom he continued eleven eleven years; and, in 1740, was choſen, by the congrega- at Crutched-Friars, colleague to the learned and judicious Dr. Lardner. From the time of his engaging in the miniſtry he propoſed to himſelf the critical ſtudy of the Scriptures, particularly of the New Teſtament, as a principal part of his buſineſs. He wrote, 1. A Defence of the Reaſonableneſs of Prayer. 2. A Paraphraſe and Notes on the Epiſtle to Philemon, the Epiſtles to the Theſſalonians, to Timothy, and to Titus. 3. A Hiſtory of the firſt planting of Chriſtianity. 4. The Reaſonableneſs of the Chriſtian Religion. 5. The Hiſtory of the Life of Jeſus Chriſt; and other works, which procured him great reputation. One of the univerſities in Scotland ſent him a diploma with a doctor's degree, and many of high rank in the eſtabliſhed church, as Dr. Herring, Hoadley, Butler, Benſon, &c. ſhewed him great marks of favour and regard. His ſentiments were free, his reaſoning ſtrong and nervous, but his delivery in the pulpit dry, and not very pleaſing. He died in 1763, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age.

BENTHAM (Thomas) biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, was born about the year 1513, at Shirebourne, in Yorkſhire, and educated at Magdalen college, in Oxford. He was very zealous againſt the popiſh religion, during the reign of king Edward VI. and therefore, ſoon after the acceſſion of queen Mary, retired to Zurich, and afterwards to Baſil, in Swiſſerland, where he preached to the Engliſh exiles; but ſoon returned, and, during the ſame reign, had the ſuperintendance of a ſmall congregation, of about two hundred perſons, in London, who met together by ſtealth, under the noſe of the vigilant and cruel Bonner. He was remarkable for his learning, his piety, and his bold and reſolute behaviour in the proteſtant cauſe; for when ſtrict command was given, that no man ſhould either pray for, ſpeak to, or once ſay God bleſs any one condemned for his religion, Bentham, notwithſtanding this rigourous proclamation, on ſeeing the fire ſet to ſome of them, turned his eyes to the multitude, and ſaid, "We know they are the people "of God, and therefore we cannot chuſe but wiſh them "well, and ſay God ſtrengthen them;" and then he boldly cried out, "Almighty God, for Chriſt's ſake, ſtrengthen "them;" upon which the people, with one accord, cried, "Amen, amen!" the noiſe of which was ſo great, and the cryers ſo many, that the officers knew not whom they were to ſeize, or with whom they were to begin their accuſation. At length queen Elizabeth came to throne; and in the ſecond year of her reign he was nominated to the ſee of Litchfield and Coventry. This good biſhop died at Eccleſhall, in Staffordſhire, February 19, 1578, aged ſixty-five.

BENTINCK, or Benthinck, (William) earl of Portland, &c. one of the greateſt ſtateſmen of his time, and the firſt who advanced his family to the dignity of the Engliſh peerage, was deſcended from an ancient and noble family of that name, in the province of Guelderland. He was firſt page of honour to the prince of Orange, from which he was advanced to the poſt of gentleman of the bedchamber, and made colonel and captain of the Dutch regiment of guards. In 1675, the prince falling ill of the ſmallpox, Mr. Bentinck gave the moſt extraordinary proof of his love and affection for him; for the ſmall-pox not riſing kindly, his phyſician judged it neceſſary that ſome young perſon ſhould lie in the ſame bed with him, imagining that the natural heat of another would drive out the diſeaſe, and expel it from the nobler parts: no body could be found in all the court to make this experiment, when Mr. Bentinck, though he had never had that diſeaſe, generouſly reſolved to run the riſque, and accordingly attended the prince, during the whole courſe of his illneſs, both day and night, and on the prince's recovery, was immediately ſeized with the ſame diſtemper, attended with a great deal of danger, but recovered juſt ſoon enough to attend his highneſs into the field, where he was always next his perſon. He was afterwards employed in ſeveral negociations, and upon that prince's acceſſion to the crown of Great Britain, was made groom of the ſtole, privy-purſe, firſt gentleman of the bed-chamber, and was the firſt commoner upon the liſt of privy-counſellors; he was ſoon after naturalized by act of parliament, and two days before the king and queen's coronation, was created baron of Cirenceſter, viſcount Woodſtock, and earl of Portland. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions, particularly in the following inſtance, which does immortal honour to his memory. The parliament having taken into conſideration the affairs of the East-India company, who, through miſmanagement and corrupt dealings, were in danger of loſing their charter, ſtrong intereſt was made with the members of both houſes, and large ſums diſtributed to procure a new eſtabliſhment, of the company by act of parliament; a particular value was ſet on lord Portland's intereſt, and on this account he was offered no leſs than fifty thouſand pounds for his vote, and to uſe his endeavours to engage the king to favour the deſign: but his lordſhip, poſſeſſed of a greatneſs of ſoul that placed him above corruption, treated this injurious offer with all the contempt and indignation it deſerved, telling the perſon employed in it, that if he ever mentioned ſuch a thing to him again, he would for ever be the company's enemy, and give them all the oppoſition in his power. After this, his lordſhip was, in 1696, created knight of the garter, at which time he was lieutenant-general of his majeſty's forces. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf on many occaſions, both in the cabinet, in public negociations, and in the field; he had the chief management of the peace of Ryſwic, was at the battle of the Boyne, at that of Linden, where he was wounded, and at the ſiege of Limerick, Namur, &c. but at laſt obſerving, with ſome concern, the progreſs his countryman the earl of Albemarle made in the king's favour, he reſigned his employments, though the king uſed all his endeavours to divert him from that reſolution. As lord Portland was a foreigner, he was very naturally an object of the national jealouſy; he was therefore with other lords impeached in the year 1700, for adviſing and tranſacting the partition treaty; and the ſame year, lord Portland and lord Albemarle were a ſecond time attacked by the houſe of commons, on the grants they had received from the king out of the forfeited eſtates in Ireland; but theſe proceedings in the commons were diſapproved by a great part of the nation, and never produced any effect. His lordſhip ſpent the latter part of his life in retirement, at Bulſtrode, in the county of Bucks, and died on the 23d of November, 1709, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, when his corpſe being removed to London, was buried in Weſtminſter-abbey.

Bentinck (Henry) the ſecond ſon of the former, was, in the reign of queen Anne, knight of the ſhire for the county of Southampton, and, in 1710, was made captain of the firſt troop of horſe-guards; in 1716 he was created by king George I. marquis of Tichfield and duke of Portland; his patent of creation ſays, that in the reign of queen Anne he promoted the ſucceſſion in the Proteſtant line, at the utmoſt hazard of his fortune and honours, at a time when the ſucceſſion was in the moſt imminent danger; his grace was alſo one of the gentlemen of that king's bed-chamber; and, on the 9th of September, 1721. was appointed captain-general and governor of the iſland of Jamaica, where his grace died of a fever, on the 24th of July, 1726, in the forty-fifth year of his age. He was of a noble, generous, and courteous diſpoſition, and was generally eſteemed one of the moſt accompliſhed noblemen at court.

BENTIVOGLIO (Guy) a celebrated cardinal, born at Ferrara, in 1579, of an ancient family, fruitful in great men. After being nuncio in Flanders and France, he was created cardinal by Paul V. in 1621. He was learned, wiſe, affable, prudent, and virtuous, and was the faithful and diſintereſted friend of Urban VIII. He wrote, 1. An Hiſtory of the Civil Wars of Flanders. 2. A Deſcription of Flanders. 3. Letters, Memoirs, &c. all which were much eſteemed. He died on the 7th of September, 1644, aged ſixty-five.

Bentivoglio, a town of Italy, in the Boloneſe, ten miles north-eaſt of Bologna, and ſixteen ſouth-weſt of Ferrara. Long. 11 34. E. Lat 44 47. N.

BENTLEY (Dr Richard) an eminent critic, was born in Yorkſhire, in the year 1662. His early proficiency in the learned languages, and his great capacity as a critic, ſoon began to diſplay themſelves; for before the age of twenty-four, he had wrote, with his own hand, a thick volume in quarto, in the firſt column of which was every word of the Hebrew Bible, alphabetically diſpoſed, and in five other columns all the various interpretations of thoſe words in the Chaldee, Syriac, vulgate Latin, Septuagint, and Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodoſian verſions, that occur in the whole Bible; and another volume in quarto, of the various collections and emendations of the Hebrew text, drawn out of thoſe various readings. From theſe extraordinary beginnings, it is no wonder that he afterwards became a very great critic. He was the firſt perſon who preached at Boyle's lectures, and in theſe diſcourſes ſhewed the folly of atheiſm, and that matter and motion cannot think. In 1692 he was collated to a prebend of Worceſter, and the next year was made keeper of the royal library at St. James's, ſoon after which aroſe the famous diſpute between him and the honourable Mr Boyle, in relation to the genuineneſs of the Epiſtles of Phalaris. In 1701 he was preſented to the maſterſhip of Trinity college, Cambridge, which is reckoned worth near one thouſand pounds per annum. Upon this promotion he reſigned his prebend of Worceſter, and, in 1707, was collated to the archdeaconry of Ely; beſides this, he was preſented to a good benefice in that ſee.

Being thus placed in a ſtate of eaſe and affluence, he took his degree of doctor of divinity, entered into matrimony, and indulged his inclination in critical purſuits, and occaſionally publiſhing the fruits of his labours, they were ſeverally found to abound with ſuch erudition and ingenious ſagacity, that, by degrees, he obtained the character of being the greateſt critic of the age. In the mean while he carried matters with ſo high a hand in the government of his college, that, in 1709, a complaint was brought before the biſhop of Ely, as viſitor, againſt him, by ſeveral of the fellows, who charged him with embezzling the college money, and other miſdemeanors. In anſwer to this, he preſented his defence to the biſhop, which he publiſhed in 1710, under the title of The preſent State of Trinity College, octavo; and thus began a quarrel, which was carried on with the moſt virulent animoſity on each ſide, for above twenty years, when it at laſt ended in the doctor's favour. During the courſe of this diſpute, he had been promoted to the regius profeſſorſhip of divinity; and his majeſty king George I. on a viſit to the univerſity in 1717, having, as uſual, nominated by mandate ſeveral perſons for a doctor's degree in that faculty, our profeſſor, to whoſe office it belonged to perform the ceremony called creation, demanded four guineas from each perſon, beſides a broad piece of gold, and abſolutely refuſed to create any doctor without theſe fees: hence there aroſe a long and warm diſpute, during which the doctor was firſt ſuſpended, and then degraded; but on a petition to his majeſty for relief from that ſentence, the affair was referred to the court of king's-bench, where the proceedings againſt him being reverſed, a mandamus was iſſued, charging the univerſity to reſtore him.

Dr. Bentley was endued with a natural hardineſs of temper, which enabled him ro ride out both theſe ſtorms without any extraordinary diſturbance, or interruption to his literary purſuits. In his private character, though he is generally allowed to have been too fond of money, he was hearty, ſincere, and warm in his friendſhip, an affectionate huſband, and a moſt indulgent father. He loved hoſpitality and reſpect, maintained the dignity and munificence of the ancient abbots in houſe-keeping at his lodge, which he beautified, and, in converſation, tempered the ſeverity of the critic with ſuch a peculiar ſtrain of vivacity and pleaſantry, as was very entertaining. He died at his lodge, in Trinity college, on the 14th of July, 1742, at eighty years of age.

The doctor's principal works, beſides thoſe already mentioned, were, 1. His Animadverſions and Remarks on the poet Callimachus. 2. Remarks upon Collins's Diſcourſe of Free Thinking. 3. Beautiful and correct editions of Horace, Terence, Phædrus, and Milton, with notes; but as the doctor had not a poetic genius, many of his notes on our Britiſh poet, in which he has endeavoured to make emendations of the original, have been greatly and juſtly cenſured.

BENZELIUS (Erick) archbiſhop of Upſal, was born of an obſcure family in Sweden, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his merit and learning. He travelled into Germany, France, Holland, and England, and wrote ſeveral works, among which is a Tranſlation of the Bible into the Swediſh Language. He died in 1709, aged ſixty-ſeven.

BEOLCUS, or Le Ruzantes, (Angelo) an Italian poet, who excelled in the comic and burleſque. He died in 1542, aged forty-three.

BERAR, a province of the mogul's empire, near the kingdom of Bengal. It is very fruitful in corn, rice, pulſe, and poppies, from whence opium is obtained. Shapour is the capital.

BERAULD (Nicholas) in Latin Beraldus, a perſon of learning in the ſixteenth century, and tutor to admiral Coligni. He lived at Orleans, and publiſhed ſeveral books, particularly an edition of Pliny, with amendments, a Greek and Latin Dictionary, &c.

BARALDUS (Francis) ſon of the former, was a man of conſiderable learning; he taught Greek in ſeveral places, and in 1571 was at the head of the college of Montargis; he was alſo a good Greek and Latin poet, and tranſlated ſome books of Appian.

BERAULT (Claudius) regius profeſſor of Syriac, at Paris, was the author of the Commentary on Statius in uſum Delphini, and died in March 1705.

Berault (Michael) a miniſter, and afterwards profeſſor of divinity at Montauban, flouriſhed about the end of the ſixteenth, and beginning of the ſeventeenth century. He wrote ſome books, and particularly, A Defence of the Vocation of Miniſters.

BERAUN, a town in the kingdom of Bohemia, and capital of a circle of the ſame name, is ſeated on the river Miza, thirteen miles weſt of Prague. Long. 14. 25. E. Lat. 50. 2. N.

BERCHETT (Peter) an eminent hiſtory painter, was born in France in 1659, and began to draw at the age of fifteen, under La Foſſe, when he improved ſo faſt, that in three Years he was employed in the royal palaces. He came to England in 1681 to work under Rambour, a French painter of architecture, but after ſtaying here a year, returned to Marli. He came again, and was ſent by king William to the palace he was building at Loo, where he was employed fifteen months, and then came a third time to England, where he had ſufficient buſineſs. We are informed by Mr. Walpole, that he then painted the cieling of the chapel of Trinity college, Oxford, the ſtair-caſe at the duke of Schomberg's, in Pall-Mall, and the ſummer-houſe at Ranelagh. His drawings in the academy were much approved. Towards the cloſe of his life he retired to Marybone, where he painted only ſmall pieces of fabulous hiſtory, and died there in January 1720.

BERCHOIRE, or Bercheur, (Peter) in Latin Berchorius, or Berthorius, a Benedictine monk, and prior of St. Eloy, at Paris, was eſteemed one of the moſt learned men of his time. He wrote a work, intitled, Repertorium Morale, or a Moral Dictionary of the Bible, and, by order of king John, tranſlated Livy into French.

BERCHTOLSGADEN, a town of Germany, in a prefecture of the ſame name, in the arbhbiſhoprick of Saltſburg. It ſupplies all the neighbourhood with ſalt, and acknowledges no eccleſiaſtical ſuperior but the pope himſelf. It is ſeated on the river Aha, ten miles ſouth-weſt of Saltſburg. Long. 13. 10 E. Lat. 47. 30. N.

BERDOA, a town in Perſia, in the province of Ganſa: The air is very healthy, and there is plenty of cattle, eſpecially good mules. It is ſeated in a fertile ſoil, ten miles weſt of the river Kur, and ſixty-three ſouth of Ganja. Long. 48. 0. E. Lat. 41. 0. N.

BEREBERES, a people of Africa, who live in tents like the Arabians, in ſeveral parts of Barbary, but more particularly to the ſouth of Tunis and Tripoly. Their principal riches conſiſt in cattle, eſpecially in goats. They are ſuppoſed to come originally from Arabia. Some of theſe dwell in houſes.

BERENGER, treaſurer and rector of St. Martin de Tours, and at length archdeacon of Angers, in the eleventh century, was diſtinguiſhed by his learning and piety. He oppoſed the opinion of tranſubſtantiation, and drew to his party Bruno, biſhop of Angers, and ſeveral other men. He died in 1088.

Berenger (Peter) of Poitiers, the diſciple of Abelard, for whom he wrote an Apology, on his being condemned by a council in 1140.

BERENICE, daughter of Diagoras the Rhodian, who made himſelf much talked of at the public games of Greece. She was the daughter, ſiſter, and mother of perſons who had won the prize at the Olympic games, on which account ſhe obtained leave to be preſent at thoſe games, which had been forbidden the women by a public decree.

Berenice, in fabulous hiſtory, the daughter of Philadelphus and Arſinoe, and the wife of Euergetes, vowed to cut off her hair, if her huſband returned victorious, which ſhe did, and ſent it to the temple of Venus, on which the hair was changed into a conſtellation of ſeven ſtars.

Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy Auletes, king of Egypt, ſucceeded her father, on his being expelled by his rebellious ſubjects, and to ſupport herſelf on the throne, married a prince named Seleucus, deſcended from the kings of Syria, but growing ſoon weary of him, ſhe put him to death, and offered herſelf to Archelaus, whoſe father had left Mithridates's party to join with Sylla. He married her, and put himſelf at the head of her troops to repulſe the Romans, who attempted to reſtore king Ptolemy, but was killed in battle, when Ptolemy, returning to Alexandria, put his rebellious daughter to death.

Berenice, daughter of Coſtobarus and Salome, and ſiſter to Herod the Great. She was firſt married to Ariſtobulus, the ſon of the ſame Herod and Mariamne, who upbraiding her with his having married beneath him, ſhe complained with tears of this treatment to her mother; and Salome having a great influence over Herod, made him ſuſpect Ariſtobulus, and was a principal cauſe of his death. She afterwards married another of Herod's ſons, after whoſe death ſhe went to Rome, where ſhe was beloved by Antonia, the wife of Druſus, but died ſoon after. Her ſon Agrippa took a voyage to Rome in the year 36, and received many favours from Antonia.

Berenice, grand-daughter of the former, and the eldeſt ſiſter of Agrippa the Younger, king of the Jews. The emperor Claudius deſigned to have married her to Marcus, the ſon of Alexander Lyſimachus Alabarchus, but that prince dying before the celebration of their nuptials, ſhe married her uncle Herod, whom the emperor Claudius made king of Chalcis on account of this marriage. After the death of Herod, it was rumoured that ſhe had an inceſtuous commerce with her brother Agrippa. To put a ſtop to this report, ſhe offered herſelf to Polemon, king of Cilicia, on condition that he would embrace the Jewiſh religion. Polemon accepted Berenice's offer, cauſed himſelf to be circumciſed, and married her; but ſhe ſoon after quitted him, to return to an infamous manner of life, on which Polemon abandoned Judaiſm, and returned to his former religion. She was with her brother Agrippa, A. D. 55, when St. Paul pleaded his cauſe in their preſence, and in that of the pro-conſul Portius Feſtus. She afterwards went to Rome, and became miſtreſs to Titus Veſpaſian.

There have been ſeveral other perſons of the ſame name.

BERE-REGIS, a ſmall town in Dorſetſhire, on a rivulet of its own name, near its influx into the Piddle, between Wareham and Middleton, with a market on Wedneſdays, It is ſituated one hundred and fifteen miles from London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 50. 40. N.

BERETTONI (PETER) commonly called Peter of Cortona, from the place of his birth, was a celebrated painter in the ſeventeenth century. His pictures expreſs the fruitfulneſs of his genius, the grandeur of his ideas, and the vivacity of his imagination. He particularly ſucceeded in painting in freſco, and in grand ſubjects. He died in 1669, aged ſixty.

BERG, a duchy of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, bounded on the north by the duchy of Cleeves, on the weſt by the county of Mark, and the duchy of Weſtphalia, on the ſouth by Weſteravia, and on the weſt by the dioceſe of Cologn, from which it is ſeparated by the Rhine. It is about one hundred and fifty miles in length, and twenty-four in breadth. It is very fruitful along the Rhine, but mountainous and woody towards the county of Mark. The rivers, beſides the Rhine, are the Wipper, Agger, and Sieg. It is ſubject to the elector Palatine, but his right is diſputed by Pruſſia and Saxony. Duſſeldorp is the capital city.

BERGAMASCO, a province of Italy, in the ſtate of Venice, bounded on the eaſt by the Breſſan, on the north by the Valteline, on the weſt and ſouth by the Milaneſe. It may be about thirty-ſix leagues from north to ſouth, and thirty from eaſt to weſt. It is watered by ſeveral rivers, which render it very fertile; particularly, it produces a great number of cheſnuts and cattle. It has mines of iron, and quarries of marble, and other ſtones, of which they make mill-ſtones. There are a great number of villages, but no city, except Bergamo, the capital. The people are very induſtrious, and make the beſt of their natural productions. They are well ſtocked with cattle, and make fine tapeſtry, but their language is the moſt corrupt of any in Italy.

BERGAMO, an ancient city, the capital of Bergamaſco, has a pleaſant ſituation, there being a fertile plain on the eaſt, and mountainous on the north. It is a ſtrong city, as well by ſituation as by art, having a wall and a caſtle, built by the Venetians, beſides other fortifications. It is not large, but has two principal ſuburbs, provided with all neceſſaries, in one of which there is a fair on St. Bartholemew's day, frequented by a great number of merchants from Italy, Germany, and Swiſſerland. The air is very wholeſome, and nothing can be more delicious than the fruit that grows in its territory. The inhabitants are active and ingenious, being capable of learning any thing. But their ſtrongeſt inclination is to trade, whence it is called Bergamo the Subtile. Its ſituation near the Alps makes the inhabitants ſubject to ſwelled throats, which are a very diſagreeable ſight to ſtrangers. It is twenty-five miles north-eaſt from Milan, twenty-ſix north-weſt of Breſcia, and twenty-eight north-weſt of Cremona. Long. 9. 38. E. Lat. 45. 42. N.

BERGAMO (JAMES PHILIP DE) an Auguſtin monk, was born at Bergamo in 1434. He wrote a Chronicle in Latin, from the creation of the world to the year 1503, and a Treatiſe of illuſtrious Women. He died in 1518.

BERGAS, a town of Romania, in Turky in Europe, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſituated on the river Lariſſa, between Adrianople and Chiourli, and is thirty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Adrianople. Long. 27. 30. E. Lat. 41. 17. N.

BERGEN, a city of Norway, and capital of the province of Bergenhus, with a ſtrong caſtle, a good port, and a biſhop's ſee. It is a large place, but is all built with wood, which renders it ſubject to fires. It is ſurrounded with mountains, which are almoſt inacceſſible, and drives a great trade in ſtoek-fiſh, furs, and deal boards. There is little or no corn grows in all the country, for that which they uſe is imported, and diſtributed from thence throughout Norway. It is ſubject to the king of Denmark, and is three hundred miles north-by-weſt from Copenhagen. Long. 5. 45. E. Lat. 60. 11. N.

BERGEN, a town of Germany, in Pomerania, capital of the iſle of Rugen, ſubject to the Swedes, thirteen miles north-eaſt of Stralſund. Long 13. 0. E. Lat. 54. 30. N.

BERGENHUS, the moſt weſtern province of Norway, between the government of Aggerhus and the ſea. Bergen is the capital town.

BERGERAC, a ſmall trading town of France, in Perigord. It had fortifications, but they were demoliſhed by Lewis XIII. after his having taken it from the Hugonots. There were forty thouſand of theſe people in and about it when Lewis XIV. revoked the edict of Nants. It is ſeated on the river Dordogne, twenty miles ſouth-weſt from Perigueux, and fifty eaſt of Bourdeaux. Long. 0. 37. E. Lat. 45. 0. N.

BERGIER (NICHOLAS) a perſon of eminent learning, was born at Rheims in 1557, and educated at the univerſity which the cardinal de Lorrain had juſt eſtabliſhed. He wrote, The Hiſtory of the High Roads of the Empire; An Account of the Coronation of Lewis XIII. and a few other pieces. He died Sept. 15, 1623.

BERG-OP-ZOOM, or BERGEN-OP-ZOOM, a town of the Low Countries, in Dutch Brabant, and in the marquiſate of the ſame name. It is ſeated on an eminence, in the middle of a moraſs, about a mile and a half from the eaſtern branch of the Scheld, with which it has a communication by a navigable canal. The houſes are well built, and the market-places and ſquares handſome and ſpacious. The church, before the laſt ſiege, was reckoned a good building, and ſo was the marquis's palace. It has a good tract of land under its juriſdiction, with ſeveral villages, and ſome iſlands in the Scheld. It has a very advantageous ſituation on the confines of Brabant, Holland, Zealand, and Flanders. It is ſtrong by nature as well as by art, being ſo ſecured by the moraſſes about it, which are formed by the river Zoom, that it was reckoned impregnable. It was, however, taken in 1747 by the French, but tis thought not without the help of treachery. The fortifications are allowed to be the maſter-piece of that great engineer Cohorn. It had been twice beſieged before, without ſucceſs. The marquis of Spinola was the laſt but one who inveſted it, and he was forced to raiſe the ſiege with the loſs of ten thou and men. It is ſeventeen miles north of Antwerp, and twenty-two ſouth-weſt of Breda. Long. 4. 15. E. Lat. 51. 30. N.

BERG ST. WINOX, a town of the Low Countries, in the country of Flanders, fortified by Vauban, and ſubject to France. It is ſeated on the river Colme, ſix miles from Dunkirk, and twenty-one from Ypres. The air is often very unwholſome, eſpecially to ſtrangers. Beſides the abbey of St. Winox, it has a convent of Dominicans, a Jeſuits college, a convent of Capuchins, and four nunneries. It has alſo an hoſpital for ſoldiers, taken care of by friars called Bons Fieux, and two ſeminaries for young ſtudents. The river Colme ſerves inſtead of a canal to go to Hondſhote, St. Omer's, and Gravelines. There is likewiſe another canal to go to Dunkirk. The villages in its territory are very famous for butter and cheeſe, of which they ſend a great quantity to Flanders. Fort Lapin and Fort Suiſſe are within a cannon's ſhot of this place, and Fort. St. Francis is ſeated on the canal, near three miles from the town. Long. 2. 35. E. Lat. 50. 57. N.

BERG-ZABERN, a town of France, in Alſace, nine miles ſouth-weſt of Landau, five miles north of Weiſſemberg, and eight weſt of the Rhine. Long. 7. 55. E. Lat. 49. 4. N.

BERIGARDUS (CLAUDIUS) one of the moſt ſubtile philoſophers of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Moulins. He acquired ſuch reputation in the univerſity of Paris, that the grand duke of Florence ſent for him to that of Piſa, where he taught philoſophy for twelve years, after which he was profeſſor of philoſophy at Padua. He printed at Udine a work, intitled, Circulus Piſanus.

BERKELEY (GEORGE) the celebrated biſhop of Cloyne, in Ireland, was the ſon of a clergyman in Ireland, and educated at Trinity college, Dublin. His firſt eſſays, as a writer, were publiſhed in the Spectator and Guardian, and his learning, wit, and agreeable converſation, procured him the eſteem and friendſhip of many great and learned men, particularly Mr. Pope and Dr. Swift. The earl of Peterborough made him his chaplain, and took him as a companion on a tour through Europe. After his return he was promoted to the deanry of Clogher, when he formed the deſign of erecting a college in the Bermudas or Summer Iſlands, for the better ſupplying the churches in our foreign plantations, and converting the ſavage Americans to Chriſtianity. For this purpoſe he obtained a patent, and embarked, with many of his relations, to lay the foundation of the new projected ſeminary; but after two years ſtay in America the deſign was dropped. He was afterwards warmly engaged, in concert with Bolingbroke, Swift, and others, in a ſcheme for eſtabliſhing a ſociety for the improvement of the Engliſh language, in imitation of the French academy; but this deſign alſo proved abortive. In 1734 he was advanced to the biſhoprick of Cloyne, where he endeared himſelf to his people, by promoting their ſpiritual ritual and temporal intereſts; the latter by endeavouring to raiſe a ſpirit of induſtry, and to propagate the arts of cultivation and agriculture, in that part of the country. The earl of Cheſterfield, when lord lieutenant of Ireland, offered him a richer ſee, but he nobly declined it, ſaying his neighbours and he loved one another, and he could not think of forming new connections in his old age, and tearing himſelf from thoſe friends, whoſe kindneſs to him was his greateſt happineſs. At length, finding himſelf unable to diſcharge the functions of his office, he reſigned his biſhoprick, and retired to Oxford, there to ſpend the remainder of his days in converſation with learned men, and to ſuperintend the education of his ſon. But ſoon after his arrival in that city, he died ſuddenly, without a groan, on the 14th of January, 1753, in the ſeventy-third year of his age, and was interred at Chriſt church, Oxford, where a handſome monument is erected to his memory. He wrote, 1. The Analyſt. 2. Alciphron, or the Minute Philoſopher. 3. On the Principles of Knowledge. 4. A New Theory of Viſion. 5. A volume of Tracts, among which are, Queries relating to the Trade and Proſperity of Ireland. 6. Siris, or a Treatiſe on Tar Water.

BERKSHIRE, an inland county in the dioceſe of Saliſbury, divided on the north and north-eaſt by the Thames from Oxfordſhire and Buckinghamſhire, on the weſt it is bounded by Glouceſterſhire and Wiltſhire, on the ſouth-eaſt by Surry, and on the ſouth by Hampſhire. It is one hundred and twenty miles in circumference, and contains about five hundred and twenty-ſeven thouſand acres, and ſixteen thouſand nine hundred and ſix houſes. The air is ſweet, and ſoil fruitful. It has plenty of corn, cattle, wild-fowl, wool, and timber, eſpecially oak and beech. The rivers are the Thames, Kennet, Ocke, Loddon, and Lambourn. The Kennet is now made navigable by act of parliament. This county ſends nine members to parliament, has one hundred and forty pariſhes, and twelve market towns. Reading, the chief, is thirty-nine miles weſt of London, and is remarkable for malt, meal, Holland tapes, and canvas or ſail-cloth. The reſt are Abingdon, Windſor, Wallingford, Maidenhead, Hungerford, Newbury, Farringdon, Wantage, Lower Lambourn, Eaſt Iſley, and Oakingham. The royal palace and caſtle at Windſor, built by Edward III. are remarkable for their fine ſituation, rich furniture, paintings, and many other curioſities. In St. George's chapel are held the chapters of the order of the garter, inſtituted by the above king Edward III. A few miles to the ſouth-eaſt of this town is the figure of a white horſe, covering an acre of ground, cut in a hill of chalk, from whence it may be ſeen at a great diſtance, and is ſaid to have been made by direction of king Alfred, in memory of a great victory he obtained. The neighbouring people have from time immemorial a kind of feſtival, called ſcouring the horſe, when they cleanſe it of weeds, whereby the chalky bottom ſtill preſerves a fine effect at a conſiderable diſtance.

Near Reading is a natural curioſity, thought to have remained ever ſince the flood. It is a bed of oyſter-ſhells and ſand, thirty or forty feet under the ſurface of a hill, and covered with different ſtrata. Theſe ſhells retain the true figure and colour, but moulder with a ſmall preſſure. In this county are alſo remains of Roman antiquities and fortifications, with ſome of the famous cauſeway, called Icknild-ſtreet.

BERLIN, a city of Germany, capital of the electorate of Brandenburg, and where the king of Pruſſia generally reſides. This city is one of the largeſt, beſt built, and beſt governed, of any in Germany. The ſtreets are large, ſtrait, clean, and well paved, and ſome of them very long and elegant. There are alſo ſeveral large and beautiful ſquares, with pleaſant walks. It is ſurrounded with handſome gardens, which produce pulſe and excellent fruit. The river Spree, that croſſes the city, has a communication with the Havel, Oder, and Elbe, which greatly facilitate commerce. The French refugees have greatly contributed to the embelliſhment of the grandeur of Berlin; inaſmuch as they have introduced all kinds of manufactures, and various arts.

Berlin is divided into five quarters, without reckoning the ſuburbs, which are very large. The houſes in theſe laſt are almoſt all of wood, but ſo well plaiſtered, that they ſeem to be of ſtone. In the ſuburb called Spandau is a houſe belonging to the royal family, with well contrived apartments, and furniſhed in a very fine taſte. In the ſuburb of Stralau is a houſe and garden belonging to the king. The royal gate of the city is defended by a half moon, and two baſtions, covered with brick; it fronts the royal ſtreet, which is one of the longeſt and moſt frequented in the city. It contains very handſome houſes, particularly thoſe belonging to ſome of the miniſters of ſtate.

The royal ſtreet is croſſed by five others, which are large and fine. On the new bridge, which is of ſtone, over the Spree, is an equeſtrian ſtatue of William the Great, which is eſteemed an exquiſite piece of workmanſhip. The elector is repreſented in a Roman habit, and his horſe ſtands on a pedeſtal of white marble, adorned with baſſo relievos, and four ſlaves bound to the baſe.

After this bridge is paſt, the king's palace appears, which is a grand and ſuperb edifice; it is four ſtories high, and the apartments extremely magnificent. No place in the world has ſuch a great quantity of ſilver tables, ſtands, luſtres, branched candleſticks, ſcreens, looking-glaſs frames, canopy beds, chairs, &c. In the knight's hall there is a buffet, which takes up all one ſide, where there are baſons and ciſterns of gilt ſilver, of an extraordinary magnitude. The furniture of the great apartment is extremely rich, and there is a very handſome gallery, adorned with paintings, repreſenting the principal actions of Frederick I. Formerly there were fine gardens to the palace, but they are now turned into a place for arms. The king's ſtables are large, ſtand near the palace, and front the great ſtreet. Externally they make a Gothic appearance, but within they are very magnificent. The mangers are of ſtone, and the pillars that divide the ſtalls are of iron, adorned with the king's cypher, gilt. Over the racks are pictures, repreſenting the fineſt horſes which the king's ſtud has produced. Over the ſtables there are large rooms, containing all ſorts of horſe furniture, particularly the horſe equipage of Frederick I. all the metallic part of which is gold, ſet with diamonds. Beſides theſe, there are handſome lodgings for the officers of the ſtables. Over the riding-houſe is a theatre, where plays have been acted, and balls have been made for the entertainment of the court.

The arſenal conſiſts of four grand buildings, that form a court in the middle, like a college; each front has three large portico's. On the principal gate is a medallion of the late king, in bronze, and the four cardinal virtues, of a coloſſal ſtature, placed on pedeſtals on each ſide of the portico, ſeem to look at the portrait of the king, which is ſupported by Fame and Victory. The Corinthian order is prevalent in the firſt ſtage, and is managed with a great deal of art. The whole edifice is ſurrounded in the upper part with a balluſtrade, adorned with trophies and ſtatues, among which is Mars, ſeated on a heap of ſeveral ſorts of arms. This altogether forms a noble and majeſtic decoration. It is bounded with iron in the ſhape of cannon, which are placed at proper diſtances, which ſupport iron chains, that hang like feſtoons, and prevent paſſengers from approaching the windows below. The lower rooms are filled with a great number of braſs cannon; the walls and pillars which ſuſtain the floor are ſet off with cuiraſſes and helmets. The upper ſtory contains ſeveral rooms, filled with arms, which are diſpoſed in a curious order. Behind the arſenal is the houſe of the general of the artillery, which includes the foundery, where they are continually at work. Beſides this, there are other places where they keep the train of artillery.

The opera-houſe is an elegant modern edifice. The front has a noble portico, ſupported by Corinthian columns, and a pediment, adorned with baſſo relievos and ſtatues. The columns that ſupport the roof throw the whole into a grand ſaloon. It has three galleries, and is ſaid to contain two thouſand perſons.

A rampart and foſſe ſeparate Worder from Dorothea-Stadt, or the New Town, inhabited chiefly by French. There are ſeven great alleys or walks, which divide this quarter into two parts. The middle walk is broader than the reſt, and is ſurrounded with balluſtrades, having a graſs-plat in the middle: this is for perſons that take the air on foot. The alleys on each ſide are paved, and ſerve for thoſe that come abroad in coaches. Theſe alleys, which are about three miles in length, are terminated with a bar, that leads towards the Park. The alleys with trees are bounded with rows of houſes. In one of theſe is a building, formerly called the Leſſer Stables, and is now made into lodgings for the guards. The apartments above theſe are occupied by the academy of Painting, and the academy of Arts and Sciences. Behind theſe is the obſervatory, where there is a great number of aſtronomical and mathematical inſtruments.

There are other things worthy of obſervation, ſuch as the cabinet of medals, and of the antiquities belonging to the king; that of natural curioſities; the chemical laboratory, and its furnaces and medals, of a new invention; the theatre for anatomical demonſtrations; the royal library, which is one of the completeſt in Germany, and has many ſcarce books and manuſcripts. The river Spree falls into the Elbe, and communicates with the Oder by a canal, near Francfort on the Oder, from which Berlin is forty-five miles north-weſt, forty-five north-eaſt from Wittemberg, ſeventy-five ſouth by-weſt from Stetin, and three hundred north-by-weſt from Vienna. Long. 13 37. E. Lat. 52. 53. N.

BERMUDAS,

BERMUDAS, or the SOMMER ISLANDS, were firſt diſcovered by John Bermudas, in 1503 Sir John Sommers was ſhipwrecked upon them in 1609; hence ſome called them the Sommer Iſlands. Theſe iſlands are numerous; but ſome are nothing but ſmall barren rocks. They lie in a little compaſs, almoſt in the form of a ſhepherd's crook, and contain about twenty thouſand acres of ground, ſurrounded in a manner with rocks, which render them inacceſſible to ſtrangers. That called St. George's Iſland is the largeſt. It was firſt planted by Richard Moore, with about ſixty perſons, in 1612. Theſe built themſelves huts, which were converted by degrees into handſome houſes, that at length became a town, called St. George. The commodities they traded in were ſpermaceti, ambergriſe, and tobacco. While the new colony was increaſing, they were infeſted with rats, which deſtroyed almoſt all their proviſions, and had like to have brought on a famine; but they found means to deſtroy them, and ſaved themſelves; inſomuch that there are now ten thouſand inhabitants, beſides ſlaves, who carry on a good trade in tobacco, the ground producing large crops; but it is not ſo good as that of our plantations on the continent of America.

The country is moſtly mountainous, but has ſome fertile plains; the ſoil is of various colours, of which the brown is the richeſt, the whitiſh next, and the reddiſh worſt. About two or three feet below the mould, is a hard whitiſh ſubſtance, like chalk, and under that a ſort of clay. The former is not ſo hard as to hinder the roots of trees from making way through it. The inhabitants catch the rain water, and preſerve it in ciſterns, becauſe the water of the iſland is brackiſh. Their chief produce is Indian wheat and tobacco; but they have ſome fruit, particularly oranges. The wood of the cedar-trees is fine, hard, durable, and fragrant. With this they build their houſes, ſhips, and churches. The palmeto bears a delicious fruit, like a damſon, and yields wood both for building and fewel; the leaves are eight or ten feet long, and ſerve to cover houſes. What they call a palm or date-tree yields a fine fruit, and there is variety of odoriferous and medicinal woods in their foreſts.

They have great plenty of ſea-turtle, which ſerves for common food, and is excellent eating. Their birds are hawks of all ſorts, ſtorks, herons, bitterns, oſpreys, cormorants, baldcoots, moorhens, teal, ſnipes, ducks, widgeons, ſparrows, wood-peckers, owls, and bats. But it is obſervable, that though theſe birds have common Engliſh names, yet they differ from ours.

They have various ſorts of fiſh in plenty, for which there is no Engliſh name. The air is ſerene, and generally healthful, unleſs in tempeſtuous ſeaſons. They have no poiſonous animals, unleſs their ſpiders are ſuch; theſe are exceeding large, and finely variegated with different colours. They make their webs from tree to tree, and theſe are very ſtrong, but not ſufficient to catch birds, as ſome have raſhly aſſerted. They have wild black hogs, ſuppoſed to be the breed of thoſe left here by the Spaniards; but cattle are very ſcarce.

The inhabited parts of theſe iſlands are divided into nine diſtricts, called tribes. 1. St. George, 2. Hamilton, 3. Ireland, 4. Devonſhire, 5 Pembroke, 6. Pagets, 7. Warwick, 8. Southampton, and 9. Sandys. There are but two places where a ſhip can come ſafely near the ſhore, and theſe are ſo well covered with high rocks, that few will care to venture in without a pilot; and they are ſo well defended by forts, that they have no occaſion to dread any enemy. St. George's town is at the bottom of the principal haven, and is defended by nine forts, on which are mounted ſeventy pieces of cannon, which command the entrance. This town has a handſome church, a fine library, and a noble town-houſe, where the governor, council, and others aſſemble. Beſides theſe, there are about a thouſand houſes, well built. The tribes of Southampton and Devonſhire have each a pariſh church and a library, and the former has a harbour of the ſame name. There are ſcattered houſes and hamlets all over theſe iſlands, where particular plantations require them, among which there are ſmall chapels for divine ſervice. The inhabitants are cloathed chiefly with the Engliſh manufactures, and all their implements for tilling the ground and building are made here. But what little traffic they have is with the continent of North America, to which they ſend ſloops and trading veſſels, for ſale. Upon the whole, they have little or no proſpect of ever growing rich, and therefore it is no wonder that ſome of the younger ſort tranſport themſelves elſewhere This practice, if continued, will ſoon decreaſe the number of the inhabitants, and in proceſs of time greatly impoveriſh the iſlands, unleſs ſome expedient be found out to employ their hands in ſome uſeful and profitable manufacture, or natural production, which will yield them ſufficient encouragement.

They have ſeldom any ſnow here, nor yet much rain, but when it does fall, it is generally with great violence; and the north and north-eaſt wind renders the air very cold. The ſtorms generally come with the new moon, and if there is a halo or circle about it, it is a ſure ſign of a tempeſt, which is generally attended with dreadful thunder and lightning. It is placed in the maps ſix hundred miles eaſt of Carolina, in the latitude of 32. 30. Long. 65. 10. W. Lat. 32. 30. N.

BERN, a canton in Swiſſerland, holds the ſecond rank among the thirteen; but as it contains one third of the whole country, it ought to be the firſt; it almoſt runs along its whole length from Geneva, till it comes near the Rhine. It is about one hundred and eighty miles in length, and ninety in breadth. It is divided into two parts, the German country, in which they ſpeak that language, and the Romand, better known by the name of the country of Vaud, in which they talk French, but very corruptly, from Morat to Geneva. The firſt is divided into thirty-five bailliages, or governments, beſides four juriſdictions. The Romand is divided into thirteen; ſo that there are thirty-eight in all, reckoning the bailliages of Morat, Orbe, Swartzeburg, and Granſon. The German country contains three hundred pariſhes, and Romand one hundred and fifty. They can raiſe ſixty thouſand men between them, and yet have enough for tilling of the ground, and other neceſſary affairs.

This country is very populous, which is owing to the mildneſs of the government, for they are not ſo haraſſed with taxes as in the other cantons. It is bounded on the ſouth by the country of Gex, the lake of Geneva, and Vallais. On the eaſt by the cantons of Uri, Underland, and Lucern; by the little country called the Free Provinces, and by the territories of Melingen and Baden. The foreſt towns are on the north, and on the weſt part of the canton of Baſil, that of Soleure, the ſmall republic of Bienne, the county of Neufchatel, and the French county. This canton is more fertile than the reſt, in corn, paſture-land and wine. All the inhabitants, among which there are many noble families, are of the reformed religion, and are obliged to have a certain number of arms, with a proportionable quantity of ammunition. The principal cities are Bern the capital; Lauſan, Thun, Avenches, or Viflifburg, Aarberg, and Aaraw.

BERN, the capital city of the canton of Bern; it is ſeated on an eminence which is a peninſula, formed by the river Aar, almoſt in the middle of the canton. It is about a mile in length, and its breadth is determined by the peninſula on which it ſtands. At the entrance there is but one ſtreet, but it ſoon grows wider, and then there are two, and then three. The ſtreets are wide, particularly that in the middle. This is cut in two by a brook which runs from one end of the city to the other, and is of great uſe to keep it clean. All the houſes are built with free-ſtone, except a few in the ſkirts of the city. They have all piazzas in front, paved with free-ſtone, by means of which you may walk dry from one end of the city to the other in the worſt of weather, and on the inſide, they are generally provided with ſhops. The city ſtands pretty high above the river, which runs on three ſides of it, with a rapid ſtream, in a deep bed. On the weſt ſide, there are two foſſes, or ditches, with ramparts, but they are ſuffered to go to decay, though they are uſed by the inhabitants for public walks. The gate on this ſide of the city is called by the Germans the gate of St. Chriſtopher, and by the French the gate of Goliah, from a wooden Coloſſus, which ſtands in a nich, and is armed with a ſword and pike, which ſome take to be St. Chriſtopher, and others Goliah; but the latter are in the right, becauſe, near the gate, there is the ſtatue of David, with a ſling in his hand.

The moſt remarkable things are the great church with a high ſteeple, from the top of which may be ſeen not only the whole city, but all the neighbouring country. It contains the greateſt bell in all Swiſſerland. It weighs twenty thouſand three hundred pounds. At the bottom of the ſteeple is a large gate with a great porch, in which the laſt judgment is repreſented in relievo. Near the church is a handſome terraſs, which is ſecured on three ſides with ſtone walls, ſeveral hundred feet high, which renders it one of the moſt agreeable places in Bern, eſpecially as there are rows of trees which keep off the heat of the ſun; and there is a charming proſpect from thence. On two ſides there are wooden ſteps, to go down into a kind of a ſuburb on the bank of the river. At ſome paces from the church there is a college, where ſtudents are brought up for the miniſtry. There are ſix profeſſors who teach the languages, and the neceſſary ſciences. This college has a library filled with good books, and many ancient manuſcripts, ſome of which are finely illuminated. There are alſo ſeveral portraits of great men who lived about the time of the Reformation. On the ſide of the library there is a cabinet of rarities, wherein are a great many curioſities of art and nature, and ſeveral fine antiques in bronze.

Beſides the great church, there are four others which formerly belonged to convents. The town-houſe is an ancient building, in the hall of which there are pictures repreſenting the antiquities of Bern, but much decayed. The arſenal is a handſome large bullding, and contains, beſides many curious particulars, the antique arms that were in uſe before the invention of artillery.

Trade was not conſiderable at Bern before the arrival of the French refugees; but it is now in a more flouriſhing condition, ſince they entered into partnerſhip with the citizens, and have introduced manufactures of ſtuffs. The women before that time were excellent houſewifes, and very reſerved, but they ſoon learnt the French faſhions, and are as gay, as proud, as free, and as great coquettes as any of that nation.

The government is ariſtocratic, and the ſupreme authority is lodged in an aſſembly called the grand council, or the council of two hundred; and the vacant places are filled up every ten years. The two heads of this council are called in German Schaldtheiſs, and in French Avoyers. They preſide by turns one whole year. Out of theſe a council of twenty-five is choſen, who ſit every day to regulate affairs that are not very important. This has four banderets, who are not unlike the Roman tribunes, and two treaſurers, one for the German country, and the other for Romand. The members of both councils are appointed for life; the banderets for four years, and the treaſurers for ſix. Every Eaſter there are ſixteen choſen out of the council, who have the chief management of ſtate affairs, and preſide over the conduct of the other members, inſomuch, that if any miſbehaves, they have a power to remove him, and to admit another in his room. There are ſeveral other councils eſtabliſhed for the adminiſtration of juſtice, who have their proper juriſdictions.

There are four governments, called Land Gericht, which are immediately under the juriſdiction of the city, and under the direction of the four banderets. The country about Bern is very unequal, being partly mountainous, and covered with wood in ſeveral places. On the weſt ſide of the city there is a foreſt of fir-trees, which is very thick, and ſerves thoſe to walk in who love exerciſe. The country produces corn and paſture, but there are no vines, except on one hill, where they are cultivated more for curioſity than uſe. There are handſome country-houſes for a league all round Bern, which make a very agreeable appearance. There are ſome mineral waters, but of no great reputation. Bern is eighteen miles north-eaſt of Fribourg, fifty ſouth of Bale, thirty ſouth-weſt of Zurich, and ſeventy-five north-eaſt of Geneva. Long. 7. 40. E. Lat. 40. 0. N.

BERNARD (St.) the firſt abbot of Clairvaux, was born in the year 1091, in the village of Fountaine, in Burgundy, and acquired ſuch reputation by his zeal, that all the affairs of the church ſeemed to reſt upon his ſhoulders. It is pretended that his mother dreamt, when ſhe was with child of him, that ſhe ſhould bring forth a white dog, whoſe barking ſhould be very loud; and being aſtoniſhed at this dream, ſhe conſulted a monk, who ſaid to her, "Be of good courage, you ſhall have a ſon who ſhall guard the houſe of God, and bark loudly againſt the enemies of the faith." St. Bernard went even beyond the prediction, for he barked ſometimes againſt chimerical enemies: he was more happy in exterminating the heterodox, than in ruining the infidels; and yet he attacked theſe laſt, not only with the ordinary arms of his eloquence, but alſo with the extraordinary arms of prophecy. He preached up the cruſade under Lewis the Younger, and by this means he enlarged the troops of the cruſaders beyond expreſſion; but all the fine hopes with which he flattered the people were contradicted by the event. In ſhort, he is ſaid to have founded one hundred and ſixty monaſteries, and to have wrought a great number of miracles. He died on the 20th of Auguſt, 1153, at ſixty-three years of age. The beſt edition of his works is that of 1690, by father Mabillon.

BERNARD (CLAUDE) called father Bernard, and The Poor Prieſt, was the ſon of lieutenant-general Bernard, and was born at Dijon, on the 16th of December, 1588. He had great wit, and a lively imagination, which, joined to a ſprightly and chearful diſpoſition, made his company much deſired. On his going to Paris, he gave himſelf up entirely to ſeeing of plays, and a life of diſſipation; but at length God touched his heart, he became diſguſted with the world, and devoted himſelf entirely to the ſervice of the poor, whom he aſſiſted by his charities and exhortations with incredible fervour, as long as he lived, ſtooping to perform the meaneſt offices for them, and ſuch as were moſt repugnant to nature. Father Bernard conſtantly refuſed the benefices offered him by the court. One day, cardinal Richelieu told him that he inſiſted on his aſking ſomething of him, and left him to conſider of it. The cardinal returned in about half an hour, when Bernard thus addreſſed him, "My lord, after having thought a good while, I have at laſt found a favour to aſk of you: when I go with the criminals to the gallows, to aſſiſt them at their death, the boards of the cart on which we ſtand are ſo bad, that we are every moment in danger of falling through to the ground. Order then, my lord, I beſeech you, that better boards be put to the cart." The cardinal laughed heartily at this requeſt, and immediately gave orders for the cart to be put in a good condition. Bernard freely made uſe of all his good offices for the unhappy. Having one day preſented a petition in behalf of one of theſe to a nobleman in office, who was of a warm temper; his lordſhip fell into a paſſion, and uttered a thouſand abuſive expreſſions againſt the perſon for whom father Bernard intereſted himſelf; and he ſtill inſiſting on his complying with the petition, the nobleman in his rage gave him a box on the ear. Immediately father Bernard, falling on his knees, preſented him the other cheek, ſaying, "My lord, give me another blow on this ſide, and grant me my requeſt." The nobleman was touched with this inſtance of humility, and inſtantly complied. Father Bernard died on the 23d of March, 1641, and was interred at the hoſpital de la Charité, where he had many years aſſiſted the poor.

BERNARD (NICHOLAS) a learned divine of the laſt century, was born in England, and educated in the univerſity of Cambridge, where he took the degree of maſter of arts, and was afterwards promoted to the deanry of Ardagh, in Ireland, by archbiſhop Uſher, who employed him in making collections relating to the antiquities of the Britiſh churches. He publiſhed a book and ſermon on the death of Atherton, biſhop of Waterford; and being almoſt ruined by the rebellion, which broke out in Ireland in 1642, he returned to England, where he was promoted to the rectory of Whitchurch, in Shropſhire, and afterwards was made a chaplain to the protector, one of his almoners, and preacher of Gray's Inn. He alſo publiſhed, The whole Proceedings of the Siege of Drogheda; and, a Dialogue between Paul and Agrippa. He died in 1661.

BERNARD (Dr. EDWARD) a learned aſtronomer, linguiſt, and critic, was born at Perry St. Paul, on the ſecond of May, 1638, and educated at Merchant-Taylor's ſchool, and St. John's college, Oxford. During his ſtay at ſchool, he had laid in an uncommon fund of claſſical learning, ſo that on his going to the univerſity, he was a great maſter of all the elegancies of the Greek and Latin tongues, and not unacquainted with the Hebrew. He had acquired a good Latin ſtyle, and could compoſe verſes well. On his ſetling in the univerſity, he applied himſelf with great diligence to hiſtory, philology, and philoſophy; nor was he ſatisfied with the knowlege of the languages of Greece and Rome, but made himſelf maſter likewiſe of the Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Coptic; and then applied himſelf to the ſtudy of the mathematics, under the famous Dr. Wallis. Having ſucceſſively taken the degrees of bachelor and maſter of arts, and afterwards that of bachelor of divinity, in 1668, he went to Leyden to conſult ſeveral oriental manuſcripts left to that univerſity by Joſeph Scaliger, and Levinus Warnerus, and at his return to Oxford, he collated and examined the moſt valuable manuſcripts in the Bodleian library. In 1673 he was made Savilian profeſſor of aſtronomy in that univerſity, and in 1676 was ſent to France by king Charles II. to be tutor to the dukes of Graſton and Northumberland, natural ſons of that king. He compoſed tables of the longitudes, latitudes, right aſcenſions, &c. of the fixed ſtars: Obſervations in Latin on the Obliquity of the Ecliptic, and other pieces inſerted in the Philoſophical Tranſactions. He alſo wrote, 1. a Treatiſe of the ancient Weights and Meaſures. 2. Chronologiæ Samaritanæ Synopſis, in two tables. 3. Teſtimonies of the Ancients, concerning the Greek Verſion of the Old Teſtament, by the Seventy; and ſeveral other learned works. He was a perſon of great piety, virtue, and humanity, and died on the 12th of January, 1696, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, leaving behind him a great number of learned and valuable manuſcripts.

BERNARD (JAMES) profeſſor of philoſophy and mathematics, and paſtor of the Walloon church, at Leyden, was born September 1, 1658, at Nions in Dauphiny. He publiſhed in French, 1. a kind of Political State of Europe. 2. Hiſtorical Letters, containing an Account of the moſt important Tranſactions in Europe. 3. Acts and Negotiations of the Peace concluded at Ryſwick. 4. A Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, two volumes folio. 5. A Treatiſe upon late Repentance; and other works. He died April 27, 1718, in the ſixtieth year of his age.

BERNARD (CATHARINE) a lady illuſtrious for her wit and learning, was born at Rouen, and ſettled in Paris, where ſhe was known and eſteemed by the greateſt wits of her time. She frequently gained the prize at the French academy; acquired great reputation by her verſes, and was received into the academy of Ricovrati, at Padua. She, in conjunction with Mr. Fontenelle, compoſed two tragedies, Brutus, Brutus, and Laodamia. But the lady of chancellor Pontchartrain, who had a particular affection for her, and who procured for her an annual penſion of two hundred crowns, perſuaded her to ceaſe writing for the theatre. To this our fair author conſented, and ſuppreſſed many pieces of poetry, for which a conſiderable ſum was offered to have them printed. She died at Paris, in 1712.

BERNARD-CASTLE, a town in the biſhopric of Durham, with a market on Wedneſdays; and three fairs, on Eaſter-Monday, Whit-Wedneſday, and St. James's day, for cattle, horſes, and ſheep. It is ſeated on the river Tees, and adjoining to Marwood park. It is but an indifferent town, and yet is noted for its manufacture of ſtockings, bridles, reins, and belts. It is a hundred and fifty-ſeven miles north-north-weſt of Litchfield, and two hundred and forty-ſix north-north-weſt of London. Lon. 1. 3. W. Lat. 54. 26. N.

BERNARD THE GREAT (ST.) a mountain in Savoy and Switzerland, between Valais and the valley of Aoſte, at the ſource of the rivers Drance and Doria. The top is always covered with ſnow, and there is a great monaſtery ſeated thereon, where the monks always entertain travellers, without diſtinction of religion, for three days.

BERNARDI (JOHN) a celebrated engraver and a great architect, was one of the firſt who performed works that deſerved to be compared with thoſe of the ancients. Many princes made him conſiderable preſents, and cardinal Alexander Farneſe was one of his moſt zealous protectors. He worked upon grand ſubjects, and died at Pienza, in 1555, at ſixty years of age.

BERNARDI (JOHN) the ſon of count Francis Bernardi, reſident in England from the republic of Genoa, was born in 1657. He was very early inured to misfortunes and impriſonment; for his father being diſguſted at ſome ill uſage he received from the republic of Genoa, refuſed to return thither, and being a native of England, retired into Worceſterſhire, where he ſettled, and his temper being ſoured by the injuries he had received, he confined his ſon, for very ſlight cauſes, to a dark room, where he allowed him only bread and ſmall-beer for ſeveral days. Exaſperated at this treatment, he left his father's houſe, at thirteen years of age, reſolving never to return to it again while the old man lived. He walked to London, where he was recommended by ſir Clement Fiſher, to whom he was well known, to captain Lyttleton Clent, who took him into his company, and cauſed him to be taught his military exerciſe. Some years after going to Holland, he entered as a private ſoldier in one of the Engliſh independent companies, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery in ſeveral engagements, and at the age of twenty-ſeven, merely by his merit, arrived to the rank of captain; but king James demanding the regiments of Britiſh troops in the ſervice of the ſtates, they refuſed to ſend them, but gave the officers leave either to ſtay there upon a ſettled eſtabliſhment, or to return home; Captain Bernardi, with ſome others, choſe the latter, and following the fortune of king James fought for him in Ireland, was afterwards taken priſoner in England, but diſcharged. However, being at laſt charged with having ſome concern in the aſſaſſination-plot, though there was not ſufficient evidence to convict him, he was confined in Newgate till his death, which happened September 20, 1736, after very near forty years impriſonment.

BERNARDINE, of Sienna, a divine of the fifteenth century, was born September 8, 1380, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſermons, which were attended with great ſucceſs and applauſe. He was made vicar-general of the friars of the Obſervance for all Italy, and repaired and founded near three hundred monaſteries in that country. He wrote ſeveral works, which are printed in four volumes, folio; and died at Aquila, in Abruzzo, May 20, 1444, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age, and was canonized, in 1450, by pope Nicholas V. A great number of miracles are related of him by the popiſh writers, who aſſert, that he uſed to cure diſeaſes with a word; that the dead have been brought to life by his relics; that he was inſpired from heaven with the knowledge of the Greek language, when he attempted to preach to the Greeks; and that Chriſt and the Virgin Mary frequently appeared over his head, while he was in his ſermons.

BERNAY, a town of Normandy, where there is a rich abbey of Benedictine monks, with a little college, and ſeveral religious houſes. It carries on a conſiderable trade, and is ſeated on the river Carantone, fifteen miles ſouth-eaſt of Liſieux, and twenty ſouth-weſt of Rouen. Long. 0. 50. E. Lat. 49. 6. N.

BERNAZZANO, a celebrated painter, born at Milan, excelled in landſkips. Having painted in freſco ſome ſtrawberries upon a wall, ſome peacocks went ſo often to peck at them, that they broke the plaiſter on which they were drawn.

BERNBURG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Upper Saxony, in the principality of Anhalt. It is ſeated on the river Sara, fifteen miles weſt of Deſſau, and twenty-three north-weſt of Magdeburg. Long. 12. 30. E. Lat. 51. 55. N.

BERNI, or BERNIA, (FRANCIS) an Italian poet of the ſixteenth century, was born at Lamporecchio, in Tuſcany, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing very ſharp ſatires, and having a particular talent for burleſque poetry. Of this laſt kind we have a poem, intitled L'Orlando inamorato de Boiardo, in ſtanzas of eight verſes; he alſo wrote ſeveral Latin poems, and other works. Menage conſiders him as the beſt burleſque poet Italy has produced.

BERNIER (FRANCIS) ſurnamed the Mogul, on account of his travels and reſidence in that country, was born at Angers, in France; and after he had taken his degree of doctor of phyſic at Montpellier, left his country in 1654, went to Egypt, to the Holy Land, and to the kingdom of the mogul, where he was phyſician to that monarch, attended him in his journies, and ſtayed there twelve years. Upon his return to France, he publiſhed, 1. The Hiſtory of the countries he had viſited. 2. An Abridgment of the Philoſophy of Gaſſendus, in ſeven volumes duodecimo. 3. A Treatiſe upon the Freedom and voluntary Power of the Mind. 4. A Decree given in the great Chamber of Parnaſſus, in favour of the Maſters of Arts, Phyſicians, and Profeſſors, in the Univerſity of Stagira, in the County of Chimeras, for the Support of the Doctrine of Ariſtotle. He died at Paris, on the 22d of September, 1688.

BERNINI, or BERNIN, (JOHN LAWRENCE) called the Chevalier Bernini, was born at Naples, and was admired for his knowledge in painting, ſculpture, architecture, and mechanics; he was eſteemed by the popes and by Lewis XIV. who allowed him an annual penſion of two thouſand crowns. A great number of his works are ſhewn at Rome; and there are no leſs than fifteen of them in St. Peter's church; of theſe the moſt admired are the great altar and tabernacle, St. Peter's chair, the tombs of Urban VIII. and Alexander VII. and the porticoes that ſurround the court of St. Peter's. He died at Rome, on the 29th of November, 1680, aged eighty-one.

BERNON, the founder and firſt abbot af the abbey of Cluny, died on the 1ſt of January, 627.

BERNOUILLI (JAMES) a famous mathematician, was born December 22, 1674, at Baſil, in Swiſſerland, where his father was a man of conſiderable rank, and was educated at the univerſity of that city. He travelled through ſeveral parts of Europe; and while he was at Geneva, taught a young girl to write, though ſhe had loſt her ſight when about two months old. He publiſhed, in Latin, 1. An Eſſay of a new Syſtem of Comets. 2. A Diſſertation upon the Weight of the Air. 3. A Letter to his brother John Bernouilli, profeſſor at Groningen. 4. The Art of Gueſſing, a poſthumous work; to which is added a Treatiſe concerning Infinite Series, and a Letter, in French, on the Play of the Racket. He wrote likewiſe many Latin pieces in the Acta Eruditorum of Leipſic, the Journal des Sçavans, and the Hiſtoire de l'Academie des Sciences. He died Auguſt 16, 1705, in the fifty-firſt year of his age.

BEROALDUS (MATTHEW) a native of Paris, who taught the Hebrew tongue at Orleans, in 1565, and afterwards read lectures on hiſtory at Sedan, and on philoſophy at Geneva. He wrote a book of Chronology in Latin.

BEROALDUS (FRANCIS) ſieur de Veroille, ſon of the preceding, was born at Paris, April 28, 1558. He was a man of learning and genius, but did not make choice of ſubjects proper to bring his natural talents to perfection. He wrote ſeveral French romances, as, 1. The Adventures of Florida. 2. The Cabinet of Minerva. 3. The Maid of Orleans; and, 4. The Hiſtory of Herodius. He alſo tranſlated the Dream of Polyphilus, and compoſed the Voyage of the unfortunate Princes.

BEROALDUS (PHILIP) a celebrated profeſſor of the belles lettres in the ſixteenth century, was a native of Bologna. He wrote a Commentary on Apuleius, and other works, and died on the 17th of July, 1505.

He ought not to be confounded with Philip Beroaldus, his nephew, who was library-keeper to the Vatican, under Leo X. and wrote many pieces of poetry which are eſteemed.

BEROOT, a town of Turky in Aſia, ſeated in Phœnicia, a province of Syria, upon the ſea-coaſt, directly weſt of Damaſcus. It is the ancient Berytus; but there are no remains of its beauty but the ſituation, which is very agreeable, and in a fertile ſoil. It is juſt far enough from the ſea to prevent the inconveniences of an inundation. There are very fine ſtreams of water, which flow from the mountains, and are diſperſed into beautiful fountains in ſeveral parts of the town. The great Chriſtian church they have turned into a moſque, and have a poor old one for the uſe of the Greeks; it is adorned with ſeveral old pictures, particularly that of St. Nicephorus, with a beard down to his feet. The wall on the ſouth ſide of the town is yet entire, but ſeems to be built out of the ruins of the old city.

At a little diſtance from the city, there are ſeveral pillars of granate, and the ruins of floors of Moſaic work. On the ſea-ſhore is an old ruined caſtle and the remains of a mole. It is forty miles weſt of Damaſcus, one hundred and twenty north of Jeruſalem, and one hundred and fifty-three ſouth of Aleppo. Long. 35. 58. E. Lat. 34. 18. N.

BEROSUS, prieſt of the temple of Belus at Babylon, in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, wrote the Hiſtory of Chaldea, which is often cited by the ancients, and of which Joſephus gives ſome curious fragments. The Athenians, according to Pliny, cauſed his ſtatue, with a golden tongue, to be placed in their Gymnaſium.

BERRE, a town of Provence, in France, ſeated on a lake of the ſame name. It is remarkable for the quantity and goodneſs of the ſalt that is made there; but the air is very bad. Long. 22. 52 E. Lat. 43. 32. N.

BERRIMAN (Dr. WILLIAM) was the ſon of Mr. John Berriman, apothecary, in Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, London, where he was born, on the 24th of September, 1688. He ſtudied at Oriel-college, Oxford, where he took his ſeveral degrees, and became curate and lecturer of Allhallows, in Thames-ſtreet, and lecturer of St. Michael's, Queenhithe. In 1720, he was appointed domeſtic chaplain to Dr. Robinſon, biſhop of London, who ſoon after collated him to the living of St. Andrew's Underſhaft; and 1727, he was elected fellow of Eton-college. He died on the 5th of February, 1750, in the ſixty-ſecond year of his age. He wrote, 1. A ſeaſonable Review of Mr. Whiſton's Account of primitive Doxologies. 2. An hiſtorical Account of the Trinitarian Controverſy, in eight Sermons, at Lady Moyer's Lecture. 3. Brief Remarks on Mr. Chandler's Introduction to the Hiſtory of the Inquiſition. 4. Sermons at Boyle's Lectures, two volumes, octavo. 5. Chriſtian Doctrines and Duties explained and recommended, in two volumes, octavo; and other works.

BERRY, a province of France, with the title of a duchy. It is bounded on the north by Solome, on the ſouth by Marche, on the eaſt by Nivernois and Bourbonnois, and on the weſt by Touraine. It is ninety miles in length from north to ſouth, and ſeventy-three in breadth from eaſt to weſt. The air is very temperate, and the ſoil produces wheat, rye, and wine, little inferior to Burgundy; that of Sancerre, St. Satur, and Lavernuſſe, is the beſt. The fruits are in plenty, and pretty good. The paſtures are proper to fatten the ſheep. This country produces alſo a great deal of hemp and flax. There are mines of iron and ſilver, but they are neglected. The ſtone quarries, within half a league of Bourges, are very ſerviceable. In the pariſh of St. Hilare there is a mine of oker, made uſe of in melting metals, and for painting.

Near Bourges there is a cold mineral ſpring, which has a clammy fat pellicle over it every morning, of different colours. It lets fall a fine black ſmooth ſediment, which has the ſame ſmell, and almoſt the ſame taſte, as gunpowder, which makes ſome conclude it partakes of ſulphur, vitriol, and oker. The pellicle is as thick as a crown piece, and when put on a red hot fire-ſhovel will bounce and ſparkle, as will alſo the ſediment. It is certain there is ſalt-petre in theſe waters, though vitriol ſeems to be moſt predominent. Theſe waters, drank on the ſpot, temperate the heat of the blood and humours, open obſtructions, and ſtrengthen the fibres.

Berry is watered by ſeveral rivers, the principal of which are the the Loire, the Creuſe, the Cher, the Indre, the Orron, the Evre, the Aurette, the Moulon, the Great and Little Saudre, the Nerre, &c. About twenty miles from Berry, near Liniers, there is a lake twenty miles round.

Berry is divided into the Upper and the Lower, and Bourges is the capital city. The inhabitants of Bourges carry on a ſmall trade with corn down the Loire, but that of the wine above mentioned is much more conſiderable, it being tranſported to Paris by means of that river, and the canal of Briare. But the principal commerce conſiſts in the fat cattle which they ſend to Paris, and the great number of ſheep; theſe bear fine wool, which is uſed in the manufactures of this province, and other parts of the kingdom. There are two ſorts of manufactures in Berry, the one for cloths and ſerges, and the other for knit and wove ſtockings. There is likewiſe a great quantity of hemp, which is tranſported elſewhere, for they have not yet got the art of manufacturing it themſelves. At Aubigny there are two thouſand perſons generally employed in the making of cloth.

BERRY (Sir JOHN) knight, a brave naval commander, was the ſon of the reverend Mr. Daniel Berry, vicar of Knevaſton and Maland, in Devonſhire, and put apprentice to Mr. Robert Mering, who had a ſhare in ſeveral ſhips at Plymouth. He had the misfortune of being twice taken by the Spaniards, and his maſter being reduced by loſſes at ſea, gave him up his indentures; on which, coming to London, he was appointed boatſwain of the Swallow ketch, which was bound to the Weſt Indies, in queſt of a pirate who infeſted thoſe ſeas. The Swallow being overtaken by a ſtorm in the gulph of Florida, they were obliged to cut away all her maſts, and two frigates which accompanied her were loſt. With much difficulty they reached Jamaica, where ſhe was refitted, and Mr. Berry appointed lieutenant. Three weeks after their leaving Jamaica, they diſcovered the pirate riding at anchor, in a bay of the iſland of St. Domingo. She had twenty guns and ſixty men, and the Swallow had only eight ſmall guns and forty men. Captain Inſam, who commanded the Swallow, ſeeing the pirate's ſuperior ſtrength, thought proper to conſult his men before he engaged; and calling all the hands upon deck, obſerved, that thoſe whom they were going to attack were men at arms, old buccaneers, and ſuperior to them in number and the force of their ſhip, and therefore he would have their opinion. Lieutenant Berry interrupting him, ſaid, that they too were men at arms, and, what was more, honeſt men, and fought under the king's commiſſion, but that if he had no ſtomach for fighting, he deſired that he would be pleaſed to walk down into his cabbin. The crew applauded his motion, and immediately prepared to engage: but the pirate being to windward, the Swallow was obliged to make two tacks under her lee, and received two broadſides before ſhe could get into her proper ſtation. Captain Berry, far from being intimidated, laid the pirate on board, on his ſtarboard bow, pouring in his whole broadſide, by which twenty-two of the pirate's hands were killed, and ſoon after the reſt ſubmitted.

This gallant action, which was performed in the year 1670, recommended him to the notice of the government, and he was appointed commander of the Coronation, of fifty-ſix guns, with orders to ſail to the Weſt Indies, and protect the trade. At his arrival at Barbadoes, he found that the French at St. Kitt's were fitting out twenty-two men of war and frigates, ſix large tranſports of their own, and four hired from the Dutch, in order to take the iſland of Nevis. To prevent this, the governor of Barbadoes fitted out eight large merchant ſhips, and converted them into men of war, which having joined Mr. Berry, he ſailed for Nevis. But juſt as he turned the point of that iſland, one of his beſt ſhips blew up by accident, and at the ſame time the French fleet appeared in ſight; and this happening juſt at the appearance of the enemy, damped the ſpirits of his men, which he perceiving, cried, "You have ſeen an Engliſh "ſhip blow up, let us try if we cannot blow up one of the "French. There they are, boys, and if we do not beat "them, they will beat us." By this time the French fleet being come up, Berry immediately attacked them, and was ſo bravely ſeconded by the reſt of his ſquadron, that after an engagement of thirteen hours, he forced their great fleet to take ſhelter under the cannon of St. Chriſtopher's, whither he purſued them, ſent in a fire-ſhip, and burnt the admiral. As ſoon as he ſaw the French ſhip on fire, he ſaid to the ſeamen, "I told you in the morning we ſhould "burn a Frenchman before night: tomorrow we will try "what we can do with the reſt." But the enemy prevented his deſign by ſtealing away while he was refitting his ſhips.

At his return he was greatly careſſed by the miniſtry, and in 1672 diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the famous battle of Southwold bay, where he commanded a ſeventy-gun ſhip, for which he received the honour of knighthood. In 1682 he commanded the Gloceſter frigate, on board of which the duke of York embarked for Scotland, but, by the careleſſneſs of the pilot, was loſt at the mouth of the Humber. In the midſt of this confuſion, ſir John preſerved that preſence of mind for which he was always remarkable, and by that means ſaved the duke, and as many of his retinue as the long-boat would carry. Soon after he was promoted to a flag, and commanded as vice-admiral under lord Dartmouth, at the demolition of Tangier, and on his return was made a commiſſioner of the navy, which poſt he held till his death. He was in great favour with king James II. who made choice of him to command under lord Dartmouth, when the prince of Orange landed in England; and when his lordſhip left the fleet, the whole command devolved on ſir John Berry, who held it till the ſhips were laid up. After the Revolution ſir John continued in his poſts, and was frequently conſulted by king William, who had a great opinion of his abilities in military affairs; but he was poiſoned in the beginning of February, 1691, on board one of his majeſty's ſhips at Portſmouth, where he was paying her off, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age. His body was brought to London, and interred in the chancel of Stepney church, where a monument was erected to his memory.

BERSELLO, a fortified town of Italy, in the Modineſe. It is ſeated near the confluence of the rivers Linza and Po, ten miles north-eaſt of Parma, nine weſt of Guaſtalla, fifteen north-weſt of Reggio, twenty eight north-weſt of Modena, and twenty-five ſouth of Cremona. Long. 10. 30. E. Lat. 44. 55. N.

BERTAUT (John) a French poet, born at Caen in Normandy, was firſt almoner to queen Catharine de Medicis, and in 1606 was biſhop of Seez. Moſt of his poems are on religious ſubjects. He was the friend of the poets Ronſard and Deſportes, and died in 1611.

BERTELIER (Philibert) regiſter of the lower court of juſtice of Geneva, his own country, lived in the middle of the ſixteenth century, and is known only by his evil actions: what rendered him moſt remarkable was, his pretending that the republic of Geneva had ſent him to Noion with orders to make exact enquiries relating to the manners and life of Calvin, and that having executed this order, he found that John Calvin had been convicted of ſodomy, and that, at the biſhop's requeſt, the ſentence of burning was changed into that of being branded. Though there was not the leaſt foundation for this baſe ſlander, the enemies of that reformer were filled with joy at being furniſhed with an ample occaſion of reviling his memory.

BERTHAULT (Peter) canon and archdeacon of Chartres, was born at Sens, and died on the 19th of October, 1681. He was the author of a Treatiſe de Ara, printed at Nantes, in 1636. He alſo publiſhed Florus Gallicus, and Florus Francicus.

BERTHEAU (Charles) one of the miniſters of the Walloon church, in Threadneedle-ſtreet, London, was born at Montpellier in 1660, where his father Charles Bertheau was a miniſter. He had ſo good a memory, that it might be ſaid he never forgot any thing that he ſaw, read, or heard. He was ſucceſſively paſtor of ſeveral churches in France, and was at laſt one of the miniſters of the church of Paris, which met at Charenton; but the perſecution obliged him to fly from that city in 1685, when he came to England, and was choſen one of the miniſters of the church in Threadneedle-ſtreet, in which he exerciſed his paſtoral functions for above forty years. He wrote two volumes of Sermons, and died Dec. 25, 1732.

BERTIE (Peregrine) ſon and heir of Richard Bertie, by Catharine, ducheſs of Suffolk, and (in her own right) baroneſs Willoughby of Ereſby, was, on the firſt of queen Elizabeth, made a free denizen, by patent, bearing date the 2d of Auguſt, 1559. On the death of his mother he claimed the dignity and title of lord Willoughby. After this time he was employed in ſeveral important negotiations, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf at the ſiege of Zutphen, in the Netherlands, and being made general of the Engliſh forces there, defended Bergen-op-Zoom againſt the duke of Parma, who had beſieged it. He afterwards aſſiſted at the ſiege of Paris, and at the reduction of Mons, Alençon, Falais, Luxon, and Honfleur, at which he acquired an eſtabliſhed reputation as a great and able commander. This great nobleman died in the beginning of the year 1601.

Bertie (Robert) ſon of the former, was born at London, December 16, 1582, and very early ſhewed an unuſual forwardneſs and inclination to arms. He was preſent at ſeveral ſieges, in which he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his bravery and intrepidity; and having ſeen moſt of the courts and countries of Europe, he was, in the firſt year of James I. made lord high chamberlain of England. In the ſecond of king Charles I. he was advanced to the dignity of earl of Lindſey; in the eleventh of the ſame reign was conſtituted lord high admiral of England; and, in 1640, his majeſty declared him general of his forces. He was ever near his Majeſty's perſon, aſſiſting him to the very utmoſt of his power and abilities. But the laſt proof he gave the king of his affection was in the battle of Edgehill, fought on the 23d of October, 1642, in which his lordſhip was killed, by receiving a ſhot in his thigh, at the head of his own regiment, and his ſon, the lord Willoughby, taken priſoner, by endeavouring to reſcue his father.

Bertie (Montague) eldeſt ſon and heir to the former, whom, in the laſt article, we left a priſoner, was afterwards exchanged, and returning to the king at Oxford, had the command of a regiment of life-guards in ſeveral battles, and, after the king's death, he and ſome other lords deſired leave to perform the laſt duty to their dead maſter, and to wait upon him to his grave, which was granted, and accordingly they attended the royal corpſe to Windſor, where it was buried: after which his lordſhip compounded and lived privately, but at the Reſtoration was made one of the privy-council, and lord high chamberlain. His lordſhip died on the 25th of July, 1666, aged [illegible]-eight years.

BERTIUS (Peter) a perſon of diſtinguiſhed learning, was born at Beveren, in Flanders, on the 14th of November, 1565. After having ſpent a conſiderable time in travelling, he became regent of the college of the ſtates at Leyden, and, at length, profeſſor of philoſophy in the ſame city; but having embraced the opinions of the Arminians, he was in 1619 deprived of this poſt. The following year, not being able to ſubſiſt his numerous family, he went to France, where he hoped to find ſome aſſiſtance, as the king had two years before placed him in the number of his geographers; he therefore ſollicited for a year's penſion, which was due to him; but not being able to obtain the payment of it, and the miniſter of the Proteſtant church of Charenton refuſing to admit him to communion, he abjured the Proteſtant religion, on the 25th of June, 1620. Soon after he was nominated profeſſor of eloquence at the college of Boncourt, where he begun his office with a diſcourſe on the motives of his abjuration. He was at length made hiſtoriographer to the king, and ſupernumerary royal profeſſor of mathematics. He died on the 3d of October, 1629, at ſixty-four years of age. He wrote, 1. Commentariorum Germanicarum, quarto and duodecimo. 2. Theatrum Geographiæ veteris, two volumes, folio. 3. Notitia Chorographica Epiſcopatuum Galliæ, folio. 4. Introductio in univerſam Geographiam, twelves. 5. Several Speeches and Pieces of Poetry, in Latin. 6. The Funeral Oration on Arminius. 7. A Book on the Perſeverance of the Saints, intitled, Hymenæus Deſertor, ſive de Sanctorum Perſeverantia & Apoſtaſia, quarto, with ſome other work. James I. king of England, in a letter to the States General, ridiculouſly obſerved, That the author of the laſt mentioned work deſerved to be burnt for the very title.

BERTON (William) an eminent divine, and doctor of divinity, flouriſhed about the year 1381, in the reign of Richard II. and was ſome time chancellor of the univerſity of Oxford. He is chiefly remarkable for his virulent oppoſition to the doctrines of Wickliff; for, by virtue of his office, as governor of the univerſity, he appointed twelve cenſors to examine Wickliff's opinions, who accordingly declared him an heretic. He wrote ſeveral pieces, particularly, Determinations againſt Wickliff; a Treatiſe concerning his juſt Condemnation; and another againſt the Articles exhibited in his Writings.

BERTRAM (Cornelius Bonaventure) a native of Thouars, in Poictou, and Hebrew profeſſor in ſeveral univerſities, was born in the year 1531, and rendered himſelf famous for his knowledge in the Oriental languages. He publiſhed, 1. Treſor de Sanctes, with augmentations. 2. Comparaiſon de la Langue Hebraique avec la Syriac; and, 3. A Treatiſe de Politica Judaica.

BERTRAND, a town of Gaſcony, in France, the capital of the county of Comminge. It is ſeated on the Garonne, thirty-three miles ſouth of Auch, twenty-four eaſt of Tarbe, and four hundred and thirty-ſeven miles ſouth-by-eaſt of Paris. Long. 0. 38. E. Lat. 43. 2. N.

Bertrand (Peter) a learned doctor of the canon law, who was made biſhop of Nevers, then of Autun, and at length cardinal. He wrote a Bibliotheca of the Fathers, and a Treatiſe de Origine & uſu Juriſdictionum. He died at Avignon in 1348.

BERULLE (Peter de) cardinal and founder of the fathers of the Oratory in France, was born Febuary 5, 1575, and died October the 2d, 1629. He wrote ſeveral works.

BERWICK, a ſhire in Scotland, bounded by the river Tweed on the ſouth, by Lothian on the north, by the German Ocean on the eaſt, and by Tiviotdale on the weſt. It abounds with corn and graſs, and has in it ſeveral ſeats of perſons of quality. The principal rivers are the Tweed, the Whiteater, Blackadder, Eye, and Ednel. The principal place is the town and caſtle of Dunſe, which is the beſt place for trade in the county. It ſends two members to parliament.

Berwick (North) a town of Scotland, in the county of Lothian, ſeated on the river Firth of Forth. It was near this place that general Cope was defeated by the rebels in 1745, and made his eſcape to Berwick-upon-Tweed. It is thirty-ſix miles north-weſt of Berwick-upon-Tweed, and twenty-weſt-north-weſt of Edinburgh. Long. 2. 29. W. Lat. 56. 5. N.

Berwick-upon-Tweed, is a town on the borders of England and Scotland, and a county of itſelf. It ſtands on the north or Scotch ſide of the river Tweed, and is pleaſantly ſituated on an eaſy declivity, almoſt cloſe to the ſea, and has a ditch on the north and eaſt, but on the ſouth and weſt it has high walls, regularly fortified, and planted with cannon, and to which the river ſerves as a moat. The houſes are generally well built, and the town-houſe is a handſome ſtructure, with a lofty turret, in which are eight bells, and a fine clock, which tells the quarters, with four dials, one on each ſide the ſquare. The church is a neat building, but has no bells. The bridge is nine hundred and forty-ſeven feet long, and is ſupported by fifteen arches. The barracks form a large regular ſquare, and will hold two regiments of foot very conveniently. The town is governed by a mayor, recorder, town-clerk, and four bailiffs, and has a coroner, a treaſurer, four ſerjeants at mace, and a water bailiff. It had a ſtrong caſtle, which now lies quite in ruins. It has a market on Saturdays, extremely well ſupplied,

ſupplied, and a fair on Friday in Trinity-week for black cattle and horſes. Corn and eggs are ſhipped from hence for London and other ports; but the principal trade is ſalmon, which is caught in the Tweed, and is reckoned to be as good as any in the kingdom. Some are ſent alive, and ſome pickled in kits by perſons who ſubſiſt on that employment, who are called ſalmon coopers. In June and July ſalmon is ſold for a penny a pound. The living is a rectory, rated at 20l. a year, in the king's books. It is eighty miles north-eaſt of Carliſle, three hundred and thirty-five north-weſt of London, one hundred and forty-ſeven north of York, and ſixty eaſt-ſouth-eaſt of Edinburgh. Long. 1. 35. W. Lat. 55. 58. N.

BERYLLUS, biſhop of Boſtra, in Arabia, flouriſhed about the year 230. After he had for a long time governed his ſee with great prudence and fidelity, he fell into ſome new and uncommon opinions, aſſerting that Chriſt, before his incarnation, had no proper ſubſiſtence, nor any divinity but that of the Father reſiding in him. The biſhops being aſſembled to recover him from his error, appointed Origen to engage in the diſpute with him, which he did with ſuch ſucceſs, that Beryllus retracted his opinion. He wrote ſeveral treatiſes and epiſtles, particularly to Origen, in which he returned him thanks for the pains he had taken in recovering him from his errors.

BESANCON, a city of France, capital of the Franche Compté, and one of the ancient cities of Europe. It is the ſee of an archbiſhop, and has a parliament as well as a univerſity. It is ſeated on the river Dreux, which divides it into two parts, the greateſt of which is a peninſula. The entrance is ſhut up by a mountain, on which they have built a large citadel, which commands all the city. There are many names of places in and about the city, that are plainly corruptions of the Latin, and are marks of its antiquity, as Chamars, Campus Martis, Chamuſe, Campus Muſarum, Chandane, Campus Diana, &c.

In this city there are eight pariſhes, two chapters, two abbeys for men, and two for women, one ſeminary, ſeven monaſteries, ſix nunneries, an hoſpital for poor children, an hoſpital for foundlings, a houſe of retreat for common women, and eleven thouſand five hundred inhabitants. The metropolitan church is built at the bottom of St. Stephen's hill, and is a very handſome ſtructure, with a high tower ſteeple. The great altar is placed in the middle choir, where on high days they expoſe reliques in ſilver ſhrines, enriched with gold and jewels. There are ſeveral tombs, and other things remarkable in the churches; and after you have paſt the church of Notre Dame, and the ſquare that it looks into, you will come to a triumphal arch, erected in honour of the emperor Aurelian, on which are ſeveral figures of men and animals, pretty entire. It ſerves as a gate to the cloiſter of St. John the Great. The great hoſpital of the order of the Holy Ghoſt is a ſtructure worth ſeeing.

The ſtreets are wide and handſome, and the houſes are well built with free-ſtone, and covered with ſlate, chiefly about the ſquare called Battan, which is adorned with a fountain, the water of which proceeds from the ſtatue of Bacchus. The river Dreux is paſſed over on a ſtone bridge, to enter from one part of Beſançon into the other. The market place is at the entrance, and on the left is another ſquare, adorned with a fountain, where the great ſtreet begins, which traverſes all this part, from the bridge to St. John the Great.

The new ſquare is not far from this ſtreet, from whence you go to the town-houſe, which is a large ſtructure, with four wings, before the front of which is the ſtatue of Charles V. in bronze, with a globe in one hand, and a ſword in the other. The imperial eagle is raiſed over a large baſon, and ſpouts out water by both his beaks. The governor's palace is the moſt magnificent in the province, and there is a fountain a little farther, adorned with the figure of a naked woman, with water ſpringing out at her nipples. Beſançon is forty-eight miles eaſt of Dijon, ſixty-five north of Geneva, ſeventy-five ſouth-weſt of Baſil, twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Dole, forty-eight ſouth-eaſt of Langre, and two hundred and eight ſouth-eaſt of Paris. Long. 6. 10. E. Lat. 47. 26. N.

BESSARABIA, a territory between the Danube, Moldavia, the Black Sea, and Little Tartary. It is inhabited by independent Tartars, who live upon their cattle, on agriculture, and robbery. Their religion, manners, and cuſtoms, are like thoſe of the Crim Tartars. When an army is ſent againſt them, they retire into inacceſſible mountains, on the coaſt of the Black Sea, from whence it is impoſſible to drive them out, on account of the moraſſes and defiles. The moſt conſiderable towns are Bender, Tartar-Barlat, Akerman, and Keli.

BESSARION, a learned cardinal patriarch of Conſtantinople, and archbiſhop of Nice in the fifteenth century, was a native of Trebiſond. John Paleologus, emperor of the eaſt, having ſent him into Italy to endeavour to produce a union between the Greek and Latin churches, he harangued the fathers of the council of Florence, and, in 1439, was created cardinal by pope Eugenius IV. From that time he ſettled at Rome, where his merit was ſo well known, that it was thought he would have been raiſed to St. Peter's chair. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his love for learning, and his houſe was always filled with learned men. Several popes made him their legate, but being ſent into France, Lewis XI. gave him a very ill reception, on account of his having paid a viſit to the duke of Burgundy, before he waited on himſelf, which gave the cardinal ſuch concern, that he died at Ravenna, in his way to Rome, on the 18th of November, 1472. He wrote a Defence of the Doctrine of Plato, and other works.

BESSE (Henry de) inſpector of the fine arts, under the marquis de Villacerf, and comptroller of the buildings when Monſ. Colbert was nominated in 1683, ſuperintendent of the buildings, and ſecretary to the Academy of Inſcriptions and Medals. He wrote an Account of the Campaigns of Rocroi and Fribourg, in 1643 and 1644, and died in 1693.

BESIERS, or Beziers, an ancient and handſome town of France, in Lower Languedoc, with a biſhop's ſee, and the title of a viſcounty. It has a delightful ſituation, and the country it ſtands in is fertile in corn, oil, and excellent wine. It is ſeated on a hill, near the river Orbe, and the Royal Canal, eight miles north of the Mediterranean, twelve north-eaſt of Narbonne, and ten weſt of Agde. Long. 3. 23. E. Lat. 43. 21. N.

BESTIARII, in Roman antiquity, ſuch perſons as fought againſt wild beaſts, or were expoſed to them by the ſentence of the law; of which there were four kinds: the firſt thoſe who fought for money; the ſecond, young men who fought with beaſts to ſhew their dexterity in managing their arms; the third, where ſeveral perſons, well armed, were let looſe at once againſt a number of beaſts; and the fourth, thoſe condemned to be devoured by the beaſts; theſe conſiſted either of priſoners of war, or ſlaves who had been guilty of ſome enormous crime. Theſe laſt were expoſed naked and defenceleſs.

BESTON, or Besodunus (John) a learned Engliſh divine, of the fifteenth century, was prior of the monaſtery of Carmelite friars at Lynn, in Norfolk, and raiſed himſelf a great character by the works he publiſhed, which were, 1. A Compendium of Moral Divinity. 2. The Elements of Logic. 3. Of the Virtues and Vices oppoſite to each other; and ſome other pieces.

BESTRICIA, a town of Tranſylvania, remarkable for the gold mines that are near it. It is eighty-five miles north-weſt of Hermanſtadt, and ninety eaſt of Tecka. Long. 22. 5. E. Lat. 48. 0. N.

BETANZOS, a town of Spain, in Galicia, ſeated on the river Mandeo, thirty-three miles north of Compoſtella, thirty-ſeven ſouth-weſt of Mondonedo. Long. 7. 50. W. Lat. 43. 21. N.

BETELFAQUI, or Betelfaki, a town in Arabia the Happy, about twenty-five miles from the Red Sea, or the Arabian Gulph. It is the mart for coffee, becauſe it grows in plenty thereabouts, and is more in eſteem than any other ſort. It is called Turky coffee, becauſe it formerly came through that country. It is ninety-three miles north of Mocha, near which our ſhips lie when they go to trade in that country, and though larger than that city, is under its government. It is adorned with very handſome moſques, whoſe high towers or minorets are whitened both within and without. The houſes are built with brick, and are one or two ſtories high, with flat roofs. This city has no walls, but within a muſquet ſhot of it there is a handſome caſtle. Within the town there is a large bazar, or market-place, for coffee, which takes up two great courts, and has piazzas covered over. Hither the Arabians of the country round about it bring their coffee in ſacks, made of matts, and one camel carries two of theſe ſacks. At the lower end of the middle bazar is raiſed a divan, four feet from the ground, covered with carpets, whereon the officers of the cuſtoms ſit to take an account of all the coffee that is ſold. Long. 45. 58. E. Lat. 15. 40. N.

BETHEL (Slingsby) ſheriff of London, in the reign of king of Charles II. and one of the moſt zealous and active of the party, who were for excluding the duke of York from the crown. He underſtood trade, and ſeems to have been well acquainted with thoſe maxims, by which an eſtate is ſaved as well as gotten. After riches poured in upon him, his œconomy was much the ſame as it was before. Parſimony was ſo habitual to him, that he knew not how to relax into generoſity, and while ſheriff of London was generally cenſured for being too frugal in his entertainments.

He was the author of a book, intitled, The Intereſt of the Princes and States of Europe, at the end of which is a Narrative of the moſt material Debates and Paſſages in the Parliament, which ſat in the protectorate of Richard Cromwell.

BETHLEHEM, a town of Paleſtine, famous for the birth of Jeſus Chriſt. It was once a flouriſhing town, but is now only a poor village. It is ſeated on the ridge of a hill, which runs eaſt and weſt. Here is a church, built by St. Helena, in the form of a croſs, which is very large; from the top of which may be ſeen all the country round about. The roof is lofty, flat, and compoſed of cedar on the inſide, and leaded without. Both ſides of the nave are ſupported by two rows of marble pillars, each made of one piece, and eleven in a row, inſomuch that they make as it were five naves, ſeparated from each other by theſe rows of pillars, in each of which is the picture of ſome ſaint. On the wall over the pillars there is a very beautiful Moſaic work, on a gold ground. The walls were formerly overlaid with fine marble, but the Turks have taken it to adorn their moſques. The three upper ends of the croſs terminate in three ſemicircles, having in each an altar. Over the chancel there is a ſtately cupola, covered with lead on the outſide, and within adorned with Moſaic work. Cloſe to the church is the monaſtery of the Franciſcans, which is large but indifferently built. The gardens are defended with ſtrong walls, and at the north-weſt of them ſtands a tower now almoſt in ruins. Their chapel is better taken care of. Through this there is a paſſage to a ſquare cave, where they ſay the Innocents were buried. Beyond this there are paſſages to the tombs of St. Jerom, St. Paula, Euſtochium, and Euſebius of Cremona. Beyond theſe there is a grot or cell, which they ſay was the lodging place of St. Jerom, where he tranſlated the Bible. Another entrance leads to a vault or chapel, twelve feet wide and forty long, whoſe floor is paved, and ſides lined with white marble, and the roof is adorned with Moſaic work, now much decayed. At the end of this there is an arched concavity, with an altar, over which is a picture of the nativity, and under it a vault, the middle of which is a ſtar made with ſtones of various colours, to mark the place where they ſay our Saviour was born; and near this is the manger where they pretend he was laid; it is hewn out of a rock, and is now flag'd with white marble.

The few cottages that are yet ſtanding are inhabited by Greeks and Armenians, who get a poor livelihood by ſelling the model of the ſepulchre and grot of the nativity to ſtrangers, cut in wood or ſtone; as alſo by attending on pilgrims. Bethlehem is about ſix miles weſt of Jeruſalem. Long. 35. 55. E. Lat. 31. 30. N.

BETHLEHEM, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of Brabant, two miles north of Louvain, ſubject to the houſe of Auſtria. Long. 4. 40. E. Lat. 51. 2. N.

BETHUNE, a town of France, in Artois, containing about five thouſand two hundred inhabitants. There is an entrance into this city thro' four gates, and it is ſurrounded with walls and fortified. The city and the caſtle taken together are of a triangular figure, but the caſtle itſelf is a very irregular building. The houſes are very indifferent, and the ſtreets ill paved; however, there is a large handſome ſquare, and ſeveral churches. In the marſhy lands, near the city, there are ſeveral canals, cut for the conveniency of whitening linen. It is ſeated on a rock by the river Belſe, eight miles ſouth-eaſt of Aire, twenty ſouth-weſt of St. Omer's, ſixteen weſt of Arras, and one hundred and twenty north of Paris. Long. 2. 48. E. Lat. 50. 32. N.

BETHUNE (MAXIMILIAN DE) duke of Sully, grand maſter of the artillery, and marſhal of France, ſovereign prince of Enrichemont and Bois-Bell, marquis of Roſny, and one of the greateſt men France has produced, was born at Roſny, in 1559. He entered very young into the ſervice of Henry of Bourbon, then king of Navarre, who was afterwards Henry IV. king of France, and merited his favour by his ſervices and fidelity. He was at the battles of Coutras, Arques, and Ivry; at the ſieges of Paris, Noyon, Rouen, and Laon, and ſignalized himſelf on every important occaſion. In 1597 he was made chief overſeer of the highways of France, and the following year was raiſed to the poſt of ſuperintendant of the finances. Though he was then but forty years of age, and had hitherto ſignalized himſelf only in the army, he put the king's finances in ſuch order, that he paid his debts, which amounted to two hundred millions of livres, and laid up great ſums in the king's treaſury. In 1601 he was made grand maſter of the artillery, the next year governor of the Baſtile, and afterwards ſuperintendant of the fortifications. He was then ſent into England as ambaſſador extraordinary, and had, at his return, the government of Poictou. At laſt Henry IV. in 1606, erected, in his favour, the territory of Sully on the Loire into a duchy and peerage, and him made grand maſter of the ports and havens. After the murder of that great prince in 1610, the duke of Sully, who had ſerved him with the greateſt zeal and fidelity, was obliged to retire to one of his houſes, where he enjoyed a private life; but in 1634 he was made marſhal of France, upon which he reſigned the poſt of grand maſter of the artillery. He died in his caſtle of Villebon, on the 21ſt of December, 1641, at eighty-two years of age, after having obtained the reputation of being an upright, ſincere, and wiſe man; of having an extraordinary capacity in the management of public affairs, and being inviolably faithful in keeping his promiſes. His excellent Memoirs, entitled, Œconomies Royal, were tranſlated into Engliſh by Mrs. Lennox, in 1757.

BETIS, governor of Gaza for Darius, defended that place with great bravery againſt Alexander the Great; but that conqueror having been wounded at the firſt aſſault, after he had taken the city, cruelly ordered Betis to be put to death, about three hundred and thirty-three years before the birth of Chriſt.

BETLEM GABOR, or GABRIEL, a famous prince of Tranſilvania, born in that country of an ancient and noble family, but very poor. He was educated in the doctrines of Calviniſm, and obtained the eſteem of Gabriel Battori, prince of Tranſilvania. After which he went to Conſtantinople, where he gained the affections of the Turks by his courage. With their aſſiſtance, he, in 1613, defeated Gabriel Battori, his benefactor, ſeized ſeveral places in Hungary, and was there proclaimed king. In 1620, the emperor ſent againſt him the counts of Dampierre and Bucquoy; but they were defeated and ſlain. Gabriel at length propoſed a peace, which the emperor would grant him on no other condition, but of his renouncing the title of king of Hungary, and being contented with that of prince of the empire. He therefore ſeveral times took up arms, but with ſuch ill ſucceſs, that he was obliged, in 1624, to conclude a peace on the conditions impoſed upon him. He died on the 15th of November, 1629, after having left conſiderable legacies to the emperor and other princes.

BETLEY, a town of Staffordſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, but no fairs. It is ſeated on the confines of the county, next to Cheſhire, in a barren ſandy ſoil, ſixteen miles north-north-weſt of Stafford, and one hundred and fifty-ſeven on the ſame point from London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 35. 0. N.

BETLIS, a town of Armenia, or Turcomania, one hundred and fifty miles from Diarbekir, and forty-five from Van, belonging to a bey, or prince of the country, who is very powerful, and is neither ſubject to the grand ſeignior, nor the king of Perſia. It lies in the road from Tauris to Aleppo; and he can ſtop caravans whenever he pleaſes; for the paſſage between the mountains is ſo narrow, that ten men can defend it againſt a thouſand. The town is ſeated between two mountains about a cannon-ſhot from each other, and the caſtle is on an eminence exactly in the middle. This eminence, or hill, is in the ſhape of a ſugar-loaf, and is ſo ſteep on all ſides, that there is no getting up, but by winding round it. The people in and about the town are ſhepherds; but they are ready to take up arms at the command of their prince. Long. 42. 40. E. Lat. 37. 20. N.

BETTERTON (THOMAS) the moſt eminent tragedian of the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of Mr. Betterton, under-cook to king Charles I. and was born in Tothill-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, in the year 1635. He was firſt bound apprentice to a bookſeller; but his genius leading him ſtrongly to the ſtage, he commenced actor in 1656, under the direction of ſir William D'Avenant. Upon the Reſtoration, and the eſtabliſhment of the companies of players, the one called the King's Company, and the other the Duke's Company, Mr. Betterton was admitted into the latter. In a little time after, at the command of king Charles II. he went over to Paris, in order to take a view of the French ſtage, and import from thence whatever he ſhould think might any way contribute to the improvement of our own; and it was upon this occaſion, as is generally ſuppoſed, that moving ſcenes were firſt introduced upon the Engliſh theatre. When the two companies, the King's and the Duke's, were united, Mr. Betterton's merit ſhone out with unrivalled luſtre; and when he was even obliged, by the cruelty of the managers, to abandon their company, and to erect a new play-houſe in Lincoln's-inn-fields, and afterwards another in the Hay-market, he was ſtill able, by his great powers of acting, to maintain that ſuperiority, which he had formerly acquired, over all his cotemporary players. Towards the latter end of his life, he happened to meet with a very great misfortune; for having imprudently riſqued his whole fortune in a naval adventure, the ſhip in which it was embarked was taken by the enemy, and he was thus ſtripped on a ſudden of all that he poſſeſſed. He was enabled, however, by the generoſity of the public, to retrieve in ſome meaſure, his ruined affairs; for a play being acted for his benefit, he cleared by it no leſs than five hundred pounds. His abilities as an actor, and his virtues as a modeſt, humane, and worthy man, procured him univerſal eſteem. He wrote ſome dramatic pieces; theſe were, 1. The Woman made a Juſtice. 2. The unjuſt Judge, or Appius and Virginia; and, 3. The amorous Widow, or the wanton Wife; but on the 28th of April, 1710, he paid that tribute to nature, from which neither heroes, nor thoſe who play them, can be exempted.

in

BETTS (JOHN) an eminent phyſician of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Wincheſter, and educated at Corpus Chriſti college, Oxford. He commenced doctor of phyſic in 1654, and practiſed with great ſucceſs in London, but chiefly among the Roman Catholics, being himſelf of that perſuaſion. He was afterwards appointed phyſician in ordinary to king Charles II. He wrote two Treatiſes in Latin; one on the Origin and Nature of the Blood; and the other on the Harmony between Medicine and Natural Philoſophy.

BETUE, or BETAW, a territory of the Low Countries, in the duchy of Guelderland, between the rivers Rhine and Lech. The land is moiſt, and the rains ſometimes render the roads impaſſable. It is divided into the Upper and Lower.

BEVELAND, two iſlands of the province of Zealand, in the United Netherlands, ſeparated by the river Schelde. The one is called the North, and the other the South.

BETULEIUS (SIXTUS) an able grammarian, a good Latin poet, and philoſopher, born at Memmingen, in the year 1500; his true name was Birck. He taught the belles lettres and philoſophy with reputation, and became principal of the college of Augſburg, where he died on the 16th of June, 1554. He publiſhed ſeveral works in proſe, and his dramatic pieces of Joſeph, Suſanna, and Judith, are eſteemed.

BEVERIDGE (WILLIAM) a learned divine, and biſhop of St. Aſaph, was born at Barrow, in Leiceſterſhire, in the year 1638, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his early piety, his ſeriouſneſs of mind, and integrity of life. After finiſhing his ſtudies at Cambridge, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his ſkill in the oriental languages, he became ſucceſſively vicar of Yealing, in Middleſex, rector of St. Peter's, Cornhill, London, prebendary of St. Paul's cathedral, archdeacon of Colcheſter, prebendary of Canterbury, chaplain in ordinary to king William and queen Mary; and, in 1704, was advanced to the biſhoprick of St. Aſaph. This dignity, however, he enjoyed but a ſhort time; for he died at his lodgings in the cloyſters in Weſtminſter abbey, March the 5th, 1708, in the ſeventy firſt year of his age, and his body was interred in St. Paul's cathedral. He wrote, 1. A Treatiſe of the Excellency and Uſe of the Oriental Tongues, eſpecially the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Samaritan, with a Syriac Grammar. 2. Inſtitutionum Chronologicarum, in quarto. 3. Pandectæ Canonum, SS. Apoſtolorum & Conſiliorum ab Eccleſia Græca receptorum, &c. two volumes, folio. 4. Private Thoughts upon Religion. 5. An hundred and fifty Sermons and Diſcourſes, on ſeveral Subjects. 6. The Church Catechiſm explained. 7. A complete Syſtem of Divinity. 8. A Defence of Sternhold and Hopkins's Pſalms; and, 9. An Expoſition of the Thirty-nine Articles.

BEVERLAND (ADRIAN) a writer in the latter end of the ſixteenth century, was born at Middleburg, in Zealand. He wrote ſeveral books in Latin, viz 1. On original Sin, in which he endeavoured to ſhew that Adam's ſin conſiſted entirely in the commerce with his wife; for this book he was committed to priſon, and his book condemned to be burnt. 2. An Admonition to avoid Fornication; many ſatires; and other pieces.

BEVERLEY, a town of Yorkſhire, governed by a mayor, a recorder, twelve aldermen, &c. and ſends two members to parliament. The minſter here is a very fair and neat ſtructure, and the roof is an arch of ſtone; in it are ſeveral monuments of the Percies, earls of Northumberland, who had added a little chapel to the choir, in the window whereof there are ſeveral pictures of that family painted on glaſs; at the upper end of the choir, at the right of the altar-place, ſtands the freed-ſtool, made of one entire ſtone, to which whoſoever fled had a right of protection; at the upper end of the body of the church, next the choir, hangs an ancient table, with the picture of king Athelſtane, who founded the church; between them is this inſcription,

Als free make I thee,
As heart can wiſh, or egh can ſee.

Hence the inhabitants pay no toll in any town or port in England. In the body of the church ſtands an ancient monument, called the virgins' tomb, becauſe two virgin ſiſters lie buried there, who gave the town a piece of land, into which any free man may put three milch cows, from Lady-day to Michaelmas; at the lower end of the body of the church is a large font of agate ſtone.

Near the minſter, on the ſouth ſide of it, is a place called Hall-Garth, wherein they keep a court of record, called Proveſt's-court; in this cauſes ariſing within the liberties may be tried for any ſum. The liberties contain above a hundred towns and parts of towns, in Holderneſſe and other parts of the Eaſt-Riding belonging to it. The town is a mile in length, having pleaſant ſprings running quite through it. It is beautified with two ſtately churches, and has a free-ſchool, with two fellowſhips, ſix ſcholarſhips, and three exhibitions in St. John's college, Cambridge, belonging to it; beſides ſix alms-houſes, where none are admitted but thoſe that give bond to leave their effects to the poor when they die.

It has two markets, on Wedneſdays and Saturdays; and four fairs, on Thurſday before Valentine's-day, Holy-Thurſday, July 5, and November 5, for cattle, horſes, and ſheep.

The principal trade of this town is making malt, oat-meal, and tanned leather, and the poor people chiefly ſupport themſelves by making bone lace. About a mile eaſt from the town, there is a mineral water, which cures eruptions of the ſkin, and is beneficial in the king's evil. Beverley is nine miles from Kingſton on Hull, and one hundred and eighty-one miles from London. Long. 0. 9. E. Lat. 53. 50. E.

BEVERLEY (JOHN of) in Latin Joannes Beverlacius, archbiſhop of York in the eighth century, was born of a noble family, at Harpham, in Northumberland, and was juſtly eſteemed one of the beſt ſcholars of his time. He was firſt a monk, and afterwards abbot of the monaſtery of St. Hilda, when his merit recommending him to the favour of Alfred king of Northumberland, who, in the year 685, advanced him to the ſee of Haguſtald, or Hexham, and, in 687, tranſlated him to the archbiſhoprick of York. This prelate was tutor to the famous Bede, and lived in the ſtricteſt friendſhip with Acca and other Anglo-Saxon doctors, ſeveral of whom he engaged to write comments on the Holy Scriptures. In 704, he founded a college at Beverley, for ſecular prieſts, and after he had governed the ſee of York, thirty-four years, being tired of the tumults and confuſions that prevailed in the church, diveſted himſelf of his epiſcopal character, and retired to Beverley, and died four years after, on the 7th of May, 721. He wrote, 1. An Eſſay towards an Expoſition of St. Luke. 2. Homilies on the Goſpels; and other works. Between three and four hundred years after his death, his body was taken up by Alfric, archbiſhop of York, and placed in a ſhrine richly adorned with ſilver, gold, and precious ſtones; and in 1416, the day of his death was, by a ſynod held at London, appointed a feſtival. Bede and other monkiſh writers aſcribe ſeveral miracles to him, of which we ſhall only mention the following: a youth, who had been dumb from his infancy, being brought to the biſhop, he ordered him to put out his tongue, and making the ſign of the croſs upon it, he commanded him to draw it in again; then he bid him pronounce the letter A, which he readily did; then the letter B, and ſo on quite through the alphabet; next he tried him with ſingle words, and afterwards with ſentences, and from that time the young man had the entire uſe of ſpeech.

BEVERLEY (JOHN) a Carmelite monk, and doctor and profeſſor of divinity at Oxford. flouriſhed about the year 1390, in the reign of Richard II. and wrote, in Latin, Queſtions on the Maſter of the Sentences, and Diſputations on uſeful Topics.

BEVERNINK (JEROM) one of the moſt able men, in the ſeventeenth century, in embaſſies and important negociations, was born at Gouda, in Holland, April 25, 1614. He was ſent ambaſſador extraordinary to the protector in England, in 1654, and concluded the peace between England and Holland; he was afterwards ſent into Spain, under the ſame character, and met with the ſame ſucceſs; and in 1679, concluded a treaty of peace and commerce between Sweden and the States General. He died Oct. 30, 1690, at the age of ſeventy-ſix.

BEULANIUS, a divine and hiſtorian, who flouriſhed in the year 1600, was a Briton by birth. He had a very extenſive knowledge, and great fluency of ſtyle. He was extremely induſtrious in examining into the antiquities of nations, and tracing out the families of the Engliſh Saxons, after they had entered Britain; and from theſe collections he is ſaid to have written his work De Genealogiis Gentium.

BEULANIUS (SAMUEL) a learned divine and hiſtorian of the ſeventh century, was ſon of the preceding, and born in Northumberland, but educated almoſt from his infancy in the Iſle of Wight. He was a man of a very humane and mild diſpoſition, a good hiſtorian, and well ſkilled in geometry. He wrote, 1. An Hiſtory of the Iſle of Wight; and, in Latin, 2. Annotations upon Nennius. 3. An Hiſtory of the Actions of King Arthur in Scotland; and, 4. An Hiſtorical Itinerary. He flouriſhed in the year 640.

BEWDLY,

BEWDLY, a town in Worceſterſhire, with a market on Saturdays. It ſends two members to parliament, and is governed by a bailiff, twelve capital burgeſſes, a recorder, a ſteward, a town-clerk, and two ſerjeants at mace. It is pleaſantly ſeated on the river Severn, and was formerly accounted a very delightful place; for which reaſon Henry VII. built a houſe here for prince Arthur, and called it Tiken hall. It is a neat well-built town, and has a good trade for malt, leather, and caps; the market is conſiderable for barley; it has three fairs, on April 23, for horned cattle, horſes, cheeſe, linen and woollen cloth; on December 10, for hogs only; and on December 11, for horned cattle, horſes, cheeſe, linen and woollen cloth. It is one hundred and twenty-ſeven miles north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 20. W. Lat. 52. 25. N.

BEYS (GILES) a famous printer of Paris in the ſixteenth century, was the firſt printer who, in his editions, diſtinguiſhed the j and v conſonants from the i and u vowels.

BEZA (THEODORE) one of the principal pillars of the reformed church, was born at Vezelai, in Burgundy, June 24, 1519. He was brought up by his uncle Nicholas de Beza, counſellor of the Parliament of Paris, till the month of December, 1528, when he ſent him to ſtudy at Orleans, and afterwards at Bourges, where he was under the care of Melchior Wolmar, under whom he made an extraordinary progreſs in polite learning, and from him imbibed the principles of Calviniſm. His uncle intended him for the bar; but the law not ſuiting his diſpoſition, he ſpent moſt of his time in reading the Greek and Latin authors, and in compoſing verſes. In 1539, he took up his licentiate's degree, and went to Paris. Ten years after, he accepted of the Greek profeſſorſhip of Lauſanne, where he alſo read lectures in French, on the New Teſtament, to the refugees of both ſexes, who dwelt in that city. He afterwards preached at Geneva, where he ſettled in 1559; after which he returned to France, and, at the requeſt of the king of Navarre, aſſiſted at the conference of Poiſſi. He often preached before the queen of Navarre, the prince of Conde, and in the ſuburbs of Paris. After the maſſacre of Vaſſi, he was deputed to complain of that violence to the king, and, in the civil war which followed, attended the prince of Conde. In 1571, he was choſen moderator at the national ſynod of Rochelle; and the year after, aſſiſted at that of Niſmes; after this, he aſſiſted at the conferences of Montbeliard, and at thoſe of Bern. He wrote, 1. A Tranſlation of the New Teſtament; 2. turned the Pſalms into Latin verſe; 3. publiſhed a Treatiſe on the Sacraments; 4. ſome Sermons on the Paſſion of Jeſus Chriſt and on Solomon's Song; 5. a Verſion of the Canticles, in lyric verſe; 6. a French tragi-comedy, intitled The Sacrifice of Abraham; and many other pieces. He died October 13, 1605. He was a man of merit and ſtrict piety; but he was expoſed to a hundred ſlanders; he however ſhewed both the Catholics and Lutherans, that he knew how to defend himſelf.

BEZIERS. See BESIERS.

BEZONS (JAMES BAZIN, count DE) marſhal of France, was the ſon of Claudius Bazin, lord of Bezons, and counſellor of ſtate in ordinary. He began to ſerve in Portugal, under the count de Schomberg, in 1667, and at length ſignalized himſelf, in a great number of ſieges and battles, till the year 1709, when he was made marſhal of France. He took Landau in 1713, was counſellor to the council of the regency after the death of Lewis XIV. and died at Paris, on the 22d of May, 1733, aged eighty-eight.

BIANCHINI (FRANCIS) one of the moſt learned men of his time, was born at Verona, on the 13th of December, 1662, of a noble and ancient family. His taſte for natural philoſophy and mathematics induced him to eſtabliſh the academy of Aletofili, at Verona. He went to Rome, in 1684, and was made librarian to cardinal Ottoboni, who was afterwards pope under the name of Alexander VIII. he alſo became canon of St. Mary de la Rotonda, and at length of St. Lawrence in Damaſo. He was eſteemed by the learned, and was a member of many academies. He publiſhed ſeveral learned diſſertations, &c. and died on the 2d of March, 1729, aged ſixty-ſeven.

BIAS, a celebrated philoſopher, and one of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, lived about ſix hundred and eight years before Chriſt. He was accuſtomed to ſay, "It is a "ſickneſs of the mind to wiſh for impoſſible things." During the ſiege of Priena, his native city, being aſked why he was the only one who retired from the place without carrying any thing with him, he replied, that he carried his all with him, meaning that his knowledge and virtue were the only bleſſings that were peculiarly his own, ſince they could not be taken from him. He expired while pleading for one of his friends.

BIBERACH, a free imperial city of Suabia, in Germany, ſeated on the river Ruſs, between the cities of Ulm and Conſtance. It has mineral waters, which are greatly eſteemed. The government is divided between the papiſts and proteſtants. It carries on a trade in dimity, and is eight miles eaſt of Buchaw, eighteen ſouth-weſt of Ulm, and three hundred and thirty north of Lindaw. Long. 10. 2. E. Lat. 48. 4. N.

BIBIENA (FERDINAND GALLI) an excellent painter and architect, was born at Bologna, in 1657, and was ſurnamed Bibiena from a territory of that name in Tuſcany, in which his father was born. He acquired ſuch reputation by his ſkill in architecture, the decorations of the theatre, and perſpective, that the duke of Parma invited him to his court, and made him his firſt painter and architect. Bibiena at length went to the emperor's court, where he had the ſame honours and advantages. He wrote two books of architecture, and died at Bologna, at above eighty years of age. His ſons followed with ſucceſs, the ſame profeſſions.

BIBLIANDER (THEODORUS) profeſſor of divinity at Zurich, was born at Biſchofszel, in Switzerland, in the year 1504. He was a man of univerſal learning, but chiefly excelled in expounding the Scriptures. He filled the chair of divinity profeſſor at Zurich, from the year 1532 to 1560. He wrote a new edition of the Koran, which he publiſhed with notes, and many other books, moſt of which are ſtill preſerved, in manuſcript, in the library of Zurich. He died September 24, 1564.

BIBLIS, in fabulous hiſtory, a nymph, who not being able to gain the affection of her brother, wept till ſhe became a fountain.

BICETRE, a caſtle in the Iſle of France, two miles from Paris, where they ſhut up mad people, beggars, vagabonds, gypſies, and diſobedient children.

BICESTER, a town of Oxfordſhire, with a church, a meeting-houſe, and a market on Fridays; with four fairs, held on Friday in Eaſter-week, firſt Friday in June, Auguſt 5, and December 13, for horſes, cows, ſheep, pigs, wool, toys, &c. It is ſeated at the head of a ſmall rivulet which falls into the Cherwell, and is a ſtraggling town, except about the market-place. It is thirteen miles north eaſt of Oxford, ſixty-ſeven weſt-ſouth weſt of Cambridge, and fifty-ſix ſouth-weſt of London. Long. 1. 5. W. Lat. 51. 46. N.

BIDACHE, a town of France, in Lower Navarre, with a caſtle, ſeated on the river Bidouſe, thirteen miles eaſt of Bayonne. Long. 1. 10. W. Lat. 41. 31. N.

BIDAL D'ASFELD (CLAUDIUS FRANCIS) marſhal of France, after having ſignalized himſelf on ſeveral occaſions, was made lieutenant-general in 1704, and ſent into Spain, where, in 1707, he contributed greatly to the victory of Almanza, took by aſſault the city of Xativa, and that of Denia, and, in 1709, rendered himſelf maſter of Alicant. He continued to ſignalize himſelf by his courage and conduct till the year 1715, when he was created knight of the Golden Fleece. He, the ſame year, became director general of the fortifications in France, and counſellor of the councils of war and the navy. He commanded in chief the German army, in 1734, after the death of the marſhal de Berwick, and, the ſame year, rendered himſelf maſter of Philipſburgh. He had ſoon after the government of Straſbourg, and died at Paris, in 1743.

BIDASSOA, a river of Spain, on the frontiers of France, which has its ſource in the Pyrenean mountains, and falls into the ſea between Andaye and Fontarabia.

BIDDIFORD, a market-town in Devonſhire, ſeated on the ſide of two hills, between which a fine river has its courſe. There is a bridge over the river, through the arch of which ſhips of great burthen may paſs, but then it muſt be without their maſts; at low water, there remains a channel ſufficient for pleaſure-boats. Some have ſaid that carts take this opportunity to paſs the river, becauſe they are not permitted to go over the bridge; but it is a miſtake, for waggons of three ton weight may croſs the bridge, if they pay an acknowledgement to the bridge-warden; the arches are ſo elaſtic, that it will ſhake with the rapid motion of a coach, but not with the lighteſt tread of a horſe, as ſome have aſſerted. The boats uſed on the river are paſſage-boats, and lighters, all which may be hired at a moderate rate.

The town is well built, particularly a new ſtreet fronting the quay, which is bridge-land, and inhabited by people of fortune. The quay itſelf is in the body of the town, and is ſo commodious, that ſhips of two hundred tons may lay their ſides to it and unload without the uſe of a lighter. It is a place of conſiderable trade; but the herring fiſhery has failed many years, and ſo has the manufactory of rock-ſalt into ſalt upon ſalt, by firſt diſſolving it in ſea-water, and then boiling it again. Great quantities of potter's ware are made here, and exported to Briſtol, Wales, and Ireland. The town is governed by a mayor, aldermen, a recorder, capital burgeſſes, ſerjeants, &c. and has a particular court, in which actions for debt are brought in any caſe, and for any ſum. There is a market three days in a week, Tueſdays, Thurſdays, and Saturdays; but Tueſdays and Saturdays are moſt conſiderable; Tueſday's market is well ſerved with corn and other proviſions.

The number of houſes is about five hundred, and allowing five perſons to each houſe, the inhabitants will be about two thouſand five hundred. The church is large, and the greateſt part new built, and yet it will but juſt contain the auditory. It has an organ, and a good ring of bells, which the nearneſs of the water renders very muſical. There is an epitaph in the weſtern wall of the church, that acquaints us that the plague raged with great violence here in 1646. It was ſuppoſed to be caught by children playing with bags of wool, juſt landed on the Quay. There are two diſſenting meeting-houſes, frequented by about a fourth part of the inhabitants; and a grammar-ſchool, endowed with about twenty pounds a year. The longitude of Biddiford is 4. 10. W. latitude 51. 10. N. The diſtance from London two hundred and three miles.

BIDDLE (John) a Socinian writer, was born at Wotton-under-Edge, in Glouceſterſhire, in the year 1615, and educated at Magdalen hall, Oxford. In 1641 he took his degree of maſter of arts, and the magiſtrates of Glouceſter chooſing him maſter of the free-ſchool of St. Mary le Crypt, in that city; he ſettled there, and was much eſteemed for his diligence; but falling into ſome opinions concerning the Trinity, different from thoſe commonly received, and expreſſing his thoughts with too much freedom, he was accuſed of hereſy, and on the 2d of December, 1645, committed to the common jail, though he was then ill of a fever; but was diſcharged on a gentleman's giving bail for his appearance, when the parliament ſhould ſend for him. Six months after, he was ſummoned to appear at Weſtminſter, and a committee being appointed by the parliament to examine him, he freely told them that he did not believe the commonly received notion of the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, but was ready to hear what could be oppoſed againſt him. He was at length, after many delays, committed to the cuſtody of one of their officers, and referred to the aſſembly of divines, ſitting at Weſtminſter, before whom he often appeared, and gave them in writing twelve arguments he had drawn up againſt the divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, which being publiſhed ſoon after, he was ſummoned to appear at the bar of the houſe of commons, where, being aſked if he owned that treatiſe, and the opinions it contained, he anſwered in the affirmative, upon which he was committed to priſon, in September, 1647, and the book burnt by the hangman.

The next year Mr. Biddle drew a greater ſtorm upon himſelf by publiſhing two tracts, one A confeſſion of Faith touching the Holy Trinity, according to the Scripture; and the other The Teſtimonies of Irenæus, Juſtin Martyr, Tertullian, Novatianus, Theophilus, Origen, Euſebius, &c. concerning one God, and the Perſons of the Holy Trinity. Theſe were no ſooner publiſhed, than the aſſembly of divines ſollicited the parliament, and procured an ordinance inflicting death upon thoſe that held opinions contrary to the received doctrine of the Trinity, and ſevere penalties upon thoſe who differed in leſſer matters. Mr. Briddle however eſcaped by a diſſenſion in the parliament, and lying unregarded for ſeveral years, his keepers, upon his giving ſecurity, ſuffered him to go into Staffordſhire, where he was hoſpitably entertained by a juſtice of peace, who, at his death left him a legacy. But Bradſhaw, preſident of the council of ſtate, hearing of the indulgence granted him, had him recalled, and more ſtrictly confined. In this confinement he ſpent his whole ſubſtance, and was reduced to great indigence, till Roger Daniel employed him in correcting an impreſſion of the Greek Septuagint Bible.

In 1651, Biddle was reſtored to liberty, on the publication of the general act of oblivion, and the ſame year publiſhed his Larger and Shorter Chriſtian Catechiſms, for which he was, in 1654, brought to the bar of the houſe of commons, and committed cloſe priſoner to the Gate-houſe; but after about ſix months impriſonment, he was acquitted by the court of king's bench.

The next year being accuſed of blaſphemy, he was ſent to Newgate, and ordered to be tried for his life at the enſuing ſeſſions; but the protector not chooſing to have him either condemned or acquitted, took him out of the hands of the law, and detained him in priſon, till being weary of receiving petitions for and againſt him, he, in 1655, ſent him to St. Mary's caſtle, in the Iſle of Scilly. But in 1658, he was brought back to London by a writ of habeas corpus, and nothing being then laid to his charge, was ſet at liberty, and became paſtor of an independent meeting. Upon the reſtoration of Charles II. when the liberty of the diſſenters was taken away, he reſtrained himſelf from public to more private aſſemblies; but on the firſt of June, 1662, he was ſeized in his lodging, where he and a few of his friends were met for divine worſhip; they were taken before a juſtice of peace, who committed them all to priſon, where they lay till the recorder took ſecurity for their anſwering to the charge brought againſt them at the next ſeſſions. But the court being unable to find a ſtatute whereon to form any criminal indictment, they were referred to the ſeſſions following; and proceeded againſt at common law: each of the hearers was fined twenty pounds, Mr. Biddle one hundred pounds, and to lie in priſon till it was paid: but in leſs than five weeks, he, by his cloſe confinement, contracted a diſeaſe, which put an end to his life, on the 22d of September, 1662, in the forty-ſeventh year of his age. His Life was publiſhed in Latin, in 1682, by Mr. Farrington, of the Inner Temple, who repreſents him as poſſeſſed of extraordinary piety, charity, and humility; he would not diſcourſe of thoſe points in which he diſſered from others, with thoſe that did not appear religious according to their knowledge; and was a ſtrict obſerver himſelf, and a ſevere exactor in others, of reverence in ſpeaking of God and Chriſt. He had ſo happy a memory, that he retained word for word the whole New Teſtament, not only in Engliſh, but in Greek, as far as the fourth chapter of the Revelations of St. John.

BIDENTALES, in Roman antiquity, a college of prieſts inſtituted to perform ſeveral ceremonies and expiations, when any place was blaſted by lightning. Their principal office was ſacrificing a ſheep of two years old, which being, in Latin, called bidens, the place blaſted by lightning obtained the name of bidental.

BIDLOO (Godfrey) author of ſeveral treatiſes in anatomy, was born at Amſterdam, March 12, 1649. In 1688, he was profeſſor of anatomy at the Hague, and, in 1694, at Leyden, when king William III. of England appointed him his phyſician, which he would not accept but on condition of holding his profeſſorſhip, which was readily granted him. He publiſhed, in Latin, 1. The Anatomy of the human Body, demonſtrated in one hundred and five Cuts, explained by the Diſcoveries of the ancient and modern Writers. 2. An Oration upon the Antiquity of Anatomy. 4. A Letter to Anthony Leewenhoek on the Animals ſometimes found in the Liver of Sheep and other Animals. 5. Two Decades of Diſſertations in Anatomy and Chirurgery; and other pieces. He died at Leyden, in April, 1713.

BIENNA, called in German Biel, a town in Swiſſerland, at the north end of a lake of the ſame name. It is moderately large and handſome; is ſeated in a ſpacious plain, on the river Schus, at the foot of a hill covered with vines. It is dependant on the biſhop and prince of Porentru, and at the ſame time partakes of the ſovereignty with him. It is abſolutely independent as to ſpiritual matters, and as to temporal, the biſhop has a mayor, who preſides in the council in his name, when any criminal matters are brought before them. Half of the fines, when they amount to above a crown, belong to the biſhop, with certain tythes and other rents. There are two councils in Bienna; the great one conſiſts of thirty, and the leſs of twenty-four. The burgeſſes are divided into ſix companies, each of which ſends counſellors. The burgomaſter preſides in the council in civil affairs. The inhabitants are of the proteſtant religion, and are in alliance with the cantons of Bern, Soleure, and Friburg. The German language prevails there, but French is underſtood. Bienna is two miles north of Nidau, ſixteen north-weſt of Bern, twelve ſouth-weſt of Soleure, and eighteen north of Friburg. Long. 7. 14. E. Lat. 47. 11. N.

BIETIGKHEIM, a ſtrong town of Suabia, and in the duchy of Wirtemberg. The air is healthy, the wine good, and the fruits excellent. It is ſeated near Beſikheim, Stutgar, and the ſtrong caſtle of Aſberg, at the confluence of a ſmall river with the Ens.

BIEZ (Oudar de) marſhal of France, was deſcended from an ancient and illuſtrious family, originally of Artois. After having ſerved in a diſtinguiſhed poſt in Italy and elſewhere, he was made marſhal of France about the year 1543. He at length commanded with ſucceſs in Picardy againſt the Engliſh; but having incurred the diſpleaſure of king Henry II. he was condemned to loſe his head; but this ſentence was changed into perpetual impriſonment, and he was ſent to the caſtle of Loches. At length, however, he was permitted to return to Paris, where he died of grief ſoon after, in 1553. However, his ſentence was reverſed, and his memory reſtored, in 1575.

BIGGLESWADE, a town of Bedfordſhire, with a market on Tueſdays, which is one of the largeſt in England for barley; and ſix fairs, on February 13, Saturday in Eaſter week, Whit-Monday, July 22d, St. Simon and Jude, and October 28, for cattle of all ſorts. It is ſeated on the river Ivel, over which it has a handſome ſtone bridge. This town was formerly inconſiderable, but it is now in requeſt, on account of its commodious inns for paſſengers, it lying on the principal road from London to York. It is ten miles ſouth-weſt from Bedford, and forty-ſix north of London. Long. 0. 15. W. Lat. 52. 5. N.

BIGNON (Jerom) remarkable for his early proficiency in learning, was born at Paris, in the year 1590. He was educated by his father Roland Bignon, who taught him the languages, polite literature, eloquence, philoſophy, mathematics, hiſtory, civil law, and divinity. At ten years of age he gave the public a ſpecimen of his learning, in his Deſcription of the Holy Land; and three years after, he publiſhed a Treatiſe on the City of Rome, and its principal Antiquities and Curioſities; and alſo a ſummary Treatiſe on the Election of the Popes, which introduced him to the acquaintance of the moſt conſiderable perſons in France. Henry IV. having heard of his reputation, appointed him page of honour to the dauphin, when he wrote a Treatiſe of the Precedency of the kings of France, which he dedicated to the king, who ordered him to continue his reſearches on that ſubject. At the death of that prince he retired from court, but was ſoon recalled; when he prepared an edition of the Formulæ of Marculphus; after which he took a journey to Italy, and viſited the moſt eminent men of learning there. Upon his return from his travels, he applied himſelf to the practice of the bar with prodigious ſucceſs, and in 1620 had the poſt of advocate-general in the grand-council. He died April 7, 1656, in the ſixty-ſeventh year of his age.

BIGOIS, a nymph in Tuſcany, who wrote a book on the Art of interpreting Lightning, which was kept at Rome in the temple of Apollo, with ſome other books of the ſame nature.

BIGORRE, a territory or county of France, in the province of Gaſcony; is bounded on the eaſt by the valley of Aure, the vicounty of Nebouſſa, Riviere-Verdun, and Pardiac; by Bearn on the weſt; on the ſouth by the vallies of Brotou and Penticouſe, in Arragon; and on the north by the county of Riviere-Bas, incorporated with Armagnac. It is forty miles from north to ſouth, and eight from eaſt to weſt. It is divided into three parts, the Mountains, the Plains, and the Ruſtan. The Mountains are incloſed between thoſe of the valley of Aure on the eaſt, thoſe of Arragon on the ſouth, thoſe of Bearn on the weſt. This part contains two principal vallies, Lavedan and Barege. The valley of Bigorre is of an oval form, and has the hills of Ruſtan on the eaſt. The remarkable towns of Bigorre are Tarbes the capital, Vic de Bigorre, Lourdeo, Bagneres, Barege, St. Sever de Ruſtan, Jornac, &c. The mountains of this country are a barrier between France and Spain, and there are four different paſſages, which the inhabitants are obliged to guard. Bigorre yields marble, jaſper, ſtone, and ſlate. There are mines of different ſorts, but they are not open. The rivers are the Adour, the Elches, the Arroſet, and the Gave of Lavedan; and there are three lakes.

BIGOT (Emeric) one of the moſt learned and worthy men of the ſeventeenth century, was born at Roan, in 1626. He ſpent his time in nothing but books and the ſciences, and at one time there was an aſſembly held every week at his houſe for learned converſations; he alſo correſponded by letters with a great number of learned men. Though he publiſhed but one book, which was the Life of St. Chryſoſtom, compoſed by Palladius; but his counſels and hints were uſeful to a great many authors. He was modeſt, and an enemy to debates, and never was there a more ſincere and faithful friend. He died at Roan, December 18, 1689, aged about ſixty-four.

Bigot (William) a native of Laval, in la Maine, was born about the end of June, 1502: no nurſe in that city would take care of him, becauſe he was born with two teeth; he had therefore a nurſe in the country, but ſhe dying of the plague, with thirteen others of the ſame family, when he was ſcarce a year old, none of the neighbours would look after him, or even give notice of it to his parents; and he was expoſed without pity under a hedge by the way-ſide; but his father being providentially called by ſome affairs that way, found him in this condition. He had however but little care taken of his education in his youth; but being brought into an unlucky ſcrape at Angers, he was obliged to retire into the country, and there applied himſelf to the ſtudy of Greek, and the liberal ſciences, in which he made a conſiderable progreſs, without the help of a maſter, and at length became a very learned man. He went into Germany with M. de Bellai de Langey, whom the French king ſent to the princes of Germany. He was afterwards made profeſſor of philoſophy at Tubingen; but in 1536 he quitted that poſt, and came to Baſil, where he continued ſome time, and then returned to France, where he found a ſure aſſylum with Meſſrs. du Bellai his patrons. He was ſome time in priſon for having mutilated a man who had been too great with his wife; but was at laſt releaſed.

BIHAEZ, a ſtrong town of the kingdom of Hungary, in an iſland formed by the river Anna, ſixty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Carloſtat. Long. 16. 2. E. Lat. 44. 35. N.

BILBOA, a city of Spain, the capital of the province of Biſcay. It has a good port, which enables the inhabitants to carry on a great trade. Small veſſels come up to the Mote, but thoſe of greater bulk lie farther out. They export wool, fine bar-iron, and military weapons made therewith. It is ſeated on the river Ibaicaval, ſix miles from the ſea. It is large and populous, having one thouſand two hundred houſes, five pariſhes, five monaſteries, ſeven nunneries, and a bridge over the river. The inhabitants have always preſerved themſelves from a mixture with the Jews and Moors, and therefore they will admit no family to ſettle among them but who can prove themſelves to be of the old Chriſtian extraction. Nor will they admit any ſlaves among them, as in the other parts of Spain. Its air is healthful, and ſoil fertile. It is fifty miles weſt of St Sebaſtian, ſixty-five north of Burgos, and one hundred and eighty-eight north of Madrid. Long. 2. 40. W. Lat. 43. 23. N.

BILDESTON, a town of Suffolk, with a market on Wedneſdays, and two fairs, on Aſh-Wedneſday and Holy-Thurſday, for wearing apparel and toys. It is ſeated on a creek, on the river Breton. The principal manufacture is in woollen goods, and chiefly blankets; the women being employed in ſpinning and carding. It is twelve miles ſouth-eaſt of St. Edmund's Bury; and ſixty-ſeven north-by-eaſt of London. Long. 0. 45. E. Lat. 52. 20. N.

BILEDULGERID, or Belad al Jerid, the Country of Dates, is one of the fine large countries of northern Africa, and lies to the ſouth of mount Atlas. It has Barbary on the north, and the Sarrah or Deſert on the ſouth. The air is very hot, the whole country lying between the twenty-ſecond and thirty-ſecond degree of latitude; but it is very healthy. The ſoil is dry and barren, and bears but little corn, except barley; but produces great plenty of dates, from whence the country has its name. They have camels, horſes, and other beaſts. There are many oſtriches, but more ſerpents and ſcorpions. The rivers are inconſiderable, the principal are the Darha, Zis, and Gir. The inhabitants are brutal, laſcivious, and great robbers. The natives of the place have their own kings, but they are tributary to the Turks of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. The Arabs are not ſo bad as the former, but live in a ſort of villages, which conſiſt of about one hundred tents, which they remove from place to place, for the conveniency of paſture. They are a ſort of republicans, and ſerve the kings they live neareſt to. Some of the Arabs live in the Deſert, without laws, and without order, and live upon robbing towns and caravans. All the inhabitants are Mahomedans and Jews. Theſe laſt carry on all the trade, and have ſynagogues in every town.

Biledulgerid Proper, lies to the north of the kingdoms of Tunis and Tripoli; to the weſt of Zeb; to the ſouth of the deſerts of Lempta and Bedoa, and to the weſt of that of Barca. It produces a great quantity of dates, with which it ſupplies part of Barbary. Touſera is its capital.

BILEVELT, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and county of Ravenſburg, ſeven miles ſouth-eaſt of Ravenſburg, ſubject to the king of Pruſſia. Long. 8. 20. E. Lat. 52. 0. N.

BILFINGER (George Bernard) one of the moſt learned men of the eighteenth century, was born at Cronſtadt, in 1693. He ſtudied at Hall, under the celebrated Wolff, and became a great partizan of the philoſophy of Wolff and Leibnitz. After his being ſome time paſtor at Tubingen, he was made profeſſor of philoſophy and morality. In 1725 he was invited to Peterſburg, where, during five years, he was profeſſor of logic, metaphyſics, and morality. On his return to Tubingen, he was made profeſſor in theology,

logy, and received the title of counſellor, and ſeveral other dignities, with conſiderable penſions. Mr. Bilfinger was member of the academies of Peterſburg and Berlin. The court of Ruſſia continued the penſion granted him at Peterſburg, of four hundred florins a year, till the time of his death, which happened in 1750. He was well ſkilled in almoſt all the ſciences; and few men have been ſo univerſally learned. His works are very numerous. The principal of them are, 1. De Harmonia Animæ & Corporis humani maxime Præſtabilita, Commentatio hypothetica. 2. De Origine & Permiſſione Mali. 3. Dilucidationes philoſophicæ de Deo, Anima humana, Mundo & generalibus Rerum Adfectionibus. This laſt work is moſt eſteemed. It is ſaid, that there have been for a long time a remarkable ſingularity in Mr. Bilfinger's family, which is, that all the perſons born in it, have twelve fingers and twelve toes. This is ſaid to have given riſe to the name, which is derived from a ſlight change in the German word Vielfinger, or many fingers.

BILLAUT (ADAM) known by the name of Maſter Adam, was a joiner of Nevers, who became a pretty good French poet. He made himſelf known to the princeſſes of Gonzaga, who dwelt ſome time in the duchy of Nevers; and afterwards, in 1637, ventured to go to Paris, where he was ſo happy as to find patrons, and the duke of Orleans honoured him with a penſion. He publiſhed a collection of poems under the title of Chevilles de Maitre Adam, and died May 19, 1662.

BINI (SEVERINUS) doctor of divinity, and canon of Cologne, was born at Randelraidt, a ſmall borough of Juliers, and publiſhed, in 1606, an edition of the Councils, in four volumes.

BINSFELD (PETER) canon and grand vicar of Treves, lived at the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, and wrote Enchiridion Theologiæ Paſtoralis, and ſome other pieces in the canon law.

BION, a bucolic poet, a native of Smyrna, lived at the ſame time with Ptolemy Philadelphus, and flouriſhed two hundred and eighty-eight years before the Chriſtian æra. He was an incomparable poet, if we may believe the lamentations of his diſciple Moſchus; and the few pieces we have of his do not contradict this teſtimony. He died of poiſon.

BION, ſurnamed Boryſthenes, from his being a native of Boryſthenes, in Syria, was a philoſopher who had a great deal of wit, but very little religion. He lived two hundred and ſeventy-ſix years before Chriſt, and was firſt the auditor of Crates; afterward he took the Cynic habit; after this he devoted himſelf to Theodore, a profeſſed atheiſt; and, at laſt, was a diſciple of Theophraſtus, who was the chief of Ariſtotle's ſect. He had a good talent at jeſting: "The way "to the other world (ſaid he) is eaſy, we go to it with "our eyes ſhut."

BIR, or BEER, a town of Diarbek, in Turky in Aſia, formerly called Meſopotamia, and by the Arabs Aljezerah, or the Iſland. It is the port of Aleppo, and is ſeated on the eaſt ſide of the river Euphrates, on the declivity of a mountain. It is but poorly built, neither is it large or ſtrong, but is pretty well defended by a caſtle, that ſtands on a high rock above the river, and is not eaſy to be taken. The walls of the town are entire, and built as well as the houſes, with ſmall ſquare ſtones, taken from the mountain, which is a ſoft rock; but in the inner part of the town the houſes are in a very bad condition; however, there is plenty of good bread, corn, and fiſh. The country about it is well cultivated, pleaſant, and fertile, producing a great quantity of corn. The Euphrates, or Frat, (for ſo the inhabitants call it) is ſometimes but an ordinary river, but when the waters are out, it may be near a mile in breadth. They ferry over it in flat bottomed boats, and pay a cuſtom to the Turks for their goods and camels, but horſes may paſs free. It is ſeated fifty miles north-eaſt of Aleppo, and thirty-five weſt of Orpha. Long. 38. 6. E. Lat. 36. 10. N.

BIRKENFIELD, a town of Germany, in a principality of the ſame name, and in the circle of the Upper Rhine. It is a walled town, and defended by a caſtle. It ſtands upon the river Nave, twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Treves, and forty ſouth-weſt of Mentz. Long. 7. 9. E. Lat. 49. 35. N.

BIRKENHEAD, or BERKENHEAD (ſir JOHN) a very famous political author in the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of Richard Birkenhead, of Northwych, Cheſhire, who was a ſadler, and, according to ſome authors, kept alſo a little ale-houſe. Our author was born about the year 1615, and was educated at Oxford. King Charles I. recommended him to be choſen reader in moral philoſophy; but being expelled by the parliament viſitors, he retired to London, and there acquired the title of the Loyal Poet, which expoſed him to ſuffer, from thoſe in power, ſeveral impriſonments; however, at the Reſtoration, he was as eminently diſtinguiſhed. In 1661 he was created doctor of the civil law, and ſoon after was elected a burgeſs to ſerve in parliament for Wilton, in the county of Wilts. He was knighted in 1662, and enjoyed ſome offices at court. He wrote, 1. The Aſſembly Man. 2. News from Pembroke and Montgomery. 3. The four-legged Quaker, a ballad. 4. A poem called The Jolt, on Cromwell the Protector's being thrown out of his Coach-box in Hyde-park; and other pieces. He died in Weſtminſter, Dec. 4, 1679.

BIRMINGHAM, a very large town in Warwickſhire, with a market on Thurſdays. It is no corporation, for which reaſon it is open for any perſon to come and ſettle there. This has contributed greatly to the welfare of the town, the increaſe of its buildings, and the enlargement of its trade. The chief manufacture is in iron work, for which it is the moſt remarkable town in England, and of this cutlery ware is the chief. But they work in other branches with different materials, particularly in braſs and leather ſnuff-boxes, &c. in large quantities. And as journeymen's wages, and the prices of proviſions, are moderate, they can afford to ſell all their wares at moderate prices. Beſides the old church, there is a handſome new one erected, as well as a chapel of eaſe, and a fine ſquare, as alſo new ſtreets, all elegantly built, inſomuch, that for extent, beauty, and trade, it is become one of the moſt conſiderable towns in England. There are ſeveral meeting houſes for the diſſenters of different perſuaſions; and yet all theſe places of public worſhip are too few, and too little, for a town which is continually enlarging its dimenſions. It has a charity-ſchool, wherein are maintained and taught upwards of fifty boys and girls, and a free Grammar ſchool, endowed with a large revenue, by king Edward VI. now rebuilt in a ſtately and commodious form. The town is governed only by two conſtables, and has two fairs, on Thurſday in Whitſun-week, and on October 10, for hardware, cattle, ſheep, and horſes. It is nineteen miles north-weſt of Coventry, forty-eight ſouth eaſt of Shrewſbury, and one hundred and ten north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 35. W. Lat. 52. 30. N.

BIRON (ARMAND DE GONTAULT, lord of) marſhal of France, and a celebrated general in the ſixteenth century, ſignalized himſelf by his valour and conduct in ſeveral ſieges and battles. He was made grand maſter of the artillery in 1569, and no body dared to aſſault him at the maſſacre of St. Bartholemew. He was the firſt who declared for Henry IV. he brought a part of Normandy under his ſubjection, and diſſuaded him from retiring to England or Rochelle. But he was killed by a cannon-ball, at the ſiege of Epernay, on the 26th of July, 1592.

BIRON (CHARLES DE GONTAULT, duke of) ſon of the former, and a peer, admiral and marſhal of France, was celebrated for his valour and ſervices. Henry IV. honoured him with his confidence, erected the barony of Biron into a duchy, and loaded him with favours. But Biron becoming ungrateful to his prince, treated with the duke of Savoy and the Spaniards, the enemies of the ſtate, and being convicted of high treaſon, was beheaded in the court of the Baſtile, on the 31ſt of July, 1602, at forty years of age.

BISAGOS, or BISSAGOS ISLANDS, near the coaſt of Guinea, in Africa, lying in about fifteen degrees of weſt longitude, and ten of north latitude. They are thirteen or fourteen in number, and all thoſe that are inhabited have each a chief, which the ſailors have digniſied with the name of kings. They have canoes that will hold near thirty men, with ſome proviſions and arms, which laſt are ſabres and arrows. Their diet is chiefly fiſh, palm oil, and palm nuts, and they have Indian corn and rice to ſell to ſtrangers. They are all idolaters. Caſagut is the moſt conſiderable of theſe iſlands, it being about eighteen miles in length, and two in breadth. It produces Indian corn, rice, pulſe, oranges, and palm trees, beſides others proper to this climate.

BISCAY, a province of Spain, bounded on the north by the ſea called the Bay of Biſcay, on the ſouth by Old Caſtile, on the weſt by Aſturias of Santilana, and on the eaſt by the territories of Alava and Guipuſcoa. It is in length about ſeventy-four miles, but the breadth is much leſs, and very unequal. This country in general is mountainous and barren, but in ſome places it produces corn, and every where a great quantity of apples, oranges, and citrons. They make cyder with the apples, which is their common drink. Beſides this, they have wine called Chacolino, which is pleaſant, but will not keep long, and therefore is uſed inſtead of ſmall-beer. Their vallies produce a little flax, and their hills a great deal of timber for ſhips. The ſea affords them excellent fiſh of all ſorts. The wool that is exported here comes from Old Caſtile; but their greateſt riches are produced by their mines of iron, which metal is extremely good, and is tranſported to all parts. They have likewiſe artificers that work in iron, who, in particular, are famous for working ſwords and knives. The natives of this province, who are of Celtic extract, ſtill retain their old laws, cuſtoms, and language. They are active, induſtrious, brave, hardy, cholerick, and make the beſt ſoldiers and ſailors in all Spain. Some ſay their language has no analogy with any now ſpoken in Europe. The chief towns in it are Bilboa, Ordunna, Durango, Fontarabia, St. Sebaſtian, Toloſa, and Victoria.

BISCAY (NEW) a province of North America, in the audience of Guadalajara. It has New Mexico on the north, Culiacan on the weſt, Zacatecas on the ſouth, and Panuca, with Florida, on the eaſt. It is about three hundred miles from eaſt to weſt, and three hundred and ſixty from north to ſouth. In general it is well watered, fruitful, moderately temperate, and abounds in all ſorts of proviſions, except the mountains of Topia, which are barren. The original inhabitants are not all brought under ſubjection, they having four large towns in the moraſſes, that are of difficult acceſs; for this reaſon the Spaniards have built three ſmall towns, which are well inhabited, for the defence of their ſilver mines. The latitude is from twenty-five to twenty-eight degrees.

BISCHOFISHEIM, a town of Germany, in the arbiſhoprick of Mentz, and circle of the Lower Rhine, is ſeated on the river Tauber, near the frontiers of Franconia, twenty miles weſt of Wurtſburg. Long. 9. 37. E. Lat. 49. 40. N.

BISCHOFF-ZELL, a town of Swiſſerland, belonging to the biſhop of Conſtance, but the Proteſtants have equal privileges with the Roman Catholics. There is a caſtle wherein the biſhop's bailiff reſides, who receives half the fines, but he has nothing to do with the town, nor is there any appeal from the council of the town. It is ſeated on the Thur, at the place where the Sitter falls into this river, almoſt half way between Conſtance and St Gall, being twelve miles ſouth of the firſt, and nine north of the latter. Long. 9. 23. E. Lat. 47. 33. N.

BISCHOFS WERDA, a town of Miſnia, in the circle of Upper Saxony, three miles from Dreſden. It was taken by the Swedes in 1639 and 1641.

BISEGLIA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and territory of Bari, with a biſhop's ſee. It is near the gulph of Venice, eight miles from Trani. Long. 16. 49. E. Lat. 41 18. N.

BISERTA, a maritime town of Africa, in the kingdom of Tunis. It is large, rich, ſtrong, and full of pirates. It is ſeated on the coaſt of the Mediterranean Sea, thirty eight miles north-weſt of Tunis. Long. 10. 40. E. Lat. 37. 20. N.

BISHOPS-CASTLE, a town in Shropſhire, with a good Market on Fridays, and ſix fairs, held on the Friday before February 13, on the Friday before Good-Friday, the firſt Friday day after May-Day, July 5, September 9, and November 13, for ſheep, horned cattle, and horſes. It is ſeated not far from the river Clun, and is an ancient corporation, enjoying great privileges. It is governed by a bailiff, recorder, and fifteen aldermen, out of whom the ſaid bailiff is choſen yearly, and is juſtice of the peace and quorum that and the enſuing year. The members of parliament are choſen by a majority of the burgeſſes and inhabitants. It is ſeventeen miles ſouth-weſt of Shrewſbury, and one hundred and fifty-two north-weſt of London. Long. 3. 25. W. Lat. 52. 30. N.

BISHOP-AND-HIS-CLERKS, ſome little iſlands and rocks on the coaſt of Pembrokeſhire, near St. David's, fatal to mariners.

BISHOPS-STORTFORD, a town in Hertfordſhire, with a market on Thurſdays, and three fairs, on Holy Thurſday, Thurſday after Trinity Sunday, and October 10, for horſes and cattle. It is ſeated on the ſide of a hill, and is a very large, handſome, and well inhabited place, full of inns, for the entertainment of ſtrangers. On the eaſt ſide of the town there are the ruins of a caſtle, ſtanding in an iſle on a very ſteep artificial mount. It ſeems to have been very ſtrong, and within it is a dark and deep dungeon, called the convict's priſon. It was demoliſhed by king John. It is ten miles ſouth-weſt of Ware, and twenty-nine ſouth-weſt of London. Long. 0. 25. E. Lat. 51. 50. N.

BISNAGAR, a kingdom of Aſia, in the peninſula of India, on this ſide the Ganges. It is about two hundred and forty miles in length, and two hundred and thirty-five in breadth, the capital of which is Biſgnagar or Chandegri. This is a large city on a hill, near the river Nagundi, in the centre of the kingdom, and has three walls, with a citadel to defend it. There are ſeveral towns beſides, ſome of which have not been particularly deſcribed by travellers, but thoſe that have will be mentioned in their proper places. The ſea-coaſt is full of ports; of theſe Pelikate belongs to the Dutch, Sadraſtpatan to the Germans, and Madras, or Fort St. George, to the Engliſh. In general the air is very hot, but the nights in the winter ſeaſon are very cold, and it rains hard for three months in the year, almoſt without ceaſing. The ſoil is fruitful and well watered, and abounds in cattle, lions, tygers, elephants, boars, and ſtags. The inhabitants are well ſhaped, of a dark tawny complexion, and lazy, though ſome of them are very ingenious in ſtaining callicoes. The religion is Pagan, except a few Mahometans, and the pagods are very magnificent and numerous. At Outemeda, a town in this kingdom, there is one of the greateſt pagods in all the Indies, built with large free ſtones. It has three towers, on which are ſeveral deformed figures in relievo, and is ſurrounded with a great many ſmall rooms, in which the prieſts have a lodging. About half a mile from this there is a large pond, on the banks of which are ſeveral ſmall pagods, about eight or ten feet ſquare, each of which has its image. They will give a ſtranger ſome of this water to drink, but if in pouring it out their pot touches the ſtranger, they will immediately break it.

There are women who make it their buſineſs to wait in the roads with fire to light the pipes of travellers, and thoſe that have no tobacco they ſupply with it. Some preſent water, in which beans have been boiled, becauſe it is accounted very wholſome; and others give away two or three handfuls of boiled rice to each.

In ſome places the roads have foreſts of Bamboes on each ſide, which are upright, and as tall as trees. They grow ſo cloſe to together, that it is impoſſible for a man to paſs through them. They are hollow like a reed, of which they are a ſpecies, and yet the wood is ſo hard, that it is of great uſe in their buildings. Theſe foreſts are full of monkeys, and thoſe on one ſide the road ſeem to be enemies to thoſe on the other; for if a baſket of rice is ſet down, with a few ſmall ſticks, they will ſoon fall a fighting, and belabour each other till one ſide retreats, and ſometimes not without broken bones. This is often done by travellers, for the ſake of diverſion. They catch the wild elephants here in pitfalls, and afterwards tame them by means of others already tamed, who ſeldom fail of beating them into a mild behaviour. The longitude of the town of this name is 78. 0. E. Lat. 13. 20. N.

BISSAGOS, a cluſter of iſlands, on the coaſt of Negroland, in Africa, a little to the north of Rio Grande, and two hundred miles to the ſouth of the river Gambia. The largeſt is about one hundred miles in circumference, and is inhabited by Pagan Negroes. They are glad to trade with ſtrangers, and uſe them very well.

BISSAUX, an iſland of Africa, on the coaſt of Guinea, or, more properly, Nigritia. It is about an hundred miles in compaſs, and the ground riſes imperceptibly to the middle of the iſland, where there are mountains with vallies between them, from which rivulets deſcend, that fall into the ſea. The land is very fruitful, and well cultivated, abounding with ſeveral ſorts of trees, eſpecially fine large orange trees, which the Portugueſe and Negroes, whoſe houſes are intermixt, plant about their habitations. There is a Portugueſe town and pariſh-church. The negroes have divided this iſland into nine diſtricts, each of which has a governor, over eight of which one preſides, whom they dignify with the title of emperor. Theſe Negroes are called Papels, and have cuſtoms and languages peculiar to themſelves. They have a little idol, which they call Shinah, which is the chief. But every one is at liberty to have a private image of his own. They conſecrate trees, but whether they are gods, or the dwellings of gods, is hard to ſay. To theſe they offer dogs, cats, and bullocks. They ſhed ſome of the blood at the foot of the tree, and ſprinkle the branches with the reſt; and after they have hung the horns of the bullock on the branches, they wiſely divide the fleſh among themſelves, and carry it home. When one of theſe governors, or mock kings, die, they barbarouſly murder his beſt beloved wives and moſt uſeful ſlaves, that they may attend him in the other world. The Portugueſe have a fort on this iſland, with twenty great guns, and as many muſquets. The garriſon conſiſts of twenty negroes, paid by the king of Portugal. The latitude of the middle of the iſland is 11. 23. N.

BISSIGNIANO, a town of the kingdom of Naples, in Italy, and in Calabria Citerior. It is ſeated on a hill, near the river Boccone, and has the title of a principality and biſhop's ſee, immediately under the juriſdiction of the pope. It is defended by a good caſtle, and is eighteen miles north of Coſſenza, fifteen ſouth-weſt of Roſſano, and one hundred and thirty-three ſouth-eaſt of Naples. Long. 16. 35. E. Lat. 13. 20. N.

BITBURG, a town of the Low Countries, in the duchy Luxemburg, nineteen miles from Treves, and twenty-eight north-eaſt of Luxemburg. Long. 6. 43. E. Lat. 50. 0. N.

BITCHE, a town of Lorrain, capital of a territory of the ſame name, and ſeated at the foot of the mountains, near the river Swolbe, eighteen miles weſt of Weiſemberg, eighteen ſouth of Deux Ponts, and twenty-five north-by-weſt of Straſburg. Near it is an ancient and ſtrong caſtle, built upon a rock. Long. 7. 44. E. Lat 49. 5. N.

BITETTO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and territory of Bari, with a biſhop's ſee. Long. 16. 56. E. Lat. 41. 8. N.

BITONTO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and territory of Bari, with a biſhop's ſee. Here the Spaniards gained a deciſive victory over the Auſtrians in 1734, which rendered them maſters of the kingdom of Naples. It is ſeated in a fine plain, eight miles ſouth of the gulph of Venice, ten ſouth-weſt of Bari, and one hundred and eighteen eaſt-by-north of Naples. Long. 17. 40. E. Lat. 41. 20. N.

BITHYNIA, anciently a part of Leſſer Aſia, near the ſtreights of Conſtantinople. It has no modern name.

BITO, a ſmall kingdom of Africa, in Negroland, to the ſouth of the river Niger, whoſe inhabitants are ſaid to be rich.

BIZU, a town of Barbary, in Africa, and in the kingdom of Morocco, capital of the province of Eſcura. It is ſeated on a mountain, in a country abounding in corn, wine, oil, figs, and nuts, and the inhabitants are ſaid to be rich.

BLACKALL, (OFFSPRING) biſhop of Exeter, was born in London in the year 1654, and educated at Catharine hall, in the univerſity of Cambridge. After ſeveral preferments in the church, he was made chaplain in ordinary to king William and queen Mary, and was conſecrated biſhop of Exeter, February 8, 1707. He animadverted upon Mr. Toland for maintaining that king Charles I. was not the author of Icon Baſilike. He engaged in a controverſy with Dr. Hoadley, late biſhop of Wincheſter, on the Inſtitution of Civil Government; and after his deceaſe, which happened at Exeter, on the 20th of November, 1716, his Sermons were collected and publiſhed together, in two volumes, folio. Dr. Blackall was diſtinguiſhed by his extraordinary piety, humility, and benevolence.

BLACK-BANK, a town of Ireland, in the county of Armagh, and province of Ulſter, ſeven miles ſouth of Armagh. Long. 6. 55. W. Lat. 54. 12. N.

BLACKBURN, a town of Lancaſhire, which has a market on Mondays, and a fair on May 21, for horned cattle, horſes, and toys; another on September 30, for horſes and ſmall wares; and another on October 21, for horſes, horned cattle, and toys. It has its name from the brook Blackwater, which runs through it, and is ſeated near the river Derwent, twelve miles eaſt of Preſton, and two hundred and three north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 53. 40. N.

BLACK-FOREST, a foreſt of Germany, in Suabia, which runs from north to ſouth, between Ortnau, Briſgaw, part of the duchy of Wirtemberg, the principality of Fuſtemburg, towards the ſource of the Danube, as far as the Rhine, above Baſil. It is part of the Hyrcinian foreſt.

BLACK, or EUXINE SEA, lies between Europe and Aſia, and is bounded by Tartary on the north, by Circaſſia, Mingrelia, and Georgia, on the eaſt, by Natolia on the ſouth, and by Romania, Bulgaria, and Beſſarabia, on the weſt. It is five hundred and eighty miles in length, and three hundred in breadth where broadeſt. It receives ſeveral large rivers, as the Danube, which firſt receives a great number of rivers, from ſeveral countries in Europe, the Neiſter, the Nieper, the Don, the Copo, and the Phaſis. The prodigious quantity of water diſcharged by theſe rivers into this ſea has puzzled many ingenious naturaliſts, to account for its not riſing any higher, ſince the only ontlet is the Thracian Boſphorus, which is nothing near ſo large as any of the rivers before mentioned. Hence they concluded that the Black Sea muſt empty itſelf by ſubterranean channels, which they imagined might run through Aſia and Europe. But they forgot the principal cauſe which preſerves the equilibrium of the waters in general, which is the evaporation by the heat of the ſun. To this may be added the action of the winds, which doubtleſs carry off great quantities of watry particles; for it is well known that wet clothes, expoſed to a briſk wind, will ſoon become dry, which can be from no other reaſon than from its carrying off the moiſture. Therefore, as the wind is almoſt conſtantly bruſhing on the ſurface of the ſea, it is no wonder it ſhould, together with the ſun, raiſe up a great deal of water into the air, for the formation of clouds, which falling on the earth, ſerves to ſupply the rivers by a conſtant circulation. Now the higher the land is, the more it will attract moiſture from the clouds, which is the caſe of hills and mountains; and it is generally known that the ſources of all the great rivers in the world proceed from hence, and that they all run back by different courſes into the ſea again. Thus, by the wiſe œconomy of nature, or, to ſpeak more properly, of the God of nature, the fertility of the earth is preſerved, and moſt lands are rendered fit to produce ſuch herbs and fruits as are moſt proper for the nouriſhment of man and beaſt. Therefore there is no occaſion to ſuppoſe, as ſome have done, that the waters have forced their way through the narrow channel of the Thracian Boſphorus into the Mediterranean. And indeed it muſt equally puzzle theſe philoſophers to determine the reaſon why the Mediterranean has not riſen high enough in ſo many thouſand years, to overflow or drown all the adjacent lands, particularly Egypt, which, on account of its lowneſs, ſeems to be ſo liable thereto. But this is ſo far from being the caſe, that Egypt has been obſerved to gain ground of the ſea, aſſiſted by the mud that is annually brought down by the river Nile. But to return to the ſubject: the Black Sea is entirely ſurrounded by the grand ſeignor's dominions, and he enjoys the ſole navigation of it, though it is ſometimes diſturbed by the excurſions of the Coſſacks, who iſſue out of the mouth of the Nieper, and make great ravages on the coaſts of Turky. The Turks reckon it a very tempeſtuous ſea, whence it has the name of the Black Sea. But what renders it moſt dangerous is the want of good harbour to put into, in caſe of a ſtorm, for there are but few of theſe in its whole circuit.

BLACKWATER, a river of Ireland, that runs through the counties of Cork and Waterford, and falls into Youghall Bay.

BLACKWATER, a river of Ireland, that runs through the county of Armagh, and falls into Lough Neagh.

BLACKMORE (ſir RICHARD) phyſician to king William III. and queen Anne, and a poet too voluminous, and of diſputed merit, was the ſon of Mr. Richard Blackmore, an attorney at law. He ſtudied at Weſtminſter ſchool, from whence he removed to the univerſity of Oxford, where he continued thirteen years, and afterwards taking the tour of Europe, took up his degrees in phyſic at Padua. Having viſited France, Italy, Germany, and the Netherlands, he returned to England, and having made medicine his principal ſtudy, practiſed in London, and was ſoon after choſen fellow of the college of phyſicians. His zeal for the Revolution recommended him to king William III. who, in 1697, made him one of his phyſicians in ordinary. That prince alſo conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and preſented him with a gold medal and chain. Upon that king's death he was one of thoſe who gave their opinion on the opening of his majeſty's body. Upon queen Anne's acceſſion to the throne he was appointed one of her phyſicians, and continued ſo for ſome time. Sir Richard is chiefly known as a poet, or rather as only a pretender to poetry; for as ſuch he is repreſented by ſome of the beſt poets of his time. It is true that he wrote many good verſes, and a greater number of bad ones than the great poets his enemies; but there were other motives for their treating him unmercifully; he was a friend to the Revolution, had been favoured at court, and Dryden, Pope, and Swift, were of the oppoſite party. He was not, however, ſo deſpicable a character as they have repreſented him. He was a chaſte writer, and exerted himſelf in the cauſe of virtue; he was not afraid of appearing her advocate, and of ſtripping vice of thoſe gaudy colours in which ſhe had been repreſented. The poem for which ſir Richard has been moſt celebrated was the Creation, which was extolled by Mr. Addiſon in the Spectator, No. 339, where he obſerves, that it deſerves to be looked upon as one of the moſt uſeful and noble productions in our Engliſh verſe. "The reader (he adds) cannot but be pleaſed to find the depths of philoſophy enlivened by all the charms of poetry, and to ſee ſo great a ſtrength of reaſoning amidſt ſo beautiful a redundancy of the imagination. The author has ſhewn us that deſign in all the works of nature, which neceſſarily leads us to the knowledge of the firſt cauſe, &c." Mr. Addiſon has not, however, eſcaped cenſure for this praiſe. Sir Richard died on the 9th of October, 1729, in a very advanced age, leaving behind him the character of a worthy man, and a friend to religion. He wrote. 1. Eſſays on ſeveral ſubjects, two volumes, octavo. 2. Hiſtory of the Conſpiracy againſt king William III. a few Theological Tracts, and the following poetical and medicinal pieces: 3. Creation. 4. The Redeemer. 5. Eliza. 6. King Arthur. 7. Prince Arthur. 8. King Alfred. 9. A new Verſion of the Book of Pſalms. 10. A Paraphraſe on the Book of Job. 11. The Nature of Man. 12. A Collection of Poems. 13. A Treatiſe on the Small-Pox. 14. A Diſcourſe on the Plague. 15. A Treatiſe on Conſumptions. 16. Another on the Spleen and Vapours. 17. A critical Diſſertation on the Spleen. 18. Diſſertations on Dropſies. 19 Diſcourſes on the Gout.

BLACKWELL (GEORGE) a learned Engliſh writer of the church of Rome, in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, was born in the county of Middleſex, and educated at Trinity college, Oxford, where he obtained a fellowſhip; but being inclined to the popiſh religion, went abroad to one of the Engliſh ſeminaries, erected to receive the exiled Engliſh Catholics, and was at laſt, in 1598, inveſted with the authority and title of archprieſt of England, and appointed notary of the apoſtolic ſee; but being ſeized at London in 1607, and committed to priſon, he was deprived of his office; however, he ſoon obtained his liberty by taking the oath of allegiance. He was engaged in a warm controverſy with the Engliſh Catholic clergy, and declared his abhorrence of the Powder plot. He wrote, 1. Letters to the Romiſh Prieſts, touching the Lawfulneſs of taking the Oath of Allegiance. 2. Letters to the Engliſh Catholics. 3. Anſwers upon ſundry Examinations, while he was a Priſoner; and other pieces. He died ſuddenly, January 12, 1612-13.

BLAEU. See BLEAU.

BLAGRAVE (JOHN) a very eminent Engliſh mathematician, who flouriſhed in the ſixteenth and ſeventeenth centuries, was the ſecond ſon to John Blagrave, of Bulmarſh-court, Berks. He was educated at St. John's college, Oxford, and afterwards retired to his patrimonial ſeat at Southcote Lodge, where he enjoyed a learned privacy, employing himſelf in the ſtudy of the mathematics. He wrote, 1. A Mathematical Jewel. 2. Of the Making and Uſe of the Familiar Staff. 3. Aſtrolabium Uranicum generale; and, 4. The Art of Dialing. He died at Reading, Auguſt 9, 1611.

BLAIR (JAMES) an eminent divine, was born and bred in Scotland, where he had at length a benefice in the epiſcopal church; but meeting with ſome diſcouragements, he came to England, in the latter end of the reign of king Charles II. and was ſent by Dr. Compton as a miſſionary to Virginia, and was afterwards, by the ſame biſhop, made commiſſary for that colony, the higheſt office in the church there. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his exemplary conduct and unwearied labours in the work of the miniſtry; and finding that the want of proper ſeminaries for the advancement of religion and learning, was a great damp upon all attempts for the propagation of the Goſpel, he formed a deſign of erecting and endowing a college at Williamſburgh, in Virginia, for profeſſors and ſtudents in academical learning. He therefore not only ſet on foot a voluntary ſubſcription, but, in 1693, came to England to ſolicit the affair at court, when queen Mary was ſo well pleaſed with the noble deſign, that ſhe eſpouſed it with particular zeal, and king William readily concurring with her majeſty, a patent was paſſed for erecting and endowing a college by the name of the William and Mary college, of which Mr. Blair was appointed preſident, and enjoyed that office near fifty years. He was alſo rector of Williamſburgh, and preſident of the council in that colony. He wrote Our Saviour's divine Sermon on the Mount explained in ſeveral Sermons, four volumes, octavo; and died in 1743.

BLAIR of Athol, a caſtle of the duke of Athol, ſeated in the county of Athol, in Scotland, twenty-eight miles north-weſt of Perth. Long. 3. 30. W. Lat. 56. 46. N.

BLAISOIS,

BLAISOIS, a province of France, bounded on the north by Beauce, on the eaſt by Orleanois, on the ſouth by Berry, and on the weſt by Touraine. Blois is the capital town.

BLAKE (Robert) one of the braveſt and moſt ſucceſsful admirals that this or any other nation has ever produced, was born in Auguſt, 1589, and educated at the univerſity of Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts. He was early tinctured with republican principles, and therefore, when the war broke out between the king and parliament, he declared for the latter, and was ſoon made captain of dragoons, and not long after lieutenant-colonel. He, in conjunction with ſir Robert Pye, ſeized Taunton, in Somerſetſhire, and afterwards maintained his poſt againſt Goring, who laid ſiege to it with near ten thouſand men, and though a part of the town was taken, he held out the reſt of it, and the caſtle, till relief came. In 1648-9, he was appointed, in conjunction with colonel Deane and colonel Popham, to command the fleet, and ſoon after blocked up prince Maurice and prince Rupert in Kinſale harbour. In 1652, he was conſtituted ſole admiral, when he defeated the Dutch fleet commanded by Van Trump, Ruyter, and De Wit, in three ſeveral engagements, in which the Dutch loſt eleven men of war, thirty merchant-ſhips, and, according to their own accounts, had fifteen thouſand men ſlain. Soon after, Blake and his colleagues, with a grand fleet of an hundred ſail, ſtood over to the Dutch coaſt, and forced their fleet to fly for ſhelter into the Texel, where they were kept for ſome time by Monk and Dean, while Blake ſailed northward. At laſt, however, Trump got out, and drew together a fleet of an hundred and twenty men of war; and, on the 3d of June, the generals Dean and Monk came to an engagement with the enemy off the North Foreland, with indifferent ſucceſs; but the next day Blake coming to their aſſiſtance with eighteen ſhips, gained a complete victory; ſo that if the Dutch had not ſaved themſelves on Calais ſands, their whole fleet had been ſunk or taken.

In November, 1654, Cromwell ſent him with a ſtrong fleet into the Mediterranean, with orders to ſupport the honour of the Engliſh flag, and to procure ſatisfaction for any injuries that might have been done to our merchants. In the beginning of December, Blake came into the road of Cadiz, where he was treated with all imaginable reſpect; a Dutch admiral would not hoiſt his flag while he was there; and his name was now grown ſo formidable, that a French ſquadron having ſtopped one of his tenders, which had been ſeparated from Blake in a ſtorm, the admiral, as ſoon as he knew to whom it belonged, ſent for the captain on board, and drank Blake's health before him with great ceremony, under a diſcharge of five guns, and then diſmiſſed him. The Algerines were ſo much afraid of him, that, ſtopping the Sallee rovers, they obliged them to deliver up what Engliſh priſoners they had on board, and then ſent them freely to Blake, in order to purchaſe his favour. This, however, did not prevent his coming on the 10th of March before Algiers, and ſending an officer on ſhore to the dey to demand ſatisfaction for the piracies committed on the Engliſh, and the releaſe of all the Engliſh captives. The dey, in his anſwer, alledged, that the ſhips and captives belonged to private men, and therefore he could not reſtore them without offending all his ſubjects, but that he might eaſily redeem them; and if he thought good, they would conclude a peace with him, and for the future offer no acts of hoſtility to the Engliſh; and having accompanied this anſwer with a large preſent of freſh proviſions, Blake left Algiers, and ſailed on the ſame errand to Tunis, the dey of which place not only refuſed to comply with his requeſt, but denied him the liberty of taking in freſh water. "Here, ſaid "he, are our caſtles of Goletta and Porto Ferino; do your "worſt; do you think we fear your fleet?" Blake, at hearing this, began, as his cuſtom was when highly provoked, to curl his whiſkers, and, after a ſhort conſultation with his officers, bore into the bay of Porto Ferino with his great ſhips and their ſeconds, and coming within muſquet-ſhot of the caſtle and the line, fired on both ſo warmly, that in two hours time the caſtle was rendered defenceleſs, and the guns on the works along the ſhore were diſmounted, though ſixty of them played at a time on the Engliſh. Blake found nine ſhips in the road, and ordered every captain to man his long-boat with choice men, to enter the harbour and fire the Tuniſeens, which they happily effected, with the loſs of twenty-five men killed, and forty-eight wounded, while he and his men covered them from the caſtle by playing continually on them with their great guns. This daring action ſpread the terror of his name through Africa and Aſia. From Tunis he ſailed to Tripoli, cauſed the Engliſh ſlaves to be ſet at liberty, and concluded a peace with that government. Thence returning to Tunis, the Tuniſeens implored his mercy, and begged him to grant them peace, which he did upon terms highly advantageous to England. He next ſailed to Malta, and obliged the knights to reſtore the effects taken by their privateers from the Engliſh; and by theſe great exploits, ſo raiſed the glory of the Engliſh name, that moſt of the princes and ſtates in Italy thought fit to pay their compliments to the protector, by ſending ſolemn embaſſies to him.

He paſſed the next winter either in lying before Cadiz or in cruiſing up and down the Streights, and was at his old ſtation, at the mouth of that harbour, when he received information that the Spaniſh plate fleet had put into the bay of Santa Cruz, in the iſland of Teneriffe, on which he weighed anchor, with twenty-five men of war, on the 13th of April 1657, and on the 20th, rode with his ſhips off the bay of Santa Cruz, where he ſaw ſixteen Spaniſh ſhips lying in the form of a half-moon. Near the mouth of the haven ſtood a caſtle, furniſhed with great ordnance, beſides which there were ſeven forts round the bay, with ſix, four, and three guns on each, joined to each other by a line of communication manned with muſqueteers. To make all ſafe, Don Diego Diagues, general of the Spaniſh fleet, cauſed all the ſmaller ſhips to be moored cloſe along the ſhore, and the ſix large galleons ſtood farther out at anchor, with their broadſides towards the ſea. Blake having prepared for the fight, a ſquadron of ſhips was drawn out to make the firſt onſet, commanded by captain Stayner in the Speaker frigate, who no ſooner received orders, but ſailed into the bay, and fell upon the Spaniſh fleet, without the leaſt regard to the forts, which ſpent their ſhot prodigally upon them. No ſooner were theſe entered into the bay, but Blake following after, placed ſeveral ſhips to pour broadſides into the caſtle and forts, and theſe played their parts ſo well, that, after ſome time, the Spaniards found their forts too hot to be held. In the mean time, Blake ſtruck in with Stayner, and bravely fought the Spaniſh ſhips, out of which the enemy were beaten by two o'clock in the afternoon, when Blake, finding it impoſſible to carry them away, ordered his men to ſet them on fire, which was done ſo effectually, that they were all reduced to aſhes, except two, which ſunk downright, nothing remaining above the water but part of the maſts. The Engliſh having now obtained a complete victory, were reduced to another difficulty by the wind, which blew ſo ſtrong into the bay, that they deſpaired of getting out; but while they were in this dreadful exigence, it ſuddenly veered about to the ſouth-weſt, (a thing not known in many years before) which brought Blake and his fleet ſafe to ſea again, though the Spaniards from the caſtle played their great guns perpetually upon them as they paſſed by. This is allowed to have been one of the moſt remarkable actions that ever happened at ſea; and the earl of Clarendon obſerves, that it was ſo miraculous, that all men who knew the place wondered that any ſober man, with what courage ſoever endued, ſhould undertake it. This was, however, the laſt action of his life, for he died upon his return in Plymouth Sound, on the 17th of Auguſt, 1657, aged fifty-nine, and was interred, on the 4th of September, with great funeral pomp, in Weſtminſter abbey; but four years after, this brave and excellent commander was taken up, and ignominiouſly buried in a pit, in St. Margaret's church-yard.

The lord Clarendon obſerves, that he was the firſt man who brought ſhips to contemn caſtles on ſhore, which had ever been thought very formidable, and were diſcovered by him to make a noiſe only, and to fright thoſe who could be rarely hurt by them. He was the firſt that infuſed that degree of courage into ſeamen, by making them ſee by experience what mighty things they could do, if they were reſolved; and the firſt that taught them to fight in fire as well as in water.

BLAMONT, a town of Lorrain, ſeated on the river Veſouze, twelve miles north-eaſt of Luneville. Long. 6. 50. E. Lat. 48. 35. N.

BLANC, a town of France, in Berry, ſeated on the river Creuſe, by which it is divided into two parts. In the Upper Town, there is a caſtle; and in the Lower, a priory and a convent. The land about it is barren, full of trees, heath, and lakes. It is thirty-five miles eaſt of Poitiers. Long. 1. 13. E. Lat. 46. 38. N.

Blanc, Lewis le. See Beaulieu.

BLANCA, an uninhabited iſland in America, near Terra Firma, to the north of the iſland of Marguarita. It is about fifteen miles in compaſs, and has a great many tortoiſes or turtles. Long. 64. 30. W. Lat. 11. 50. N.

BLANCO, a cape or promontory of Africa, in the Atlantic Ocean, one hundred and eighty miles north of the river Senegal. Long. 18. 30. W. Lat. 20. 0. N.

Blanco, a cape or promontory of Peru, in South America, on the coaſt of the South Sea, one hundred and twenty miles ſouth-weſt of Guiaquil. Long. 81. 10. W. Lat. 3. 45. S.

BLANCHART (James) an excellent painter, was born at Paris, and learnt the rudiments of his profeſſion under Nicholas Bolleri, his uncle; but left him at twenty years of age, and travelled into Italy. He ſtaid two years at Rome, and from thence went to Venice, where he was ſo charmed with the works of Titian, Tintoret, and Paul Veroneſe, that he reſolved to follow their manner; and in this he ſucceeded ſo far, that at his return to Paris, he ſoon became generally eſteemed for the novelty, beauty, and force of his pencil. He painted two galleries at Paris, one belonging to Perault, the firſt preſident, and the other to Bullion, ſuperintendant of the finances; but his capital piece is a picture of the deſcent of the Holy Ghoſt in the church of Notre Dame. He was ſeized, in the flower of his age, with a fever and impoſthume in the lungs, of which he died in 1683. Of all the French painters Blanchart was eſteemed the beſt colouriſt, he having carefully ſtudied this part of painting in the Venetian ſchool.

BLANCHE of Caſtile, queen of France, and mother of St. Lewis, was a lady of very great accompliſhments. She was daughter to Alfonſo IX. king of Caſtile, and married to Lewis of France, eldeſt ſon of Philip Auguſtus, May 23, 1200; ſhe was crowned with her huſband, Lewis VIII. Auguſt 6, 1223, and declared regent, by the laſt will of that prince, during the minority of Lewis IX. their eldeſt ſon, who had then but juſt entered into his twelfth year. The young king was ſcarce crowned when a dreadful civil war broke out, on account of the regency of the kingdom being given to a woman who was a foreigner; but by her prudence ſhe defeated that formidable party as often as they renewed their plots. She was again regent of the kingdom when St. Lewis engaged in the croiſade, but died in 1252, before his return.

There have been ſeveral other princeſſes of this name.

BLANCHET (Thomas) an eminent painter, born at Paris in 1617, rendered himſelf well ſkilled in his profeſſion by his aſſiduous ſtudies and the inſtructions of Pouſſin and Andrew Sacchi. He ſpent the greateſt part of his life at Lyons, which he embelliſhed with his pencil, and died there in 1689. He excelled in deſign and colouring. Moſt of his pictures are at Lyons and Paris.

BLANCHINI. See Bianchini.

BLANDFORD, a town in Dorſetſhire, with a market on Saturday, and three fairs, on March 7, July 10, and November 8, for horſes, ſheep, and cheeſe, and October 10, for pedlar's ware and cattle. It is ſeated on the river Stour, near the Downs. It was burnt down in 1731, but has been ſince rebuilt in a handſomer manner than before. The houſes are now tiled, which were thatched before, and are about five hundred in number; they have likewiſe a new beautiful church; and the market place is enlarged. It is governed by two bailiffs, who are annually choſen out of the aldermen or capital burgeſſes. It is eleven miles ſouth of Shafteſbury, ſixteen north-eaſt of Dorcheſter, and one hundred and ſeven weſt-by-ſouth of London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 50. 50. N.

BLANES, a ſea-port town of Catalonia, in Spain, twenty miles ſouth of Gironne. It is ſeated near the river Tordera, and ſuffered greatly by the French troops, in 1695. Long. 2. 40. E. Lat. 41. 30. N.

BLANKENBERG, a town of Germany, in the circle of Weſtphalia, and in the duchy of Berg, twelve miles eaſt of Bonne. Long. 7. 18. E. Lat. 50. 44. N.

BLANKENBURG, a town of Germany, capital of a county of that name, in the circle of Lower Saxony, ſubject to the duke of Brunſwick-Wolfembuttle. It is a ſmall place, and the houſes are ill built. The inhabitants are ſo indolent and ſtupid, that no encouragement will prevail upon them to raiſe houſes fit for civiliſed perſons to live in; they ſay, "Our fathers have lived into this manner, and we deſire nothing better". It is forty-five miles ſouth eaſt of Wolfembuttle. Long. 11. 20. E. Lat. 51. 50. N.

BLANKENHEIM, a ſmall territory of Germany, with the title of a county, which is part of that of Eyffel, near the archbiſhoprick of Cologn, and duchy of Juliers. The town of that name is defended by a caſtle built upon a mountain.

BLANZAC, a town of France, in Angumois, ſeated on the river Nay, on the frontiers of Saintonge, with a chapter, whoſe principal has the title of an abbé.

BLAREGNIES, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the province of Hainault, ſeated ſeven miles ſouth of Mons. Long. 3. 35 E. Lat. 50. 30. N.

BLASTERES (Matthew) a Grecian monk, of the order of St. Baſil, lived in the fourteenth century, and wrote a Collection of eccleſiaſtical Conſtitutions

BLAUBEUREN, a town of Germany, in the circle of Suabia, twelve miles weſt of Ulm, twelve eaſt of Munſingen, twenty-two miles north-eaſt of Buchaw, and thirty-three eaſt of Tubingen. Long. 9. 57. E. Lat. 48. 22. N.

BLAVET, a ſea-port town of Brittany in France, ſeated at the mouth of a river of the ſame name, which is one of the ſtations of the royal navy of France. It is ſometimes called Port-Lewis, and is ſixty-five miles ſouth-eaſt of Breſt, and ſeventy-five north-eaſt of Nantes. Long. 3. 5. W. Lat. 47. 10. N.

BLAYE, a city of France, in Guienne, ſeated on the river Gironde. It is built on a rock, and has a citadel with four baſtions, which is called the Upper Town. The Lower Town, or ſuburb, is ſeparated from the Upper by a ſmall river. Here the merchants reſide with their magazines. The river at this place is three thouſand eight hundred yards over, for which reaſon they built a battery upon an iſland, in 1689, to command the veſſels that ſail up it. The neighbourhood produces a great deal of corn, which they ſend abroad when the exportation of it is allowed. The port of Blaye is much frequented by ſtrangers. It is eighteen miles north of Bourdeaux, forty ſouth of Saintes, and fifty ſouth-weſt of Angouleſme. Long. 1. 23. W. Lat. 45. 6. N.

BLEAU, or Jansson, (William) in Latin, Janſſonius Cæſius, a celebrated and learned printer at Amſterdam, the friend and diſciple of Tycho Brahe. He wrote an Atlas, a Treatiſe on the Uſe of the Globes, Inſtitutions of Aſtronomy, &c. and died in October, 1638, aged ſixty-ſeven.

BLECHINGLY, a town in Surry, which ſends two members to parliament, tho' it has no market, but it has two fairs, on June 22, and November 2, for horſes, bullocks, and toys. The bailiff, who returns the members, is choſen annually at the lord of the manor's court. It ſtands on a hill, and has a fine proſpect as far as the South Downs, in Suſſex. It is twenty miles eaſt of Guildford, and twenty-one ſouth-by-weſt of London, Long. 17. 15. Lat. 51. 20.

BLEKING, the moſt ſouth-eaſt province of Sweden, having the Baltic Sea to the ſouth, Smaland on the north, and the province of Schonen on the weſt. Its principal towns are Chriſtianſtadt, Elieholm, Ahus, Roterby, and Chriſtianople, which laſt is the capital.

BLENHEIM, a village of Suabia, in Germany, on the weſt ſide of the Danube, three miles north-eaſt of Hochſtet, and twenty-five north-weſt of Augſburg, memorable for the victory of the confederates, under the command of the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene, over the French and Bavarians, Auguſt 2, 1704. Long. 2. 30. E. Lat. 48. 40. N.

BLOCKZIL, a fortreſs of Over-Yſſel, in the United Provinces, ſeated on the river Aa, at the place where it falls into the Zuider-Zee. It has a port ſufficient to contain two hundred veſſels, and ſerves to defend thoſe ſhips that croſs this ſea. It has ſix good baſtions, and ſeveral other regular fortifications. It is eight miles ſouth-weſt of Steinkirk. Long. 6. 0. E. Lat. 52. 44. N.

BLOIS, a town of France, the capital of Blaiſois, in Orleanois, is ſeated on the banks of the river Loire, partly on a plain, and partly on an eminence, in the midſt of one of the moſt agreeable countries of France. The caſtle is the ornament of this city. At the firſt view, it ſeems to be two diſtinct buildings; but it is joined by a paſſage cut out of the rock. Joining to this, on the weſt ſide, is the tower of Chateau-Regnaud, ſo called becauſe that lordſhip may be diſcovered from hence, though twenty miles diſtant. At the eaſt end of this is another ſmall tower, which is partly ancient and partly modern. That part of the caſtle which was built by the duke of Orleans, in the room of that which he demoliſhed in 1632, is a ſuperb edifice, but it was never finiſhed. The court before it, where the church of St. Saviour is built, is prodigious large, and was formerly uſed for tournaments.

The gardens are anſwerable to the beauty and magnificence of the caſtle, the entrance into which is over a bridge upon the ditch, and through a ſtreet which parts them. The moſt remarkable thing in this caſtle is a fine long gallery, adorned with many curious and uncommon pieces; it is in the midſt of two gardens, one of which is full of fruit-trees, and the other of parterres, fountains, caſcades, and marble ſtatues brought from Italy. Beyond theſe, there is a large park, where there is game in abundance. On all the gates of the city there is the image of the Virgin Mary, whom they believe freed them from the plague in 1631. There are ſeveral pariſh-churches, chapters, and religious houſes for both ſexes. The church of St. Solenne is the cathedral, and is the handſomeſt in the city. The front of the Jeſuits church is decorated with three orders of architecture, the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian, but there is only the Doric on the inſide. The town-houſe is a tolerable building, and ſtands in a ſtreet which terminates at the quay, where there is a public walk that has a fine proſpect on the Loire, over which there is a bridge that leads to the ſuburb of Vienne. There are a few houſes on the bridge, and a tower at each end to guard the entrance.

About three quarters of a mile from the city, the water runs down the clefts of a rock into a large aqueduct, by which it is conveyed to a reſervoir near the walls, and from hence they are diſtributed by leaden pipes to the ſeveral parts of the city. The country about Blois produces corn, wine, cattle, and game of every kind, and the waters a great quantity of fiſh. The meadows are ſo rich and fertile, that the cows yield excellent milk good in conſumptive caſes, and affords the beſt cream in the kingdom. About a league from Blois, there are mineral ſprings, which have the ſame virtues as thoſe of Forges; and in the middle of a hill planted with vines, is a vein of earth of the ſame nature as terra ſigillata, or the ſealed earth of Lemnos. The lake of Vernes is about five miles in length, and about half as much broad. About Romanlin, there is a ſort of fullers earth, which is very uſeful. The trade of Blois is chiefly in wine and brandy. They make ſerges and ſtuffs at this place. Several kings have kept their courts at Blois, for which reaſon they ſpeak the French language in perfection, and the inhabitants are accounted witty and polite. It is thirty three miles ſouth-weſt of Orleans, twenty-eight north-weſt of Tours, eighteen ſouth-eaſt of Vendome; and one hundred ſouth-weſt of Paris. Lon. 1. 30. E. Lat. 47. 35. N.

 that

BLOMAERT (Abraham) an excellent painter, was born at Gorcum in 1567. His manner is eaſy and graceful. He underſtood the claro oſcuro; the folds of his draperies are large, but his taſte in deſigning has too much of the Flemiſh manner. There are a vaſt number of prints done by the beſt engravers after his works. He died in 1647, aged eighty.

Cornelius Blomaert, an excellent engraver, was the youngeſt of his three ſons.

BLOMBERG (Barbara) the daughter of a good family at Ratiſbon, and the ſuppoſed mother of Don Juan of Auſtria, the natural ſon of the emperor Charles V. That prince died thoroughly perſuaded that ſhe was his mother, and on that account recommended her to the king of Spain. Philip II. to whom the true mother was not unknown, did all he could to deceive the world; he invited her to come into Spain, and ſent her ſome time after to the royal monaſtery of St. Cyprian, with a good equipage, where having lived four years, ſhe went to Lareda, for the benefit of the air, and there died.

BLON (James Christopher le) an artiſt who invented a method of producing paintings by printing. He was a Frenchman of ſurpriſing vivacity and volubility; and Mr. Walpole, who knew him, ſays, he had a head admirably mechanic, but was an univerſal projector. His method of printing paintings was performed by ſeveral metzotinto plates for one piece, each expreſſing different ſhades and parts of the piece in different colours. In this manner he perfected many large pictures that were very tolerable copies of the beſt maſters. He diſtributed thoſe by a kind of lottery, but the ſubſcribers did not find their prizes much valued. However, ſome heads coloured progreſſively, according their ſeveral gradations, bear witneſs to the ſucceſs and beauty of his invention. He had another merit to the public, with which few inventors begin; for he communicated his ſecret in a thin quarto, entitled Coloritto, or the Harmony of Colouring in Painting, reduced to mechanical Practice, under eaſy Precepts and infallible Rules. In 1732, he alſo publiſhed, in French, a Treatiſe on ideal Beauty, which has been ſince tranſlated into Engliſh; he afterwards ſet up a project for copying the cartoons in tapeſtry, and made ſome very fine drawings for that purpoſe, but did not meet with the ſucceſs he expected. The affair therefore was dropped, and he diſappeared.

BLONAY, a ſmall town in Swiſſerland, in the canton of Bern, about a league above Vevay, at the foot of the mountains, on which it has a caſtle, from whence there is a delightful proſpect over all the lake of Geneva, the neighbouring country, and Savoy. This is the only place in the Pais de Vaux, where they ſing pſalms with the ſound of a trumpet. Long. 7. 8. E. Lat. 46. 28. N.

BLONDEL (David) a proteſtant miniſter in the ſeventeenth century, diſtinguiſhed by his ſkill in eccleſiaſtical and civil hiſtory, was born at Chalons ſur Marne, and was admitted miniſter at a ſynod of the Iſle of France, in 1614. He exerciſed his miniſtry at Houdan, near Paris, and afterwards at Amſterdam. He wrote, 1. A Defence of the reformed Churches of France. 2. A work againſt the Decretal Epiſtles. 3. De Epiſcopis & Preſbyteris; and other pieces; and died in 1655, aged ſixty-four.

Blondel (Francis) regius profeſſor of mathematics and architecture, was employed in ſeveral negotiations, and arrived at the dignity of marſhal de camp and counſellor of ſtate, and had the honour of being choſen to teach the dauphin the mathematics; he was alſo made member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and director of the Academy of Architecture. He died at Paris, in 1688, aged ſixty-eight. He wrote, 1. Notes on the Architecture of Savot. 2. A Courſe of Architecture and Mathematics. 3. The Art of throwing Bombs. 4. A Compariſon between Pindar and Horace; and other works.

BLONDUS (Flavius) an hiſtorian born at Forli, in Italy, in 1388, was ſecretary to Eugenius IV. and other popes. He compoſed a great many books, and among others, a Hiſtory from the year 400 to 1440. He died in 1463.

BLOOD (Thomas) generally called colonel Blood, as extraordinary an adventurer as ever lived, either in this or any other country, was born in Ireland, about the year 1628. He ſerved as a lieutenant in the parliament's forces, and, after the Reſtoration, laid a plan for ſeizing Dublin caſtle and the perſon of the duke of Ormond, then lord lieutenant, which would have certainly taken effect, had it not been diſcovered in time; but, notwithſtanding a reward was offered for taking him, he had the addreſs to make his eſcape. He was preſent at the action of Pentland-hills in Scotland, on the 27th of November, 1666, in which the rebels were routed; and ſome time after, captain Maſon, one of his friends, who was taken priſoner at this battle, being to be removed from London to one of the northern counties to take his trial, and to that intent was ſent down with eight of the duke's troops; when Blood, with three of his friends, well armed, followed, and, after a deſperate battle reſcued him. After this, he, with five of his companions, ſeized the duke of Ormond in his coach, in the ſtreets of Weſtminſter, took him out, and carried him off in the dark towards Tyburn, where, it was thought, he intended to hang him, but being purſued by the duke's ſervants, his grace was reſcued, yet himſelf and his aſſociates eſcaped. But the moſt bold and daring of all his attempts was that to carry off the royal enſigns of majeſty out of the Tower, which he was very near effecting by the aſſiſtance of thoſe who engaged with him in the former enterprize. As this ſtory is of a moſt ſingular nature, it may be proper to give it at large.

About three weeks before Blood made this attempt, he came to the Tower in the habit of a clergyman, with a woman whom he called his wife, to ſhew her the crown, and having ſeen it, ſhe pretended to have a ſick qualm, and deſired Mr. Edwards, the keeper of the crown, to ſend for ſome ſpirits; and when ſhe had drank, Mrs. Edwards invited her to repoſe herſelf upon a bed, which ſhe accepted of, and ſoon recovered. At their departure, they, in the warmeſt terms, expreſſed their gratitude, and about three days after, Blood returned with a preſent of four pair of gloves from his wife; and having thus begun the acquaintance made frequent viſits to improve it. In one of theſe viſits, the pretended clergyman obſerved, that his wife had long ſtudied, and had thought of a handſome way of requital, "You have, ſaid he, a pretty gentlewoman to your daugh-"ter, and I have a young nephew, who has two or three "hundred pounds a year in land, and is at my diſpoſal; "if your daughter be free, and you approve of it, I'll bring "him hither to ſee her, and we will endeavour to make it a "match." This Mr. Edwards readily aſſented to, and invited the pretended parſon to dine with him that day, and he as chearfully accepted the invitation, and taking upon him to ſay grace, performed it with the appearance of ſingular devotion. At his departure, he appointed a day and hour to bring his young nephew to his miſtreſs. He came, as he had propoſed, at ſeven o'clock in the morning; the old man was ready to receive his gueſts, and the daughter was dreſſed; he went to the jewel-houſe, with three more, all armed with rapier-blades in their canes, and every one a dagger, and a pair of pocket-piſtols. Two of his companions entered in with him, and the third ſtaid at the door. Blood told Mr. Edwards, that they would not go up ſtairs till his wife came, and deſired him to ſhew his friends the crown to paſs away the time till then; but as ſoon as they entered the room, and the door was as uſual ſhut, they threw a cloak over the old man's head, clapped a gag into his mouth, and an iron hook to his noſe, that no ſound might paſs that way; they then told him that they were reſolved to have the crown, globe, and ſceptre, and promiſed, if he would ſubmit, to ſpare his life, otherwiſe he was to expect no mercy. The old man then ſtruggled, and made all the noiſe he could, on which they knocked him down, gave him ſeveral blows, and ſtabbed him in the belly, when, thinking him dead, they omitted tying his hands behind him; one of them put the globe into his breeches; Blood kept the crown under his cloak; the third deſigned to file the ſceptre in two, becauſe it was too long to carry conveniently; but before this could be done, young Mr. Edwards, the old gentleman's ſon, who had been in Flanders, arrived, and aſking the man at the door, if he wanted his father, went up ſtairs. In the mean time, the centinel gave notice of his arrival, and they immediately haſted away with the crown and globe, but left the ſceptre. The old man ſuddenly roſe, pulled out the gag, and cried, "Treaſon! "Murder!" at which the daughter running down, and ſeeing her father wounded, ruſhed out upon Tower-hill, and cried, "Treaſon! the crown is ſtolen!" Inſtantly young Edwards and one captain Beckman purſued the villains, who were advanced beyond the main guard; and the alarm being given to the warder of the draw-bridge, he put himſelf in a poſture to ſtop them, but Blood firing a piſtol, though the bullet miſſed him, he dropped down, when getting to the little ward houſe gate, the centinel let them paſs, when running over the draw-bridge, they got upon the wharf, and haſted to their two other companions who held their horſes at Iron Gate, crying themſelves as they ran, ſtop the rogues! But inſtantly they were overtaken by captain Beckman, when Blood diſcharged his ſecond piſtol at his head, but he, ſtooping, avoided the ſhot, and ſeized upon him with the crown under his cloak; yet Blood, though he found himſelf a priſoner, had the impudence to ſtruggle a long while for it; and when it was wreſted from him, cried, "It was a gallant attempt, though unſucceſsful, for "it was for a crown." In ſhort, not only Blood, but all the reſt of the gang were taken, and committed priſoners to the tower. This happened on the 9th of May, 1671.

paſs,

But what ſeems the moſt extraordinary circumſtance is ſtill behind. The duke of Buckingham raiſed the king's curioſity to ſee ſo extraordinary a perſon, on which Blood was carried to court, and introduced into the royal preſence. His majeſty enquired firſt into the particulars of the attempt on the duke of Ormond; when he confeſſed the fact, and added, that the duke had taken away his eſtate, and executed ſome of his friends, and that he and many others had engaged by ſolemn oaths to revenge it. He abſolutely refuſed to betray his accomplices, and voluntary told the king that he had been engaged in a deſign to kill his majeſty with a carbine from out of the reeds by the Thames ſide, above Batterſea; but his preſence ſtriking him with awe, he relented, and diverted the reſt of the aſſociates from the deſign. He repreſented that he expected the utmoſt rigour of the law; but that he ſhould die without concern: that however there were hundreds of his aſſociates who had ſworn to revenge the death of any of the fraternity, which would expoſe his majeſty and all his miniſters to the daily fear of a maſſacre: but that if he would ſpare the lives of a few, and receive them to favour, he would oblige them to be as daring in his ſervice. In ſhort, the artful ſpeeches of this villain had ſuch an effect, that the king deſired Blood to write to the duke of Ormond to beg his pardon; and not only forgave him and his aſſociates, but, to the ſurpriſe of the whole kingdom, rewarded him by ſettling upon him a ſalary of five hundred pounds a year, and admitting him to all the privacy and intimacy of the court. While old Mr. Edwards, for his fidelity, courage, and wounds in the king's ſervice, received only a grant of two hundred pounds, out of the exchequer, and one hundred pounds to his ſon, who aſſiſted; the payment of which was ſo long delayed, that he was obliged to ſell his order for one hundred pounds ready money, and his ſon his for fifty pounds. Blood enjoyed his penſion about ten years, till being charged with fixing an imputation of a ſcandalous nature on the duke of Buckingham, he was thrown into priſon, where he died, Auguſt 24, 1680.

BLOUNT (John) called in Latin Blondus, or Blundus, archbiſhop of Canterbury, received the firſt part of his education at the univerſity of Oxford, from whence he went to finiſh his ſtudies at Paris, and returning from thence to Oxford, read divinity lectures there with great applauſe. He afterwards obtained conſiderable preferments, and in 1232, was raiſed to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury; but the pope objected to him, and would not permit him to enjoy that dignity. This prelate, who was eſteemed a prodigy of learning, died in 1248.

Blount (Sir John) knight, governor of a garriſon in Aquitain, in the year 1412, where being beſieged by the marſhal of France, he, with three hundred men, defeated the marſhal's army, took the marſhal, and an hundred French gentlemen and commanders priſoners, and brought them to England, in the laſt year of Henry IV.

Blount (Charles) lord Montjoy, afterwards created earl of Devonſhire, was born in the year 1563, and was the ſecond ſon of James, lord Montjoy. He had his education at court and the Inner Temple, and was diſtinguiſhed by queen Elizabeth, at his firſt appearance at court. He was ſeveral times choſen member of parliament; and, in 1588, was one of thoſe young noblemen and gentlemen who hired ſhips at their own expence to join the Engliſh fleet, when it was in purſuit of the Spaniſh armada. In 1594, he was made governor of Portſmouth, and the ſame year ſucceeded to his elder brother's title of lord Montjoy. He had a principal ſhare in many of the great exploits of that reign, and particularly in reducing the rebellious Iriſh to obedience. In 1603, he was conſtituted lieutenant of Ireland, by king James I. and the ſame year was advanced to the title of earl of Devonſhire. He died April 3, 1606.

Blount (Sir Henry) a great wit, a remarkable patriot, and a conſiderable writer in the laſt century, was born at his father's ſeat at Tittenhanger, in Hertfordſhire, December 15, 1602, and was educated at Oxford, where he took the degree of bachelor of arts, and then ſtudied the law at Gray's Inn; after which he travelled through Europe, and ſeveral parts of Aſia. In 1639, king Charles I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood; and upon the breaking out of the civil war, he attended his majeſty to ſeveral places, and was preſent at the battle of Edgehill. Afterwards quitting his majeſty's ſervice, he returned to London, where he was called to an account for adhering to the king, but he fully excuſed himſelf, by alledging the duty of his poſt. In 1651 he was nominated by the parliament one of a committee of twenty perſons, for inſpecting the practice of the law, and remedying its abuſes; and on the firſt of November, 1655, he was appointed one of the twenty-one commiſſioners to conſider of the trade and navigation of the common-wealth. Yet after the reſtoration of the royal family, he was appointed high ſheriff of the county of Hertford, and from that time lived as a private gentleman, above twenty years. He publiſhed, 1. An Account of his Travels. 2. Six Comedies, written by John Lilly, under the title of Court Comedies. 3. The Exchange Walk, a ſatire; and 4. An Epiſtle in Praiſe of Tobacco. He died October 9, 1682.

Blount (Sir Thomas Pope) bart. an eminent writer, and the eldeſt ſon of the former, was born at Upper Holloway, in the county of Middleſex, September 12, 1649. He was educated under the eye of his father, and always diſtinguiſhed himſelf as a lover of liberty, a ſincere friend to his country, and a true patron of learning. He was advanced to the degree of baronet by king Charles II. in whoſe reign he was elected burgeſs for St. Albans, in two parliaments; and was knight of the ſhire in three parliaments after the Revolution. He wrote in Latin, 1. A Critic on the moſt celebrated Writers. 2. Eſſays on ſeveral Subjects. 3. A Natural Hiſtory, extracted out of the beſt modern Writers; and 4. Remarks upon Poetry, with Characters and Cenſures of the moſt conſiderable Poets, whether ancient or modern. He died June 30, 1697.

Blount (Charles) brother to the former, and alſo an eminent writer, was born at Upper Holloway, Middleſex, April 27, 1654. He was a man of ſenſe and learning, and had the art of writing with much ſeeming ſtrength, where his arguments were not very cogent. He had an early diſlike to ſuperſtition, which hurried him into dangerous miſtakes, and inclined him to believe all revealed religion prieſt-craft. He wrote the following works, 1. Anima Mundi, or an hiſtorical Narration of the Opinions of the Ancients, concerning Man's Soul after this Life. 2. The Life of Apollonius Tyaneus. 3. Diana of the Epheſians, or the Original of Idolatry. 4. Religio Laici. 5. Janua Scientiarum, or an Introduction to Geography, Chronology, Government, Hiſtory, Philoſophy, and all genteel kinds of Learning. 6. Miſcellaneous Works; and ſome pamphlets. The cloſe of his life was very unhappy: for after the death of his wife, he became enamoured of her ſiſter, who ſcrupled the lawfulneſs of marrying him; on which he printed a letter on that ſubject, in which he ſtated the caſe as of a third perſon, and treated it with great learning and addreſs; and alſo applied to ſeveral divines, who decided againſt him, upon which, the lady growing inflexible, he, in a fit of deſpair, ſhot himſelf; but lived after it ſome days. He died in Auguſt, 1693.

BOADICEA, a famous Britiſh queen, who lived in the firſt century. She was the widow of Praſutagus, king of the Iceni, and having ſuffered the moſt barbarous indignities from the Romans, who had proceeded to ſuch a pitch of brutality as to cauſe her to be publicly whipped, and her two daughters raviſhed; ſhe excited the Britons to a revolt: accordingly, an hundred and twenty thouſand of the latter, with Boadicea at their head, attacked the Roman colony, at Camelodunum, and ſlaughtered ſeventy or eighty thouſand Romans; committing the moſt ſhocking and unheard of cruelties. But Suetonius marching againſt them with about ten thouſand men, a bloody battle enſued, in which eighty thouſand Britons were ſlain, and the Romans gained the victory, with a very inconſiderable loſs. This battle was fought in the ſixty-firſt year of the Chriſtian æra. This valiant queen, thus diſappointed of the completion of her revenge, either diſpatched herſelf by poiſon, or died of ſickneſs ſoon after.

BOBIO, the largeſt river of Chili, in South America. It has its ſource in the great mountains, called the Cordillera of the Andes, and falls into the ſea in forty-ſeven degrees of ſouth latitude.

BOBBIO, a town of Italy, in the Milaneſe, and in the territory of Pavia, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Trebia, thirty miles north eaſt of Genoa, twenty ſouth-weſt of Placentia, twenty-four ſouth-eaſt of Tortona, and twenty-five ſouth-eaſt of Pavia. Long. 9. 30. E. Lat 44. 48. N.

BOCCACE (John) one of the moſt polite and learned writers of his age, was born at Certaldo, in Tuſcany, in the year 1313. After having ſpent ſix years with a merchant, and almoſt as many in the ſtudy of the canon law, he thought of nothing but poetry, and neither his father's commands, nor the cenſures and exhortations of his friends could ſuppreſs his natural inclination to write verſes. He accordingly ingly publiſhed ſeveral poems, and was eſteemed one of the triumvirs, or three princes of poets of that age: he alſo publiſhed ſeveral pieces in proſe, among which he chiefly immortaliſed himſelf by his Decameron, which conſiſts of a hundred novels. He died in the year 1375.

BOCCA CHICA, a ſtreight or entrance into the harbour of Carthagena, in South America, defended by ſeveral forts and platforms of guns.

BOCCA DI DRAGO, a ſtreight between the iſland of Trinidad and New Andaluſia, a province of Terra Firma in South America.

BOCCALINI (TRAJAN) a celebrated ſatirical writer, born at Rome, who, in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, obtained the admiration of all Italy by his refined and delicate criticiſms. Sovereign princes themſelves did not eſcape the laſh of his ſatire. The cardinals Borgheſe and Gaëtan, having declared themſelves his protectors, he publiſhed his Ragguaglio di Parnaſſo, and La Secretaria di Apollo, which is the continuation of the former. Theſe two works were received by the public with uncommon applauſe. He there feigns that Apollo holding his court at Parnaſſus, heard the complaints of the whole world, and did juſtice according as the caſes required. He at length printed his Pietra di Parangone, againſt the court of Spain: but fearing that the Spaniards would be revenged, he retired to Venice; but was there aſſaſſinated in a very ſtrange manner. He lodged with one of his friends, who having got up early one morning, left Boccalini in bed; a minute after, ſome armed men entered his chamber, and gave him ſo many blows with bags full of ſand, that they left him for dead; ſo that his friend returning ſome time after, found him ſpeechleſs. Great ſearch was made at Venice for the authors of this murder, and though they were never diſcovered, it was univerſally believed that they were employed by the court of Spain.

BOCCHUS, king of Mauritania, joined with Jugurtha, his ſon in law, againſt the Romans, and was twice conquered by Marius, in the one hundred and eighth and one hundred and ſeventh year before the Chriſtian æra. At length, in order to make his peace with the Romans, he delivered up Jugurtha to Sylla, and as a reward for his treachery, had a part of his kingdom.

BOCCONI (SYLVIO PAUL) a learned naturaliſt, born at Palermo, in Sicily, in 1633, was the author of ſeveral curious and intereſting works in natural hiſtory, and died on the 22d of December, 1704, in a monaſtery near Palermo.

BOCCORIS, king of Egypt, having, according to Tacitus, conſulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon on the leproſy which prevailed in Egypt; he, by the advice of that oracle, drove the Jews out of the country, as a uſeleſs people, hateful to the gods; but Moſes informs us why, and in what manner the Jews were driven from Egypt, and we are ſurpriſed in reading Herodotus, Juſtin, Plutarch, Tacitus, and other profane authors, to ſee how ignorant they were of the hiſtory of the Jews We may, however, infer from their teſtimony, that Boccoris is the Pharaoh mentioned by Moſes.

BOCH, BOCHIUS, or BOCQUI (JOHN) a Latin poet, born at Bruſſels, in 1555. He travelled into Italy, Germany, Poland, and Muſcovy, and at his return became ſecretary to the duke of Parma. He died on the 13th of January, 1609. The critics in the Netherlands ſet ſo great a value on his poetry, that they gave him the name of the Belgic Virgil. He wrote, 1. De Belgii Principatu. 2. Parodia Heroica Pſalmorum Davidicorum. 3. Obſervationes Phyſicæ, Ethicæ, Politicæ, & Hiſtoricæ, in Pſalmos. 4. Vita Davidis. 5. Orationes. 6. Poemata.

BOCHART (MATTHEW) a proteſtant miniſter, at Alençon, in the ſeventeenth century, and the author of ſeveral works, which procured him the reputation of being a man of learning; the chief of which are, a Treatiſe againſt Relics, and another againſt the Sacrifice of the Maſs.

BOCHART (SAMUEL) one of the moſt learned men in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Roan, in Normandy, in 1599, and was acquainted with the Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Ethiopic, and ſeveral other languages. He was indebted to the univerſity of Oxford, where he ſome time reſided, for part of that immenſe ſtock of learning which he poſſeſſed. His Geographia Sacra, his Hierozoicon, and other ingenious and elaborate works, are, and ever will be in great eſteem among the learned; eſpecially ſuch as ſtudy the Scriptures in their original languages. It is harder to ſay what he was ignorant of, than what he knew, but he particularly excelled in oriental learning. He was many years paſtor of a proteſtant church at Caen, in Normandy, where he was tutor to Wentworth Dillon, earl of Roſcommon, author of the Eſſay on tranſlated Verſe. He obtained the eſteem of the learned, and was ſo diſtinguiſhed for his probity and profound erudition, that he obtained the friendſhip even of the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the Roman church. The queen of Sweden engaged him in 1652, to take a voyage to Stockholm, where ſhe gave him public marks of her eſteem. At his return to Caen, he reſumed the functions of the miniſtry, and was received into the academy of that city. His learning was not his principal qualification; he had a modeſty infinitely more eſtimable, and on that account enjoyed his great reputation in tranquility, ſheltered from thoſe unhappy quarrels, which ſo many other learned men draw upon themſelves. He died ſuddenly while he was ſpeaking in the above academy, on the 16th of May, 1667, aged ſeventy-eight. A complete edition of his works was publiſhed in Holland, in two volumes, folio, 1712.

BOCHEL, or BOUCHEL (LAWRENCE) a learned civilian, of the ſeventeenth century, and advocate in the parliament of Paris, wrote ſeveral works which are eſteemed, viz. 1. Decrees of the Gallican Church. 2. Enchiridion Chriſtiani Juriſconſulti: and 3. A Bibliotheca of the French Law. He died on the 29th of April, 1629.

BOCHETTA, a place of Italy, in the territory of Genoa, which was famous in the war of 1646 and 1647. It is a chain of mountains, over which the great road lies from Lombardy to Genoa; and on the very peak of the higheſt mountain, there is a narrow paſs, which will hardly admit three men to go a-breaſt. This paſs is properly called the Bochetta; for the defence of which there are three forts. It is the key of the city of Genoa, and was taken in 1746 by the Imperialiſts, by which means they opened a way to that city.

BOCKHOLT, a town of Germany, in the dioceſe of Munſter, in Weſtphalia, twenty miles eaſt of Cleef. Long. 6. 20. E. Lat. 51. 40. N.

BODESTEN (ADAM) a famous German phyſician, born at Carloſtadt, was a great partiſan of the doctrine of Paracelſus, whom he tranſlated, and wrote Commentaries upon him, which are eſteemed by the phyſicians of his ſect. He died at Baſil, in 1577.

BODIN (JOHN) a famous writer, in the ſixteenth century, born at Angers. After having ſtudied and taught the law at Toulouſe, he went to Paris, where he commenced advocate. Bodin was in ſuch favour with Henry III. that that prince impriſoned Michael de la Serre, for writing againſt him in a ſcurrilous manner, and ordered him not to publiſh it upon pain of death: but the king's favour not continuing, the duke d'Alençon gave him ſeveral employments, and brought him with him to England, where Bodin had the pleaſure and honour of ſeeing his book, intitled the Republic, taught in the univerſity of Cambridge; the Engliſh having tranſlated it into Latin, this determined him to make a Latin tranſlation of it himſelf. He alſo wrote 1. A Commentary on Oppian's Books of Hunting, and a Tranſlation of the ſame Books into Latin Verſe. 2. The Method of Hiſtory. 3. A Diſcourſe on Coins; and 4. An Anſwer to the Paradoxes of Maleſtroit, concerning all Things growing dearer, and the Means of remedying it. He died of the plague at Laon, in 1596.

BODLEY (Sir THOMAS) from whom the Bodleian or public library at Oxford takes its name; was the eldeſt ſon of Mr. John Bodley, of Exeter, and was born in that city, in March, 1544. He was educated at Oxford, after which he travelled through France, Germany, and Italy. He was afterwards employed by queen Elizabeth in ſeveral embaſies to Germany and Denmark; he was afterwards ſent to the Hague, to manage the queen's affairs in the United Provinces, and was admitted into the council of ſtate, where he ſat next to count Maurice. On theſe occaſions he behaved greatly to the ſatisfaction of his royal miſtreſs; but at length he retired from public buſineſs, and ſet about the noble work of reſtoring, or rather founding anew the public library at Oxford, which was completed in 1599, and is juſtly eſteemed one of the nobleſt libraries in the world. He received the honour of knighthood after king James's acceſſion to the throne. He died on the 28th of January, 1612, and was buried at the upper end of the choir of Merton college.

Over him was afterwards erected a monument of black and white marble, on which is placed his effigies in a ſcholar's gown, encompaſſed with books; and at the four corners ſtand the figures of Grammar, Rhetoric, Muſic, and Arithmetic. On each hand of his effigies ſtands an angel, that on the right holding a book open, in which are theſe words: Non delebo nomen ejus de libro vitæ, i. e. I will not blot his name out of the book of life; and that on his left holds out to him a crown. Underneath is the figure of a woman, ſitting before the ſtairs of the old library, holding in one hand a key, and in the other a book. Beneath all are theſe words; Memoriæ Thomæ Bodley militis, publicæ bibliothecæ fundatoris ſacrum, obiit Jan. 28, 1612. An annual ſpeech in his praiſe is ſtill made at Oxford, on the 8th of November, at which time the viſitation of the library is uſually made. The reverend Mr. Granger obſerves, that he merited much as a man of letters; but incomparably more in the ample proviſion he made for literature, in which he ſtands unrivalled; and that his library is a mauſoleum which will perpetuate his memory as long as books themſelves endure. Sir Thomas wrote his own Life to the year 1609; which, together with the firſt draught of the Statutes, and his Letters, have been publiſhed from the originals in the Bodleian library.

BODLEY (LAURENCE) a younger brother of the former, was born at Exeter, about the year 1546. He was educated at Oxford, where he took his degrees of bachelor and maſter of arts, and was at length made one of the canons reſidentiary of Exeter cathedral, and rector of Shobroke, near Crediton. He died April 19, 1615, in the ſeventieth year of his age.

BODLEY (Sir JOSIAS) youngeſt brother to Sir Thomas, and Dr. Laurence Bodley, was educated at Oxford; but prefering a military to a ſtudious life, he went into the Low Countries, which were at that time the grand theatre of war, where he was advanced to the degree of a captain. In 1598 he was ſent into Ireland, where he ſignalized himſelf by his valour and conduct in ſeveral ſieges, and for his good ſervices was knighted by the lord deputy Chicheſter. He was living in Ireland in the year 1613, when he was director-general and overſeer of the fortifications of that kingdom. He wrote Obſervations concerning the Fortreſſes of Ireland, and the Britiſh Colonies of Ulſter; and a Jocular Deſcription of a Journey by him taken to Lecale, in Ulſter, both of which are ſtill in manuſcript.

BODMIN, a borough town of Cornwall, with a market on Saturdays, which is very conſiderable for corn and proviſions, and four fairs, on January 25, Saturday after Mid-Lent-Sunday, Wedneſday before Whit-Sunday, and December 6, for horſes, oxen, ſheep, cloth, and a few hops. It is ſeated in a bottom, between two high hills, which renders it very unhealthy, eſpecially to new comers. It chiefly conſiſts of one long ſtreet, and the many decayed houſes ſhew that it was once a very populous and large place. It is a corporation, governed by a mayor and his brethren, and ſends two members to parliament. It is thirty-ſix miles north-eaſt of Falmouth, and two hundred and thirty-two weſt of London. Long. 4. 5. W. Lat. 50. 32. N.

BODON, a fortified town of Turky, in Europe, and in Bulgaria, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the Danube, twenty-ſix miles weſt of Widen. Long. 45. 24. E. Lat. 45. 10. N.

BODROG, a town of Hungary, ſeated on the north-eaſt ſhore of the river Danube, one hundred miles ſouth-eaſt of Buda. Long. 20. 20. E. Lat. 46. 15. N.

BOEDROMIA, Βοηδρόμια, in Grecian antiquity, an Athenian feſtival, inſtituted in memory of Ion, the ſon of Xuthus, who came to the aſſiſtance of the Athenians in the reign of king Erectheus, when they were invaded by Eumolpus, the ſon of Neptune: or, according to Plutarch, in memory of a victory obtained by Theſeus, againſt the Amazons, in the month Boedromion, anſwering to the latter part of Auguſt and the beginning of September.

BŒHMEN (JACOB) a famous viſionary, was born in a village near Gorlitz, in Germany, in the year 1575, and was taken from ſchool as ſoon as he had learnt to read and write, in order to be put apprentice to a ſhoemaker. He afterwards became a maſter ſhoemaker, and marrying, had ſeveral children. He pretended to receive frequent viſions, or as he himſelf expreſſes it, to be wrapt, by the divine drawing, into the holy ſabbath, in which, he ſays, he remained one time ſeven whole days, in the higheſt joy. He wrote, 1. Aurora, or the riſing Sun. 2. Of the three-fold Life of Man. 3. Of the heavenly and earthly Myſterium. 4. The Myſterium Magnum upon Geneſis; and other works, which have been tranſlated into Engliſh. He died on the 18th of November, 1624.

BOERHAAVE (HERMAN) one of the moſt learned phyſicians that has appeared ſince Hippocrates, was born at Vourhout, a village near Leyden, on the 31ſt of December, 1668. Having acquired great knowledge in the learned languages, and in mathematics, he joined the ſtudy of phyſic to philoſophy and theology, beginning with Hippocrates, whoſe works he digeſted in ſuch a manner as to render them perfectly familiar to him. Afterwards he made himſelf acquainted with the moſt authentic modern authors, particularly with our Sydenham, to whoſe name he uſually prefixed the epithet Immortal. He next applied to chemiſtry and botany; but ſtill intended to engage in the miniſtry: however, going from Harderwick in Guelderland, where he had taken the degree of doctor of phyſic, in order to return to Leyden, he met with an invincible obſtruction to his mounting the pulpit; for being in a paſſage-boat, ſome diſcourſe happened to be ſtarted on the doctrine of Spinoſa being ſubverſive of all religion; when one of the paſſengers oppoſing to this philoſopher's pretended mathematical demonſtrations, only the loud invectives of a blind zeal; Boerhaave calmly aſked him, if he had ever read the works of the author he decried; the orator was at once ſtruck dumb, and fired with reſentment, when another paſſenger whiſpered the perſon next him to learn Boerhaave's name, and took it down in his pocket-book, and on his arrival at Leyden every where proclaimed that Boerhaave was become a Spinoſiſt. This great man, finding that ſuch prejudices gained ground, was unwilling to riſque the refuſal of a licence for the pulpit, when he had ſo fair a proſpect of riſing by phyſic. He therefore applied wholly to the ſtudy of medicine, and gradually roſe from being lecturer to the higheſt dignity, the rectorſhip of the univerſity of Leyden, becoming, in the mean time, a member of the Royal Society of London, and of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. He was remarkable for his piety, his modeſty, his humanity, and his private acts of benificence; yet he amaſſed great wealth, and died on the 23d of September, 1738, in the ſixty-ninth year of his age. He wrote, 1. Inſtitutiones Medicæ. 2. Methodus diſcendi Medicinam. 3. Aphoriſmi de cognoſcendis & curandis Morbis. 4. De viribus Medicamentorum. 5. Inſtitutiones & Experimenta Chemiæ, and ſeveral others, all greatly eſteemed.

BOETHIUS, or BOETIUS (FLAVIUS ANICIUS MANLIUS TORQUATUS SEVERINUS) an excellent Roman writer and poet in the beginning of the ſixth century, was the ſon of Anicius Manlius Flavius Boethius. He was educated at Athens, where he continued eighteen years, and made ſo great a progreſs in his ſtudies, that he is allowed to have been the moſt learned writer of that age. Upon his return to Rome he was ſoon advanced to the higheſt poſts of honour, and, in the year 487, was conſul alone; he alſo enjoyed the ſame honour in 510 and 523; but he was afterwards falſely accuſed of having carried on a conſpiracy with the emperor Juſtin againſt the Goths, for which he was baniſhed, cloſely impriſoned, and at length beheaded. He wrote, while in priſon, a book upon the Conſolation of Philoſophy, another upon the Trinity, and ſeveral other works.

BOETHIUS, BOECE, or BOESIS (HECTOR) a famous Scottiſh hiſtorian, in the fifteenth and ſixteenth centuries, was born at Dundee, in the ſhire of Angus, about the year 1470. He ſtudied at Dundee, Aberdeen, and Paris, at which laſt place he applied himſelf to philoſophy, and became a profeſſor of it there, and, in 1497, was a profeſſor at Aberdeen. Upon the death of his patron, biſhop Elphinſton, in 1514, he wrote his Life, and added the Lives of his Predeceſſors in the See of Aberdeen. He alſo wrote the Hiſtory of Scotland, which has been highly cenſured by ſome, and magnified others. He was a great maſter of claſſical and polite learning, and ſkilled in divinity, philoſophy, and hiſtory, but ſomewhat credulous, and much addicted to the belief of legendary ſtories.

BOETIE (STEPHEN DE LA) counſellor in the parliament of Bourdeaux, wrote Latin and French verſes, a Treatiſe, intitled, The voluntary Servitude, and other works. He died on the eighteenth of Auguſt, 1563, aged thirty-three. Montagne, his intimate friend, gives him a great elogium.

BOETIUS (EPO) a celebrated civilian of the Low Countries, was born at Roorda in 1529, and taught the belles lettres in ſeveral cities, and civil law at Douay, with reputation. He wrote many Treatiſes on Law, and other works, and died on the ſixteenth of November, 1599.

BOG, a river in Poland, which runs ſouth-eaſt through the province of Podolia and Budziack Tartary, falling into the Black Sea between Oczakow and the Nieper, or rather into the Nieper, a little before it falls into the Black Sea.

BOG, a town of Scotland, in the ſhire of Bamff, near the mouth of the river Spey, four miles ſouth of Murray Frith, twelve miles eaſt of Elgin, and one hundred miles north of Edinburgh.

BOGAN (ZACHARY), the author of ſeveral treatiſes, was the ſon of William Bogan, gent. and was born at Little Hempſton, in Devonſhire, in the year 1625. He was educated at Oxford, but left that city when it was garriſoned by the king, and returned after its being ſurrendered by the parliament. He wrote, 1. Additions to Mr. Francis Rous's Archæologiæ Atticæ. 2. A View of the Threats and Puniſhments recorded in Scripture, alphabetically compoſed. 3. Meditations of the Mirth of a Chriſtian Life. 4. Help to Prayer, both extempore, and by a ſet Form; as alſo to Meditation, &c. with ſome other pieces. He died Sept. 1, 1659.

BOGDANI (JAMES) a celebrated painter, was born of a genteel family in Hungary, and his father was deputy from the ſtates of that country to the emperor. The ſon made a conſiderable progreſs in painting, without being brought up to the profeſſion, merely by the force of his natural abilities, and excelled in fruit, flowers, and eſpecially birds. Queen Anne beſpoke ſeveral of his pieces, which are ſtill in the royal palaces. He was a man of a gentle and fair character, and lived between forty and fifty years in England. He had raiſed an eaſy fortune, but being perſuaded to make it over to his ſon on his marriage, and other misfortunes ſucceeding, poverty and ſickneſs terminated his life at his houſe in Great Queen-ſtreet.

BOGHIO, or BUEIL, a county in the ſtates of the duke of Savoy, on the ſide of the river Tinea, and on the frontiers of Provence. It has a town of the ſame name, which is the principal place. Long. 6. 45. E. Lat. 44. 12. N.

BOGORIS, the firſt Chriſtian king of Bulgaria, ſeeing that Theodora governed the Eaſtern empire for her ſon Michael, and perſuaded that ſhe would be unable to reſiſt him, ſent ambaſſadors to Conſtantinople in 843, to declare war againſt the young prince; but Theodora anſwered the ambaſſadors: "Tell your maſter, that he will find me at the head "of the Roman troops, with arms in my hand, to puniſh "him for having baſely violated the peace, and attacked "the empire when it had only an infant for its monarch, "and a princeſs for regent. Aſſure him, that I am certain "of the protection of heaven, the inexorable avenger of "perjury and infidelity. But whatever is the fate of our "arms, it can only redound to his ſhame. Should For-"tune declare for him, how will he dare to glory in hav-"ing conquered a woman? and if I gain the victory, how "can he avoid reproach for being conquered by a woman." Bogoris, ſtruck with this anſwer, as full of ſpirit as of courage, conceived an high idea of Theodora, and ſent back his ambaſſadors to deſire the continuance of the peace, one of the conditions of which was, that ſhe ſhould reſtore the ſiſter of the king of the Bulgarians, who was a priſoner at Conſtantinople, where ſhe had embraced the Chriſtian religion. This princeſs gave him the firſt favourable impreſſions of Chriſtianity. At length, being inſtructed and baptized by a learned biſhop, ſent him by Theodora, he took the name of Michael, out of reſpect for her ſon, and afterwards occaſioned the converſion of his people.

BOHEMIA, a kingdom of Europe, uſually reckoned a part of Germany. It comprehends Proper Bohemia, Moravia, Luſatia, and Sileſia. Luſatia is now ſubject to the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, and Sileſia to the king of Pruſſia. It is bounded on the eaſt by Poland, and on the north by Brandenburg; on the weſt by Saxony, Miſnia, and Culembach; on the ſouth by Bavaria, Auſtria, and a part of Hungary. Proper Bohemia is about one hundred and ninety-five miles in length, and one hundred and fifty in breadth. Bohemia, taken in general, is one of the higheſt countries in Europe, for there is no river enters into it, and yet many paſs out, of which the moſt conſiderable are the Elbe, the Oder, the Viſtula, and the Morava. The air is cold and unwholſome, for they have more epidemical diſeaſes there than in the neighbouring countries. There are mines of ſilver, copper, lead, and even ſome veins of gold. The majority of the people are Roman Catholics, but there are many Proteſtants after the confeſſion of Augſburg, ſome Calviniſts, and Moravians. There are Jews at Prague, but they pay heavy taxes for living there. The Bohemians are lively, robuſt, hardy, but luxurious in their eating and drinking. Their language and cuſtoms are quite different from thoſe of Germany.

BOHEMIA PROPER, is the moſt conſiderable part of the kingdom of Bohemia, and lies to the weſt of the other parts. It is ſurrounded by high mountains, and is watered by ſeveral rivers, the principal of which are the Elbe, the Moldaw, the Egerand, and the Miza. It is bounded on the weſt by Franconia and the Upper Palatinate, on the eaſt by Sileſia and Moravia, on the ſouth by Bavaria and Auſtria, and on the north by Miſnia and Luſatia. It is divided into eighteen circles.

Bohemia Proper is the moſt fruitful part of the whole kingdom, and for that reaſon exports a great deal of corn. The rivers are ſtored with fiſh; the woods with wild-fowl, deer, and wild boars; the paſture grounds are covered with tame cattle; in the mines are gold, ſilver, iron, copper, tin, precious ſtones, as amethyſts and rubies.

BOHOL, one of the Philippine Iſlands, in Aſia, lying to the north of the iſland of Mindanao, and ſouth-weſt of Leyte. Long. 122. 5. E. Lat. 10. 0. N.

BOI, commonly called Il Siracuſano, the Syracuſan, was a famous cheſs player at the court of Spain, under king Philip II. from whom he received ſeveral fine preſents; he alſo received ſome from Urban VIII. who was ſo pleaſed with his ſkill, that he offered him a biſhoprick, which he refuſed. Having the misfortune to be taken by corſairs, and to ſee himſelf reduced to ſlavery, he found the way, by means of his ſkill at this game, to make their ſavage tempers tractable; they admired him, treated him with humanity, and demanded no other ranſom than the inſtructions he gave them for a few months in playing at cheſs.

BOIANO, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, and county of Moleſe, with a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated at the foot of the Appenines, near the river Tilerno, ten miles ſouth of Moliſe, thirty north weſt of Benevento, and forty-five north of Naples. Long. 14. 38. E. Lat. 41. 30. N.

BOIARDO (MATTEO MARIA) of Ferrara, count of Scandiano, celebrated for his Italian poems, lived in the fifteenth century, and died in 1494. His principal work is his Orlando inamorato. His Latin Eclogues and Sonnets are alſo much admired.

BOILEAU (GILES) member of the French academy, and the eldeſt brother of the celebrated Boileau Deſpreaux, wrote a Tranſlation of Epictetus, two Diſſertations againſt Menage and Coſtar, and ſome other works. He died in 1669, aged thirty-eight.

BOILEAU (JAMES) brother of the former, and a learned doctor of the Sorbonne, was born at Paris, on the 16th of March, 1635. After having been dean and grand vicar of Sens under M. de Goudrin, he returned to Paris in 1694, and was made canon of the holy chapel. He died when dean of the faculty of divinity, on the firſt of Auguſt, 1716. He publiſhed a great number of curious works, the principal of which are, 1. The Decretal ſuper ſpecula de Magiſtris. 2. De Antiquo jure Preſbyterorum, in regimine Eccleſiaſtico. 3. De Antiquis & majoribus Epiſcoporum cauſis, in quarto. 4. An Hiſtory of Auricular Confeſſion, in Latin, &c.

BOILEAU (NICHOLAS) ſurnamed Deſpreaux, youngeſt brother of the preceding, and one of the moſt celebrated French poets, was the ſon of Giles Boileau, ſecretary to the great chamber of parliament, and was born in 1636, not at Paris, as is commonly ſaid, by at Crône, a ſmall village, where his father had a country houſe, near Villeneuve St. Georges. After he had gone through a courſe of polite literature and philoſophy, he engaged in the ſtudy of the law, in which he made ſuch progreſs, that on December 4, 1656, he was admitted an advocate; but he could not adapt himſelf to a ſcience which often obliges thoſe who follow it to clothe falſhood in the garb of truth. He reſolved therefore to take another courſe, and looking on the Sorbonne as the oppoſite to the bar, he determined to go through a courſe of divinity there; but he could not long endure the thorns of ſchool-divinity; he imagined that to allure him the more cunningly, chicanery had only changed her habit: he therefore renounced the Sorbonne, and delivered up himſelf entirely to his own genius, and giving a looſe to his paſſion for the belles lettres, and eſpecially for poetry, he proceeded ſolely under his own conduct, and took poſſeſſion of one of the formoſt places on the French Parnaſſus. The public gave his works the encomium they deſerved, and Lewis XIV. who always loved to encourage the ſciences and polite literature, was not only pleaſed to have Mr. Boileau's works read to him conſtantly as he compoſed them, but ſettled a yearly penſion of two thouſand livres upon him, and gave him the privilege of printing all his works. He was afterwards choſen a member of the French academy, and alſo of the Academy of Inſcriptions and Medals. His works are printed in four volumes, duodecimo. This great man, who was as remarkable for his integrity, his innocence, and diffuſive benevolence, as for the keeneſs of his ſatires, died on the 2d of March, 1711, in the ſeventy-fifth year of his age.

BOILEAU (JOHN JAMES) a learned canon of the church of St. Honorius at Paris, was born in the dioceſe of Agen, and obtained the eſteem of cardinal de Noailles, and of many learned men. He wrote, 1. Letters on Moral and Pious Subjects. 2. The Life of Madame the Ducheſs of Liancourt; that of Madam Combé; and ſeveral other works. He died in 1735, aged eighty-ſix.

BOIS (FRANCIS DU). See SYLVIUS.

BOIS (PHILIP GOIBAUD, ſieur DU) a member of the French academy, was born at Poictiers, and, in 1671, was governor to the duke of Guiſe. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by tranſlating into French ſeveral of the works of St. Auguſtin, and the Offices, the Treatiſes of Friendſhip and Old Age, and the Paradoxes of Cicero. He died in 1694.

BOIS (GERARD DU) a native of Orleans, a prieſt of the Oratory, and an able hiſtorian. He wrote a Hiſtory of the Church of Paris; and died in that city, on the 15th of July, 1696.

BOIS LE DUC, or BOLDUC, a city of the Low Countries, in Dutch Brabant, which ſtands on the confluence of the rivers Aa and Pommel, which fill its ditches, and croſs the city, being divided into ſeveral canals within the city. It is large and handſome, but what renders it moſt conſiderable is its ſtrength. It is ſtrong by its ſituation in meadows that are frequently covered with water, and by the works that have been raiſed. It has a citadel within its walls, and ſix good forts at its principal avenues. The roads to the town are over cauſeways, made with turnings and windings. This city is large, fair, well built, and populous, and is about four miles in compaſs. Its fortifications are after the modern manner, and its walls are flanked with ſeven good baſtions. The linen and woollen manufactures flouriſh here; and it is famous for cutlery wares and needles.

The cathedral church is a very fine ſtructure, now in the hands of the Proteſtants, who have placed two communion tables before the great altar, over which the Ten Commandments are written. There were four pariſh churches, one of

of which is pulled down, another is turned in warehouſes, a third into ſtables, and the fourth is uſed by the Proteſtants for divine ſervice. Here were alſo ſixteen convents for men and women, which have been converted to other uſes. The diſtrict of Bois le Duc is called the Mayory, and is very populous, containing above one hundred villages, beſides the towns of Eyndhoven and Helmont, and Bois le Duc the capital. This laſt is twenty-three miles eaſt of Breda, eight ſouth-eaſt of Hewſden, forty-five north-eaſt of Antwerp, and forty-five ſouth of Amſterdam. Long. 5. 20. E Lat. 51. 45. N.

BOISROBERT (Francis Metel de) a native of Caen, abbot of Châtillon-upon-the-Seyne, and one of the forty members of the French academy, obtained the friendſhip of cardinal de Richelieu by his wit, which was naturally turned to pleaſantry. He rallied agreeably, and diverted the cardinal by telling him abundance of little ſtories relating to the court and city; and his converſation was of ſuch uſe to his eminence, that his phyſician uſed to ſay, "My "lord, all our drugs will ſignify nothing, if you don't mix with them a dram of Boiſrobert." He publiſhed ſeveral Poems, Letters, and other works, and died in 1662.

BOISSARD (John James) a learned antiquary, born at Beſançon in 1528. He travelled through Italy, Greece, and Germany, to collect ancient monuments, and had an incredible fondneſs for this ſtudy, of which the following is a remarkable proof. He went to ſee cardinal Carpi's garden, ſituated on Mons Quirinalis, accompanied by ſeveral of his friends, when finding a great number of ancient ſtatues, inſcriptions, &c. he concealed himſelf in ſome of the alleys, and let his friends go home without him, employing the reſt of the day in drawing the monuments and copying the inſcriptions; and on the garden gates being ſhut, ſtaid there all night. The next morning the cardinal finding him at work, could not imagine how a ſtranger ſhould get into his garden at ſo unſeaſonable an hour; but when he knew the reaſon of his ſtaying there all night, he ordered him a good breakfaſt, and gave him leave to copy whatſoever he ſhould think curious in his palace. He died at Metz, Oct. 30, 1602. His principal works are, 1. Four volumes, in folio, of Roman Antiquities, adorned with plates, engraved by Theodore de Bry, and his two ſons. 2. Theatrum Vitæ humanæ, which contains the Lives of an hundred and ninety-eight famous Perſons, with their Portraits. 3. A Treatiſe de Divinatione & magicis Præſtigiis. Theſe works are ſcarce, and eſteemed by the antiquarians.

BOISSIEU (Denys de Salvaing, lord of) firſt preſident of the chamber of accounts in Dauphiné, and one of the moſt learned men in the ſeventeenth century. He accompanied the Marſhal de Crequi in his embaſſy to Rome, in quality of orator to Lewis XIII. in 1633. when he harangued with ſuch judgment and eloquence, that he equally pleaſed both the pope and the king. He wrote ſeveral works, the moſt important of which is a Treatiſe on the Uſe of Fiefs, &c. in the province of Dauphiné. He died in 1679.

BOIT, an excellent painter in enamel, in which Mr. Walpole ſays he has never, perhaps, been ſurpaſſed, but by his predeceſſor Petitot, and his ſucceſſor Zincke. He was born at Stockholm, and bred a jeweller, which profeſſion he intended to follow here in England, but changed his deſign, and went into the country, where he taught children to draw. He there engaged a gentleman's daughter, who was one of his ſcholars, to promiſe him marriage, but the affair being diſcovered, he was thrown into priſon, which, as the affair was not completed, was certainly an act of great cruelty. In that confinement, which laſted two years, he ſtudied enamelling, an art to which he fixed on his return to London, and practiſed with the greateſt ſucceſs. The prices he is ſaid to have obtained for his work are very incredible; but being engaged in a very large deſign for the court, and queen Anne dying before it was completed, he ran in debt, his goods were ſeized by execution, and he fled to France, where he changed his religion, was countenanced by the regent, obtained a penſion of two hundred and fifty pounds ſterling per annum, and an apartment, but died ſuddenly at Paris, about Chriſtmas 1726. There is a large piece done by him at Kenſington, repreſenting queen Anne ſitting, and prince George ſtanding by her; and at Bedford-houſe is another very large plate of the duke's father and mother.

BOIVIN (John) Greek profeſſor in the royal college, librarian to the French king, and member of the French academy, and Academy of Belles Lettres. He was beloved for his probity, the ſweetneſs of his temper, and his profound erudition. He wrote a French Tranſlation of the Œdipus of Sophocles, and the Birds of Ariſtophanes; the Batrachomyomachia, in French verſe, and other works. He died at Paris, on the 29th of October, 1726, aged ſixty-four.

BOKARA, the capital city of Great Bokaria, in Aſia, is large and populous, and is ſeated three days journey to the northward of the river Amo. It is the reſidence of the khan, who is entirely abſolute, though his power reaches but a little way without the city. The adjacent country is called Turkiſtan, and is governed by ſeveral becks or chiefs, who are all wholly independent on each other, as well as of the khan of Bokaria. The town is ſeated on a riſing ground, with a ſlender wall of earth, and a dry ditch. The houſes are low, and moſtly built of mud, but the caravanſeras and moſques, which are numerous, are all of brick. The bazars, or market-places, which have been ſtately buildings, are now moſt of them in ruins. Theſe were generally built of brick and ſtone. Here is likewiſe a handſome building for the education of the prieſts, who gain conſiderably by their diſcourſes on the points of their religion, which is Mahommedaniſm. They differ from the Perſians, not only with regard to Mahommed's ſucceſſor, but in particular ceremonies. Their hatred to the Perſians is much greater than to the Chriſtians, and they eſteem themſelves equally unclean by touching either, and never omit waſhing themſelves immediately after they have left their company.

The air and ſoil are healthy enough, but the waters are very bad. There are alſo ſerpents and ſcorpions, which infeſt the houſes, and are very venemous. The ſting of the ſcorpion cauſes great pain, and ſometimes death. The inhabitants are more civilized and polite than ſome of their neighbours, and yet they are cowardly, cruel, effeminate, and very perfidious. Great numbers of Jews and Arabians frequent this place, though they are much oppreſſed, and often deprived of all their properties by the khan or his attendants, who ſeize them at their pleaſure. At the beſt they pay heavy taxes, and it is almoſt criminal to be rich. The trade of Bokara is much declined from what it was formerly. Their products are cotton, lamb furs, down, rice, and cattle; and their manufactures ſoap, callicoe, and cotton yarn.

The khan and his officers are poſſeſſed of very rich jewels, but will not diſpoſe of them but in caſes of great neceſſity, and then they are jealous of their being carried out of the country. They have little uſe for European cloth, but for the making of caps. Their money is ducats of gold, for they have no ſilver coin but what comes from Perſia and India. Their meaſure is a gaz, equal to thirty-one inches. Their weight is a batman, which is ſixteen pounds Engliſh. The Perſian and Tartarian languages are both ſpoke here, but all their writings are in the Perſian tongue. It is one hundred miles weſt-by-ſouth of Sarmakand, ſixty eaſt of Amol, and one hundred and fifty north of Balkh. Long. 65. 50. E. Lat. 39. 15. N.

BOKARIA (Great) formerly called Uſbeck and Zagatay, is ſituated in between ſixty-firſt and eighty-ſecond degrees of longitude, and between thirty-four and forty-ſix degrees of latitude. It is bounded on the north by the river Sir, or Sihun, which ſeparates it from Weſtern Tartary, on the eaſt by Little Bokaria, on the weſt by Korazin, and on the ſouth by Perſia and Little Thibet. It is ſeven hundred and ſixty miles in length, from eaſt to weſt, and ſeven hundred and twenty broad, from north to ſouth. It is divided into three kingdoms or governments; Proper Bokaria, which is three hundred and eighty miles in length, and three hundred in breadth, the capital of which is Bokara: Sarmakand, which is five hundred and forty miles in length, and three hundred and twenty in breadth, the chief place of which is Sarmakand: Balkh, the length of which is three hundred and ſixty miles, the breadth two hundred and forty, and the principal town is Balkh. The country is very fine; the plains and valleys are very fertile in all ſorts of grain and fruit. The fields are covered with graſs ſeven or eight feet high, the rivers ſwarm with excellent fiſh, and the mountains abound with the richeſt mines. There is plenty of wood in ſeveral parts; the country is populous, the towns numerous, and the inhabitants drive a great trade with the neighbouring dominions.

There is only one lake of note in this country, called Taran, out of which the river that waſhes Sarmakand ariſes. The chief mountains are thoſe of Botom, near the lake Taran, and thoſe of Belure on the eaſtern borders. The chief cities of Proper Bokaria are Karmina, Wardanſi, Karſhi, Zam, and Bokara.

The inhabitants are of three ſorts, 1. the Bokhars, or ancient inhabitants, who are handſome, with fair complexions, black hair, and hawk-noſed; their chief purſuit is trade. 2. The Zagatags, who are Mogols that ſettled here with Jagatay the ſon of Jenghiz-Kahn. 3. The Uſbecks, who are alſo Mogols: theſe two laſt are incorporated together, and are the moſt civilized and brave of all the Mahommedan Tartars; they dwell in huts, and rove about to feed their cattle, the towns being almoſt wholly poſſeſſed by the Bokhars. 4. The Perſians, who often are at war with theſe people, and have ſometimes brought them under ſubjection. The inhabitants are all Mahommedans, and ſpeak a mixture of the Perſian, Turkiſh, and Mogol languages.

BOKARIA (LITTLE) is ſeated between eighty-two and one hundred and eighteen degrees of longitude, and between thirty-five, thirty, and forty-five degrees of latitude. It is bounded on the north and eaſt by Weſtern Tartary, on the weſt by Great Bokaria, and on the ſouth by the Sandy Deſerts, which ſeparate it from Thibet, and the north-weſt end of China. It is one thouſand five hundred and ſixty miles long, from eaſt to weſt, and five hundred and ſeventy broad, from north to ſouth. It is divided into three kingdoms or countries, to which may be added Shachew, which borders on China. Their names are Kaſhgar, which is five hundred and ſeventy miles in length, and three hundred and ninety in breadth; the principal town is Yarkant: Turfan, two hundred and ten miles in length, and one hundred and eighty in breadth, and whoſe capital is Turfan: Khamul, which is two hundred and fifty miles in length, and one hundred and eighty in breadth, and the chief town Khamul: Shachew, whoſe length is five hundred miles, and its breadth one hundred and eight-five, and the capital city Shachew.

Little Bokaria is a long tract of tolerably good land, running through the midſt of the great Sandy Deſert, from Great Bokaria till within a few days journey of Shachew, which laſt is formed in the ſame manner, both of valleys and ſandy plains, moſtly fruitful enough, intermixt with chains of high mountains, that render the air very cold. Little Bokaria is rich in mines of ſilver and gold, muſk, and all ſorts of precious ſtones, not excepting diamonds. It is well watered, very populous, and full of towns. The chief rivers are Rhotomni Solon, the river of Yarkant, the Ili, and the Haptu in Kaſhgar; the Polonkir and Echina, or Quedulan, in Shachew. The lakes are Auja Nor in Kaſhgar, Lors Nor in Turfan, which receives the rivers of Yarkant and the Haptu, and Kas Nor, and Kara Nor in Shachew.

BOKE-NEALE, a capital town of a province of the ſame name, lying under the line, in Africa. This country is inhabited by Jagas, who purchaſe elephants' teeth from their neighbours, and bring them to Guinea, to be ſold.

BOL (JOHN) a celebrated Flemiſh painter, born at Malines, who excelled in landſcapes. He died in 1593, aged ſixty.

BOLESLAUS I. the firſt king of Poland, ſucceeded the duke Mieciſlaus his father, who had embraced the Chriſtian religion. He aſked the pope, in vain, for the title of king, but the emperor Otho III. going a pilgrimage in the year 1000, to adore the corpſe of St. Adelbert, who had been martyred in Pruſſia four years before, and being magnificently entertained by Boleſlaus, ſhewed his gratitude in beſtowing on him the title of king, cloathing him with his own garments, and giving him the enſigns of royalty, particularly the ſword and golden ball. Boleſlaus conquered Moravia, rendered the people tributary to him, and endeared himſelf to the clergy by being very liberal to the church. He died in 1025.

BOLESLAUS II. the ſecond king of Poland, invaded Ruſſia in the year 1076, when his troops being victorious, gave themſelves up to ſenſuality, and continued ſo long abſent from Poland, that their wives took other huſbands, chiefly from among their ſlaves, as men of character would not conſent thus to injure the abſent. The Poles hearing of this, would not be reſtrained by Boleſlaus from returning to puniſh their wives for their infidelity. The women, and the ſlaves they had married, defended themſelves againſt the aſſailants, but were at laſt overcome. Boleſlaus, exaſperated at his ſoldiers for returning home without permiſſion, now continued the carnage, and put to death great numbers of thoſe who had obtained the victory over their ſlaves, and alſo a multitude of the women who had occaſioned their fault, and even expoſed the children born in adultery to be devoured by wild beaſts. This cruelty, at laſt, took a ludicrous turn, and he condemned thoſe women, whom the ſword had ſpared, to ſuckle puppies, and never to appear without one at their breaſts. Boleſlaus, increaſing in wickedneſs, murdered Staniſlaus, archbiſhop of Cracow, with his own hand, for reproving him. On this account he was excommunicated by the pope, when being forſaken by his ſubjects, he fled into Hungary, where he was kindly received by the king, till the pope ordered him to withdraw his protection. Boleſlaus, then diſguiſing himſelf like a mean perſon, entered a monaſtery in Carinthia, and officiated as their cook till his death, juſt before which he diſcovered himſelf to his confeſſor, and was afterwards decently interred, with this epitaph. "Here lies Boleſlaus, king of Poland, who murdered St. Staniſlaus."

There have been ſeveral other princes of the ſame name.

BOLEYN (ANNE) the daughter of ſir Thomas Boleyn, was born in 1507, and carried into France at ſeven years of age. She was afterwards maid of honour to queen Catharine, at which time king Henry VIII. being in love with her, ſhe behaved with ſuch addreſs, that in refuſing to gratify that monarch's paſſion, ſhe made him love her enough to divorce his wife and marry her, and accordingly ſhe was crowned queen of England, on the 1ſt of June, 1533, and continued to enjoy the king's affections, till the charms of Jane Seymour fired his heart, in 1536. His love was then changed to a violent hatred; he charged her with being unchaſte, impriſoned her, cauſed her to be tried, her marriage was declared null, and ſhe was condemned to be either burnt or beheaded, and was accordingly beheaded, on the 19th of May, 1536. Her death was lamented by many who felt her loſs, for ſhe made it her ſtudy to advance learned men, to reward merit, and to aſſiſt the poor.

BOLEYN (GEORGE) viſcount Rochfort, the unfortunate brother of Anne Boleyn, was raiſed by her greatneſs, involved in her fall, and more cruelly in her diſgrace. He was accuſed of too intimate familiarities with his ſiſter, by a moſt infamous woman his wife, who continued a lady of the bedchamber to the three ſucceeding queens, till her adminiſtring to the pleaſures of the laſt of them, Catharine Howard, brought that ſentence on her, which her malice or jealouſy had drawn on her lord and her ſiſter-in-law. The weightieſt proof againſt them was, his having been ſeen to whiſper the queen one morning as ſhe was in bed. But that could make inceſt, where a jealous or fickle tyrant could make laws at his will! Little is recorded of this nobleman, but two or three embaſſies to France, his being made governor of Dover and the Cinque Ports, and his ſubſcribing the famous declaration to Clement the Seventh. Like earl Rivers, he roſe by the exaltation of his ſiſter; like him was innocently ſacrificed on her account; and, like him, ſhewed that the luſtre of his ſituation did not make him neglect to add accompliſhments of his own.

Antony Wood ſays, he was much adored at court, eſpecially by the female ſex, for his admirable diſcourſe and ſymmetry of body, which one may well believe, as the king and the lady Rochfort would ſcarce have ſuſpected the queen of inceſt, unleſs her brother had had uncommon allurements in his perſon. Wood aſcribes to him ſeveral poems, ſongs, and ſonnets, with other things of the like nature; Bale calls them Rythmos elegantiſſimos. But none of his works are come down to us, unleſs any of the anonymous pieces, publiſhed along with the earl of Surrey's Poems, be of his compoſitions. BOLANDUS (JOHN) a famous Jeſuit, born at Tillemont, in the Netherlands, on the 13th of Auguſt, 1596. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing the Lives of the Saints, under the title of Acta Sanctorum, of which he publiſhed five volumes, in folio, but died while he was labouring at the ſixth, on the 12th of September, 1665, aged ſeventy. The continuators of that work are called Bollandiſts.

BOLOGNA, a city of Italy, in the ſtate of the church, and capital of the Bologneſe, with an archbiſhop's ſee. It is one of the ancienteſt, largeſt, and fineſt cities in Italy. It is very well built, and the ſtreets from one end to the other have handſome piazzas, wherein paſſengers may walk without being incommoded by the ſun or rain. It is about ſix miles in circumference, but is not perfectly round. It is ſurrounded with very large and agreeable plains, (except on the ſouth ſide) that produce every thing that is uſeful and neceſſary for life; for which reaſon it is called Bologna the Fat. It is ſeated at the foot of Mount Appenine, which is on the ſouth, and has twelve gates. The river Savona waſhes its walls, and the rivulet Rheno runs thro' the midſt of it, forming ſtreams therein. The tower, called Aſinelli, ſtands in the middle of the city, and is reckoned the higheſt in Italy, it being ſix hundred and ſeventy-ſix feet in height. Gariſonda is another tower, not far diſtant from the former. It is now but two hundred and forty feet high, though it was formerly ſeven hundred and eighty; but as it leans on one ſide, they were obliged to take the greateſt part of it down, to prevent the whole from falling. Near theſe towers is the church of St. Petronius, which is one of the largeſt and moſt ſtately in Italy. At a ſmall diſtance from this beautiful church there is a handſome edifice, wherein the belles lettres are taught, and is the moſt celebrated univerſity in Italy, eſpecially for the ſtudy of the civil law. The cathedral church is well worth the notice of foreigners, as well for the beauty of the ſtructure, as for the fine paintings and rich ſtatues to be ſeen therein. The church of St. Dominic is one of the moſt magnificent in Bologna. The chapel dedicated to the honour of this ſaint is a finiſhed work. It conſiſts of a curious dome, wherein the glittering of gold appears in every part, with the fineſt paintings in the world, repreſenting the hiſtory of his life. The pavement of this chapel, as well as the walls, are done with different coloured marble. The altar is made with exceeding fine poliſhed marble, after the manner of Michael Angelo. It would be endleſs to take notice of all the beauties of this chapel, or to deſcribe the numerous ſilver ſilver lamps of an enormous weight, or the chandeliers of the ſame metal, with which it is full. The choir is behind the great altar, wherein the ſeats of the monks are inlaid in ſuch a manner, as to be a juſt repreſentation of the hiſtory of the Old and New Teſtament. As for the reliques, manuſcripts, and tombs, we ſhall paſs them over in ſilence.

The monaſtery of the Dominicans is not leſs magnificent than the church, where one hundred and twenty monks live in a ſplendid manner. The library and the cellar are worth obſervation; for the former is full of books, and the latter of exquiſite wines. Near the church of St. Petronius is the palace where the governor reſides, wherein are the ſtatues of ſeveral popes, and a fine monument, erected in memory of the coronation of Charles V. by Clement VII. Before the palace there is a large ſquare, adorned with a curious fountain, enriched with ſeveral figures; near this is the pope's chapel, built exactly after the model of St. Peter's at Rome, and adorned in the ſame manner. The other churches are worth ſeeing, for there are curioſities in them all. Behind that of St. Cecilia is a large ſquare, where the palace of the Bentivoglios ſtood, which was razed to the ground on account of their cruelty.

Bologna is ſurrounded with a wall, but has no citadel. The ſtreets are pretty ſtrait, and the houſes are built with brick and ſtone, all ſtuccoed over, except a few, which are of hewn ſtone. The women are generally handſome, and well dreſſed, ſhowing themſelves oftner than in other places of Italy. The inhabitants in general are of a very odd diſpoſition; for when they are brought under ſubjection, they bear the yoke with incredible patience, and obey with the moſt grovelling ſubmiſſion; and yet, when they are maſters, they govern with inſupportable arrogance.

There are no leſs than four hundred ſilk mills in this city, beſides which it carries on a trade in wax, hemp, flax, hams, ſauſages, waſh-balls, ſnuff, and perfumes. This city is twenty-three miles ſouth-weſt of Modena, twenty-five ſouth-weſt of Ferrara, thirty-eight weſt of Ravenna, forty-eight north of Florence, and one hundred and forty-five north-by-weſt of Rome. Long. 11. 30. E. Lat. 44. 27. N.

BOLOGNE, commonly called Bullen by the Engliſh, is a city of France, in Picardy, the capital of the Bolonnois, ſeated near the ſea. It is divided into two towns, the Upper and Lower; the firſt is ſtrong by nature and art; the other is encloſed by walls only. The port is at the mouth of the river Liane, but, as the water is ſhallow, no ſhips of burthen can enter it. It is defended on the ſide of the river by a mole, which ſhelters it from the winds, and at the ſame time prevents the river from filling it with filth. It is much frequented by thoſe of the Engliſh who are obliged to ſeek for ſhelter in other countries. The merchants live in the Lower Town, where there are two large ſtreets, that run parellel on the ſide of the river: the houſes neareſt it are beſt built. The Minims have a convent in the other. Theſe two ſtreets run into the largeſt in the Lower Town, where there is a market and a church. About the port there are ſome ancient towers, and other fortifications, which were raiſed by the Engliſh when they were maſters of Bologne. The High Town has walls very well built; and there is a large ſquare which is adorned with a town-houſe, the hall of the ſeneſchalty, and the houſe of the prieſts of the Oratory.

The cathedral church is in the great ſtreet, to which people formerly came in pilgrimage from all parts of Europe, on account of an ancient image of the Virgin Mary, which is ſtill ſubſiſting in a chapel behind the choir, adorned with ſeveral lamps. The Urſuline and Annunciades nuns, the Cordeliers, the Capuchins, &c. have convents there. It is twenty-three miles weſt of St. Omer's, fifty north-weſt of Arras, fifty-five weſt of Liſle, forty north of Abbeville, eighteen ſouth of Calais, and one hundred and thirty-ſix north of Paris. Long. 19. 17. E. Lat. 50. 42. N.

BOLOGNESE, a ſmall province of Italy, in the territory of the Church, bounded on the north by the Ferrareſe, on the weſt by the duchy of Modena, on the ſouth by Tuſcany, and on the eaſt by Romania. It is watered by a great number of ſmall rivers, which render the ſoil the moſt fertile of any in Italy. Bologna is the capital, and from the great produce of the land is called Bologna the Fat. It produces abundance of all ſorts of grain and fruits, and particularly muſcadine grapes, which are in high eſteem. There are alſo mines of alum and iron, and they fabricate large quantities of linen, ſilk, and cloth.

BOLSANE, a town of Germany, in the territory of Tyrol, and circle of Auſtria. It is a handſome town, is very populous, and drives a great trade. It is very agreeably ſituated, in the midſt of a fine large valley, full of villages, and abounding in vineyards. The vines are carefully guarded by men who live in huts, ſupported by poles, and raiſed high enough to overlook the vineyards. The wines in this valley are the beſt in all Tyrol; but they muſt be drank the year after that of their growth, otherwiſe they become unfit for uſe. It is ſeated on the river near the Adige, nineteen miles ſouth-weſt of Brixen, and twenty-eight north of Trent. Long. 11. 11. E. Lat. 46. 42. N.

BOLSEC (Jerome) a Carmelite of Paris, who having preached a little too freely in the church of St. Bartholomew, forſook his order, and fled beyond the Alps. He preached at Geneva againſt Calvin's doctrine of eternal predeſtination, and he had no ſooner finiſhed his diſcourſe, than Calvin, who was preſent, roſe up and attempted to confute him, on which Bolſec was ſent to priſon, and afterwards baniſhed, on pain of being whipped if he ever returned. Filled with reſentment, he wrote the Hiſtory of the Life, Manners, Doctrine, and Death of John Calvin, and alſo the Life Manners, and Behaviour of Theodore Beza, in the moſt virulent and abuſive terms, filled with the moſt evident falſhoods; in return, Beza wrote his Life in the ſame ſtrain, and perhaps with as little regard to truth; among other invectives, he calls him a contented cuckold. Bolſec died about the year 1585.

BOLSENA, a town of Italy, ſeated on a lake of the ſame name, in the Patrimony of St. Peter, eight miles from Orvieto. Long. 11. 3. E. Lat 42. 57. N.

BOLSLAFF, a town of Sileſia, on the river Bober, eighteen miles north-weſt of Lignitz, and twenty-five eaſt of Gorlitz. Long. 15. 53. E. Lat. 51. 12. N.

BOLSLAW, a town of Bohemia, ſeated on the river Sizera, thirty miles north-eaſt of Prague. Long. 14. 35. E. Lat. 50. 24. N.

BOLSOVER, a town in Derbyſhire, with a market on Fridays, but no fairs. It is ſeated in a good ſoil and air, and is thought to have been a garriſon of the Danes, there being two large ditches or trenches yet to be ſeen. It is commonly called Bolſover-caſtle, from an old caſtle there, ſeated on high ground; and this place is of ſome note for the fine tobacco-pipes made here. It is five miles eaſt of Cheſterfield, and twenty-four north of Derby. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 53. 18. N.

BOLSWAERT, a town of the United Provinces, in Frieſland, and in the county of Weſtergoe, eight miles north of Slooten. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 53. 6. N.

BOLTON, a town of Lancaſhire, with a market on Mondays, and two fairs, on July 19 and October 2, for horſes, horned cattle, and cheeſe. It is ſeated on the river Croell, and is pretty well built. It has a manufacture for fuſtians, and the market is conſiderable for cloth and proviſions. It is nineteen miles north-weſt of Mancheſter, and a hundred and ninety-two north-north-weſt of London. Long. 2. 15. W. Lat. 53. 55. N.

Bolton, or Boulton, (Edmund) an ingenious antiquarian in the beginning of the ſeventeenth century, was a retainer to George Villiers, duke of Buckingham, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his writings, among which are, 1. An Engliſh Tranſlation of Lucius Florus's Roman Hiſtory. 2. Nero Cæſar, or Monarchy depraved. 3. Hypercritica, or a Rule of Judgment for writing or reading our Hiſtories. 4. The Life of the Emperor Tiberius, &c.

BOMAL, a town of the Auſtrian Netherlands, in the principality of Luxemburgh, ſeated on the river Ourte, twenty miles ſouth of Liege. Long. 5. 35. E. Lat. 50. 20. N.

BOMBASIUS (Paul) a native of Bologna, who gained a reputation by profeſſing the belles lettres towards the beginning of the ſixteenth century. He taught Latin and Greek at Naples, and there ſhewed ſuch proofs of his capacity, that the cardinal Pucci made him his ſecretary. He was a great friend to Eraſmus, and was in a happy and proſperous ſituation; but being at Rome when that city was plundered under pope Clement VII. he endeavoured to follow his maſter to the caſtle of St. Angelo, but was not quick enough to avoid being ſurrounded by a troop of ſoldiers, who inhumanly murdered him.

BOMBAY, a ſmall iſland on the weſt coaſt of the peninſula on this ſide the Ganges, in Aſia. It formerly belonged to the Portugueſe, but was given to England by the marriage of the infanta of Portugal with king Charles II. and now belongs to the Eaſt-India company. It is chiefly remarkable for its fort or caſtle, its harbour, and its convenient ſituation for trade. It is inhabited by ſeveral nations, but chiefly Engliſh, Portugueſe, and Indians, to the number of about fifty thouſand. The preſident of the Engliſh factory at Surat is uſually governor of this iſland, who lives in great ſplendor, and is very nobly attended. The chief town is about a mile in length, wherein all religions are tolerated, as well as in the reſt of the iſland. The Indians have ſmall pagods, which will not hold above nine or ten people. The air was formerly very unhealthy and fatal to the Engliſh, eſpecially in the months of September and October, which immediately follow the rains; but ſince the bogs and ſwamps have been drained, it is as healthy as any ſettlement on this coaſt. It rains here in June and July without intermiſſion for ten or fifteen days together, which puts an end for that time to navigation and travelling by land; after this they become gradually leſs and leſs till the middle of September, and then intirely ceaſe till the return of the ſeaſon the next year; and yet, which is exceeding ſtrange, on the eaſt of the peninſula, on the coaſt of Coromandel, from April to September, the weather is fair. The trees are green all the year, and the palm-trees will yield a quart of toddy in a night in the dryeſt ſeaſon. However, theſe rains are very uſeful for the production of rice; for, unleſs the ground is flat, and well ſoaked with water, there can be no hopes of a crop. There are a great many venomous creatures in this iſland, among which the ſpiders are very large. Bombay is one hundred and thirty miles ſouth of Surat. Long. 73. 0. E. Lat. 19. 0. N.

BOMBERG (DANIEL) a famous printer, a native of Antwerp, ſettled at Venice, and acquired great reputation by his Hebrew editions of the Bible, and the rabbinical authors. He began them in 1511, brought that part of his art to the higheſt perfection, and continued them till his death, which happened about the year 1550.

BOMENE, a ſea-port town of the United Provinces, in Zealand, ſeated on the north ſhore of the iſland Schonen, oppoſite to the iſland of Goree. Long. 4. 5. E. Lat. 51. 50. N.

BOMILCAR, general of the Carthaginians, was ſo alarmed at the exploits of Agathocles, that he baſely reſolved to deliver the city of Carthage to him; but his deſign being diſcovered, the Carthaginians were ſo enraged at his treachery, that they hanged him in the market-place, about the three hundred and eighth year before the Chriſtian æra.

BOMINEL, a town of Dutch Guelderland, ſeated on the north ſhore of the river Wall, eight miles from Bois le Duc, and four from Nimeguen. Long. 5. 15. E. Lat. 51. 55. N.

BONA, called BALEDERNA by the Moors, a ſea-port town, was formerly the capital of a province under the kings of Conſtantina. It was built by the Romans, and was famous for its archbiſhop St. Auguſtine, it being formerly in a flouriſhing ſtate. Some affirm it is the ancient Hippona; but the people of the country deny it, and ſay, that after it had been taken, retaken, and demoliſhed ſeveral times, the town called Baled el Ugned, that is, the Place of Jujebs, was built out of its ruins.

Above Bona, there is a fort which commands it, with a guard of three hundred Turkiſh ſoldiers, with an aga at their head, who is governor of the place. In the diſtrict of this town, there are the ruins of a town called Melle, now of no conſideration; and fifty miles eaſtward ſtands Tabarca, a poor town, at preſent belonging to Tunis. Over-againſt it there is an iſland of the ſame name, belonging to a Genoeſe family, who keep a governor there, and a factory to trade with the Moors, as well as to fiſh for coral. Long. 7. 57. E. Lat. 36. 5. N.

BONA (JOHN) a pious and learned cardinal, author of ſeveral devotional pieces, was born October 19, 1609, at Mondovi, a little city of Piedmont. He wrote the following books in Latin: 1. Of divine Pſalmody. 2. A ſhort Path to God. 3. A Guide to Heaven. 4. Principles and Rules of a Chriſtian Life; and other pieces. He died at Rome, on the 27th of October 1674, at ſeventy-four years of age.

BONACINA (MARTIN) a famous canon of Milan, wrote a Treatiſe on moral Divinity; another on the Election of the Popes; and another on Benefices. He died in 1631.

BONA DEA, the Good Goddeſs, in pagan mythology, one of the names of Cybele. Others ſay, ſhe was a Roman lady, the wife of one Faunus, and was famous for her chaſtity, and that after her death ſhe was deified. She was worſhipped at Rome, and her ſacrifices were performed only by matrons, and in ſo ſecret a manner, that it was no leſs than death for any man to be preſent at the aſſembly. See CYBELE.

BONARELLI (GUI UBALDO) an Italian count, born at Urbino, on the 25th of December, 1563. He was intruſted with ſeveral important negotiations, and was eſteemed an able politician and learned philoſopher. He was the author of a fine Italian paſtoral, intitled Filli di Sciro. He died at Fano, in 1608, aged forty-five.

BONAVENTURA (the bay of) in America, on the coaſt next to the South Sea, in the Popayan. It has a port, and a harbour for ſhips, but the air is very unwholeſome. It is ninety miles eaſt of Kali. Long. 75. 18. W. Lat. 3. 20. N.

BONAVENTURE, a celebrated cardinal, called, from his works, the Seraphic Doctor. He was born at Bagnarea, a ſmall town in Tuſcany, in 1221, and his original name was John Fidauze. He took the habit of a monk of the order of St. Francis in 1243, became doctor of Paris in 1255, and the next year general of his order. After the death of Clement IV. the cardinals diſagreeing about the election of a new pope, engaged themſelves by a ſolemn promiſe to elect him who ſhould be named by Bonaventure, even though it ſhould be himſelf; but he choſe Theobald, archdeacon of Liege, who was then in the Holy Land, and took the name of Gregory X. This pope, in return, in 1272, made him cardinal and biſhop of Alba, and ordered him to aſſiſt at the ſecond general council of Lyons, in which city he died on the 14th of July, 1274. It is remarkable, that Luther conſidered him as an excellent man, and calls him Bonaventura præſtantiſſimus vir. His works were printed at Rome, in 1588, in eight volumes in folio.

BONAIRE, an iſland of America, near the north coaſt of Terra Firma, to the ſouth-eaſt of the iſland of Curaſſoa, and to the ſouth-eaſt of Margarita. It belongs to the Dutch, and has plenty of goats and ſalt. Long. 66. 18. W. Lat. 20. 16. N.

BONAVISTA, an iſland in the Atlantic Ocean, being the moſt eaſtern of the Cape de Verd iſlands. This was diſcovered before any of the reſt, and is twenty miles in length, and thirteen in breadth. Here are plenty of goats and cotton, and ſome indigo. The inhabitants are very ſlothful; they have a town and two roads where ſhips come to an anchor. Long. 23. 6. W. Lat. 16. 5. N.

BONCIARIUS (MARK ANTHONY) a diſciple of Muret, diſtinguiſhed by his writing a polite Latin ſtyle, was born near Perouſe in Italy, February 9, 1555, and taught all his life at that city. He wrote, in Latin, a Treatiſe on Grammar, and a poem, intitled Triumphus Auguſtus, ſive de Sanctis Peruſii tranſlatis. He died January 9, 1616.

BONCONVENTO, a town of Italy, in the Sieneſe, ſeated on the river Ombrono, ten miles ſouth-eaſt of Sienna.

BOND (JOHN) a celebrated commentator and grammarian, was born in Somerſetſhire, and educated at the univerſity of Oxford, where he took the degree of maſter of arts, after which he was made maſter of the free-ſchool of Taunton St. Mary Magdalen, in Somerſetſhire, and at laſt turned his thoughts to the ſtudy of phyſic, which he practiſed with great reputation. He wrote Commentaries on Horace and Perſius, and died on the 3d of Auguſt, 1612.

BONELLES, a town in the Iſle of France, twenty-three miles from Paris.

BONET (THEOPHILUS) an eminent phyſician, born at Geneva, March 15, 1620. He took his degree in phyſic in 1643, after he had gone through moſt of the famous univerſities, and was for ſome time phyſician to the duke of Longueville; mean while his ſkill in his profeſſion got him conſiderable practice; but being ſeized with deafneſs, it obliged him to retire from buſineſs, which gave him leiſure to collect all the obſervations he had made during a practice of forty years. He wrote, 1. Polyalthes, ſive Theſaurus Medico-Practico, three volumes folio. 2. Labyrinthi Medici extricati. 3. Medicina Septentrionalis Collatitia; and other works.

BONFADIO (JAMES) one of the moſt polite writers of the ſixteenth century, was born in Italy, near the lake of Garda. He was ſecretary to the cardinal de Bari, and after his death to the cardinal Ghinucci. He afterwards read public lectures on Ariſtotle's Politics, and on rhetoric, and was made hiſtoriographer to the republic of Genoa. He applied himſelf to write the annals of that ſtate, in which he wrote too ſatirically on ſome families, which created him enemies who were reſolved to ruin him; they accuſed him of the unnatural ſin, and as witneſſes were found to convict him of it, he was condemned to be burnt. Some ſay this ſentence was executed; and others, that his puniſhment was changed, and that he was beheaded. This happened in 1560. His Hiſtory of Genoa is eſteemed. We have alſo ſome Letters, ſome Orations, and Latin and Italian Poems of his, which were printed at Bologna, in the year 1744, octavo.

BONFINIUS (ANTHONY) flouriſhed in the fifteenth century; he was a native of Aſcoli, in Italy, and attached himſelf to the ſtudy of the belles lettres. Matthias Corvin, king of Hungary, having heard of his learning, ſent for him, and Bonfinius had the honour to pay his reſpects to him at Rees, a few days before that prince made his public entry into the city of Vienna, which he had conquered, when, inſtead of letting him return to Italy, he detained him, and ſettled upon him a good penſion. He wrote, 1. A Hiſtory of Aſcoli. 2. A Treatiſe of Virginity and conjugal Chaſtity. 3. An Hiſtory of Hungary; and other works.

BONFRERIUS (JAMES) a learned Jeſuit, born at Dinant, in 1573. He wrote a Commentary on the Pentateuch, and learned Notes on the Onomaſticon of the Places and Towns mentioned in the Holy Scriptures. He died at Tournay, on the 9th of May, 1643, aged ſeventy.

BONGARS (JAMES) in Latin Bongarſius, a native of Orleans, was one of the moſt learned men of the ſixteenth century. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of critical learning, and was for near thirty years employed in the moſt important negotiations of Henry IV. whoſe reſident he was ſeveral times at the courts of the princes of Germany, and at length his ambaſſador. He was of the proteſtant religion, and and when very young had the courage to write and poſt up in Rome a very ſpirited anſwer to a bull of pope Sixtus V. The public is obliged to him for the edition of ſeveral authors who have written the Hiſtory of the Expeditions to the Holy Land; he alſo publiſhed, among other works, an edition of Juſtin, in which he reſtored ſeveral paſſages which had been corrupted, by conſulting valuable manuſcripts, and added notes which explained many difficulties. He died in 1612, at the age of fifty-eight.

BONIFACE, count of the Roman empire, in the fifth century, and the friend of St. Auguſtine. He had taken a reſolution to embrace a monaſtic life; but Auguſtine perſuaded him to live in the world like a good Chriſtian, in order to be of ſervice to the church by his riches and authority. He was driven out of Africa by the Vandals, and died in 432, of the wounds he had received in a battle againſt Aetius.

Boniface I. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Zozimus in 418, though his election was oppoſed by a part of the clergy, who elected Eulalius; but this antipope was depoſed by the emperor Honorius. Boniface died on the 25th of October, 423, and was ſucceeded by Celeſtin I.

To this Boniface St. Auguſtine dedicated his four books againſt the two Epiſtles of the Pelagians.

Boniface II. a Roman, was elected pope after Felix III. on on the 15th of October, 529. The antipope Dioſcorus was ſet up in oppoſition to him, but died ſoon after. He, in a ſynod held in 531, appointed the deacon Vigilius his ſucceſſor; but this novelty being eſteemed contrary to the canons, was revoked by another ſynod. He died on the 17th of October 532, and was ſucceeded by John II.

Boniface III. a Roman, ſucceeded pope Sabinianus, on the 15th of February, 606, and died on the 12th of November following. He prevailed on the emperor Phocas to conſent that the title of Univerſal Biſhop ſhould be given to no other biſhop but that of Rome, and in a ſynod condemned the practices of the biſhops who nominated their ſucceſſors.

Boniface IV. the ſon of a phyſician of Valeria, was elected pope after Boniface III. on the 18th of September, 607. He obtained from the emperor Phocas the Pantheon, a famous heathen temple built by Agrippa, and converted it into a church, which is now called Our Lady della Rotunda. He died on the 8th of May, 614, and was ſucceeded by Deus-dedit.

The works attributed to Boniface appear to be ſuppoſititious.

Boniface V. a Neapolitan, ſucceeded pope Deus-dedit, on the 24th of December, 617, and died on the 25th of October, 625. He maintained the privilege of having the churches for aſylums, and was ſucceeded by Honorius I.

Boniface VI. a Roman, was, according to ſome writers, elected pope after the death of Formoſus, on the 16th of December 896, and was driven from the papal chair fifteen days after, his election, according to Baronius, not being canonical. Stephen VI. who Flodoard eſteems the lawful ſucceſſor of Formoſus, was elected pope on the 8th of January, 897.

Boniface VII. antipope, ſurnamed Françon, cauſed Benedict VI. to be ſtrangled in priſon, in the year 974, and after the election of Benedict VII. removed the treaſures of the church to Conſtantinople. He, however, at length returned after the death of Benedict, and cauſed his ſucceſſor John XIV. to be murdered; but died himſelf ſoon after, 985, and after his death was dragged naked by the feet about the ſtreets.

Boniface VIII. a famous pope, born at Anagnia, was educated with great care, and became well ſkilled in the civil and canon law. He was at firſt conſiſtorial advocate, apoſtolical prothonotary, and canon of Lyons. Martin II. created him cardinal on the 23d of March, 1281, when he was named cardinal Cajetan. In ſhort, Celeſtin V. having at his ſolicitation made a voluntary abdication of the pontificate, cardinal Cajetan was elected pope, on the 24th of December, 1284, when he took the name of Boniface VIII. and cauſed Celeſtin to be ſhut up in a caſtle, where he died ſome time after. Boniface had a famous quarrel with Philip the Fair, king of France, on account of the croiſade projected by this pope, on the erection of the biſhopric of Pamiez, and the collation of benefices; and on theſe ſubjects very ſevere letters mutually paſſed between them. At length king Philip reſolving to oblige Boniface to appear at a council he had a mind to aſſemble at Lyons, ſent Sciarra Colonna into Italy, with William Nogarat, his confidant, who entering Agnania, where Boniface was, arreſted him on the 7th of September, 1303, the day before he was to have publiſhed a bull, by which he had excommunicated the French king, abſolved his ſubjects from their obedience, and gave his kingdom to the firſt who could take it, having before offered it to the emperor Albert, who declined accepting it; but the fourth day after Boniface's confinement, the people of Agnania took up arms, delivered the pope, and expelled the French. However, this affront gave Boniface ſuch vexation, that he fell ſick, and died at Rome of a raging fever, on the 12th of October, 1303.

This pope canonized St. Lewis in 1297, inſtituted the jubilee to be obſerved every hundred years in 1300, and cauſed the ſixth book of the Decretals to be collected, which he called the Sexte. He was ſucceeded by Benedict XI.

Boniface IX. was of a noble but poor Neapolitan family. He was made a cardinal in 1381, and elected pope after the death of Urban VI. on the 2d of November, 1389, at the time when the cardinals, who were at Avignon, had choſen Clement VII. and afterwards Benedict XIII. He inſtituted the payment of the firſt fruits of benefices. Hiſtorians beſtow great praiſes on his chaſtity, which, it is ſaid, made him prefer death to a remedy that was inconſiſtent with that virtue, but reproach him with pride and arrogance, an inſatiable deſire to amaſs great riches, exceſſive cruelty, and a criminal complaiſance for the irregularities of his family. He died on the 1ſt of October, 1404, and was ſucceeded by Innocent VII.

Boniface (St) the firſt archbiſhop of Mentz, who before he took that name was called Winifred. He was born at Kirton, in Devonſhire. After having taught the Holy Scriptures in a monaſtery in England, he reſolved to go and preach the Goſpel to the barbarous nations. He was ſent by Gregory II. into Germany, in the year 719. He preached in Thuringia, and the countries of Heſſe, Frieſland, and Saxony, where he made great numbers of converts. Boniface then travelled to Rome, where he was conſecrated biſhop, in 723, by Gregory II. who ſent him back into Germany, where he continued preaching, converted the people of Bavaria, and received the pall from Gregory III. with a permiſſion to erect biſhoprics in the countries newly converted. After his having made a third journey to Rome, he again returned to Germany, where he erected epiſcopal ſees at Saltzburg, Freizengen, Ratiſbon, Paſſaw, Burabour, Wirtzburg, and Eichſtat. King Pepin and the French lords nominated him to the archbiſhoprick of Mentz, which he ſoon after reſigned in favour of Lalley his diſciple, and went to preach the Goſpel in Frieſland, where he was murdered by the Pagans, on the 5th of June, 754. His Letters were publiſhed by Serrarius.

BONIFACIO, a town in the iſland of Corſica, beyond the mountains, near the ſtreight called Bocca di Bonifacio. It is well fortified, and pretty populous. It is thirty-eight miles ſouth of Ajaccio. Long. 9. 20. E. Lat. 41. 25. N.

BONN, an ancient and ſtrong city of Germany, in the electorate of Cologn, and the uſual reſidence of the elector. It is of great conſequence in time of war, becauſe it is ſeated on the Rhine, in a place where it can ſtop every thing that comes down that river. It is well fortified by the elector, who has a fine palace and beautiful gardens in the city. It is twelve miles ſouth of Cologn, eighteen eaſt of Juliers, and ſixty-two north-by-eaſt of Treves. Long. 7. 5. E. Lat. 50. 44. N.

BONNA, a woman of very remarkable abilities, was a native of the Valtaline, and ſpent her time in keeping ſheep, but being met by Peter Brunoro, an illuſtrious warrior, of the Parmeſan, that officer, obſerving the vivacity and ſtateline's of this girl, took her with him, and made her his concubine. He took pleaſure in ſeeing her in man's cloaths, mount a horſe, and accompany him in hunting. She was with him when, in order to ſerve count Sforza, he oppoſed Alphonſo, king of Naples, and followed him when he entered again into the ſervice of Alphonſo, his firſt maſter. Some time after, Brunoro reſolved to return to Sforza, and deliberated on the means of flying, but he could not execute them ſo ſecretly as to prevent his deſign coming to the knowledge of the king of Naples, who cauſed him to be arreſted, and thrown into priſon. Bonna inſtantly reſolving to endeavour to releaſe him, went to all the princes of Italy, the king of France, Philip duke of Burgundy, and the Venetians, from whom ſhe obtained letters of recommendation to procure the liberty of Brunoro. Alphonſo, being ſolicited by ſuch great powers, was obliged to ſet him at liberty, and to give this generous girl, who had interceded with the ſenate of Venice for her lover, the command of the troops of that republic, with a ſalary of twenty thouſand ducats. Upon this, Brunoro conſidering the great obligations he was under to Bonna, made her his lawful wife. Bonna, after her marriage, diſcovered more and more the greatneſs of her courage, and was preſent at all the engagements, fighting with great bravery. She became well ſkilled in the art of war, and ſhewed the effects of it on various occaſions, particularly in the enterpriſe of the Venetians againſt Francis Sforza, duke of Milan, where ſhe forced the enemy to reſtore the caſtle of Pavono, near Breſcia, after ſhe had commanded in an aſſault ſword in hand. In ſhort, the ſenate of Venice having an entire confidence in the conduct of Peter Brunoro, and in the valour and prudence of his wife, ſent them to the defence of Negropont, againſt the Turks; and they defended that iſland ſo well, that during all the time they continued there, the Turks did not dare to undertake any thing on that ſide. Brunoro died in the city of Negropont, and Bonna ſet out on her return to Venice, but died in the way, in a town of the Morea, in the year 1466, leaving two children born in marriage.

BONNEFONS (JOHN) a Latin poet, born at Clermont, in Auvergne, and lieutenant-general of Bar ſur Seine, acquired great reputation by his Pancharis, and other poems. He died under the reign of Lewis XIII.

He ought not to be confounded with John Bonnefons, his ſon, another Latin poet.

BONNEL (JAMES) accomptant-general of the revenue of Ireland, diſtinguiſhed by his piety, integrity, and humanity, was born at Genoa, November 14, 1653, and educated at Cambridge. He was a perſon of great learning, and tranſlated ſome parts of Syneſius into Engliſh, which however were never publiſhed. It is remarkable that his charity was ſo very extenſive, that he commonly gave the eighth part of his yearly income to the neceſſitous. Mr. Granger obſerves, that he was a man of uncommon knowledge, of amiable manners, and a juſt pattern of public and private virtues. He was charitable without oſtentation, religious without bigotry; and ſo acquitted himſelf in the ſeveral duties and relations of life, as not only to avoid evil, but the appearance of it; not only to eſcape cenſure, but to gain and deſerve praiſe and honour. This worthy perſon died on the 28th of April, 1699.

BONNER (EDMUND) biſhop of London, in the ſixteenth century, was born at Henley, in Worceſterſhire, and was the ſon of an honeſt poor man of that place. He was educated at the univerſity of Oxford, where he ſtudied civil and canon law; but was leſs diſtinguiſhed by his learning than by his dexterity and ſkill in the management of affairs, and for this he was taken notice of by cardinal Wolſey, who made him his commiſſary for the faculties. After the cardinal his patron's death, being of a forward and enterpriſing genius, he inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of king Henry VIII. and became one of his chaplains, a favourer of the Lutherans, a promoter of that king's divorce from queen Catharine of Spain, and of all his proceedings in abrogating the pope's ſupremacy. He inſinuated himſelf into the favour of Thomas Cromwell, ſecretary of ſtate, by whoſe recommendation he was employed as embaſſador at ſeveral courts, and particularly in 1533, was ſent to pope Clement VII. then at Marſeilles, upon the excommunication decreed at Rome againſt king Henry VIII. on account of his divorce; and to deliver that king's appeal to the next general council lawfully called; when he delivered the threatnings he was ordered to uſe, with ſuch vehemence and paſſionate heat, that the pope talked of throwing him into a caldron of melted lead, or of burning him alive; on which Bonner was ſo frighted, that he took the firſt opportunity to make his eſcape. He was alſo employed in embaſſies to the emperor and the kings of Denmark and France; and in 1538, while he was embaſſador in the laſt mentioned kingdom, was nominated to the biſhoprick of Hereford; but before his conſecration was tranſlated to the ſee of London, in 1539. During that reign he appeared zealous againſt the pope, and in promoting the Reformation in this kingdom; though there is but too much reaſon to ſuſpect that he acted all this while againſt his conſcience, and was a thorough papiſt in his heart; for ſoon after the acceſſion of Edward VI. he ſcrupled to renounce the authority of the biſhop of Rome, and entered a proteſt againſt the king's injunctions and homilies, for which he was committed priſoner to the Fleet; but was ſoon after releaſed on his recanting his proteſtation. He now outwardly complied with the methods taken to advance the Reformation; though he privately uſed all poſſible means to obſtruct it. However, being afterwards charged with neglecting the obſervance of the king's injunctions, he was committed to the Marſhalſea, and deprived of his biſhoprick; but he ſoon moſt ſeverely revenged himſelf on his enemies; for after the acceſſion of queen Mary he was reſtored to his biſhoprick, and ſoon after was made vicegerent and preſident of the convocation; he then viſited his dioceſe in order to root up all the ſeeds of the Reformation, and ſent an order to all the miniſters to put out ſuch paſſages of Scripture as had been painted on the church walls, and ſet up the maſs again at St Paul's before the act for reſtoring it was paſſed. He was in the commiſſion for turning out ſome of the reformed biſhops, and being known to be of a fierce and cruel diſpoſition, biſhop Gardiner, in 1555, left wholly to him the condemning and burning of heretics, when, during that and the three following years, he moſt inhumanly committed to the flames, and otherwiſe deſtroyed, hundreds of innocent perſons, for their adherence to the proteſtant religion, and their refuſing to embrace the groſs errors of popery. However, at queen Elizabeth's acceſſion to the throne, he had the confidence to go and meet her at Highgate, with the reſt of the biſhops; but ſhe looked on him as ſo much defiled with blood, that ſhe could not ſhew him any mark of her favour; however, he remained for ſome months unmoleſted; but being called before the privy-council, on the 30th of May, 1559, and refuſing to take the oath of allegiance and ſupremacy, then tendered to him, he was a ſecond time deprived of his biſhoprick, and the next month ſent to the Marſhalſea, where he lived ſeveral years very chearfully, and died there on the 5th of September, 1569.

BONONIA (JOHN DE) archdeacon of Palermo, bachelor of the faculty of Paris, and chaplain to the emperor Charles V. was born in Sicily, and flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century. He was extremely zealous againſt the verſions of the Scripture in the vulgar tongue, and printed a book in 1555, on Predeſtination and Reprobation.

BONOSUS, the ſon of a profeſſor of rhetoric, cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed emperor in Gaul, but was defeated by Probus, and afterwards hanged, about the year 280.

BONTEKOE (CORNELIUS) a famous phyſician, born at Alkmaer; after having perfected himſelf at Leyden, in medicine, chemiſtry, and the philoſophy of Deſcartes, went to the Hague, then to Amſterdam, at length to Hamburgh, and afterwards to Berlin, where he became phyſician to the elector of Brandenburg, who gave him a profeſſor's chair at Frankfort upon the Oder, where he died ſoon after, aged thirty-three. He wrote a Treatiſe on Tea, and another on the Clymacteric Year.

BONUS EVENTUS, in pagan mythology, one of the Dii Conſentes, whoſe ſtatue had a patera in his right hand, and in his left an ear of corn. This was one of the emblematical deities to whom the Romans addreſſed their petitions for ſucceſs in their undertakings. His ſtatue was placed in the Capitol, together with his wife or ſiſter Bona Fortuna, or Good Fortune.

BOOKS, though theſe at firſt view may appear improper for an Hiſtorical Dictionary, yet in a work which treats of authors, they neceſſarily make a conſiderable part, and have had ſuch an effect in the promotion of truth, of ſcience, and of all the arts, as make it neceſſary to give them a place here. The Romans wrote their books either on parchment, or on paper made of the Egyptian papyrus. The latter being the cheapeſt, was of courſe the moſt commonly uſed. But after the Saracens conquered Egypt, in the ſeventh century, the communication between that country and the people ſettled in Italy, or in other parts of Europe, was almoſt entirely broken off, and the papyrus was no longer in uſe among them. They were obliged, on that account, to write all their books upon parchment, and as the price of that was high, books became extremely rare, and of great value. We may judge of the ſcarcity of the materials for writing them from one circumſtance: there ſtill remain ſeveral manuſcripts of the eighth, ninth, and following centuries, wrote on parchment, from which ſome former writing had been eraſed, in order to ſubſtitute a new compoſition in its place. In this manner it is probable that ſeveral works of the ancients periſhed. A book of Livy, or of Tacitus might be eraſed, to make room for the legendary tale of a ſaint, or the prayers of a miſſal. P. de Montfaucon affirms, that the greateſt part of the manuſcripts on parchment which he has ſeen, thoſe of an ancient date excepted, are written on parchment from which ſome former treatiſe had been eraſed. As the want of materials for writing is one reaſon why ſo many of the works of the ancients have periſhed, it accounts likewiſe for the ſmall number of manuſcripts of any kind, previous to the eleventh century, when they began to multiply from a cauſe which ſhall be hereafter mentioned. Many circumſtances prove the ſcarcity of books during theſe ages. Private perſons ſeldom poſſeſſed any books whatever, and even monaſteries of conſiderable note had only one miſſal. The price of books became ſo high, that perſons of a moderate fortune could not afford to purchaſe them: the counteſs of Anjou paid for a copy of the Homilies of Haimoa, biſhop of Halberſtadt, two hundred ſheep, five quarters of wheat, and the ſame quantity of rye and millet; and when Lewis XI. borrowed the works of Raſis, the Arabian phyſician, from the faculty of medicine in Paris, he not only depoſited, as a pledge, a conſiderable quantity of plate, but was obliged to procure a nobleman to join with him as ſurety in a deed, binding himſelf under a great forfeiture to reſtore it. But in the eleventh century, the art of making paper in the manner now become univerſal, was invented, and by means of that, not only the number of manuſcripts encreaſed, but the ſtudy of the ſciences was wonderfully facilitated. The invention of the art of making paper, and the invention of the art of printing, are two conſiderable events in literary hiſtory. It is remarkable that the former preceded the firſt dawning of letters and improvement in knowledge, towards the cloſe of the eleventh century; the latter uſhered in the light which ſpread over Europe, at the æra of the Reformation. BOOT (RICHARD) a phyſician and botaniſt, born in Ireland, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing a Natural Hiſtory of that kingdom, which was tranſlated from the Engliſh into French.

BOOTH (JOHN and HENRY) two celebrated painters, were born at Utrecht, and were both Blomaert's diſciples. They went to Rome, where John ſtudied the drawings of figures and animals, in imitation of Bamboccio's manner; and Henry applied himſelf to landſcapes, imitating the manner of Claud de Lorrain. Both of them ſucceeded in their ſeveral kinds. They agreed to paint pictures together, in which John drew the figures and the animals, and Henry the landſcapes, reconciling their manner ſo well, that the whole ſeemed done by one hand. By this means they finiſhed their pictures with great eaſe, and ſold them very faſt; but Henry's death broke off their partnerſhip; for he fell into a canal at Venice, one night when going home, and was drowned.

BOOTH (BARTON) one of the beſt and moſt applauded actors, eſpecially in tragedy, that ever trod the Engliſh ſtage, was the ſon of John Booth, eſq. and was born in 1681. He was educated by Dr. Buſby, at Weſtminſter-ſchool, where he ſignaliſed himſelf by acting a principal part in a Latin play, which gained him the notice of the doctor, as well as the univerſal applauſe of all the ſpectators. This gave him an inclination for the ſtage, to the great concern of his father, who intended him for the church; ſo that when he had reached the age of ſeventeen, and the time approached when he was to be ſent to the univerſity, he ſtole away from ſchool, and went over to Ireland with Mr. Aſhbury, a player, in the year 1698, where he diſtinguiſhed himſelf on the ſtage of Dublin, in a very extraordinary manner; and having continued there three ſeaſons, he returned to England, in 1701, and was by the lord Fitzharding recommended to Mr. Betterton, then at the head of the company, who very readily took him under his care, and gave him all the aſſiſtance in his power. The firſt character in which he appeared on the Engliſh ſtage, was that of Maximus, in the tragedy of Valentinian, and it was ſcarce poſſible for a young actor to meet with a better reception than he did. Soon after, the Ambitious Step-Mother coming upon the ſtage, he performed the part of Artaban, which added conſiderably to his reputation, and made him be eſteemed one of the firſt actors then on the ſtage. But he ſhone with the greateſt luſtre in the tragedy of Cato. Cibber obſerves, that though that play ſeems plainly to be written on what are called whig principles, yet the tories at that time ſeemed to vaunt their approbation of every ſentiment in favour of liberty, which, by a public act of their generoſity, was carried ſo high, that one evening, while the play was acting, they collected fifty guineas in the boxes, and made a preſent of them to Booth, with this compliment; that it was for his honeſt oppoſition to a perpetual dictator, and his dying ſo bravely in the cauſe of liberty. The reputation to which Mr. Booth was now arrived, ſeemed to entitle him to a ſhare in the management of the theatre, and in 1713, a new licence was granted, in which Mr. Booth's name was added to thoſe of the former managers, Cibber, Wilks, and Dogget, the laſt of whom threw up his ſhare. He was then in the thirty-third year of his age, and in the higheſt reputation as an actor. He ſpoke juſtly, his pronunciation was very correct, and the cadence of his voice was extremely grateful to the ear. During the twenty years in which he continued a manager, the theatre was in the greateſt credit, and his illneſs and death, which happened on the 10th of May, 1733, contributed not a little to its decline. He wrote a dramatic entertainment, called Dido and Æneas; but his maſter-piece was a Latin Inſcription to the Memory of Mr. William Smith, a celebrated actor, who died while he was young. To ſum up Mr. Booth's character: in his private life he had many virtues, he was juſt, punctual, and ſincere; entirely void of envy, and diſcharged all the duties of a public and private nature in a genteel and generous manner.

BORDELON (LAWRENCE) a laborious writer, in the eighteenth century, was born at Bourges, in 1653, and after he had performed his ſtudies in that city, received the degree of doctor, went to Paris, and became preceptor to M. Lambert, at whoſe houſe he died, on the 6th of April, 1730. His principal works are, 1. A curious Converſation on Judicial Aſtrology. 2. The Philoſophic Theatre. 3. Les Diverſités, in ten volumes, duodecimo. 4. The true Religion ſought for and found, &c.

BORDUNI (PARIS) an excellent Italian painter, was born at Venice, about the year 1512, and being of a noble family, had a polite education. He was the diſciple of Titian; but has been more admired for the delicacy of his pencil, than the truth of his out-lines. He was at the court of France in the reign of Francis I. who had a great eſteem for him, and for whom he not only drew abundance of hiſtory-pieces, but the portraits of ſeveral court ladies, in ſo fine a manner, that original nature was hardly more charming. He at length returned to Venice, laden with riches and honour, and having gained great reputation in all parts of Italy, died in the year 1587, aged ſeventy-five.

BORE (CATHERINE DE) wife to Martin Luther, was the daughter of a private gentleman. She left the convent of Nimptſchen, where ſhe was a nun, in 1523, at which time eight other nuns eſcaped with her; they all being aſſiſted by Leonard Coppe, a ſenator of Torga. This action committed in the Holy Week gave great offence; but Luther publiſhed an Apology both for Leonard Coppe and the nuns. Luther married her about two years after. She ſurvived that great reformer, and died on the 20th of December, 1552.

BOREAS, in pagan mythology, the ſon of Aſtræus and Aurora, the god of the winds, or rather the north-wind, and is ſaid to have had his ſeat in Thrace, which is ſituated north of the country where the poets lived who firſt wrote of this wind. He debauched Chloris, the daughter of Arcturus, and carried her to mount Niphates, ſince known by the name of Caucaſus; but his favourite miſtreſs was Orithyia, the daughter of Erectheus. In ſhort, transforming himſelf into a horſe, he had by the mares of Dardanus twelve foals, of wonderful ſwiftneſs.

In the octagon tower of the winds, built by Andronicus, Boreas is repreſented under the figure of an infant with wings, that ſeems taking a rapid flight; he wears buſkins, and covers his face with his mantle, to preſerve it from the ſharpneſs of the cold.

BOREASMI, Βορεασμοι, in Grecian antiquity, a feſtival kept by the Athenians in honour of Boreas, inſtituted in remembrance of many of the ſhips of their enemies being deſtroyed by a north wind.

BOREL (PETER) a learned phyſician, was the ſon of James Borel, who publiſhed ſeveral poems, and was born at Caſtres, in 1620. He applied himſelf to the ſtudy of phyſic, of which he was created doctor, and practiſed with great ſucceſs in the city of Caſtres. Towards the end of the year 1653, he went to Paris, and was ſoon after made phyſician in ordinary to the king. In 1674, he was received into the Academy of Sciences, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by writing a great number of works, ſome of which are eſteemed by the learned. The principal of theſe are, 1. The Antiquities of the city of Caſtres, octavo, in French. Hiſtoriarum & Obſervationum Medico-Phyſicarum, the beſt edition of which is that of Paris, in 1657 or 1658. 3. Bibliotheca Chymica, duodecimo. 4. De vero Teleſcopii Inventore, cum brevi omnium Conſpicillorum Hiſtoria, quarto. He died in 1678.

BORELLI (JOHN ALPHONSO) an eminent mathematician and philoſopher, was born at Naples, January 28, 1608. The inclination which he had very early for philoſophy and mathematics continued with him his whole life, during the greateſt part of which he was profeſſor of thoſe ſciences, in the moſt celebrated univerſities in Italy, eſpecially at Florence and Piſa, where he gained the eſteem and favour of the houſe of Medicis; but engaging in the revolt of Meſſina, he was obliged to retire to Rome, where he ſpent the reſt of his life under the protection of Chriſtina, queen of Sweden. He wrote, in Latin, 1. Euclid reſtored. 2. The Theory of the Influence of the Planets in Medicine, deduced from phyſical Cauſes. 3. Of percuſſive Force. 4. Of natural Motions depending upon Gravity. 5. An hiſtorical and meteorological Account of the burning of Mount Ætna, in the year 1669. 6. Of the Motion of Animals; and ſeveral other works, ſome of which are in Italian. He died December 31, 1679, in the ſeventy-ſecond year of his age.

BORGIA (Cæsar) the natural ſon of Rodoric Borgia, afterwards pope, by the name of Alexander VI. He was proſecuting his ſtudies at Piſa, when his father was raiſed to the papacy, in 1492, upon which he took a journey to Rome, where he was at firſt received by his father in ſo cold a manner as threw him into the utmoſt confuſion, but was ſoon after made archbiſhop of Valenza, and cardinal of St. Maria Nuova. The reſt of his life was a continued ſcene of the blackeſt and moſt horrid villainies. After committing a great number of aſſaſſinations, and particularly cauſing his elder brother, the duke of Gandia, to be murdered, he reſigned his cardinalſhip, and then went ambaſſador to France, where he was made duke of Valentinois, by Lewis XII. and poiſoned the biſhop of Setta, the pope's nuncio, at Paris. He married Mademoiſelle d'Albret, daughter of the king of Navarre. He now grew every day more and more bloody in his diſpoſition; Rome and the Eccleſiaſtical dominions were full of aſſaſſinations; for Borgia and his father being powerfully protected by the French, left no method of villainy unacted, in order to enrich themſelves by the eſtates of others; and not only in an open manner by arms, diveſted innocent people of their properties, but likewiſe ſecretly deſtroyed them, that they might ſeize their wealth to carry on an unjuſt war againſt the vicars of Romagna. Every thing of which the clergy were poſſeſſed, was, upon their deceaſe, claimed by the pope as his property; and the ſums ariſing from the benefices, while vacant, were likewiſe ſecured; and the benefices themſelves ſold like common goods in a market. In this manner were the Borgias heaping up wealth, when an unforeſeen accident blaſted all their projects. Borgia and his father the pope propoſing to make themſelves maſters of Tuſcany, determined to raiſe money by the promotion of new cardinals; upon which they choſe nine of the richeſt of the prelates, whom they reſolved to diſpatch by poiſon immediately after their promotion, together with ſome others of the moſt wealthy at Rome. For this purpoſe they invited the new cardinals to ſup at a vineyard near the Vatican, belonging to cardinal Adriano di Corneto, who, as he was extremely rich, was, among the reſt, ſingled out to die by the ſame poiſon. Borgia, in order to execute this deſign, ſent to the pope's butler, who was to wait and ſerve at ſupper, ſome particular flaſks of wine which he had mixed with a certain poiſon, and gave the butler a ſtrict charge that none ſhould taſte of it but thoſe whom he ſhould particularly direct. Accordingly, the pope and he, about the cool of the evening, came to the vineyard where they were to ſup, when the former, before he ſat down to ſupper, deſired ſomething to drink; the chief butler, who had received Borgia's directions about the poiſon, being gone to the Vatican to fetch a ſalver of peaches for the deſart, the under butler went to the ſide-board, and finding ſix flaſks laid by in a corner, imagined that they might contain wine of a better kind than the reſt, and therefore poured out a glaſs-full of the poiſoned liquor, which he delivered to the cup-bearer, who gave it to the pope, who inſtantly drank it off. Borgia likewiſe drank another glaſs of it. As ſoon as the pope ſat down to ſupper, the poiſon began to work ſo in his bowels, that he fell ſuddenly off his chair, and was taken up for dead. Nor did Borgia eſcape the effect of his own plot; he was ſeized with exquiſite pain. As ſoon as the pope was taken from the ground, they cauſed him to be carried in all haſte to the Vatican, and Cæſar Borgia to his chamber likewiſe, and from that moment they never ſaw each other again; remedies were in vain uſed for the pope's recovery, he was filled with inexpreſſible agony, and the next day died, after the formality of receiving all the ſacraments of the church, on the 18th of Auguſt, 1503. But Cæſar Borgia, by the ſtrength of his conſtitution, overcame the poiſon, being frequently put into the belly of a bull and a mule, who were ript up alive for that purpoſe. After this Borgia narrowly eſcaped being maſſacred by his enemies; he was confined in priſon; he made his eſcape; was obliged to fly for ſafety from place to place, and at laſt entering a volunteer into the army of his brother in-law, John, king of Navarre, this execrable monſter was killed fighting under the walls of Viana, March 12, 1507. Cæſar Borgia had taken this motto: Aut Cæſar, aut nihil, on which the following epigram was written.

Borgia Cæſar erat, factis & nomine Cæſar;
Aut nihil, aut Cæſar dixit, utrumque fuit.

BORGOGNONE, a celebrated painter, whoſe true name was Giacomo Corteſi, but he is commonly called Borgognone, from the country where he was born, about the year 1605. He was much admired, and highly applauded for his admirable guſto, and grand manner of painting battles. He had for ſeveral years been converſant in military affairs, was a conſiderable officer in the army, made the camp his ſchool, and formed all his ideas from what he had ſeen performed in the field. His ſtyle is roughly noble, full of fire and pirit, and there are a few prints etched by his hand. Towards the cloſe of his life he retired to the Jeſuits convent in Rome, where he is ſaid to have taken ſanctuary, to rid his hands of an ill bargain he had got in a wife, but happily ſurviving her, he lived in great eſteem and honour till after the year 1675.

BORLASE (Dr. Edmund) an eminent phyſician and Engliſh writer in the ſeventeenth century, was the ſon of ſir John Borlaſe, maſter of the ordnance, and one of the lords juſtices of Ireland in 1643. He ſtudied in Dublin college, and afterwards at the univerſity at Leyden, at which laſt place he took the degree of doctor of phyſic. He afterwards practiſed phyſic with great ſucceſs in the city of Cheſter, and was incorporated doctor of the faculty, in the univerſity of Oxford. Among the books which he wrote and publiſhed, are the following, 1. Latham Spaw, in Lancaſhire, with ſome remarkable Caſes and Cures effected by it. 2. The Reduction of Ireland to the Crown of England. 3. The Hiſtory of the Iriſh Rebellion. 4. Brief Reflections on the Earl of Caſtlehaven's Memoirs, &c. He died after the year 1682.

BORMIO, a county depending on the republic of the Griſons, in Switzerland. It is bounded on the ſouth by the eſtate of Venice, and the eaſt by the territory of the Houſe of Auſtria, and on the ſouth and weſt by Caddea. It is fifteen miles over both ways, and is divided into five communities, namely, the town of Bormio, the Valley of Forbia, the Interior Valley, the Lower Valley, and the Valley of Luvino. Bormio is the only town in this diſtrict, and has a governor called a podeſta, ſent by the Griſons to preſide in civil and criminal affairs. It is ſeated at the confluence of the river Addo and the Iſolaccia, forty-three miles ſouth-eaſt of Coire, and eighteen north-eaſt of Tirano. Long. 10. 10. E. Lat. 46. 45. N.

BORNEO, an iſland of Aſia, in the Eaſt Indies, and one of the three great Sunda Iſlands. It was firſt diſcovered in 1521, by the Portugueſe, and is thought to be the greateſt iſland in Aſia, being ſix hundred miles from north to ſouth, and five hundred from eaſt to weſt. It is ſeated under the Equator, that line cutting it almoſt thro' the middle. The products of this iſland are, fruit, maſtic, gums, wax, rice, caſſia, honey, cotton, camphire, frankincenſe, muſk, aloes, agaric, ſapan, pepper, cinnamon, diamonds, gold duſt, and the bezoar ſtones. There are mines of iron, tin, and load ſtones. Birds neſts are to be had here, which are eatable, and reckoned a great delicacy. The beaſts are oxen, buffaloes, deer, goats, elephants, tygers, and monkeys. Here are parrots and parrokeets, beſides various birds unknown in Europe. They have great numbers of monſtruous bats, which ſometimes darken the ſky in the evening, in colour, ſhape, and ſmell, like a fox, and their wings when extended are five or ſix feet from ſide to ſide.

This iſland has fine rivers, eſpecially towards the weſt and ſouth. In their monſoon, from April to September, their wind is weſterly, in which they have continual heavy rains, and violent ſtorms, with thunder; the rainy ſeaſon continues eight months. The towns and factories are generally built on floats of timber in the rivers, made faſt to trees on the ſide. The houſes have but one floor, with partitions made with cane, and the roofs are covered with palmeto leaves, the eaves of which reach within four or five feet of the bottom, to ſhelter them from the ſun. The weſt and north-eaſt ſides of the iſland are almoſt deſart, and the eaſt is but little known. The inland parts are very mountainous, tainous, and the ſouth-eaſt, for ſome hundred miles together, is a ſtinking moraſs, which being overflowed in the wet ſeaſon, is very unhealthy.

The natives, who now inhabit the inland parts, are called Byayos; they are extremely ſwarthy, and of the Pagan religion. They live on their tame cattle, and by hunting. They are quite naked, except wearing a cloth round their waiſts, and paint their bodies of a blueiſh colour, as well as daub them with oil. Their greateſt ornament is a ſtring of tiger's teeth about their necks. The ſea coaſts are inhabited by Banjareans, who are Mahommedans, and have long ſtrait black hair; their limbs are well proportioned, but their ſtature is low. The dreſs of the common people is much like that of the Byayos. The better ſort wear garments on their bodies, and a bit of muſlin or callico about their heads, but have neither ſhirts, ſhoes, nor ſtockings. The women are little, but handſomer than the men. They feed upon boiled rice, veniſon, fowls, eggs, and fiſh, and drink water or tea, and ſtrong liquors, when they can get them. Betel is always at hand for chewing, and both ſexes are fond of chewing and ſmoaking tobacco. They have learnt gaming of the Chineſe, and divert themſelves with dancing, comedies, ſhooting at a mark, and hunting.

The language on the coaſts is the Malayan, but the inhabitants of the inland countries have one or more proper to themſelves, and each clan has its own chief. They live in woods and thickets, and their arms are a dagger and a trunk, through which they ſhoot poiſoned darts.

The town called Borneo is on the north part of the iſland, and is built on piles. It is very populous, and has a good port. Long. 111. 27. E. Lat. 4. 55. N.

BORNHOLM, an iſland of Denmark, in the Baltick Sea, to the ſouth-eaſt of the province of Schonen. It is twenty-five miles in length, and fifteen in breadth, and is fertile in corn. They have plenty of butter, oats, and paſture. This iſland was conquered by the Swedes in 1658, but the inhabitants, under the conduct of Jens Roeſods, voluntarily ſurrendered it to the king of Denmark, on account of the bad uſage they received from the former. In 1678 a body of five thouſand Swediſh troops, in their paſſage from Pomerania to Sweden, being ſhip-wrecked on this iſland, ſuch of them as eſcaped were made priſoners of war. The inhabitants defend the iſland by their own militia, without any expence to the crown. Here is a commandant, a vice-commandant, an amtman, and other officers. The iſland contains one bailiwic, and about one hundred villages. The commandant or governor reſides at Rattum, a ſmall town. The longitude of which is 14. 56. E. Lat. 55. 15. N.

BORNO, a kingdom of Africa, to the weſt of Abyſſinia. The country is partly mountainous and partly plain. The laſt part contains ſeveral villages, and the king himſelf lives in one of the largeſt. The people conſiſt of ſhepherds and herdſmen, and, like other negroes, go almoſt naked. Their religion is Pagan, and their women are in common. The king and his army go ſouthward every year to make war with their neighbours, and generally bring home a great number of ſlaves, which he ſells to the Barbary merchants. He has no revenue but what he gets from his neighbours by force of arms. This kingdom is out of the reach of common travellers, as are moſt of the inland parts of Africa.

BORNOS, a ſmall town of Andaluſia, in Spain, ſeated in a pleaſant plain, abounding with fruit, corn, and oil, and incloſed by high mountains.

BOROUGHBRIDGE, a town in the Weſt Riding of Yorkſhire, with a market on Saturdays; and three fairs, on April 27, for horned cattle and ſheep; on July 22, for horſes, horned cattle, ſheep, and hard ware; and on October 23, for horned cattle and ſheep. It is ſeated on the river Your, over which there is a handſome ſtone bridge. It ſends two members to parliament, and is ſeventeen miles north-weſt of York, and two hundred and four north from London. Long. 1. 15. W. Lat. 54. 10. N.

BOROUGH (ſir JOHN) garter principal king at arms, in the reign of Charles I was the ſon of a Dutchman, who was a brewer at Sandwich, in Kent. He was a polite and learned gentleman, and wrote, 1. Impetus juveniles & quædam ſedatioris aliquantulum Animi Epiſtolæ. 2. The Sovereignty of the Britiſh Seas proved by the Records, Hiſtory, and municipal Laws of the Kingdom; and, 3. A Collection of the Records in the Tower of London. He died October 21, 1643.

BORREL (JOHN) more known by the name of Buteo, a learned phyſician of the ſixteenth century, was born at Charpey, near Romans, in Dauphiné, in 1492, and wrote ſeveral works, which are eſteemed. He died in 1572.

BORRHAUS (MARTIN) profeſſor in divinity at Baſil, was firſt known by the name of Cellarius. He was born at Strutgard, in the county of Wittemberg, in 1499; he received, at Heidelberg, the degree of maſter in philoſophy, afterwards removing to Wittemberg, he procured the friendſhip of Melancthon, and joined the anabaptiſts. At length quitting that ſect, and alſo the name of Cellarius, he followed a trade, but was at laſt admitted into the number of the profeſſors of the academy at Baſil, and firſt taught rhetoric, and afterwards divinity. He wrote, 1. Notes on the Politics of Ariſtotle. 2. A Commentary on Ariſtotle's Rhetoric. 3. Another on Iſaiah and the Apocalypſe. 4. Another on Job and the Eccleſiaſtes; and other works. He died of the plague at Baſil, in 1565.

BORRI (JOSEPH FRANCIS) in Latin Burrhus, a famous chemiſt and impoſtor of the ſeventeenth century. He finiſhed his ſtudies in the ſeminary at Rome, where he was admired by the Jeſuits as a prodigy, on account of his memory and capacity. He afterwards ſet up for a viſionary at the city of Milan, and declared that he ſhould ſoon finiſh his chemical labours, by the production of the philoſopher's ſtone, when he ſhould be made the general of the popiſh armies, and drive all mankind into one and the ſame fold; he was to be aſſiſted in a very particular manner by Michael the archangel; he had already received a ſword from heaven, on the hilt of which was to be ſeen the repreſentation of the ſeven intelligences, and the pope himſelf was to be put to death if he had not the requiſite mark on his forehead. He taught many other abſurdities of the ſame kind, but the inquiſition impriſoning ſome of his diſciples, he fled, and after various changes of fortune, was at laſt ſent to Rome, where he was condemned to paſs his whole life in the priſon of the inquiſition. Some writings are attributed to him, viz. Letters on Chemical Subjects, and Political Reflections.

BORRICHIUS (OLAUS) profeſſor of philology, poetry, chemiſtry, and botany, in the academy of Copenhagen, and one of the moſt learned perſons of his age, was the ſon of a Lutheran miniſter, in the dioceſe of Rippen, in Denmark, and was born April 7, 1626. He publiſhed, 1. Lingua Pharmacopœorum. 2. Diſſertationes de Poetici, Græcis & Latinis. 3. De Ortu & Progreſſu Chemiæ; and ſeveral other works. He died Oct 3, 1690.

BORROMEO (CHARLES) cardinal, archbiſhop of Milan, and one of the greateſt men in the ſixteenth century, was born in 1538, and diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his virtue, his learning, and piety. He wrote a great number of works, the greateſt part of which were printed at Milan in 1747, in five volumes, folio. He died on the 11th of November, 1584, aged forty-ſeven, and was canonized in 1610.

BORZONI (LUCIANO) a celebrated painter in the ſeventeenth century, was born at Genoa in 1590, and diſcovered from his infancy a great taſte and inclination for painting. He excelled equally in portraits and in hiſtory-pieces. All his pictures are proofs of his great abilities and genius. He died at Milan in 1645, leaving three ſons, John Baptiſt, Carlo, and Francis Maria. The two firſt died young, after having ſhewn great talents for painting. Francis Maria was born at Genoa in 1625, and principally excelled in painting landſcapes, ſea-pieces, and tempeſts, and died at Genoa in 1679.

BOS (LAMBERT) a perſon diſtinguiſhed by his learning, was born at Warcum, in the Netherlands, on the 23d of November, 1670, and was educated by his father James Bos, who taught him the Greek and Latin tongues. After being preceptor to the children of a nobleman of Holland, he went, in 1694, to the univerſity of Franeker, and by the advice of his relation, the celebrated Vitringa, he gave himſelf up entirely to the ſtudy of the Greek, and became profeſſor of that language at Franeker, in 1704, purſuing the duties of his office with great aſſiduity till his death, which happened on the 6th of January, 1717. He wrote a conſiderable number of works, which are eſteemed, viz. Διατριβαὶ, ſive Exercitationes Philologicæ, in quibus novi fœderis nonnulla loca e profanis maxime Auctoribus Græcis illuſtrantur, the beſt edition of which is that of Franeker, in 1713, octavo. 2. Myſterii Ellipſios Græce expoſiti Specimen, which has had many editions, and is of great uſe to thoſe who ſtudy the Greek Language. 3. Obſervationes miſcellaneæ ad loca quædam cum novi fœderis, tum externorum ſcriptorum Græcorum, accedit Horatii Vitringæ animadverſionum ad Joannis Vorſtii philologiam ſacram Specimen, octavo. 4. In 1709 he gave a new edition of the Verſion of the Septuagint, with ſhort Prolegomena, quarto. 5. Antiquitatum Græcarum præcipue Atticarum, brevis deſcriptio, duodecimo. 6. Animadverſiones ad Scriptores quoſdam Græcos. Accedit Specimen animadverſionum Latinarum, octavo, &c.

BOS (JOHN BAPTIST DU) a celebrated author, and member of the French academy, was born at Beauvais in 1670, and finiſhed his ſtudies at the Sorbonne. In 1695 he was made one of the committee for foreign affairs, under Mr. Torcy, and was afterwards charged with ſome important tranſactions in England, Germany, Holland, and Italy. At his return to Paris he was handſomely preferred, made an abbé, and choſen perpetual ſecretary of the French academy. He was the author of ſeveral excellent works, the principal of which are, 1. Critical Reflections upon Poetry and Painting, the beſt edition of which elegant and valuable work is that of Paris in 1740, in three volumes, duodecimo. 2. The Hiſtory of the Four Gordians, confirmed and illuſtrated by Medals. 3. A Critical Hiſtory of the Eſtabliſhment of the French Monarchy among the Gauls; the beſt editions are thoſe of 1743, in two volumes, quarto, and four volumes, duodecimo. He died at Paris, on the 23d of March, 1742.

BOSA, a maritime town in the weſtern part of the iſland of Sardinia, with a caſtle, a good port, and a biſhop's ſee. It is ſeated on the river Boſa, to the north-eaſt of an iſland of the ſame name. It has good ſalt pits, and is ſeventeen miles north-eaſt of Algheir, and twenty-eight north of Oriſtagni. Long. 8. 30. E. Lat. 40. 19. N.

BOSC (James du) a cordelier, who flouriſhed in the ſeventeenth century, and raiſed himſelf a reputation by a book which he intitled L' honnête Femme. He alſo wrote ſome pieces againſt the Janſeniſts, and other works.

Bosc (Peter du) a French miniſter, and the greateſt preacher in his time among the Proteſtants, was the ſon of William du Boſc, advocate to the parliament of Roan, and was born at Bayeux, February 21, 1623. He was choſen miniſter of the church of Caen in 1645, but his great merit giving umbrage to the enemies of the Proteſtant religion, he was baniſhed in 1664, but the ſame year obtained leave to return. The joy which appeared at Caen, on this occaſion, cannot be expreſſed; they celebrated his return with feſtivals, a great many perſons of honour of the other party congratulated him upon it, and there was a Catholic gentleman who then did one of the ſtrangeſt things that ever was ſeen; he was a perſon of diſtinction in the province, but though of an irregular life, made an open profeſſion of loving the paſtors who had particular talents, and ſeemed peculiarly enamoured with the merit of M. Du Boſc. This gentleman having a mind to ſolemnize the feaſt with a debauch, he took two Cordeliers, and made them drink ſo much, that one of them died on the ſpot. He went to ſee Mr. Du Boſc the next day, and told him that he thought himſelf obliged to ſacrifice a monk to the public joy; that the ſacrifice would indeed have been more reaſonable if it had been of a Jeſuit, but that his offering ought not to diſpleaſe him, though it was but of a Cordelier. This tragical accident, of which Mr. du Boſc was only the innocent occaſion, did not fail to diſturb the joy he felt upon ſeeing himſelf again in his family, and amongſt his flock. In 1685 Mr. du Boſc was reduced, by an act of the parliament of Normandy, not to exerciſe his miniſtry any more in the kingdom, on which he retired to Holland, and was miniſter of the church of Rotterdam till his death, which happened Jan. 2, 1692. He publiſhed ſeveral Sermons, and other pieces.

BOSCAGER (John) a celebrated civilian, born at Beziers, on the 23d of Auguſt, 1601, taught civil law at Paris with reputation, and died on the 15th of September, 1687, aged eighty-ſeven. He wrote a book, intitled, Inſtitutions of the French and Roman Law, which, it is ſaid, was printed without his conſent, and that the Remarks were not compoſed by him.

BOSCAN (John) a Spaniſh poet of the ſixteenth century, born at Barcelona. He was the friend of Garcilaſſo de la Vega, another Spaniſh poet. Theſe two were the firſt who made any great improvements in the Spaniſh poetry, and their pieces were printed together. Boſcan, who died about the year 1542, principally ſucceeded in ſonnets.

BOSCAWEN (Edward) an admiral, diſtinguiſhed by his bravery, was the ſecond ſurviving ſon of Hugh, late lord viſcount Falmouth, and having early entered into the navy, was, in 1740, captain of the Shoreham, and behaved with great intrepidity as a volunteer under admiral Vernon, at the taking of Porto Bello. At the ſiege of Carthagena, in March 1740-1, he had the command of a party of ſeamen, who reſolutely attacked and took a battery of fifteen twenty-four pounders, though expoſed to the fire of another fort of five guns. Lord Aubrey Beauclerk being killed on the 24th of March, at the attack of Boca-Chica, captain Boſcawen ſucceeded him in the command of the Prince Frederic, of ſeventy guns. On the 14th of May, 1742, he returned to England, and married Frances, daughter of William Glanville, eſq. and the ſame year was elected repreſentative in parliament for Truro, in Cornwall. In 1744 he was made captain of the Dreadnought, of ſixty guns, and ſoon after took the Medea, a French man of war, commanded by M. Hoquart, the firſt king's ſhip taken in that war. On the 3d of May, 1747, he ſignalized himſelf under the admirals Anſon and Warren, in an engagement with the French fleet, off Cape Fineſterre, and was wounded in the ſhoulder with a muſquet ball. Here M. Hoquart, who then commanded the Diamant of fifty-ſix guns, again became his priſoner, and all the French ſhips of war, which were ten in number, were taken. On the 15th of July, he was appointed rear-admiral of the blue, and commander in chief of the land and ſea forces, employed on an expedition to the Eaſt Indies; and on the 4th of November, ſailed from St. Helen's, with ſix ſhips of the line, five frigates, and two thouſand ſoldiers. On the 29th of July, 1748, he arrived at St. David's, and ſoon after laid ſiege to Pondicherry; but the men growing ſickly, and the monſoons being expected, the ſiege was raiſed, and Mr. Boſcawen ſhewed himſelf as much the general as the admiral in his retreat. Soon after he had news of the peace, and Madraſs was delivered up to him by the French.

In April, 1750, he arrived at St. Helen's in the Exeter, and found that in his abſence he had been appointed rear-admiral of the white. He was the next year made one of the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty, and choſen an elder brother of the Trinity-Houſe. On the 4th of February, 1755, he was appointed vice-admiral of the blue, and on the 19th of April, ſailing in order to intercept a French ſquadron bound to North-America, fell in with the Alcide and Lys, of ſixty-four guns each, which were both taken; on this occaſion M. Hoquart became his priſoner a third time, and he returned to Spithead with his prizes, and one thouſand five hundred priſoners. In 1756 he was appointed vice-admiral of the white, and, in 1758, admiral of the blue, and commander in chief of the expedition to Cape Breton, when, in conjunction with general Amherſt, and a body of brave troops from New-England, the important fortreſs of Louiſbourg, and the whole iſland of Cape Breton, was taken, for which he afterwards received the thanks of the houſe of commons. In 1759, being appointed to command in the Mediterranean, he arrived at Gibraltar, where hearing that the Toulon fleet, under M. de la Clue, had paſſed the Streights, in order to join that at Breſt, he got under ſail, and on the 18th of Auguſt ſaw, purſued, and engaged the enemy. His ſhip, the Namur, of ninety guns, loſing her main-maſt, he ſhifted his flag to the Newark, and after a ſharp engagement, took three large ſhips, and and burnt two in Lagos Bay, and the ſame year arrived at Spithead with his prizes, and two thouſand priſoners. On December 8, 1760, he was appointed general of the marines, with a ſalary of 3000l. per annum, and was alſo ſworn one of the privy council. This brave admiral died at his ſeat at Hatchland Park, near Guildford, in Surry, of a bilious fever, on the 10th of June, 1761.

BOSIUS (Anthony) a native of Milan, and agent of the order of Malta, lived in the ſixteenth century. He wrote a work intitled, Roma Sotteranea, which was not printed till after his death. Paul Aringhi, prieſt of the Oratory at Rome, tranſlated it into Latin.

BOSNIA, a province of Turky, in Europe, ſeated between Sclavonia and Dalmatia. It belongs entirely to the Turks. The Chriſtians were on the point of baniſhing the remainder of the Turks from this country. But when they were ready to ſtrike the blow, the Spaniards invaded Sicily, and obliged the emperor to conclude the peace of Paſſarowitz, in 1718, at which time he gave up Boſnia to the Turks. It is two hundred miles in length, and ſeventy-five in breadth. It is but a barren country, and is very little cultivated. Its principal revenue ariſes chiefly from the ſilver mines. Among the game there are falcons, which are greatly in eſteem.

BOSPHORUS of Thrace, or Canal of Conſtantinople, is a ſtreight by which the Sea of Marmora joins to the Black Sea. It is about twenty miles long, and two broad, in the narroweſt part. The Turks have built two caſtles, over-againſt each other, to guard the entrance. It yields a delightful proſpect, but the entrance is ſometimes fatal to ſhips.

BOSQUET (Francis) biſhop of Lodeve, in the province of Languedoc, in 1648, and afterwards of Montpellier, in 1655, was one of the moſt learned men of the ſeventeeth century. He wrote, 1. Notes on the Epiſtles of Innocent III. 2. The Lives of the Popes of Avignon. 3. Synopſis Legum Michaelis Pſelli; and publiſhed the Pugio Fidei of Raymond Martin.

BOSSAERT (Thomas Willeborts) a celebrated painter, was born at Bergen-op-Zoom, and, like the great painters that flouriſhed at that time, began to draw when very young, in the books that were intended for other ſtudies. Preferring his pencil to every thing elſe, he drew his own picture, by his reſemblance in a looking-glaſs, ſo like, that thoſe who ſaw it were aſtoniſhed. This he did before he had the leaſt inſtruction from any one, and when he was only twelve years of age. Upon this his parents ſent him to a maſter, that he might follow the bent of his genius; but his firſt maſter being only an indifferent painter, and incapable of ſatisfying his earneſt deſire of learning, he left him, and engaged himſelf with Gerard Segers, under whom, after four years practice, he proved a moſt accompliſhed artiſt. Antwerp being, at that time, the ſeat of arts, arts, where there was a conflux of the moſt eminent painters, he thought it the fitteſt place for his improvement, and there made ſuch a number of noble pieces, as added to the ſplendor of that wealthy city. In 1642 Henry Frederick, prince of Orange, and his ſon, prince William, employed him in their ſervice, in which he continued ſeveral years, and made thoſe excellent pieces that are to be ſeen in that prince's palace at the Hague, and other parts of Holland, and painted portraits for moſt of the perſons of quality that were then living. That great piece of his at the Hague is moſt admired, where he repreſents Mars, on one ſide provoked and excited by the Furies, and, on the other hand, Peace and Concord, ſtriving to appeaſe and reſtrain him. The martyrdom of St. George in the great church is alſo an excellent piece. He died in the flower of his age, and his loſs was much lamented by all who were acquainted with his perſon and abilities.

BOSSE (Abraham, an able engraver, born at Tours, was well ſkilled in perſpective and architecture. The impreſſions from his plates are very agreeable, and he wrote two Treatiſes, which are eſteemed, one on the Manner of Deſigning, and the other upon Engraving.

BOSSU (Rene le) a celebrated monk of St. Geneveve, born at Paris, on the 16th of March, 1631. He was the ſon of John le Boſſu, lord of Courbevoye, one of the king's privy council, and advocate-general in the court of aids. He was born with all the qualities that form eminent men, a penetrating genius, a ſound judgment, a happy memory, a lively but regular imagination, an eaſy and natural way of expreſſing himſelf, a ſweet and ſedate temper, and, what is moſt valuable, an upright heart, and a ſoul naturally inclined to piety. The firſt book he publiſhed was not well received; this was a Compariſon between the Principles of Ariſtotle's Natural Philoſophy, and thoſe of Deſcartes. But his Treatiſe upon Epic Poetry gained him a very great reputation. He died March 14, 1680, being then forty-two years old.

Bossu (James) a monk of St. Dennis, and doctor of divinity in the univerſity of Paris, was one of the moſt furious preachers of the League, before and after the death of Henry III. He printed ſome Dialogues between a Catholic and a Politician, and a Treatiſe againſt Adherence to the Heretics. The outrages of this furious preacher, in theſe pieces, againſt the parliament of Paris ſitting at Tours, and againſt all the Catholics who continued faithful to Henry IV. cannot be ſufficiently deteſted. He maintained, that hereſy being worſe than paganiſm, and paganiſm being a true atheiſm, hereſy muſt be reckoned atheiſm, and the moſt enormous ſin that can be committed, and that all heretics ought to be avoided as the plague.

BOSSUET (James Benigne) biſhop of Meaux, was born at Dijon, on the 27th of September, 1627. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his preaching, and the zeal he diſcovered in his endeavours to bring over the Proteſtants of of France to the Romiſh Church; by his oppoſition to quietiſm, and by his numerous writings, both in French and Latin, which have been collected together, and printed at Paris, in ſeventeen volumes, quarto. This famous divine died at Paris, on the 12th of April, 1704, aged ſeventy-ſeven.

BOSSUS (Matthew) diſtinguiſhed by his virtue and his learning, was born in 1427. He devoted himſelf to the eccleſiaſtical ſtate in 1451, in the congregation of regular canons of Lateran, and afterwards taught divinity at Padua. His Orations, his Sermons, and his Letters, have been often printed. He alſo wrote a ſort of an Apology for Phalaris, and other works. He died at Padua in 1502, at the age of ſeventy-five.

BOSTON, a corporation town of Lincolnſhire, has two markets, one on Wedneſdays, and the other on Saturdays, and alſo three fairs; that on May 4 is chiefly for ſheep; that on Auguſt 11 is called Town Fair, and that on December 11 is for horſes. It ſends two members to parliament, and is a large, neat, and well inhabited town, ſeated on both ſides the river Witham. It has an handſome market-place, and a church, that is reckoned the largeſt pariſh church, without croſs iſles, in Europe, and its ſteeple ſerves as a land-mark for ſailors. Boſton is governed by a mayor, who is clerk of the market and admiral of the coaſt, a recorder and his deputy, twelve aldermen, eighteen common-council men, a judge, and marſhal of the admiralty, a town-clerk, a coroner, and two ſerjeants at mace. It is thirty-eight miles north of Peterborough, thirty-ſeven north-eaſt of Lincoln, and one hundred and twenty north of London. Long. 0 15. E. Lat 53. 3 N.

Boston, the capital town of New England, in North America, was built in 1630, in a peninſula about four miles in circumference, at the bottom of Maſſachuſet's Bay, in a very convenient ſituation for trade. On the ſouth ſide are ſeveral rocks, which break the waves at the entrance of the bay; and on the north ſide there are about a dozen ſmall iſlands, called the Brewſters, ſome of which are inhabited. The entrance would be difficult, but for marks ſet up for a guide; but within the harbour there is room enough for five hundred ſhips to lie at anchor. In one of the above mentioned iſlands there is a caſtle regularly fortified, called Fort William, which ſtands well to guard the entrance. There are one hundred pieces of cannon, placed on a platform near high-water mark, ſome of which are forty-pounders. The bay is ſo much frequented, that there are twenty-four thouſand ton of ſhipping cleared annually. There are ſeveral wharfs which jut into the harbour, one of which, called Long Wharf, is eight hundred feet in length. At the bottom of the bay is a pier, about two thouſand feet in length, with a row of workhouſes on the north ſide. Ships may unlade here without the help of lighters and boats.

The ſtreets are handſome, and the chief runs from the pier to the Town-houſe or Exchange, which contains the merchant's walk, the council chamber, the houſe of the repreſentatives, and a large room for courts of juſtice. It is ſurrounded with bookſellers ſhops, among which are five printing-houſes. The town lies in the ſhape of a half-moon round the harbour, and contains about four thouſand five hundred houſes, and twenty-four thouſand inhabitants. As it ſtands upon land that riſes gradually, it affords a delightful proſpect into the ſea. It is two miles in length, and in ſome places three quarters of a mile broad. The buildings are of brick, the ſtreets ſpacious and well paved, and the water good. The predominant religion is the Independent, though there are other perſuaſions, and ten churches ſerve for them all, but the Independents have ſix. The epiſcopal church is handſomely built and adorned, and contains about one thouſand members. They have an organ, and a rich ſet of plate for the communion table. The reſt are the French church, the Baptiſt meetings, the Quakers meetings, &c. The trade with Great Britain, and the Britiſh colonies in America, procure plenty of all the neceſſaries of life, and in general the inhabitants are well dreſſed and polite. They have a market every Thurſday, and ſeveral fairs in a year. Long. 71. 5. W. Lat. 42. 24. N.

The reſidence of the governor of New England is commonly at Boſton, and here the general court and aſſembly meet, to which this town ſends four repreſentatives; and here the affairs of the whole province are tranſacted. Here likewiſe they have quarter-ſeſſions and county courts. The neck of land which joins it to the continent is but forty yards over, which ſituation, properly improved, might render it impregnable on the land ſide, eſpecially as a high tide ſometimes overflows it. Fires have happened here two or three times, but the houſes that have been deſtroyed have been rebuilt with advantage. The county it ſtands in is called Suffolk.

BOSWORTH, a town in Leiceſterſhire, has a market on Wedneſdays, and a fair on October 19, for horſes, cows, ſheep, hogs, pewter, hats, and cloaths. It has a loſty ſituation on a hill, and the country about it is fertile in corn and graſs. It is memorable for the deciſive battle fought near the town, between Richard III. and Henry earl of Richmond, wherein the former loſt his crown and life. It is thirteen miles ſouth-weſt of Leiceſter, and one hundred and four north-north-weſt of London. Long. 1. 24. W. Lat. 52. 45. N.

BOTALLUS (Leonard) phyſician to the duke of Alençon and to Henry III. was born at Aſti, in Piedmont. He introduced at Paris the practice of frequent letting of blood; which was condemned by the faculty: but ſoon after his death, it grew into practice with all the phyſicians. He publiſhed ſeveral books in phyſic and ſurgery, the beſt edition of which is that of Leyden, in 1660, in octavo.

BOTEREIUS (Rodolphus) advocate to the grand council at Paris, lived at the end of the ſixteenth and beginning of the ſeventeenth centuries, and wrote a Hiſtory of Henry IV.

BOTERO, or Boterus (John) a native of Bene, in Piedmont, flouriſhed about the end of the ſixteenth century. He was tutor to the children of Charles Emanuel, duke of Savoy, and compoſed ſeveral books in Italian, which have been tranſlated into ſeveral languages: theſe conſiſt of accounts of the governments and forces of ſeveral ſtates of Europe, political treatiſes, &c.

BOTHNIA, a province of Sweden, at the end of the gulph of the ſame name. It is divided into two parts, called Eaſt and Weſt Bothnia, the former belongs to Finland. Weſt Bothnia is full of mountains; the earth is ſandy, and yet a ſcarcity of proviſions is ſeldom known. Cattle and game are ſo common, ſalmon and a ſort of herrings ſo plenty, and the trade of ſkins is ſo gainful, that the inhabitants can command what they want from their neighbours. There are only two towns worth mentioning; theſe are Tornea and Uma. See Tornea, &c.

Their rye is ſo forward in the beginning of October, that they turn their horſes in to eat it down. They never ſow their barley till the latter end of May, or in June, and it is ready to cut down in Auguſt, the ſame time as the rye. Barley bread is much eſteemed among them. Their trees are chiefly fir and birch; but as for fruit trees, they have none, nor yet any thorns or briars. They have two or three kinds of berries that grow in the manner of ſtrawberries. In ſome places there are willow and aſpen trees. Every year they mark out the road with fir boughs ſtuck in the ſnow, that travellers may not miſs their way. In the cold weather nothing remains fluid but brandy, and the like, and then the veſſel that it is drank in will freeze to the lips, and draw blood when it is taken away. In December the ſun does not riſe till near noon, but by the help of the twilight, aurora borealis, and the whiteneſs of the ſnow, the day may be ſaid to be four hours long.

When the ſnow is on the ground, they are drawn upon ſledges chiefly by rein deer, though many uſe horſes. The ſledges are made like boats, pointed before, and keels at the bottom not above three inches broad. Thoſe for travelling are generally about four feet long, but thoſe of the Laplanders are ſix, becauſe they carry dried fiſh along with them, and the ſkins of rein deer. They are covered all over, except at one end, where there is the ſkin of a rein deer faſtened, to cover the breaſt with. All the difficulty lies in keeping theſe narrow bottomed machines upright, which thoſe that are uſed to them do with a ſtaff. The rein deer have large branched horns, which bend forward. The fleſh of theſe animals, which they eat, is tender, but inſipid. It is dried by the Laplanders, and kept a long while. They make uſe of their ſinews to ſow their boats together with. They likewiſe drink their milk, or make furmity with it. They are cloathed with the ſkins of the young ones, which have ſoft hair; the hairy ſide is worn outwards, but then they are lined with furs. They likewiſe wear ſtockings, or rather boots, made with the ſame ſkins. The rein deer will travel ſeventy or eighty miles a day, when the ſnow is hard, otherwiſe they go on but ſlowly. Their chief food is white moſs, which they find under the ſnow.

It deſerves notice, that the horſes of Bothnia, when the froſt is gone, are turned out into the foreſts, where they unite into different troops, and feed together till the ſnow returns without invading each others territories; by this means, the maſters know where to find them in any part of the ſummer. when the weather becomes bad, as it generally does in September, they come back in companies, and each horſe returns to his own ſtable, and then they are uſed in drawing ſledges. The horſes are little as well as the cows. Theſe laſt are kept at a diſtance from Tornea, and the women go in boats to milk them. The inhabitants of Bothnia are Proteſtants, and are a civil and well behaved people.

BOTTZENBURG, a town of Germany, in the duchy of Mecklenburg. It had a caſtle, but that was deſtroyed by the Danes, in 1202. It is ſeated on the Elbe, and the veſſels that paſs by are obliged to pay a conſiderable toll. Long. 10 48. E. Lat. 53. 34. N.

BOVA, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, in the Farther Calabria, with a biſhop's ſee. It is twenty miles ſouth-eaſt of Reggio. Long. 16. 15. E. Lat. 37. 55. N.

BOUCHAIN, a ſtrong town of the Low Countries, in Hainault, and the capital of Oſtervant. It was built by king Pepin, and is ſeated on the river Scheld, which divides it into two parts; it conſiſts only of one pariſh, beſides which there is a ſmall convent of penitent nuns; it is fortified with four baſtions, large half-moons, and deep ditches. It was taken by the duke of Orleans, in 1676, and by the allies in 1701, but was retaken by the French the next year. It is nine miles ſouth-weſt of Valenciennes, eight north-eaſt of Cambray, and ten ſouth-eaſt of Doway. Long. 3. 15. E Lat. 50. 17. N.

BOUCHER (John) doctor of the Sorbonne, and curate of St. Bennet's at Paris, at the time of the league, was a ſpreader of ſedition, and the moſt ſtubborn and unruly perſon among the rebels. It was he, who, giving orders to ſound the alarm-bell in his church, September 2, 1587, contributed more than all the reſt to the ſtirring up of the people againſt king Henry III. After that prince's death, he preached that his ſucceſſor ought not to obeyed, and publiſhed nine ſermons, in which he declared, that his abjuration was nothing but a piece of diſſimulation; however, in ſpight of his ſermons and his libels, the Pariſians ſubmitted to Henry IV. and Boucher retired into the Low Countries with the Spaniſh garriſon which was at Paris during the league, on the 22d of March, 1594. He got a canonry at Tournai, and died dean of the chapter of that city fifty years afterwards.

BOUCHET (John) a native of Poictiers, flouriſhed in the ſixteenth century, and was the author of a great number of books both in verſe and proſe. The moſt conſiderable of his writings is that intitled the Annals of Aquitaine; he alſo wrote ſeveral pieces of poetry, the moſt curious of which is his Chapelet des Princes.

BOUCICAUT, or John le Meingre, a celebrated marſhal of France, count of Beaufort, and viſcount of Turenne, was the ſon of John Boucicaut, or le Meingre, who was alſo marſhal of France. He took up arms when but ten years of age, and fought by the ſide of king Charles VI. at the battle of Roſebec, in 1382, and was ſent to Genoa, to take poſſeſſion of that city, which had ſubmitted to the king. He at length diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour in fighting againſt the Turks, Venetians, and Engliſh; but being taken priſoner at the battle of Agincourt, in 1415, where he commanded the vanguard, he was carried into England, where he died in 1421.

BOUDRI, a town of Switzerland, in the principality of Neufchatel, ſeated on the river Reuſe. Long. 7, 5. E. Lat. 47. 11. N.

BOUFLERS (Lewis Francis, duke of) a peer and marſhal of France, was born on the 10th of March, 1644, of a noble and ancient family. He diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his valour and conduct in many ſieges and battles, and had the command of the right wing, when the French were defeated, at the bloody battle of Malplaquet. He died at Fontainbleau, on the 22d of Auguſt, 1711, aged ſixty-eight.

Marſhal Bouflers, his ſon, died at Genoa, after having delivered that republic.

BOUGEANT (William Hyacinth) a famous Jeſuit, born at Quimper, on the 4th of November, 1690. After having taught humanity at Caen and Nevers, he ſettled at the college of Lewis the Great, where he employed himſelf in writing ſeveral works, the principal of which are, 1. A Collection of phyſical Obſervations, extracted from the beſt authors. 2. An Hiſtory of the Wars and Negotiations which preceded the treaty of Weſtphalia. 3. The Hiſtory of the Treaty of Weſtphalia. 4. The female Doctor, a philoſophical Amuſement on the Language of Beaſts, &c. He died at Paris, on the 7th of January, 1743.

BOUGI (marquis of) lieutenant-general of the armies of France in the ſeventeenth century. See Reverend.

BOUHIER (John) preſident à mortier in the parliament of Dijon, and one of the forty members of the French Academy, was born at Dijon on the 16th of March, 1673. He diſcovered in his infancy a great inclination to learning; he obtained the knowledge of the languages and of civil law, became an excellent magiſtrate, and one of the beſt writers amongſt the French. He wrote, 1. Diſſertations on Herodotus. 2. Remarks on ſeveral of Cicero's Works. 4. The Art of Pleaſing in Converſation; and a great number of other books. He died on the 17th of March, 1746, aged ſeventy-three.

BOUHOURS (Dominic) a famous Jeſuit, and one of the moſt elegant French writers, taught humanity at Paris; but the frequent pains in his head, with which he was tormented till his death, made him quit his profeſſorſhip, when he was entruſted with the education of the two young princes de Longueville; and at length M. Colbert entruſted him with the education of his ſon, the marquis de Seignelay. He wrote, 1. The Converſations of Ariſteus and Eugenius. 2. Remarks and Doubts on the French Tongue. 3. The Life of St. Ignatius. 4. The Life of St. Francis Xavier. 5. That of Madame de Bellefonds. 6. Dialogues upon the Art of Thinking well in Works of Genius; and other works. He died on the 27th of May, 1702, aged ſeventy-five.
